I want to move on to part 2 of the Bill, which will plug a significant gap in existing equalities legislation. During the consultation process, a number of organisations strongly called for the extension of protection against religious discrimination. At present, that protection applies only to employment conditions. The Bill's provisions in respect of discrimination on grounds of religion or belief are designed to answer those concerns.

The Bill will also address the imbalance that has emerged from case law under the Race Relations Act 1976. People of the Jewish faith and in the Sikh community are afforded protection in certain areas of the law as ethnic groups, while members of other religions and faiths are not. For example, a Jew or a Sikh who is refused service in a restaurant or a shop can challenge that discrimination through the legal system, but members of any other religion or belief who receive the same unfair treatment cannot. I hope that all hon. Members will agree that it is simply unacceptable that a shop, hotel or restaurant can lawfully refuse to serve Muslims, and a golf club can refuse to accept them as members, whereas the same practices would be outlawed if applied to Jewish or Sikh men and women.

Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend and her team on this important Bill, but does she agree that, in this context, another lesson can be drawn from Northern Ireland? The very deep religious and cultural differences there meant that the Equality Commission for Nothern Ireland played a crucial role in the Good Friday agreement. Its recognition of the differences was an essential element in resolving some of the cultural problems in Northern Ireland.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend speaks from deep personal experience, as she made an enormous contribution to the process of achieving the Good Friday agreement. She is right: a commission that recognises the cultural differences that can give rise to prejudice and discrimination can help to create the fairer and more harmonious society that we all want. Fially, I should like to take this opportunity to say how much the House will miss my hon. Friend in the next Parliament.

Part 2 of the Bill will end the anomaly that I described. The proposed measures will make it unlawful to discriminate on grounds of religion or belief in the provision of goods, facilities or services, or to discriminate against or harass a person on those grounds in disposing of or renting property, in the provision of education or in the exercise of other public functions. Various exceptions are provided for, for example in the case of faith schools, Parliament, the security agencies and the armed forces—again following precedent in these matters—and of course the courts.

Linda Perham: With reference to goods, facilities and services, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is a cause of great grievance among older people when they are discriminated against—for example, when somebody over 70 tries to hire a car? Although part 2 concentrates on religion and belief, there are older people who believe that the anomalies affecting them should be addressed.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an important point, which we will certainly address in the review of equalities legislation, to which I shall return shortly. It is an important point, but it was simply not possible to address all the implications of that in the Bill.

With regard to part 2, I thank the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), for the enormous efforts that she and her officials have made to ensure that we could have the relevant provisions in the Bill. That is an important step forward.

Part 3 brings sex discrimination legislation into step with race and disability legislation. We have already introduced a duty on the public sector to promote race equality, and we plan to enact a duty to promote equality between disabled and non-disabled people. The Bill ensures similar provisions in relation to gender, so public authorities will be prohibited from sex discrimination in carrying out their public functions, and will have a new duty to promote equality of opportunity between men and women when carrying out those functions, and to tackle unlawful discrimination.

Mr. Boswell: Does that mean that for the new strands—the ones not historically represented by commissions—that duty will not be written into the provisions? What is the thinking behind that apparent discrimination? There seems to be a functional distinction between those who are reinforced by their traditional position, and those who come new to the issue.

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point, to which I alluded when responding to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North (Linda Perham) on the question of age discrimination. It is simply not possible in the Bill to deal with every aspect of the inconsistencies in the legislative treatment of different groups.

In closing, I should like to put the Bill into the broader context of the other steps that we as a Government are taking to deal with discrimination and to promote equality. The Bill will, as I have indicated, take three important steps—the gender duty, the extension of discrimination law on grounds of religion or belief, and above all, the establishment of the single equality and human rights commission. But we are taking two other hugely important steps. We have already established an equalities review, which is being led by Trevor Phillips, who is also the chair of the Commission for Racial Equality, to look at the long-term and underlying causes of inequality and disadvantage. That much wider review will inform the work of the single commission and provide practical recommendations on key policy priorities for the Government, but not only for the Government—also for the public sector, employers, trade unions, the voluntary sector and civil society as a whole.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Ms Hewitt: Let me, if I may, finish the point.

We have also launched a review of equality legislation to correct the inconsistencies and inequalities in our discrimination law. That work, which will seek to simplify and modernise the law, will move towards the establishment of a single equality Act, for which equality organisations and many of my hon. Friends have been campaigning for many years. I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant).

Chris Bryant: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. I am grateful also for the way that she continued her sentence. Perhaps it would have been better if I had not intervened on her. She seems to have answered the point made by the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) by suggesting that once the two reviews are finished, it should be possible for us to have a Bill that would require the new organisation to adopt the duty across the piece, so that equality is not atomised, but dealt with as a whole.

[Chris Bryant]

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. It is precisely the scope not only of the duty on public authorities, but of various other aspects of anti-discrimination law that we will be able to examine in the review of equalities legislation—a review that my Department is leading and on which we have already started. It might be helpful if I say that there will be a full consultation and a properly inclusive process as we look at the various aspects of anti-discrimination law.

The Bill, and more broadly our strategy to counter inequality and discrimination, is a product of work right across Government. I am very grateful indeed to all my right hon. and hon. Friends who have worked as a single team not only to promote the Bill, but to put in place the two other reviews that I mentioned. We also have the cross-Government strategy to promote racial equality and social cohesion, which is being led by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary; the work to take forward the national employment panel's recommendations for increasing employment and business growth for ethnic minorities, which is led by my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions; and the work on improving the life chances for people with disabilities and the recently published strategy on age diversity, led my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions.

As I said, we in the Government believe that equality and human rights are not minority concerns. They are the cornerstones of a strong and fair society, and of a strong and prosperous society. They are the foundations of the mutual trust and respect that we all wish to see in our country. Earlier today my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced the date of the next general election, so in a few days we will be leaving the House for our constituencies and the election campaign. I hope that all of us who have had the privilege of serving as Members of the House and all who aspire to do so will avoid doing anything to arouse or exploit prejudice against any group in our society.

In the election campaign, there will of course be sharp disagreements and passionate debate. That is as it should be, and it is a tribute to our democracy and to the freedom of speech and political expression that we cherish, and which is entrenched in our Human Rights Act, that it should be so. But let us exercise that freedom of speech in a way that reflects the best traditions of the House, rather than the worst elements of some of our media. I trust that once we have had the verdict of the British people, the Bill will proceed to full enactment. I believe that it is good for individuals, good for our communities and good for the social and economic strength of our country, and I commend it to the House.

3.8 pm

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I begin by declaring my interests, as set out in the register.

I apologise for the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien), whose middle son had quite a big heart operation a couple of days ago. My hon. Friend felt that he should be with his family at this time. His boy is making good progress, I am pleased to say.

I am grateful to the Secretary of State for the clear way in which she explained the Bill. Whatever our concerns about the Bill—we have a number of them—she has worked hard on the agenda with her right hon. Friend the Deputy Minister for Women and Equality. In 2002 she published the consultation paper, "Equality and Diversity: Making it Happen". We then had the statement of intent in October 2003 and the White Paper in 2004, followed by the Bill. Whatever our disagreements with the Secretary of State about red tape, regulation and many other themes that we have pursued, she can be proud that what she has worked so hard on is coming to fruition. All Conservative Members praise the work that she and her team have done, but there will soon be an election and everything is now riddled with uncertainty.

I offer our broad support for the Bill, particularly clause 3 on the fundamental duties of the commission. The Opposition sign up to those aspirations. We support the principle of bringing the Equal Opportunities Commission, the Commission for Racial Equality and the Disability Rights Commission together and adding the new strands of sexual orientation, religion or belief and age. Given that no statutory body is charged with promoting human rights, it makes sense to give that duty to the new commission for equality and human rights.

Mr. Boswell: I am pleased to hear my hon. Friend's authoritative welcome for the Bill's principles. In heaping justified praise on the Government for their changes following consultation, does he agree that that is an object lesson to the House and the country in the formulation of public policy? We have already made many improvements in the initial process that drives us forward to the need for careful consideration. The Secretary of State referred to the commission and we want the correct final outcome, which we have not yet reached.

Mr. Bellingham: I would like to praise my hon. Friend for his work on disability issues over many years, and I also praise my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing). Members of Parliament and Front Bench spokesmen on both sides of the House have worked hard on a non-party political basis. I agree that it is important that the Bill should go into Committee because we want clarification on a number of points.

I shall raise some general concerns, but first I want to examine some specific points because it is obvious that the Bill will not go into Committee in the near future. If the Minister has time when she winds up, perhaps she will clarify one or two points. Clause 6 covers disclosure, so what will be the impact of the Freedom of Information Act 2000?

Under clause 13 on monitoring progress, as I said during my brief intervention on the Secretary of State, the commission will be required to publish a report within three years of the Bill coming into force and every three years thereafter. That will be approximately once in the lifetime of a Parliament, which is insufficient scrutiny. Perhaps we can return to that.

Clause 30 refers to legal assistance and subsection (1) enables the commission to give assistance to an individual who is the victim of discrimination or "who is or may become party to legal proceedings".

Will the cost of that assistance come from the commission's budget or will it be funded by the Legal Services Commission, and what is the relationship between the two? The commission for equality and human rights could be running other cases—for example, judicial review cases under clause 32—and that could have a substantial impact on its budget. What would happen if it ran over budget? Will there be a supplemental budget for such legal cases and will the Legal Services Commission be involved?

Clauses 38 to 40 refer to dissolution, which is highly relevant to today's announcement, the transfer of property, rights and liabilities and to the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981. What about the existing commissions' ongoing cases? It is important during the transition period that the three commissions are not deterred from launching new actions and it is equally important that existing legal actions are pursued with the usual professionalism, resources and commitment. I hope that the Minister can give an assurance on that.

Clause 34 refers to public sector duties and enables the commission to require a public authority to comply with its public sector duties covering gender, race and disability. What about the other strands of age, religion or belief and sexual orientation, to which the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) alluded? Age Concern is worried about that and sees some illogicality. It believes that omission of the other strands and the relationship of public authorities in terms of their duty goes against the essence of the commission's approach.

The Secretary of State kindly wrote to me and other colleagues on 25 February announcing the Government's equalities review, which will run in tandem with the Department of Trade and Industry's discrimination law review. The equalities review will be chaired by Trevor Phillips and will report in 2006. It will review all equality legislation. Is it sensible to go ahead with the Bill before we have the findings of those reviews? We support the broad outline of the Bill, but some important reviews will report in the near future.

Stonewall has said:

"the creation of the CEHR will show that the current inequality in legislative provision is untenable. A Single Equality Bill, simplifying and standardising equality legislation for all protected groups, will bring greater clarity for individuals and employers as well as equality for those groups who are lagging behind."

That view is echoed by other bodies.

Angela Eagle: Is the hon. Gentleman arguing that the Bill should not be reintroduced early in the next Parliament but should be delayed for a year or two?

Mr. Bellingham: It is important to get the Bill right and it might be better to have one really good Bill following the outcome of those reviews. Perhaps the Minister will respond to that.

The Disability Rights Commission states in its briefing to Members on the importance of harmonised equality legislation:

"The DRC believes that a CEHR cannot be fully effective without new legislation to level up the current provisions for the various equality strands ... The wide disparities within current equality legislation will result in different groups of people having different levels of protection."

That is my concern and I hope that the Minister will be able to respond to that when she winds up.

Helen Jackson: In light of the current circumstances and the detailed examination that the Conservatives have given to their spending plans if they were to form a Government, have they earmarked expenditure for these provisions and will they support and push for them, or will they be among the £35 billion of cuts?

Mr. Bellingham: That is a red herring. We have made it clear that we will streamline the Department of Trade and Industry and cut some of its funds. Its budget and the number of staff have risen sharply over the past eight years and there will be plenty of money around for important legislation and maintaining priorities. If I am fortunate enough to be in the position of the Minister of State and in charge of the legislation, the DTI team will do what it can to ensure that those priorities are maintained.

Chris Bryant: I want to take a different tack, but before doing so, I have to say that it is a delight to hear the hon. Gentleman citing Stonewall in this Chamber. He would not have done so five or 10 years ago and we are enormously grateful for that change in the Conservative party in recent months.

The hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) said earlier from a sedentary position that the Conservatives would introduce a similar Bill soon after the general election. If he can do so with a straight face, will the hon. Gentleman say how quickly they might introduce such legislation when they win the general election?

Mr. Bellingham: The hon. Gentleman mentions the word "when"; perhaps he has seen the opinion poll in the Financial Times today. Obviously, I cannot pre-empt what my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) will do in his first Queen's Speech, but our Front-Bench spokesmen and spokeswomen feel strongly about the Bill and will do all we can to pursue its important priorities if the electorate give us the mandate.

On disability rights and the work of the DRC, I recently had a useful meeting with the West Norfolk disability information service—WNDIS—and its representatives, Mr. Jonathan Toye and Mr. Brian Reed. They expressed concern that the new commission will not have the same focus, bite, and detailed and expert knowledge that the DRC has. We discussed at some length how the disability rights functions of the new commission will work. I feel, as they did, that the commission must reflect the unique and complex nature of disability as well as the distinctive legislative provisions on disability. Incidentally, they do a superb job helping disabled people in my constituency, explaining what their rights are, sponsoring cases in which there has been injustice and a breach of those rights, explaining to local businesses exactly what they should be doing, and working with local public bodies. We discussed the importance of the commission having a dedicated disability committee, and I should like the Minister to elaborate on that and to put at rest the minds of two excellent and hard-working constituents of mine who are concerned that the DRC's expertise and professionalism should be continued.

[Mr. Bellingham]

Is there a real possibility that the other strands will also want their own dedicated committees? I have always been in favour of a federal approach, under which the commission would be an umbrella body focusing on cross-cutting and shared issues together with units and appointed committees, with executive powers, concerned with each strand. Whether it is too late to go down that route, I do not know, but there is the obvious precedent of the disability committee.

We support the idea of a one-stop shop. We find it attractive, and it has been welcomed by a lot of organisations, such as the CBI, which has not always supported what the Government have done, but which said:

"The current approach is often confusing, time consuming and does not offer adequate support for issues crossing over different equality strands. A single commission would have the advantage of being a simple 'one-stop shop' for advice on all equality issues, presenting a joined-up approach that could help rationalise support."

It is important that the Government should listen to business needs, and the Government's White Paper, issued a short while ago, noted on page 164, in paragraph 7.23:

"The Government expects members of the ... board and senior management team to include people with experience of business and management to help ensure that, as an organisation, it is equipped to engage constructively."

We certainly support that, particularly bearing in mind the importance of small businesses, which represent 99 per cent. of all firms. They generate 52 per cent. of the country's wealth, and many prefer to work through intermediaries. That is why it is vital that the commission should make a special effort to work with those intermediaries so that it is able to get through to the small businesses that are such an important part of our wealth creation.

There is no reason why the commission cannot develop as an authoritative and credible body. Merging different organisations into one should lead to efficiencies. I am well aware that the start-up costs of any new super-commission will be substantial. I understand that they will be in excess of £24 million. The transfer of undertakings will obviously be expensive, and there will be a need for new IT systems. However, given that the three existing strands will come into one body, even though there are three new strands and even though human rights work will come in, economies of scale should surely lead to a lowering of costs.

I do not understand why the DTI will not insist that a really impressive example is set here. Yet, page 47 of the explanatory notes to the Bill makes it quite clear that the estimated annual budget of the new commission when fully operational—not before 2007, and possibly later—will be £70 million. That is up from a combined budget of the existing commissions of £43 million. Most of the extra cost will be down to the extra staff, but there surely could be substantial savings on staff. In rationalising and merging IT departments and other departments, such as public relations, there should surely be a case for a more streamlined operation. I should have thought we could easily consider the new commission employing fewer than 500 staff and still doing a really good job. Surely the Secretary of State should at least try to deliver that and to set an example.

In theory, merging and consolidating existing regulators into a new super-regulator should lead to more efficiency and a simplified service. On the other hand, if one thinks of recent history, that has not always been the case. Consider the Financial Services Authority, whose handbook now runs to more than 8,000 pages. Can it really be said that the FSA is better run and more user friendly than some of its predecessor bodies, such as the Investment Management Regulatory Organisation and the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation? The DTI should do its level best to set a good example of a state-of-the-art, efficient organisation that offers really good value for money.

On the subject, incidentally, of the DTI setting a good example, the Secretary of State mentioned that diversity is important. Why, therefore, do a significant majority of DTI officials—60 per cent. in a recent survey—not agree with the statement:

"I believe that DTI recognises the diversity of its customers and adapts its policies to reach them."?

The Secretary of State has rightly said that it is important to narrow the gender pay gap, and we feel strongly about that. Why, then, is there still a 16 per cent. difference between male and female salaries at the DTI, a figure only marginally better than the national average? Surely that should concern the Secretary of State.

We are, to some extent, in a slightly surreal situation. We are debating a vital matter an issue of great importance to millions of people. Yet everyone knows that we are putting up a façade this afternoon and that the Bill will go nowhere. That is why it is important that the Bill should be brought back at an early stage after the election.

I should make one point to the Secretary of State. We have made it clear all along that we support the Bill. The Liberal Democrats also support the Bill. Yet quite a few Bills have been brought before the House in this Session that did not command cross-party support. Why was not this Bill given greater priority? Why did not the Government bring it forward months ago? We would have supported it, and it could be on the statute book. I do not understand that at all. It does not seem to make any sense. There were no logical, technical or practical reasons why it could not have been brought forward.

As an Opposition, we feel strongly that everyone should be given fair treatment. Discrimination of any kind is morally wrong. It destroys lives; it breaks up families; it ruins health. It also destroys wealth, because the most valuable asset of any business is its employees. If they are undervalued, undermined or discriminated against, how can they give of their best? If their lives are falling apart because their home life is a misery, how can they go to work with motivation and commitment?

We want everyone to be given every possible opportunity to reach the maximum fulfilment of their lives, free of any kind of discrimination, free of any kind of abuse and free of any kind of prejudice. We respect and support much of the work that the Government have done, but we are equally proud of our own party's record, especially on disability, and particularly of the work done by the late right hon. Nick Scott when he was Minister for Social Security and Disabled People and by my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) when he was in that post. Our party has an excellent record on these issues, and that is why, if we do win the support of the electorate, we will continue with that work.

3.29 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab): Not only do I agree strongly with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, but I find myself agreeing with the main thrust of the remarks of the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) and with the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), who has made a distinguished contribution on disability matters, when they welcome the Bill and, I assume, welcome the aspects of it that refer to disability.

It seems odd, on a day when an election has been declared, that the House is again showing that we can reach agreement on important issues. If the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk sounded a little impatient, I hope that in the course of my remarks I will be able to reassure him that, particularly in the field of disability, patience is, I am afraid, something that has to be acquired. I hope, nevertheless, that when my party is deservedly re-elected in a few weeks' time, it will bring the Bill back to the House very speedily, if only because of its great merits.

The Bill's main thrust is to establish a commission for equality and human rights. That will, of course, take over disability rights, and I want to devote most of my speech to that, as well as to the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission.

There are, as you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, 10 million people in this country who experience some aspect of disability, and of course it is right that in a society committed to pluralism we bear in mind not just their needs but their rights, including the rights of participation which were, to some extent, discussed following the statement earlier today.

I wonder whether the House will, if only for a few moments, allow me a degree of nostalgia when I refer to the setting up of the Disability Rights Commission. As someone who was fairly heavily involved in that policy, it seems to me that its existence will last for a shorter term than I expected. Reflecting on the formation of the DRC, I can tell the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk that the intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Helen Jackson)—a very distinguished parliamentarian whom we will miss very much—was extremely relevant.

As the member of the shadow Cabinet responsible for disability matters before 1997, it was my task to contribute to policy formulation and to present to my party's annual conference, which I was very proud to do, the proposal that such a measure should be included in the manifesto and then introduced by a Labour Government. I was proud to do it, particularly after we had been defeated by a mere 13 votes by the previous Government, whose spokesman on disability, the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), who later became Conservative party leader, strongly resisted the idea.

My hon. Friend's intervention was relevant to this extent: I can tell the House that before I was able to make the declaration to our party conference, seek its approval and, I hope, have something to do with its inclusion in our manifesto for the 1997 election, the proposal had to be costed very carefully. I remember long conversations well into the night on the Friday before conference, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, who was then the shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury. We did not get an agreement easily, but once it was done we knew that the proposal had been costed and was to be part of our Government's policy, and I am very glad that that has been implemented. These matters have to be considered carefully, so my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough is right.

When it was proposed to set up a new commission embracing other bodies, including one for disability, I took the view that there might be a backlash against the idea, but I am pleased that that has not happened. That was largely because of the way in which the Government dealt with the matter, which included setting up the taskforce, and also because they went out of their way to embrace not just the DRC but the various disability organisations that realised, although they were so supportive of the DRC, that they would have an even stronger role in a larger, more effective and influential body. I hope that that is how things will develop.

I can remember the Disability Action Network, some of whose members decided to occupy Labour party headquarters for nearly a day, initially to protest about lack of access. Once they found that it was easy to get to the third floor, where the national executive met, they changed their demands. They wanted an immediate declaration from the then Leader of the Opposition—now my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister—that a commission would be set up. We do not make policy under those conditions, and I said so. However, because of those strong feelings, I want to refer to the views of the DRC.

It is true that there are reservations about some aspects of the Government's thinking, but the DRC view on the Bill is clear. It says that it "marks a new approach to equality and human rights which we believe has great potential to transform the life chances of disabled people and other marginalised groups in our society".

I know that the House will give great weight to the views of the DRC in that regard.

The DRC went on to say—and I agree—that there is a need for "strong advocacy and a real voice in an effective enforcement body".

It hopes that the commission will follow that path. The DRC's emphasis is important. As I said, it welcomed the main proposals but said that the Government's proposal for at least one disabled commissioner and a disability committee for at least five years should be widely debated in the House before the Bill is enacted, if only to answer the questions: why five years, and why impose a limit at all? Those are fair questions, and I endorse them.

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

The DRC generally welcomes both the wide enforcement powers at the disposal of the commission for equality and human rights and the remit to promote and investigate human rights—as far as it goes. Many Members on both sides of the House want it to go further. The new provisions to counter discrimination on grounds of religion or belief in relation to goods, services and facilities, and the new duty for the public sector to promote gender equality are welcome, too. They certainly represent progress.

The DRC supports a single measure on equality, and I welcome the intervention by the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce). He made an important point, representing a view that is widely shared. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may not have had time to respond in detail, but perhaps the Government's position will be expressed with greater clarity in the wind-up, not least because of what we read in the excellent Library note. Library briefings are always good, but Vincent Keter has done a superb job on the Equality Bill. He refers to the TUC. Indeed, I shall simply quote what the TUC said:

"In the interests of social justice and fairness, a single equality act should establish high and consistent standards of protection across all equality areas. A single equality body established without the full statutory backing of fair, comprehensive and transparent equality legislation would lack authority and have trouble dealing with the expectations of different interest groups."

That is also the view of the Commission for Racial Equality.

Angela Eagle: Is my right hon. Friend aware that that is also Labour party policy? The policy forum was of that opinion when it met last year, and that opinion was subsequently agreed at last year's conference.

Mr. Clarke: I am delighted, as always, to be reminded by my hon. Friend of the importance of Labour party policy formulation.

Before I deal with another aspect of the Library paper to which I have referred, I should like to ask whether copies of the Bill—or rather, in due course, the Act—will be made available promptly in the full range of accessible formats, so that people with all sorts of disability can have access to it. The Government are committed to a more inclusive society, as the Bill shows. They have an excellent record in challenging discrimination and prejudice across the board. That, too, is reflected in the Bill. I urge them to confirm yet again the importance of enforcement, promotion and a robust commitment to the human rights remit.

I should like to refer—very briefly, as other hon. Members want to speak—to the other aspect of the Library paper. In respect of disability, it refers to the hierarchy of equality and expresses the view that some groups have been left with less protection than others. I believe that to be the case, and I believe that it is wrong. We should seek to put it right.

The Library paper says that the equality commission will amplify the impact of discrimination legislation and promote equality. It rightly talks about employment, which is crucial if people with disabilities are to make progress and gain the feeling that they are a very important part of our society, respected and encouraged to achieve their full potential.

The Disability Discrimination Bill rightly addresses goods and services issues, but we have not been as specific as the disability organisations would like, especially in relation to transport issues. I certainly take the view that, although we have made tremendous progress under this Government, some public bodies might be encouraged to reflect the disability awareness that we have accepted in the House.

I should like to give an example, without, I hope, being at all patronising. Today, I decided to ring Mencap—one of the many wonderful organisations involved in this field—and the young woman who answered the phone has learning disabilities. I simply wish to say that there are many public bodies whose personnel could well emulate the absolutely charming, helpful and efficient way in which that young lady did her duties, and it is that sort of approach that we want to encourage.

I referred in an earlier intervention to the Government's thinking about Scotland. I welcome what they have to say about Scotland, and in particular, the links that they have already established with the Scottish Executive, with the proposal for a Scottish representative on the commission and the encouraging of an annual report to the Scottish Parliament. I welcome that very much, as long as it is consistent with the commission itself. We will provide resources and staffing so that the commission has the best possible professionalism and advice to allow it to make the kind of report that that Parliament—and this Parliament, for our interests—is entitled to receive.

I have spoken about disability, but I know that the Bill embraces other aspects of human rights, which I welcome. For example, it adds to the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970. Mr. Speaker has arranged a reception tomorrow evening at which my good friend Lord Morris of Manchester will be the principal guest, and it is right for that Act to be honoured 35 years on.

Next Monday—11 April—is the 19th anniversary of the Third Reading of my private Member's Bill that became the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986. Yesterday, I was delighted to be in the Chamber to hear moving tributes to the late Lord Callaghan. I remember that on the day when we tried to get that Bill through, as I sat under the clock showing the customary humility that the House would expect, Jim Callaghan appeared and stood at the Bar. I understood that he had travelled from Cardiff that day to ensure that we had a quorum for the vote so that we could get the Bill through, which we did. I would dearly have loved the advocacy aspects of the Act to have been implemented. I pray for that even today, and hope that when the Equality Bill is enacted in due course, as I passionately believe that it should be, there will not be the delay in implementation that other Acts have experienced.

The Bill is welcome and noble. Whatever the differences that we will demonstrate over the coming weeks—I will play my part in debating them—I think that it reflects the basic commitment of the British people to a civilised society, which is reflected by the Government's policy on such important matters.

3.47 pm

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke), whose record of campaigning on disability issues, especially, is perhaps unrivalled in the House. I have been happy to support him on several occasions. He gave an eloquent testimony to the reasons why he supports the Bill and how he has come to arrive at that point.

Before I go into the details of our support for the Bill, may I apologise, especially to the Deputy Minister for Women and Equality, for the fact that I will have to leave just before the end of the debate, although no discourtesy is intended? I am pleased to say that she will know that although I have several comments to make about the Bill, my party certainly supports it and regrets, in one sense, that our debate is only a rehearsal for proceedings that will presumably take place in the fairly near future and follow through to the Bill's enactment.

The very title of the Bill seems to encapsulate how we have turned round 180° in our approach to these issues. It is not an anti-discrimination Bill, but an equality Bill, which represents a fundamental change of approach. Indeed, although I noticed that the Joint Committee described clause 3 as being more like a party manifesto than a piece of legislation, the provision nevertheless makes it clear that the Bill is hugely aspirational, with the intention of promoting equality rather than giving people the means of dealing with discrimination. After all, the opportunity to deal with discrimination comes only after the event if the law gives one rights to protest against it. The Bill is an attempt to give people legal rights so that they are equal in the first place. That is a fundamentally different approach.

Reading through the submissions that we have received, I was interested to see that, whatever their initial reaction, the overwhelming majority of organisations are now pretty well on board, although some have made supplementary comments on what is necessary. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the legislation's application in Scotland. Even those of us who represent Scottish constituencies appreciate the fact that the Bill addresses the differences between the roles of the Scottish Parliament and the Westminster Parliament, but I hope that when the Bill is enacted and the commission is established some clarifications will be made available, otherwise people in Scotland might be confused about where to turn for support. I am sure that that can be done.

In an intervention on the Secretary of State, I raised what will be the main thrust of my speech, which is my hope that a single equality Act will deal effectively with the hierarchy of equality, which the right hon. Gentleman also mentioned. In the past, we have addressed different aspects of equality in a piecemeal fashion through different pieces of legislation, with the result that the various aspects are perceived to be of different degrees of importance. That is why the disability rights organisations, for example, were concerned and suggested that—in a sense as a gesture—the Bill should provide for a person who is or has been disabled to be on the commission. In reality, it is inconceivable that the commission will not represent and promote the interests of disabled people. The issue will not be whether a person has been disabled, but what is done to ensure that disabled people's rights and opportunities are promoted to the full.

At this point, let me make a small special plea, as I tend to do on occasions such as this, as chairman of the all-party group on deafness, which has been established in the past year. There is a range of disabilities, each of which brings different needs. We have not set up the all-party group on deafness to detach ourselves from the general campaign on disability rights. We simply acknowledge that there are discrete issues of particular concern to deaf people that need to be addressed separately, while continuing to support and to work in full co-operation with other groups.

I welcomed the Department for Work and Pensions' recognition of sign language, which took place within the past couple of years. It was nicely publicised as the Government giving official recognition to British sign language; in fact, it was the Department doing so and I have not seen anything comparable from other Departments, such as the Department for Education and Skills. My serious point is that the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe is determining what type of legal instrument can be added to the European convention on human rights to give sign language users the recognition that has been given to users of other minority languages. It is worth putting on record the fact that in the UK there are more users of British or Irish sign language than speakers of Welsh or Gaelic, yet the resources that the latter two languages attract are probably 50 times as great as those that go to sign language. Although I welcome the DWP initiative, it is only a drop in the ocean of what is needed to enable sign language users to use their language fully in the wide range of circumstances to which clause 3 refers. I hope that the commission recognises that it should take a proactive approach to that issue.

Having put that on the record, I shall get down from my soapbox and address the mechanics of the Bill and its proposals. Several of the groups that made representations have argued the case for a single equality Act. The Equal Opportunities Commission supported that case particularly well, saying that if the new body is to be effective, it must be backed up by a consistent legal framework, be able to fulfil a full range of roles, be organised and resourced to work effectively in Scotland and Wales as well as in England and Great Britain, and be able to deal effectively with each of the equality strands and with human rights. It also has to be properly resourced.

I do not disagree with the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), in that it is legitimate for the following question to be asked and for the Government to spell out the answer. They do not have to do so today. It is: why will the new body cost £70 million as opposed to the current cost of £43 million? I hope that there are good reasons for this, because the aspiration is to do a great deal more. A little more information about why this will be the case and how the distribution will take place would give us some comfort that the extra cost will be because of the remit of the new legislation and not because of an expanding bureaucracy.

The Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. O'Brien) and I recently spoke at a CBI conference on diversity. It is worth noting that at that conference Sir Digby Jones of the CBI said that the organisation supported the Bill and the representations that had given support to the Bill, but then expressed many reservations about the detailed application and regulations that may flow from it. I hope that the Government will recognise that a single equality Act should reassure the likes of the CBI that it would bring together and simplify legislation and regulation rather than make it more complicated. That, fundamentally, is the objective.

[Malcolm Bruce]

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I agree with so much of what the hon. Gentleman has said. However, I understand that his party has undertaken completely to get rid of the Department of Trade and Industry. If the Liberal Democrats are in Government in six weeks' time, how will he administer the very good points that he is making now?

Malcolm Bruce: The mechanisms for delivering policy and particular Ministers are matters for judgment. Our view is that it is perfectly possible for this matter to be dealt with in another Department—for example, the Home Office. I understand that the DTI, partly because of the second nature of the Secretary of State, is also the Department for equality, but it is slightly odd that the Bill has been promoted by the DTI. People might worry that it was more narrowly drafted because of that and confined to economic issues when, I am glad to say, it was not. The Bill runs much more widely than the DTI. It reaches throughout society, as it rightly and properly should. It is just a convenience of current Government organisation that it happens to be coming from the DTI.

I reinforce another point made by the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk. On the impact of the proposed legislation on business—I reiterate that it has a much wider impact than business—it is important that the needs of small and medium-sized businesses be particularly represented. With the greatest respect to the Government, there is sometimes a tendency to think that if they have spoken to the CBI, they have the voice of business. Big business has an agenda and a capacity to respond that are different from small and medium-sized businesses'. I hope that that will be taken firmly on board.

The main case is for a single equality Act. Current legislation has grown up piecemeal over the years. I am advised that there are currently 30 Acts, 38 statutory instruments, 11 codes of practice and 12 EC directives and recommendations relevant to the areas and activities of the proposed new commission. That is a difficult mix of areas for people to take account of. As has been said, there are anomalies within the existing system. If someone is being discriminated against because they are Jewish or a Sikh, they can have recourse to the law. If, however, that is happening to someone and they are Muslim, currently they do not have that recourse. An equality Act can deal with that simply and straightforwardly.

The bringing together of equality and human rights is absolutely right in principle and in practice. It is often forgotten that the UK is not only an early signatory to the European convention on human rights, but that largely we wrote it. It is not some form of alien European imposition. The convention was drawn up largely by British lawyers in the aftermath of the war and the Nazi occupation to create a framework of fundamental rights to which all countries that had been engaged in the war could sign up. We might tend to think that we were providing the convention to the occupied, defeated and liberated nations of Europe out of magnanimity, and that it somehow did not apply to us. However, we wrote it in our own terms and we signed up to it.

The Conservatives talk glibly about the possibility of repealing the Human Rights Act 1998. I saw the Leader of the Opposition looking somewhat uncomfortable when challenged on this point recently. When he was asked whether he was going to renege on our commitment to the European convention on human rights, he said no. I should remind the Conservatives that when we signed up to the convention in 1953, we also undertook to incorporate it in our domestic law, although it took us nearly 50 years to do so. It is really disconcerting to hear the Conservatives suggesting that they might go back on that fundamental part of our treaty obligations. The Human Rights Act gave British citizens the right to take human rights cases to the domestic courts, rather than having to incur the expense and delay of taking them to Strasbourg.

Angela Eagle: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's point entirely. Is he aware that that message is going through many people's letter boxes in direct mailings from the Conservatives even as we speak, despite the fact that their Front-Bench spokesman feels uncomfortable about it? What does the hon. Gentleman make of that phenomenon?

Malcolm Bruce: The Conservatives' entire campaign is dishonest. I am glad to say that I do not believe that they have any intention of withdrawing from the European convention on human rights. I am not even sure that they seriously intend to repeal the Human Rights Act. However, they want to lead people to believe that they could do so, without confronting the real issues. Indeed, the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk made a reasoned and considered case for his party's supporting this Bill.

This is a British piece of legislation that the Government have introduced after consultation to put in place a much more detailed development of human rights and equality which will, I hope, go substantially beyond the basics of the European convention on human rights. Indeed, the Joint Committee, while expressing some concern that there might be areas of conflict or uncertainty, was quite clear that the general objective was to develop and enhance equality and human rights in the United Kingdom, above and beyond the provisions of the European convention, to meet the needs of our own societies.

Reservations were expressed by many of the organisations that will be affected by the creation of the equality commission. Perhaps a climate of vested interests is created when people have worked with their own equality commission. They might have reservations about its being merged with a greater organisation. However, to be fair to the Government, they have clearly persuaded people that the added weight and value of combining all these aspects will be beneficial.

Speaking as a trustee of the Royal National Institute for Deaf People, I can say that that organisation certainly welcomes the single commission approach.

I reiterate my party's view, which has been much more eloquently argued by my noble friend Lord Lester, who, regardless of politics, is regarded as one of the finest human rights lawyers in the country. He has attempted to introduce his own Bill on a single equality commission, and I hope that that was seen as a serious endeavour to put a framework in place. The Government have suggested that their own review is designed to lead in that direction. I do not concur with the view that we should delay the setting up of a single commission, and I would emphasise the urgency involved. We must not rush into this, but we must ensure that a single equality Act is introduced sooner rather than later. If not, the single commission will spend an awful lot of time dealing with an inadequate collection of piecemeal laws. Those could quickly be put to one side once we had clearer, simpler legislation.

I commend the Bill. As I said earlier, a fundamental approach to promoting equality rather than dealing with discrimination represents a radical and welcome shift that should greatly enhance the quality of life of every minority—we are all minorities at some stage or another—that could conceivably be discriminated against, and give them the backing and resources to create, as the right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston said, a civilised society that is tolerant and inclusive.

4.4 pm

Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): It gives me great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce). I especially appreciated his important reference to deafness, which made the point that the political will to move strongly on equality makes a difference to every form of discrimination on the ground of disability.

It also gives me great pleasure to contribute to the debate on the day that the general election has been called. I am proud to be a member of a political party that has had equality and fairness at the core of its constitution and principles since the day that it was founded more than 100 years ago. Despite some people's grumbles, equality remains at its core. Every Labour Government have made significant progress on equality and this Government have made huge progress, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State spelled out in her speech. Although I do not expect the Bill to go through all its stages in the next two days, I hope that it becomes the centrepiece of the third term of a Labour Government.

I praise the way in which consultation prior to the Bill's publication has been managed to gain the backing of all the relevant organisations. I pay tribute to Ministers and their team on undertaking careful consultation and gathering support so that our discussion is consensual on this important day. However, I want to utter some words of caution. In my experience, when one mentions equality and human rights, it is easy to get uncontroversial support—there is no problem. It is also easy to urge public and private bodies to make progress. It gets harder and controversy begins when we move towards insisting that public and private bodies implement standards of equality and human rights. It becomes harder still and more controversial when we pass legislation that insists that public and private bodies and individuals respect specific standards of equality and human rights. It becomes even harder and much more controversial when we start to penalise public authorities or private bodies for not conforming to the standards that we have set.

At the heart of taking any of those actions is the first step of establishing a system whereby we know what is happening and progress is monitored. That aspect becomes controversial and difficult with the realisation that it will be effective only with the support of sufficient resources, teeth, clout, legislation and political determination. The system has to be clear and firm and have resources. With the greatest respect for both Opposition spokesmen, when they were pressed on financial aspects, the response was woolly. I have absolute confidence that the Labour party is determined to put the resources behind this important legislation.

The Bill is on the right track because it recognises the need for legislation, encompasses the entire breadth of disability and sets out a system for implementation. When I was active on Sheffield city council and, in the mid-1980s, we reached the first stage of controversy by appointing our first equalities officer, we were told that it was a great waste of money by our then opposition. They were even more horrified when that equalities officer recommended that there should be a women's training workshop on information technology. There was a huge fuss and enormous opposition. How on earth did we know, as a council, that there was any call for a women's training workshop on information technology? Bizarrely, we did know, but even more bizarrely, by the end of the week when this was on the front page of the newspapers, the relevant council department had had 2,000 applications for the women's information technology workshop, which was only a subject for council debate at that stage. Often, therefore, it is important to be ahead of the game, in each area of disability, to recognise the need to move to legislation. We then find that such a move was crucial for a large number of people or a minority.

We must recognise, of course, that equality is a dream, a goal or target that we never reach. We say that every baby is born equal, but of course that is not the case. The life chances and expectancies of all of us are grossly unequal. We must also recognise the international dimension, which was brought home to my family recently when one of my grandsons was born with a defective heart. After intensive surgery at one week old, which was successful, he is now at home, six weeks old and quite well. He is probably among the 1 per cent. of the world's population for whom such intensive surgery at seven days old can be successful. The idea, therefore, that equality for every individual can be easily achieved is nonsense. Nobody would approach the international context without recognising that.

That brings me to my next point, as the only reason that baby Seamus is still with us is that we have a national health service that is free, open and accessible to every individual, at least in this country. Having a public service that is open, free, accessible and of world-class standards is one of the most important pieces of equality legislation that any Government can pass. That is the same in every area. Everyone recognises that we cannot even start to get near achieving the millennium development goal of every child in the world achieving equal access to education unless there is free primary education. That is a law of equality in itself.

[Helen Jackson]

I was pleased to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggest in the run-up to the election that each and every pensioner will have free bus travel, which is particularly relevant to me, as I am shortly to enjoy that, in good measure.

Every area of legislation has an equality aspect, whether in relation to housing, transport, education or health. In relation to housing, the equality aspect might be accessibility or ease of getting around the house. It is impressive that this Bill has been put together with the co-operation of and contributions from every Department. We talk a great deal about Governments being too parcelled up when it comes to legislation, but this is a good example of legislation to which that does not apply.

Breadth and scope are important, and I want to say more about the Northern Ireland experience. An important aspect of the peace process was the funding regime from Brussels, the European peace and reconciliation programme. The then Commissioner Wulff-Matthies included in that programme criteria according to which every penny of the money had to be spent. It was a partnership action for fair treatment: every item of expenditure had to meet standards of equality, or the money would not be released from Brussels. The partnership boards did not just include people on both sides of the sectarian divide—there was an equality balance in terms of gender, of race where appropriate, and of disability. The whole range of equality was encompassed to defuse the specific inequality issue about which people in Northern Ireland felt so strongly.

There was considerable debate in Northern Ireland about the proposal for a single equality commission. People naturally feared that it would weaken the individual commissions dealing with gender, race and other aspects of inequality. In fact, the emphasis on a single commission strengthens each inequality issue and strengthens the anti-discrimination agenda in each area.

We have seen that closer to home in our party. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State mentioned the Representation of the People Act 2000, which we produced after a huge amount of discussion in our party—and a very important piece of legislation it is, applying as it does to all political parties. Now the issue of racial imbalance in this Parliament is being raised in the party far more strongly than ever before and we are considering action to redress that imbalance. Once progress has been made in one respect, we can raise our sights in the case of all the other aspects of inequality. I would say that the equality agenda in the last Parliament led to pressure for successful legislation on, for instance, same-sex couples.

As was said earlier, the Bill's establishment of a single commission will make further legislation urgent and essential. I should be very surprised, and a little disappointed, if the legislation that follows is not a little controversial, and does not push the boat further than every Member may wish.

I finish by giving three warnings. First, everything in the Bill is about individuals. Clause 8(2) defines equality as being "equality between individuals". That is the right way to go, but it is sometimes in conflict with people being defined not as individuals but as part of a household. The future role of pensioners and pensions is an issue that many of us have been concerned to pursue in the House, and I believe that important legislation on it will be introduced in the next Parliament. For far too long, women pensioners in particular have been seen as part of a household or a couple and, therefore, as being more dependent than men, who are assumed to have been in full-time employment, and not as worthy of financial reward for the effort and work—of whatever type—that they have put in during their lives. I hope that the Bill will set the scene for women pensioners and potential pensioners being given that status in their own right, so that women's work will be valued and women pensioners will get a better balance of income. At the moment, it is appallingly unbalanced.

My second warning to Ministers concerns universal legislation and choice. I have mentioned those areas of universal legislation that in my view form part of inequality legislation because they apply to everyone. The issue of choice must be carefully considered, as must league tables that encourage us to say, "Are we up here or down there? Is ours a very good school or not? Are we doing well or not? Is this a hospital in which people might die more easily than in another?" In considering such choices, we must be careful that we do not undermine some of the basic principles of equality that we want to pursue.

My third warning is that we must make sure that the commission and the legislation arising from it have strong, sharp, powerful teeth. When controversial issues arise that challenge accepted norms and assumptions of behaviour, there must be a strong recognition of the need to be absolutely clear that the equality agenda leads many other important agendas that any Government might want to pursue to produce a better society. I hope that, when our political leaders go out campaigning today and in the weeks ahead, they ensure equality is up there with the economy, education and the other big issues. I say that unashamedly, because Labour has a superb record on equality. If that record is presented frequently, powerfully and consistently, there is no doubt that we will have not just a third term of government, but a fourth, a fifth and perhaps many more. So let us put the Bill in the Queen's Speech and make it the No. 1 priority for the next election and the essential flagship of Labour's third term.

4.24 pm

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): It is a privilege to follow the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Helen Jackson), who—aside from the triumphalism towards the end of her speech—spoke authoritatively and movingly from her own experience in family terms and her experience culled from her work in Northern Ireland. I respect her passionate commitment to equality. Knowing that the hon. Lady is not seeking re-election to the House, I wish her every success and happiness in what she goes on to do.

I welcome the Bill. I believe that it is a good measure that deserves support. Let the background to the Bill's introduction be clearly understood. Inequality before the law, prejudice and discrimination are still commonplace features of our society and we have the responsibility not to look the other way, but to seek to attack those inequalities, that discrimination and that prejudice. The Bill is by no means the only way of achieving that. Everything cannot be achieved through legislation, but legislation has an important contribution to make in tackling the prevalent negative attitudes and stereotypes, tackling tendencies to caricature people to disadvantage and in conducing to an atmosphere and culture in which we respect each other.

What it is really about is equality before the law and the principle of social justice. As far as I am concerned, that means that every individual, irrespective of race, sex, disability or sexual orientation, is entitled to be treated by his or her fellows with respect and to be granted equal protection by the law. That is a statement that I confidently make on the Floor of the House today, and it is a point that I shall reiterate time and again in the period lying immediately ahead. Each and every one of us can do only his or her bit in trying to tackle discrimination, to undermine the causes of prejudice and to promote social justice. In the course of this Parliament, I have attempted to promote what I believe to be the right course, with my voice and my vote—and I intend to go on doing so.

I welcome the opening speech of the Secretary of State and I would like to focus on a number of the Bill's aspects. First, on the major proposal to establish a commission for equality and human rights, the background was rehearsed by the Secretary of State and by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham). The case for it is compelling, indeed.

At the moment and of long standing, we have had three commissions to address particular types of discrimination: the Equal Opportunities Commission, the Commission for Racial Equality and the Disability Rights Commission. Each draws its powers and exercises its functions courtesy of a number of different pieces of legislation. I believe that the intended creation of the new body should in no way suggest—Ministers will not allow it to do so—that the record of those three organisations is anything other than excellent.

The reality is, however, that those bodies have had responsibilities to deal with sex discrimination, race discrimination and disability discrimination. In discharging their responsibilities, they have had a budget of something in the order of £45 million a year. When I last looked into it, the figures for 2002 showed that those bodies were undertaking about 4,400 cases and the respective websites of the three anti-discrimination bodies were taking about 75,000 hits per month. They have been extremely busy; they have had a great deal to do; they have done exceptionally well.

It is important to recognise that those bodies' responsibility was to deal with only three, albeit three very important, types of discrimination. The Government are proposing, consistent with the findings of the review and with consultation held over a long period, that new strands be introduced. If they are to be introduced and if we are to attack religious discrimination or discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation and if we are to afford equal protection to transgendered people as well, the case—strong in any case—for a merger of those anti-discrimination bodies becomes, frankly, overwhelming. The creation of three more commissions will mean that six different commissions will exist. The potential for overlap in their strands of work, and for duplication, waste of resources, misunderstanding and conflict, would be preposterous, so the Government's proposals in the Bill make obvious sense. I also very much welcome the robust and supportive terms with which the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk, greeted the Government's proposal to establish the commission for equality and human rights.

However, the argument for the new commission is not simply about minimising duplication. It is stronger than that, as the commission has multiple merits. It will have the opportunity to work as a champion for equality and human rights, and to provide a single focus for the articulation of the important message that we must change our society's values and culture. Moreover, the commission will be able to tackle the multiple discrimination suffered by many people. The tendency has been to think that people who suffer discrimination are, for instance, women, members of ethnic minorities or disabled, or that they have a gay sexual orientation. In fact, it is possible that a person might suffer from several different forms of discrimination and inequality. That person should be able to turn to what will prove to be a one-stop shop. The establishment of the commission will streamline the service and provide a single and unified source of information, advice and guidance.

That one-stop shop will be good for individuals, and that is important, but it will also be good for public authorities and private businesses. They will not have to consult a multiplicity of different pieces of legislation but will be able to take advice from one body. In due course, I shall say something about having a single piece of legislation in this area, but the commission will have the virtue of being the only body offering guidance. That seems to me to make a great deal of sense, and the argument for the establishment of the commission is therefore positive and powerful.

Secondly, I want to say something about the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of religion or belief. I welcome that, but it does not apply to discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. That is regrettable, but I suspect that the Government would argue that they cannot be expected to do everything in one Bill.

The Government may also take the view that such legislation should be adopted on the basis of slowly, slowly, catchee monkee. After all, outposts of prejudice, discrimination and diehard neanderthal resistance remain, and must be countered over a period. Everything cannot be done at once, but I believe that we need to get our ducks in order in respect of equality.

Stonewall has made the case for a similar prohibition of discrimination in the provision of goods and services to gay people. That is an intelligent argument, and I believe that the same case will be made again and again. I welcome what has been said about religion and belief, but we should look at extending the provisions. I am sure that my hon. Friends the Members for North-West Norfolk and for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) will echo that commitment. I look forward to the next Conservative Government having the opportunity to introduce a robust piece of legislation along those lines.

[Mr. John Bercow]

Thirdly, I want to say something about the duty to promote equality. As I understand it, that duty is to promote equality between men and women. It is extremely welcome, but it does not apply to people who suffer discrimination on grounds of age or sexual orientation. Therefore, if we are not careful and delay for too long, another injustice will be created. I warmly welcome the duty to promote gender equality. It is fair to say that some concerns have been expressed, not so much about what the Bill says on the subject, but about areas that are still uncovered and questions that remain unanswered. Specifically, I should like to elicit from the Government a comment on the harassment suffered by women. I know that the Equal Opportunities Commission has raised the matter. The elimination of harassment seems a fairly basic and prosaic demand. To my knowledge—I am not a lawyer, and I say that as a matter of pride—it is not provided for in the terms of the Bill. I do not know whether the Minister would be open to amendments on this front in Standing Committee, but we ought to be told.

Other issues related to the promotion of gender equality need to be addressed. I remember taking part in a stimulating debate in Westminster Hall on 25 June 2003 with the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) on the subject of the gender pay gap. That gap is real. The Government are doing what they can to tackle it, but I think the Minister would admit that a great deal of work remains to be done. Studying the terms of the Bill, I am not clear whether the provisions on the promotion of gender equality will allow for or, better still, require public authorities to conduct pay reviews and tackle pay discrimination when it is clear from those reviews that such discrimination exists. It is not referred to, so far as I can tell, in the Bill. It is a genuine concern of the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Incidentally, in this context, tributes have rightly been paid to people responsible for the introduction of the legislation. Those tributes should properly be paid to members of the Government and officials who have assisted in the drafting of the Bill. At the EOC I pay particular tribute to Julie Mellor and Sam Smethers, who have done magnificent work in championing the cause over a long period. Some right hon. and hon. Members will be aware that I have taken a particular interest in the issue of discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. In that context, I cannot think of two more persistent and effective lobbyists in any organisation in Britain than Ben Summerskill and Alan Wardle. Their work ought to be acknowledged and I hope it will be eloquently championed by Members in all parts of the House. The EOC has raised important issues, which I hope the Minister will address in her winding-up speech.

There is some concern in the EOC that sections 55 and 73 of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 are not replicated in the Bill. There are specific powers under those sections that allow the EOC to review health and safety requirements as they can affect, for example, cases of pregnant women in employment. Similarly, I think I am right in saying from memory that section 73 of the Sex Discrimination Act gives powers to the EOC to pursue strategic cases against recalcitrant employers who persistently behave badly and then typically, as a commercial tactic, settle out of court before the heat in the kitchen becomes unbearable.

As I understand it, under present law, relying on the 1975 Act, the EOC has been emboldened over a long period to pursue cases. There is a concern that that power might not exist under the Bill. If that were so, notwithstanding the commitment that the Government have made to ensure a direct transfer of powers and functions, it would necessarily follow that the EOC would be in a relatively diminished position. I very much hope that that is not the case. The Minister might well be able to reassure me. She knows very well that I approach these matters in a non-partisan spirit, and I would go so far as to say that I would dance round the mulberry bush in celebration if she were able to tell me that my concern was unfounded. However, on the basis of a cursory perusal of the terms of the Bill, I think my concerns have some grounds.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) on the Liberal Democrat Front Bench repeatedly and powerfully made the case for a single equality Act, and I welcome his comments. We cannot entirely anticipate—it would be premature to do so—the findings of the equalities review and the discrimination law review. That said, we have a lot of evidence to study. There is a good intellectual argument for saying that if the work of a number of commissions is to be brought together into one commission, there is a certain logical coherence, if not inevitability, about having a single equality Act from which the powers, functions and, dare I say it, the comportment, culture and language of the new body should flow. I use those terms advisedly and with some force. The terms of the Bill are one thing; the way in which they are applied, the enthusiasm with which the tasks are embraced and the sense of understanding and rapprochement between the different equality strands are of the essence in translating aspiration into reality.

The hon. Member for Gordon made the point with some passion; I shall do so slightly differently. If memory serves me correctly, we currently have in equality and anti-discrimination legislation no fewer than 35 Acts, 52 statutory instruments, 13 codes of practice, three codes of guidance and 16 European directives and recommendations. I was not a competent mathematician at school, but I believe that that adds up to no fewer than 119 pieces of legislation or guidance flowing from this House or the European Union appertaining to equality and anti-discrimination. Given that an important part of the thrust of the motivation behind the Bill is to ensure that there is coherence, intelligibility, simplicity and focus in public policy, it seems that it is not wildly prescient but merely averagely discerning to suspect that the outcome of the equalities review and discrimination law review will be a commitment from the Government, whatever party that may be, to introduce a single equality Act.

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend is making an eloquent and powerful case and I would like his advice. Does he believe that we should await the findings of those two reviews before moving forward to one consolidated piece of legislation, or would that be a mistake and should we move forward and set up the commission in the first instance?

Mr. Bercow: My view is that we should proceed with the commission for equality and human rights. I do not believe that it is necessary to await the outcome of the reviews, because the proposal to introduce the Bill was decided on the powerful and compelling evidence of unsatisfactory practice before the decision to establish those reviews was taken.

The outcome of the reviews may be invaluable in informing the legislative framework and bolstering the effectiveness of the commission but, as my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk and other right hon. and hon. Members know, there is a tendency to inertia under any Government or, alternatively and sometimes as well, there is a tendency to have too many pieces of legislation and too little time in which to introduce them. My strong preference is to press on with the Bill while we have the momentum.

Our support for the Bill should be unequivocal. I was extremely appreciative of what my hon. Friend said. He did not sit on the fence and there was no question of "on the one hand" and "on the other hand". He rightly expressed reservations from the Front Bench about specific clauses and asked sensible and proper questions, but his clarion call for decisive action could not be bettered by anyone in the House. I pay tribute to him for his commitment. Indeed, he and I have often talked about which of us is the modernising Conservative. I have always tended to say that I am and that I am seeking to persuade him to join me in that cause, but today he was superb. We are all modernisers now; we all want a modernised, successful Conservative party, in government after the election, with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) as Prime Minister.

I want to conclude on an issue that has been touched on and which cannot be disregarded. It is business involvement—I use the term advisedly—with the new commission and business reaction to the legislation. There is a fine balance. Everybody these days talks about the importance of better regulation, light-touch regulation and sensitive regulation. I agree with that: my view is that regulation should be relatively light touch in the sense that it should not impede the successful operation of legitimate and fair-minded business. On the other hand, it cannot be so light touch as, frankly, to undermine the very purpose of, and rationale behind, the introduction of the Bill in the first place.

I started by saying, quite categorically, that I thought there was a problem and that it needed to be addressed. The notion, sometimes rather vulgarly popularised in the more down-market red-top tabloids, that prejudice does not really exist and is just the politically correct plaything of politicians of the left has to be decisively challenged and countered. That discrimination is there. Sometimes people suffer in silence because they do not know how they are to secure redress, do not think that they will be heard or do not know where to go. Discrimination and disadvantage exist, and we have to be prepared to tackle them.

What we cannot allow is a regime so minimalist that the noble aspirations of the Bill are not given effect in practice. It has to be light touch, but clear and firm. In the best spirit, I suggest to the Minister and to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest, who, I hope, will occupy the Minister's post in a matter of weeks, that the principle that should guide public policy here is quite straightforward. The commission on equality and human rights, in dealing with businesses, should be the friend of the willing but uninitiated and the foe of the wilfully non-compliant and incorrigibly discriminatory. I cannot put it more simply than that.

I have often argued for exemptions from legislation for relatively small businesses. I do not think that that approach would work in this context. The point has been made, and rightly, that more than 99 per cent. of businesses in this country are small—more than 99 per cent. employ fewer than 100 people. They account for somewhat over 50 per cent. of the private sector work force, and last time I looked they generated well in excess of two fifths of our national output. In other words, most businesses are small. We cannot simply say in matters of equality, good practice and human rights that they are to be exempt from requirements that will apply to larger businesses and to public authorities.

We have a duty to try to ensure that we are sensitive, that we are not unduly adversarial, that we work with and try to bring the best out of agencies that are trying to do the right thing. But on the principles of equality, of respect and of human rights, there cannot and should not be a compromise.

I welcome the Bill, and I am pleased to have had an opportunity to speak in support of it. Once again, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk on his passionate and effective contribution to our proceedings.

4.49 pm

Linda Perham (Ilford, North) (Lab): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), who is the first and last of the great modernisers in the Conservative party.

I, too, welcome the Bill and I wish to focus on the measures aimed at tackling age discrimination, on which I have campaigned since I was elected in 1997. In fact, I was fortunate enough to be drawn ninth in my first private Member's Bill ballot and I introduced a Bill on age discrimination in employment advertisements. Unfortunately, the Government did not support it, but it did lead to the code of practice on age diversity, which has now become the Age Positive programme, so I am very pleased about that.

When I introduced that Bill in 1998, I remember the word "complex" being used about any issues to do with age. I also remember that when my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) was in the relevant position, she, too, used that word when speaking to the all-party group on ageing and older people—of which I have the honour of being secretary—about the Age Equality Commission Bill, which my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) was trying to introduce in November 2001.

It is disappointing to me that age is the last strand of implementation of the EC directive on equality and employment; it is three years on from the other two strands that were required to be introduced under the directive. This Bill sets in motion the establishment of the commission, which will, at last, include age.

[Linda Perham]

I am delighted, as is the Equal Opportunities Commission, that the Bill proposes a duty for public bodies to promote gender equality. The EOC says that it is the "most radical change in sex equality law for 30 years".

However, there is still no duty to promote age equality, when such a provision will now exist for gender, disability and race. The other main omission as far as the age focus is concerned is the protection against discrimination in goods, facilities and services, which I raised in an intervention with the Secretary of State. Part 2, which is quite extensive, extends the protection against discrimination on grounds of religion or belief. Why does the provision not extend to age? I know that the Bill cannot cover everything, but older people have even less time to wait than others.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a particular shortage of skills and expertise in several areas and that now is a good time to encourage older people back into work, to make use of the experience and expertise that they have? She has pursued the issue vigorously for many years. Does she agree that now is an opportune time, when unemployment is so low and there are so many job opportunities, to make a positive effort to get those people back into work?

Linda Perham: I thank my hon. Friend for those comments; he is a man after my own heart on this matter. There is a great cohort of people in their later years who have a big contribution to make and, in fact, they outnumber younger people. Employers would do well to recognise the talents of those older people.

As I was saying, part 2 extends the protection against discrimination on grounds of religion or belief. Clause 56 mentions discrimination in advertisements, which returns us to the Bill that I tried to introduce seven years ago—but I was addressing age discrimination. Older people are demonstrably discriminated against in financial services, including insurance of all sorts, in travel, in car hire, in civic life, where magistrates and jurors have to retire at 70, and in social care, where people who are disabled and over 65 cannot apply for mobility and independent living allowance. There is discrimination in health care. I campaigned with Age Concern to extend the invitation for breast cancer screening to those aged up to 70. I think that the statistics still show that women between the ages of 70 and 74 are most in danger of contracting and dying from breast cancer. Also, I know that we are not within the jurisdiction of the Holy See, but cardinals over the age of 80 are not allowed to vote in the papal elections.

Angela Eagle: Disgraceful.

Linda Perham: My hon. Friend says, "disgraceful". I just threw that in as a topical example of age discrimination, although not one in this country.

I hope that the discrimination law review, which is being mentioned by the Secretary of State and others, will assess how anti-discrimination legislation can be modernised to fit the needs of Britain in the 21st century and that it will examine those injustices.

My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) alluded to the number of older people who could make a contribution. More than a third of our population is over 50, including many Members of this place and even more in the other place. Age discrimination in all its forms could affect all of us. The Bill takes a huge step in raising awareness of the need to challenge inequality and to promote human rights for older people.

My support for and belief in fairness and opportunity for all motivate me to serve my constituents and represent them in this place. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State mentioned basic moral beliefs as a defining principle. I am proud to agree, and I am proud that a Labour Government are introducing the Bill.

4.55 pm

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Like every Member who has spoken in the debate so far, the hon. Member for Ilford, North (Linda Perham) made a helpful and thoughtful contribution to our proceedings. As she has done throughout her parliamentary career, she emphasised the particular concerns of older people. When one considers only the political merits of the measure, as some of us will be doing in the weeks to come, it is interesting that the emphasis has been not so much on older people as on some other aspects of discrimination. I make no qualitative judgment about that, I merely mention it.

What has struck me about the debate is that we are talking about an argument whose time has come. Its consequences are irreversible and that is much to be welcomed. It will be reflected on the slate of candidates that my party is putting forward, some in very winnable seats, at the general election. There will be much greater diversity on our Benches, which may translate to the other side of the House when we come back. I am delighted about that diversity. It is an index not merely of a party that has changed its views and habits but of a much wider national commitment to changes that need to take place. We all welcome them.

It would be difficult for a Member to come into the Chamber and say that they were against equality. I can certainly tell the House that I am not against equality, but we need to flesh out why we support it and the nature of our enthusiasm, as well as any qualifications that we may have. I am glad that the Bill has received universal support. A strong argument in its favour is that it has been highly consultative and there will inevitably, due to the election timetable, be more consultation to come. Had the Bill been introduced on the back of a bright idea from the Institute of Public Policy Research two or three years ago and rushed through as some legislation has been, it would not have commanded the same degree of authoritative support.

The Bill's support is also due to the considerable work that has been done in a process of dialogue with various stakeholders, including the three equality commissions. I think particularly of my experience with the DRC, to which the right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) was kind enough to refer earlier. I began as a sceptic about the DRC, but I leave this Parliament as an enthusiast for its achievements. Conscious of its special role, the DRC was undoubtedly sceptical about the move to a single equality commission, but those difficulties have been largely overcome. The EOC has expressed active and enthusiastic support for the Bill, as have many other non-governmental organisations that have written to us.

There is a further need to adjust our legislative base to incorporate all the unfinished business from the European directive, and to make effective and reasonably comprehensive—I stress the word "reasonably"—provision for the new strands of ageism, sexual preference and religious or other belief commitments.

There is also a need, although it is not wholly met by the Bill, to begin to set up the stakes for moving in an evolutionary style towards a harmonisation of the various approaches to discrimination in all its forms and to deal with the problems that have been mentioned about double, triple or quadruple jeopardy for people who may be discriminated against in a number of ways. Finally, and in no sense least in my book, there is a need to move the public debate on to give some teeth and force to the human rights agenda in its widest sense.

Those are all strong arguments in principle for the Bill, and I will say in a moment where I stand in relation to the introduction and timing of the Bill measured against other issues, but I must enter a degree of caution about overselling it. Indeed, I usually need to advise the Government against overselling their legislation generally. The Bill looks good. As I said, it would be a brave man or woman who came to the House this afternoon and said that they were against equality or against legislation to promote it, but the Bill is more about machinery than concept. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in introducing it was heavy on the concept—I genuinely agreed with her in an intervention—but, in fact, the Bill is about machinery.

Frankly, before the consultation process, Ministers initially ran into difficulties even with their own statutory bodies. I can remember some pretty blistering initial comments from the Commission for Racial Equality, and the DRC had familiar reservations. Those reservations have been largely resolved in the process to date, but the Bill is, of course, by definition, given the timing, only a demonstration of commitment. That is what we are hearing this afternoon. We all know that the real business is to come, and that there must be further examination, input, consultation and, of course, the parallel process of the studies to which Ministers have referred.

The questions rightly put by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) from the Conservative Front Bench are always reasonable ones. Are the resources sufficient and appropriate? Is the new structure adequate to carry the weight for all the various strains and to represent the interests of those who are within those strains? Equally, is it possible to put together what has been an historic legacy of different commissions in a way that is as economic and cost-saving as possible, while providing equal convenience and service for users?

For example, the DRC has an excellent helpline. It is terribly important that that is continued and that the help is provided by people who are disability specialists. I am not too interested in one sense in the tokenism of the membership of the commission, although it is often useful in practice to include those who have direct experience of the difficulties and discrimination that people face. I am absolutely concerned that there should be a proper underpinning of expertise. Indeed, there was some historic concern from Northern Ireland, when the single commission was created, about whether those pockets of expertise were continuing. The right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston was right to remind us, as he so often does, about the importance of advocacy and supporting people in their concerns.

Much reference has been made already—in the case of my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), magnificently from his own memory—to the very clear briefing provided by Stonewall about the ramshackle nature of the existing law. With all the different bits of law that apply—I think that he totalled them at 119—it is rather like a kind of Austro-Hungarian empire that has built up and is now applicable. Ministers are conscious of that; they have commissioned their own review of discrimination law, and a parallel study of equalities is being carried out under Trevor Phillips, and I welcome both of those.

I follow the remarks of the hon. Member for Ilford, North in thinking that there must be concern not just about the different bits of law, but about the fact that, even after the Bill, their application will still be very uneven. There will not be positive duties relating to age or sexual preference. Again, we must return to the fact that enforceability measures on human rights are weaker than those on discrimination. I did not think that the Secretary of State's explanation that addressing that might be rather bothersome and go too far was entirely convincing.

Mr. Bercow: Leaving aside the issue of the duty on public authorities and focusing for a moment on the prohibition of discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief in the provision of goods, services and facilities, does my hon. Friend think that it is unfortunate that the cases of gay and lesbian people are not advanced in any way under the terms of that aspect of the Bill, given that considerable publicity has been given to the example last year of a gay couple who were denied the right to stay in a Scottish hotel—if I remember rightly—because of a bigoted and prejudiced proprietor? It is unfortunate that that aspect of the matter cannot be dealt with now, although perhaps it could be by amendment in Committee.

Mr. Boswell: Yes, the short answer is that I agree with my hon. Friend on that, as I have when we have discussed the matter over several years. The issue must be considered properly in Committee. I say this neutrally without making a prediction about the general election. Over the years I have sometimes noticed that Ministers are unnecessarily timid, but can occasionally be encouraged to do the right thing with the assistance of a lively debate in Committee. Unfortunately, however, that is an unrealistic prospect today.

I have said this regarding disability discrimination, but I say it again now because it is still important. There is a need—I hope that the Minister's study of discrimination law will examine this—to consider the different forums under which redress can be obtained in law. Of course, there might be a single commission under the Bill, but there would still be different legal ways of obtaining redress depending on the nature of a case. The Minister will well know from our discussions on the Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001 that even in education provision, special educational needs are dealt with by tribunals during the compulsory years, but anyone who complains of discrimination and is older than the compulsory age of education must have recourse to the county court. There are several examples from the past. A study by the Royal National Institute of the Blind showed the different results obtainable through employment tribunals under part 2 of the Disability Discrimination Act 1985 compared with those obtained under part 3 of the Act following discrimination in relation to goods and services. The Minister needs to examine carefully and critically how fairly people will be able to get their legal rights, even if those rights exist in legislation.

[Mr. Boswell]

I must warn the House that special factors regarding disability do not apply to racial discrimination and arguably apply to a lesser extent to gender discrimination. I am thinking especially of the fact that questions of disability discrimination often hinge on the extent of adaptation and what represent reasonable adjustments. However, one can say quite simply that a person either is a racist or homophobe, or is not. There is not a question of accommodation, but whether people behave acceptably.

I welcome the interaction with the reviews about which the Secretary of State talked. I hope that they will go forward in a good spirit as promptly as possible. We all understand the point well made by the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) that we will need a single overarching legal framework in due course, which I readily concede. It may well be that the studies will coincide with the future reintroduction of the legislation, but, on reflection and partly stimulated by the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham, I feel that it would be better to get on with establishing the commission now. There might be advantages in doing so—as a Conservative, I can see the argument for getting the commission up and running—but I say to Ministers, whoever they may be in future, that we must also make sure that the legislation that we enact now is fit for purpose and can be adapted to a new framework, and that ultimately we have a single, overarching, consolidated piece of legislation that everyone can understand and that can be explained in simple terms. At that point, we will have achieved what I believe is a common objective.

It is hardly surprising, given how much politics is in our mind at the moment, that we have discussed the various views and provisions in respect of human rights. Let me say neutrally and with no political intent that I want to see a little less political correctness and a little less legalism and a lot more delivery in terms of securing people's rights and avoiding discrimination. Before coming here, I gave a little thought to the questions what is discrimination and what are a person's rights to avoid it. It seems to me—here I emphasise the point that my hon. Friend made—that there is a proper place for legislation in terms of setting out people's rights, in part to punish defaulters and those who are not willing to play by the rules, and in part to drive good practice by giving management a reason, motive or excuse to do the right thing, while emphasising the strong business case for doing so.

I have argued that case in the House before, but I shall do so again now. If one is a good diversity employer and if one has an enlightened attitude toward people of different sexual orientation—or whatever—one is more representative of society and one's customer base, and people will come to one's store, bank or service industry because they are more comfortable about doing so. I think that the business case aligns quite closely with what I call, in shorthand, the moral case for these provisions. As has already been said, it is therefore especially important to ensure that, as well as leaders of industry, small and medium-sized enterprises are given active encouragement and support to do the right thing.

I agree with the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Helen Jackson) that there is scope for more serious analysis of the underlying issues. We are not here because we think that lawyers feel uncomfortable with discrimination or because there is a European directive, or even because the Minister is moving the Second Reading of this piece of legislation. We are here because many of us—perhaps we Conservatives have made less of our commitment in this respect—are aware of the history of under-representation, in effect a denial of full participation in society. Examples include the lagging remuneration of women and the huge unemployment among disabled people—much higher than the average, despite the fact that many want to work. People face obstacles to their career, denial of some of their life chances and, as the Disability Rights Commission is reviewing, functional discrimination in relation to access to medical services. All those things happen. They ought to be a concern of the united commission and of this House. It is not just a matter of passing a piece of legislation that says we are all equal now. It is a matter of asking how unequal are we and what are we going to do about it.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend educated me in these matters some five years ago and he is therefore responsible for a good deal of what has followed. I have always been grateful to him. May I put it to him that the essence of our argument is that legislation of this sort is to be viewed not as a threat to be minimised, but as an opportunity to be grasped, because for individuals and for the country as a whole it makes sense socially, culturally and, indeed, economically?

Mr. Boswell: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. He leads me on to my third point by way of general argument. Apart from the need to consider rights as a positive way of driving forward good business practice and apart from having regard to the pockets of functional discrimination that continue in this country and blight it, there is a general national need to conduct our affairs with decency and respect. The word "respect" has appeared in a number of places and it is right that it has.

I believe firmly in the idea of one nation. I do not want to see anybody left out or put upon. I believe positively that our society is strengthened and empowered by diversity. We should all have moved on from the stage of saying that we should not be nasty to one another to asking, "Why wouldn't it be a good thing if we realised what tremendous assets we have in people and made the best use of them?" Surely that is a perfectly proper approach.

If, in a sense, there is to be an overarching public duty, we could start profitably with clause 3, which provides general duties. Above all, however, public authorities collectively should treat citizens decently. That is what the European convention on human rights was meant to be about. I am not a lawyer but I understand that the convention was very much grounded in the British concepts, of which we are still proud, of common law and equity. It is about how we treat people properly. That is a great prize.

I am not sure how we can underwrite decency into public policy. I do know, however, as a constituency Member—I am sure that we have all had this experience—that people come to see us who have not been treated decently by the public system. There has been a distressing element of harshness, lack of communication, administrative failure or whatever. A Member often has to say, "I am sorry. The system has let you down. I shall try to rescue you from it." We can perhaps do something to improve both public law and public practice to make such an approach more a thing of the past.

Beyond that there are some private duties, which we have personally, in terms of our own moral ethic. There may be no way in practice that we can either achieve, or claim to have achieved, the removal of any discrimination or nastiness from our inner thoughts or our hearts. We cannot legislate for that. However, Government and public people can help both by their own example and the language that they use—for example in election campaigns—and by the way that they approach these issues. They can help also by achieving, encouraging and fostering a higher level of public debate and public education. It is clear that when people are educated, they behave better in relation to these issues than if they are not. If fear can be removed from the process, that is also positive.

I have spoken rather personally because I feel strongly about these matters. I welcome the Bill. I realise that it will not happen now but it paves the way for changes that are important and are already happening, and it reinforces those changes. The process is irreversible but so it should be. As this is part of a process in which we are engaged, I do not want to leave politics—I can assure the House that I am standing as a candidate at this election—unless and until our better instincts as a nation are fulfilled.

5.18 pm

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell). I note with interest that the modernising tendency of the Conservative party is in great evidence, but the massively empty green Benches around the hon. Gentleman demonstrate that the enemy, if I might put it that way, in internal Conservative party terms has not really made an appearance today, which is a pity. It would have been interesting to hear from those Members and learn of their thoughts on a radical and welcome Bill. I am sure that those of us who are fortunate enough to be back in this place after the election will hear from them.

I congratulate the Deputy Minister for Women and Equality on introducing the Bill, and on the great deal of work on it that she has personally undertaken. I congratulate her and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the work that they have done as Ministers with responsibility for women and equality. Who knows what position anyone will hold when we get back after the election, but I would like to pay tribute to them now. Baroness Morgan initiated the move towards a single commission, and those of us who agree with that approach will want to put on record our thanks to her for that. The measures are now close to fruition, although this is perhaps more of a dress rehearsal than the opening night of a play. However, we shall just have to enjoy it for what it is, and anticipate the debates to come in the next Parliament.

I welcome the approach taken by the Bill. It has been commented on by many of those who have spoken today. It represents the modernisation of the way in which we regard equality legislation, and a move forward from the approach introduced by a great heroine of mine, Barbara Castle, who put a great swathe of anti-discrimination protections on to the statute book in the 1970s, ranging from the Equal Pay Act 1970 to the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, and by the former Prime Minister, Jim Callaghan, to whom moving tributes were paid yesterday, who was responsible for the race relations legislation that accompanied that first generation of laws. Those laws made a big difference in what had been an area of great worry and narrowed life opportunities, in which people who were being subjected to prejudices and discrimination through no fault of their own found themselves without legal redress.

I am encouraged by the debate that we have had today. The time is now right to move on to a different generation of anti-discrimination legislation that seeks to prevent discrimination from happening in the first place—rather than offering redress after it has happened, important though that is—and to promote equality. That is a much more proactive approach which will prevent a great deal of distress and alleviate a lot of suffering by ensuring that the discrimination does not happen. That is what we all, as legislators, wish to see in Britain. We must move this legislation on to the front foot, so that it can prevent discrimination from happening rather than arriving after the mess has been made. That is not to say that redress after the event is unimportant, and when the Bill finally reaches its Committee stage, we shall look carefully at the enforcement powers of the new, and very welcome, single commission, to ensure that none of its teeth are lost in the transition.

It is also important to welcome clause 3, which sets out in very eloquent terms the fundamental duties of the commission for equality and human rights. I shall read out its provisions, because they really do say it all. It requires the commission to work towards the "creation of a society in which . . . people's ability to achieve their potential is not limited by prejudice or discrimination".

That is an important aspiration, which has been shared across the House in today's debate. Clause 3 also requires the commission to ensure that "there is respect for and protection of each individual's human rights . . . respect for the dignity and worth of each individual", and that

"each individual has an equal opportunity to participate in society, and . . . there is mutual respect between communities based on understanding and valuing of diversity and on shared respect for equality and human rights."

[Angela Eagle]

I could not have put it better myself. I would be pleased to see such an aspiration and duty on the face of British legislation. It marks a shift away from trying to clear up the mess after the event through redress to trying to forge a different sort of society, in which mutual tolerance and respect is almost taken for granted, and is promoted and expected in all walks of life. I hope that that will apply equally in the private sector, where we have a little more to do.

Mr. Bercow: I agree with the hon. Lady's point about prevention rather than redress whenever possible. However, given that there has been widespread flouting of the law on the minimum wage—an important Government policy—does she agree that one way in which to concentrate ministerial minds would be for the Government to give a commitment, which Conservative Front Benchers would echo, to an annual debate on equality issues on the Floor of the House so that evidence of breaches could be highlighted?

Angela Eagle: All attempts to raise the issues in Parliament, whether in Government time or in other ways, are welcome. When we ultimately reach a Committee stage, we might want to re-examine the Bill to ascertain whether to include further mechanisms in it. Given the good will in the House, at least today, I hope that we can find reasonable ways of realising that ambition.

Despite 30-odd years of anti-discrimination legislation, serious problems remain. The gender pay gap is approximately 18 per cent. on average, and is grossly higher in some sectors of the economy, especially financial services, where it is about 60 per cent. Members of ethnic minorities suffer from a similar gap, for which only their ethnicity can account, and it is as unacceptable as the gender pay gap. The House will consider the Disability Discrimination Bill tomorrow—thank goodness that will reach the statute book. However, people with disabilities are not even at the starting gate because many are denied the practical right to get to work, participate fully in society and make the undoubted contribution that their many talents would bring to it. We want the new single commission to assist us in dealing with those formidable problems.

I especially welcome the extension in part 2 of the goods and services protection on the ground of race. However, I echo the impatience that has been expressed in the Chamber today at the exclusion of what I call the orphan strands—sexual orientation, age and religious belief—which currently have no primary legislation. I suspect that we can put that right only through a rapid move to a single equality Act. My right hon. Friend the Minister knows that I have been pushing for that in the party—it is now official party policy—and in any other way that I can, including involvement in the all-party group and working with Lord Lester, who is a doughty campaigner on such issues. I promoted his private Member's Bill in this House after he managed to carry it in the other place. It is important to get on with this matter quickly.

I especially welcome the duty in the Bill to promote equality on the ground of gender. The Government promised to do that in 1998, but used the ominous phrase, "when legislative time is available". Some of us have fought since then to ensure that legislative time would be made available. We have not quite made it under the gate as it closes on this Parliament, but I hope that we will revert to it as a matter of great urgency in the next. I am encouraged by the response to my question by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East—[HON. MEMBERS: "West."] How could I confuse the Members for Leicester, West and for Leicester, East? I must be having a tiring day. I apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz). I was encouraged by the Secretary of State's answer that we would proceed rapidly from dress rehearsal to the real thing at the earliest opportunity in the next Parliament.

It is interesting that the Joint Committee on Human Rights described the Bill in uncharacteristically enthusiastic terms as "the most important measure for the advancement of human rights in this country since the Human Rights Act itself"

I am encouraged that there is enthusiasm for creating a mechanism to ensure that the rights of British citizens under the Human Rights Act are effectively safeguarded without the need for extremely expensive and cumbersome constant recourse to the courts. I know that other Members want to concentrate on that issue, so I will not pursue it. The fundamental duty of the single commission, however, is very welcome.

I agree with many of those who have said that we need a robust legal framework for the commission for equality and human rights to enforce. That brings us back inexorably to the case for a single equality Act, and the importance of ensuring that such an Act reaches the statute book as quickly as possible in the next Parliament, consistent with doing a good job on the drafting. To that end, I am extremely encouraged that the discrimination law review has been set up, with the equality review working in tandem with it, to begin to do the work on what the single equality Act will look like. It is important that that proceeds as quickly as possible so that the single commission has a coherent set of legislation to enforce once it is up and running.

It has been said that the existing anti-discrimination law in the UK is rather complex. Different figures have been given for the number of items—I think that the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) had slightly more up-to-date figures than I have. I had a figure of slightly less than 100, but a few more statutory instruments and EU directives have probably passed me by since I last did a count. We can all agree, however, that people must try to find their way through a tangled, inconsistent, unpredictable, piecemeal and complex web—even when, as in the majority of cases, I believe, employers wish to do the right thing and ensure that they abide by the law.

Such a complex network of legislation and duties also makes it almost impossible for individuals who believe that they may have been discriminated against to find out, by examining the law, what their rights are, how they might access them and how they might protect them, unless they have the support of, say, a trade union or an advocacy group, which can teach them and point out what their rights are. Ideally, a simplified, harmonised approach is needed. We need an approach that consolidates some of the law that we have, but that also extends that law. As many Members on both sides of the House have pointed out today, there are some serious loopholes and inconsistencies in the law, which create a hierarchy of discrimination and protection from discrimination, which is unjustifiable when it is examined.

The existing law is under-inclusive. Those who are discriminated against on the grounds of gender, race or disability are more widely protected than those who are discriminated against in relation to what I have referred to as the orphan strands—the newer strands of sexual orientation, age and religious belief. As has been pointed out by other Members who have contributed to the debate, those of a certain age or sexual orientation may be actively discriminated against in the provision of goods, services or facilities, yet have no redress in law.

The present position is ridiculous. It is illegal for a landlord to say that he does not want a woman tenant or to prevent someone from becoming a tenant because of that person's colour, but it is not illegal to refuse tenants because of their age or sexual orientation. I cannot for the life of me see any justification for that. It must be put right as quickly as possible.

As I said earlier, we must shift the focus towards promotion and prevention rather than concentrating only on redress. That means restructuring some of our current laws. Our efforts to introduce a single equality Act must proceed in parallel with work that has already begun to create mechanisms for the enforcement of such a law, and the establishment of the commission for equality and human rights. I hope that in the next Parliament, in the not too distant future, we shall be able to enact both pieces of legislation. I welcome this dress rehearsal, and look forward to the real thing.

5.36 pm

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to speak in this important debate. I welcome the opportunity to give the Bill a Second Reading, especially as it takes place on the day on which a general election has been called. I shall be proud to campaign on the Bill, which focuses on the fundamental issue of equality and sends the clear message that it is at the top of our agenda, and I am proud that the Government have introduced it.

We know of the discrimination that still exists widely in nearly all spheres. The Secretary of State described it vividly, and I shall deal with some aspects of it later. First, however, let me congratulate the Secretary of State and her team on the hard work that they have done with various organisations to generate all this support for the Bill. I also congratulate the organisations involved, particularly the Equal Opportunities Commission. It helped the all-party sex equality group, which I chair and which has engaged in discussions on the Bill. I pay tribute to its relentless pursuit of the equality agenda.

I am very pleased about the review of all equality law. There has been a good deal of pressure for that from Members who are present today and from a number of organisations, and I am glad that the Government have responded. The current law is complex and inaccessible, and the mismatch of legislation is unacceptable. We have heard references to 35 Acts and to numerous statutory instruments, codes of practice and EC directives. It is impossible to continue with that legislative framework.

I especially welcome the creation of the commission for equality and human rights. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), I felt very proud when I read the list of fundamental duties that it will have,

"with a view to the creation of a society in which ... people's ability to achieve their potential is not limited by prejudice or discrimination", and providing that

"there is respect for and protection of each individual's human rights ... respect for the dignity and worth of each individual ... each individual has an equal opportunity ... there is mutual respect between communities".

I am proud to be associated with those ambitions, and, like others who have spoken, I am very pleased that the Bill promoted equality rather than just picking up the mess. It is a proactive Bill.

The commission will carry out the work of the existing commissions on gender, race and disability and will work to prevent discrimination and promote equality in the areas of age, sexual orientation and religion or belief. I welcome the extension of protection to groups discriminated against on those grounds. I also welcome the extension of protection against discrimination in the provision of goods, facilities and services on the basis of religion or belief, but I would like such protection to be extended to cover discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation or age, and to be extended to transgendered people. That issue has been referred to and the Secretary of State responded to it, but it is important that we bring those different strands together as soon as possible.

From a Welsh perspective—there is a distinct one—I welcome the fact that the commission in Wales will have greater autonomy than the commissions currently enjoy and will have an explicit power to advise the Welsh Assembly. However, I want an assurance that it will have a strong, devolved structure so that it can engage effectively in the context of devolution. I would be grateful if the Minister assured me about that when she responds.

I welcome the fact that there will be a separate Wales committee, which will be part of the new commission. It will set the agenda of the commission for equality and human rights in Wales, and it will take into account the fact that Wales is different from England. I hope that the Minister will respond to my earlier question about how that committee will be appointed.

The commission needs to acknowledge that there are specific circumstances in Wales that need to be addressed, such as the high number of small and medium-sized enterprises there. I agree with the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) that those businesses should not be exempt from the legislation, but we need to address the equality issue with them in a sensitive way. The Equal Opportunities Commission has received a tremendous amount of lobbying from small businesses in Wales. We must not exempt them, but we must approach the equality issue carefully.

[Julie Morgan]

I want the commission to be properly resourced, so that there is adequate funding to address the issues in Wales.

Chris Bryant: My hon. Friend makes an important point about how the different situation that may pertain in parts of Wales should be taken into account when considering equality issues. However, I hope that she would not encourage too much divergence from the fundamental principles embraced in the Bill. Part of the advantage of having a separate Wales committee is that some of the work done in this area by the Welsh Assembly Government has been groundbreaking. Indeed, we might want such suggestions to be brought into play throughout the UK.

Julie Morgan: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful intervention and I agree with the points that he made.

I want the commission to be properly resourced, so that there is adequate funding to address equality issues in Wales. The current budget—£70 million has been allocated to it—is, in the opinion of many equality organisations, insufficient to meet all the demands placed on it. I was concerned to hear from Conservative Front Benchers that the budget could be streamlined. In fact, the budget is probably not enough, and I hope that the Minister will address that issue when she responds.

A report by the EOC, the Commission for Racial Equality, the Disability Rights Commission and the Legal Services Commission found that Wales was an "advice desert". There is only one law centre in the whole of Wales. Even if an individual can get advice, they may not have access to experts trained in discrimination law. Funding for training advisers in Wales is clearly needed, and we need to make sure that the Bill provides it. So there is much work to do in training people in Wales, and we must have a budget that is able to provide for that. There is also, of course, the issue of the Welsh language.

I therefore agree with the intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant). We do not wish to diverge from the main thrust, which is the commission's covering the whole UK, but we must take into account the particular issues relating to Wales.

I also welcome the creation in the Bill of a public sector duty to promote equality between women and men. That duty will come alongside the existing race duty and the new disability duty, and I congratulate the EOC on its effective lobbying on this issue. In addition to what is covered in the Bill, I would like the elimination of harassment to be included in the gender duty, and I would like an assurance from the Minister that the gender duty will require public sector bodies to address unlawful pay discrimination, and to carry out the pay reviews that the EOC is promoting in its briefing for the Bill.

The pay gap in Wales is of particular concern, though on the basis of the figures provided by my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), it may be less than in England. For full-time women workers in Wales, it is 14 per cent. and for part-time workers, a completely unacceptable 32 per cent. A mandatory pay review would go some way towards addressing the problem, and I would like to hear whether the Government are prepared to go down that route.

I would like to raise the issue of the relationship of the new commission with the Children's Commissioner for Wales—it is a rights-based organisation—and with the new commissioner for older people, which we discussed in connection with a draft Bill in the Welsh Affairs Committee this morning. There is bound to be an overlap of functions and it is important to develop relationships between the bodies that cover the same issues. The draft Commissioner for Older People (Wales) Bill will, we were led to understand by the officials who gave evidence this morning, enact the first such commissioner in the world. The Bill's general aim is, among other things, to promote awareness of the interests of older people in Wales and to promote the provision of opportunities for, and the elimination of discrimination against, older people in Wales. We need to ensure that the two elements work well together and to avoid competing legislation. That will be part of the detailed work in Committee, which I hope will take place soon after we return to government. Tackling these issues should be one of our first priorities.

I would like to deal with some particular aspects of discrimination. We legislate for a purpose—to ensure that equality is promoted and honoured—and I believe that the Bill will help to eliminate sexism and gender discrimination, as well as racism and racial discrimination.

I also hope that the Bill will help us to deal with one of the most discriminated against groups in our society. I refer to the position of Gypsies and Travellers in this country. I am pleased that the Commission for Racial Equality is now working hard to promote the rights and needs of Gypsy Travellers. I hope that the legislation will help to ensure that adequate Traveller sites are provided in this country. Since the duty on local authorities was scrapped by the Leader of the Opposition when he was in government—he got rid of the Caravan Sites Act 1968—we have faced a difficult situation as to where Gypsies and Travellers are to stop. It has caused many problems for Gypsies and Travellers and for the local settled communities.

We all know that the policies of the market—Travellers were told that the market would provide and that they should buy their own land and get planning permission to set up their own sites—have failed miserably. It is very difficult for them to secure planning permission; indeed, the planning system rejects 90 per cent. of applications from Gypsies and Travellers. That has resulted in many illegal encampments, which then cause problems for local residents and are unacceptable for the Gypsy Travellers themselves. Currently, we face a no-win situation.

I believe that the Gypsy and Traveller community has cause to welcome the Bill. We know that these are among the most discriminated against groups in society. If the Bill means anything, we will have to tackle this issue and try to change people's attitudes towards Gypsies and Travellers. It is not easy to tackle it; we politicians find it difficult to do so. Sometimes I feel that we are discussing the Bill in theory, but at some point we have to face up to the existence of real discrimination and then do something about tackling it.

We know that Gypsies and Travellers have the highest rates of infant mortality, the worst health and the lowest levels of educational achievement in the country. A fairly recent MORI poll was commissioned by Stonewall. The attitudes survey showed that 18 per cent. of respondents felt "less positive" about members of other ethnic groups, while 35 per cent. said that they felt "less positive" about Gypsies and Travellers. I hope that the Bill will tackle that problem and will go some way towards providing equal opportunities in housing, health and education for Gypsy Travellers. It should help to stop the current highly unsatisfactory position, which is very hard on both Gypsy Travellers and on local settled communities. If we get back into government, that is one of the first issues that we must tackle. We must improve the situation for people who suffer such great discrimination, and for the residents who suffer the problems of illegal encampments.

For many reasons, I welcome this Bill. I hope that it will render George Orwell's dictum that some people are more equal than others a thing of the past. I look forward to a time when people of whatever gender, race, disability, age, sexual orientation or religious belief can enjoy real equality and complete freedom from discrimination. I believe that this Bill is an excellent step in that direction.

5.50 pm

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): I apologise for the fact that I was unavoidably absent for the middle part of this debate, although I followed proceedings with one ear as much as I could. I want to add my voice to all those who have spoken in support of the Bill.

The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 has been on the statute book for 30 years and, although the Secretary of State may not be aware of it, I worked very hard to ensure its success. I campaigned, lobbied, marched, wrote letters and attended endless meetings in its support, and it is good that the thinking on which it was based is being extended across society.

While I campaigned for the 1975 Act, in my heart of hearts, I hoped that it would eventually be repealed when we had succeeded in achieving our aims and objectives in respect of equality for women. It is sad that, 30 years later, we are still talking about it. I hope that it does not take another 30 years before our successors can repeal this legislation, which I believe will achieve a huge amount. It is part of the great tradition in which legislation is used to change cultural attitudes. Legislation has a real role in that process and I am sure that, in the long run, this Bill will ensure that discrimination is eliminated from our society.

I do not want to repeat what many have said already, but neither do I want the warm welcome that this Bill has received in the Chamber to end up with us being burned as we were by the Child Support Act 1991. All hon. Members will remember the heart-rending child support cases that we heard about in our postbags and surgeries, and we should be wary about a Bill that receives a similarly warm reception here. When the Bill is enacted, I am sure that it will be broadly helpful, but we must look at it with a critical eye to ensure that it does not cause the resentment and difficulties experienced with other legislation.

I am keen that the CEHR should succeed and hope that the Government are not contemplating a repeat of what happened with the Equal Opportunities Commission. I intend no slur on Manchester, but the EOC was rather banished from what might be called the centre of influence. My friends among the commissioners, and my own experience, tell me that the EOC was not as influential as had been hoped when it was established and I am sure that distance was one of the factors in that. I therefore hope that, when the new body is set up, it remains in the centre of influence, which is still London, although I accept that there should be a Welsh and a Scottish element to it because of the devolved Administrations.

It is crucial that the body works with the grain of society. Although there is a need to confront discrimination and prejudice, it is much easier to persuade a society to accept the changes that are required to deliver equality if people are encouraged to go along that route, rather than enraged or driven to take that route because resentment has built up. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) about the need to work with the grain of society, making sure that businesses, organisations and the community feel that it is in their own best interest to rid society of discrimination and to work towards equality because it would deliver a better society.

It is important that the new organisation is clear in its thinking. One problem with other equality bodies is that language has been developed that is all-encompassing and which avoids the issue in order not to offend. The problem is that the language itself is derided and people ignore or deride the organisation. None of us wants the efforts to abolish inequality to be undermined by language that invites mockery. We label it politically correct language, but in my view using such language often means avoiding clarity of thought. If we are not clear in our objectives and the meaning of the words that we use, we are likely to undermine our objectives. It is crucial that the CEHR is clear about what it wants to achieve and that it speaks in language that is readily understood.

Reading the explanatory notes, one thing that struck me was the general duty on the public bodies to ensure gender balance, with which I have no quarrel. That is not before time and I wish them all success in so doing. What slightly bothers me is how that is to be implemented—whether it will be implemented from the centre, whether public bodies will be subject to further quotas and targets, whether there will be costs to the bodies for the measurement of their achievements or lack thereof, and what impact those costs could have on the organisation, in terms of extra administration, and ultimately on the taxpayer or, in the case of local government, the council tax payer.

We are all well aware that council tax has risen steeply in recent years and that there is huge resentment of it. I would not wish legislation to be approved that added further costs to public bodies. It is encouraging that an organisation such as the Audit Commission is reviewing the amount of auditing work that it imposes on the bodies that it audits. I would hate to think that we were complicit in adding further costs, having just taken some away, particularly from local government. I would like the Minister to assure us that provisions to ensure gender balance will not give rise to extra costs and bureaucracy.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry that it is in the best interests of small businesses to maximise the quality of their employees. Labour Members discussed whether small businesses should be exempt from the legislation and I should be grateful to hear the Minister's thoughts on that and whether it is an issue for the equalities review. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) said that 90 per cent. of business is comprised of small businesses and that we must ensure that they are not overburdened or over-regulated. One million jobs have gone from manufacturing industry in the past few years and we do not want to put yet another regulatory burden on small businesses. We need to work with them so that they are encouraged to hire people and are not badgered and bullied into it.

[Mrs. Jacqui Lait]

Three organisations are being consolidated into one and there will be savings on premises. However, there will be overlapping expertise and the cost to the new organisation will be higher. The existing commissions believe that they do not have sufficient resources and it will be difficult for the Department to work out the balance, but we must ensure that, when the bodies are consolidated, duplication in obvious areas is winnowed out or efficiency will be reduced. No new body would want to be labelled inefficient from the start.

My final point is more personal. We have discussed the groups that we do not want to suffer discrimination, but I am concerned about the stigma that still attaches to people with mental health problems. When we discuss discrimination against people with disabilities, mental health disabilities are often overlooked. Society still stigmatises people with mental health disabilities more than those with physical disabilities. Will the Minister assure me that the commission's remit will cover mental health so that it can work with the broader population to alleviate people's fears about those with mental health problems? People who are mentally ill are capable of recovering because modern drugs and treatment enable them to play a full part in society. If that is achieved, a large group of people—one in five will suffer from a mental illness at some time—will have that stigma removed and be able to play a full part in society.

With those slightly cautionary notes, I wish the Bill well, but I also think that we need to look at it with a clear eye. There are pitfalls that we need to avoid before it passes into law, leaving us needing to change the legislation at a later date.

6.5 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I am delighted to take part in what is probably the last Second Reading debate of this Parliament and which, because the Bill will not be able to complete all its stages, may well provide the first Second Reading debate of the next Parliament when we come back after the election. I have been in the House for 18 years, and I cannot recall such a good-tempered debate on an issue that used to cause great controversy. I remember debates on equality and race and community relations in which there was much anxiety and distress among Members on both sides. Certainly, that was so when we were the Opposition and the Government were Conservative. That has not happened today, and we have heard some excellent speeches on both sides. Three in particular deserve mention—those from the hon. Members for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow)—and we have just had a speech from the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait). I often vote for the hon. Member for Buckingham as Back Bencher of the year; I know that he did not win this year, just, and he cannot win every year, but I am sure that after the election I shall vote for him as the Opposition Front Bencher of the year, because I am sure that his hard work in Parliament will be rewarded by whoever is the next Leader of the Opposition.

What has been good about the debate are the constructive points that Members have put in welcoming what the Government propose to do in the Bill. We have needed a Bill of this kind for some time, and there is no doubt huge support for it outside Parliament. All of us have received a briefing note from practically every one of the organisations involved, and there is universal praise. When the Law Society agrees with Stonewall and the Citizens Advice Bureau with Age Concern, there must be something very right about what the Government propose.

There is all-party endorsement, although I am sorry that I missed the speech from the Liberal Front-Bench spokesman and most surprised to see so few Liberal Democrat Members attending; they often claim to belong to the party that speaks for equality, but they obviously do not feel that so strongly that they felt they should come here in large numbers, which is a pity.

As the Secretary of State said, equality is the defining issue of our age. I am proud to have been a member of the first multiracial Government in this country's history, and I am very proud of what the Labour Government have done since 1997 on equality issues. In a sense, the Bill is an emphatic underlining of the work that we have done and a pledge to continue it after the election.

A lot of tributes have been given to Ministers, and I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Minister for Women and Equality, who has steered the Bill through from the initial consultation period, but I particularly mention my Leicester colleague, the Secretary of State, for her work on the equality issue. I have called her the champion of equality. I share a city and a community with her, and we go to many community events together. Throughout her long career, and even before she came to the House through her work for the National Council for Civil Liberties, she has always championed the ethnic minority community and women's rights. It is therefore right that she should have introduced the Bill.

My concern when the Bill was published—a concern, too, of the black and Asian community—was that we did not want the Government to abolish the Commission for Racial Equality. We felt that this was not the right time to deal with the CRE on the same basis as the other organisations. I welcome the fact that a number of organisations that have never had a commission acting on their behalf, such as Stonewall and Age Concern, will be included, with all these other strands, but I felt, and the community felt, that there was a strong case for keeping the CRE outside the ambit of the new commission until it was ready to join. Ministers in this Government listened very carefully to what the community had to say. They accepted the points made by organisations such as the 1990 Trust, listened to the consultation that took place and heeded the wise words of the CRE chairman, Trevor Phillips, who will now be chairing the equalities review, and they accepted that this was not the right time.

On race, a number of issues had to be resolved and time was needed to ensure that that was done before the CRE became part of that whole. We therefore welcome the fact that late entry is being accorded to the CRE. That commitment has been warmly welcomed by the community as a whole. That does not detract from the fact that we need to get on and ensure that we have the single equality Act that we need to ensure that the Human Rights Act 1998 is very much a part of our everyday life in this country.

I know that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) will be speaking next. There is no better advocate or champion of human rights legislation. She is much more experienced on these matters than I am, and I am sure that she will cover this point. When that legislation first became part of our domestic law, there were concerns about how it would develop. We all welcome it, and it has become part of the everyday life of our country; indeed, it is part of the law. It is right that the commission will recognise human rights issues within its overall ambit. Why have four or five commissions when we could have one commission on equality?

The other important point in this debate is the way the chairman of the commission and the other commissioners are chosen. I know that there is detail in the Bill and that we will have a chance to scrutinise it when it goes into Committee after the election, but it is important that we ensure that the commission properly reflects the community as a whole and the stakeholders in this new organisation.

The point made by the hon. Member for Beckenham is also important. I am not sure whether she was in favour of or against targets for public bodies. I think that targets are a very good idea. I recently completed a report called "Making Progress", which looks at Government appointments to quangos over the past five years with particular reference to the black and Asian community. The power of appointment is an extremely important weapon, and we need to make sure that we use it to put black and Asian people on to those committees, to put more women on to our quangos and to make sure that every group in society is properly represented.

The hon. Member for Daventry, a former Minister who, in government, had the opportunity to make a number of appointments, correctly talked about the huge talent that we have in this country. That is why we have a leadership role in equality and race issues in Europe. We are able to show by example—not by positive action but by merit—how our various communities, not just the black and Asian community, but women and all the other communities that make up Great Britain, have been able to contribute to the country. That is something that we can be proud of, but we need to go much further. Of course, jobs must be awarded on merit, but when the commission is formed, we must ensure not only that the commissioners are representative of society as a whole but, much more importantly, that people who have executive positions are also properly representative of society. That is happening with the civil service now; it is getting better. However, as the Secretary of State and the Minister of State have said in speeches on the issue, there is still so much more that can be done. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar is a rare example of a woman QC, but she was appointed on merit; she just happened to be a woman.

There has been much better progress in some Departments, especially in the Home Office. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) was Home Secretary, targets were introduced for the first time. In the Lord Chancellor's Department, now the Department for Constitutional Affairs, the Lord Chancellor has made a huge effort to ensure that there is adequate diversity in the appointment of the judiciary—all based on merit. The basis of equality is to ensure not that we have positive discrimination in this country, but that every citizen has the right to be chosen on their merits.

On today of all days, when the Prime Minister has asked Her Majesty for a general election and Parliament is to be dissolved, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) made a good point: the Bill is a good campaigning issue. It seems as though there will be common ground, which is good for politics and for our country. If equality and race could be taken above party politics and become campaigning subjects across parties and across the political spectrum, that would be the way forward.

My final point is about location. My right hon. Friend the Deputy Minister for Women and Equality may want to announce that the new commission will be based in Redditch, but what better place to house the new equality commission than the great city of Leicester?

Mr. Bercow: East.

Keith Vaz: Leicester, East is not yet a city. However, the architect of the legislation, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, comes from Leicester and by 2010 the city will have more people of Asian origin than any city in Europe, and half our population happens to be women. It is a perfect location, so in supporting the Bill I put in a bid for the city of Leicester. If we spoke to the Secretary of State she might be in favour of that as well.

6.17 pm

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Even the members of the commission will have to relax some time. Redcar has a fantastic beach, so my bid is for the location to be further north than Leicester. However, I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), who gave such an amusing and knowledgeable address.

I welcome the Bill. I hope I do not sound like a pompous lawyer, but I should like to welcome it not just personally but as chair of the all-party group on equalities. We thoroughly congratulate my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Deputy Minister for Women and Equality, who are great champions for equalities, and in particular great champions of the rights of women.

The Bill is a huge and strong signal of the Government's commitment to eradicate discrimination and enhance the rights of all members of our society. It makes it clear that the Government understand, if I can put it in shorthand form, that we are all in this together; the pursuit of equalities is not a minority interest.

[Vera Baird]

Almost equally welcome was the announcement in February of the equalities review, to try to identify the root causes of inequality. I hope and expect that Trevor Phillips can carry out a profound inquiry into the deep-seated, complex and subtle causes of the various inequalities that still limit the personal development of a large number of our citizens at a time—the 21st century—when that simply should not be happening.

Like most people, I also welcome the discrimination law review, which I hope will propose a single Act on equality. People are concerned about timing. The review is due to report in summer 2006, so if its proposals are clear, scrutinised reasonably quickly and accepted, by the time the commission starts in 2007 it may have the powers that it needs—the basis of equal law for all strands of inequality.

I repeat a point that has been made before: the current random selection of rights in equalities is unacceptable. There is a public duty for race and there is soon to be one for disability. We have suffered hugely as a gender from the fact that there has been no public duty for gender. That is, of course, in the Bill, but there is still no public duty to promote age.

Equally, discrimination in respect of goods and services on the grounds of race, gender, disability is unlawful. The Bill will prevent discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief, but still not on the grounds of age. All those things must be smoothed out and recast to ensure that the new commission is not saddled with—I hope that I have in place the right grammatical structure—the oxymoron of a hierarchy of equalities.

I wish briefly to welcome two aspects of the commission: the equalities aspect absolutely unequivocally, and the human rights aspect strongly, too. The commission's equality duties, as set out in clause 8, are truly all that we could ask for. The commission must "promote understanding of the importance of equality and diversity ... encourage good practice ... promote equality of opportunity ... promote awareness and understanding of rights under" equality law, enforce equality law and

"work towards the elimination of"

discrimination and harassment.

More prosaically but very practically, a huge advantage to having a single commission working together, even though the strands will obviously conduct their own separate work as well, is that it is not always possible to know the basis on which someone is discriminated against. If a 58-year-old black woman is refused a job, it is essential to have what the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) called a one-stop shop to which she can take her problem. She should not have to guess why she has been refused the job inappropriately. She needs to go to an organisation that can pick her case, run with it and put right what has been wrong. So I am pleased with the equality aspect, and I am pleased, too, with the incorporation of human rights.

Human rights is a very dear issue to me. I pay great tribute to the Joint Committee on Human Rights. I was briefly privileged to be a member of that Committee, but long after I left, it carried on its powerful work, which I firmly believe has played a large role in ensuring that human rights are part of the Bill and the commission. I strongly compliment my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Jean Corston), who has so very well chaired and led the Joint Committee on Human Rights and truly driven the human rights agenda in this Parliament in a way that is second to none.

The commission's human rights duties are not too bad either. The commission must "promote the understanding of the importance of human rights ... encourage good practice in relation to human rights ... promote awareness, understanding and protection of human rights and ... encourage public authorities to comply with the Human Rights Act 1998".

I give that four out of six, because I regard it as slightly weak in terms of enforcement.

I wish to express the devout hope that the commission will be instrumental in bringing about a human rights culture throughout out society. Equality teaches us that we cannot bring about a cultural change by piecemeal advances in rights that come about because of random cases that happen to go to court at any given time. The commission is necessary to drive human rights until they are rooted in our society, so that they become common values that we can use daily to frame and balance what the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) talked about: the decent ways that we should deal with one another.

I want to express three perhaps mild concerns, given the temper of the debate. First, the commission will be able to pursue cases under human rights law where the case is brought on the basis of equality, but if the equality aspect of the case is dropped or somehow falls away, the commission must drop the case completely, unless the Secretary of State gives leave for it to continue on a human rights basis. I cannot think why it should be for the Secretary of State to make such a decision and why the commission cannot determine whether the human rights aspect of the case is good enough to continue in its own right.

My second concern, which I raised with the Secretary of State, is the absence of teeth in relation to the human rights side of the commission. It has no power to issue codes of practice, and no investigatory and enforcement powers. I appreciate what she said—that we do not want to overburden the commission—but I hope there will be an opportunity when we discuss the Bill again to consider increasing the powers that relate to the human rights side of the commission, because it is hugely important that human rights are not seen as a lower priority.

The third caution that I raise is the way in which clause 9 is framed. Not surprisingly, and entirely appropriately, it gives priority to promoting rights under the European convention on human rights, which is entirely as one would expect. However, I hope that the provision will not preclude the promotion of broader rights. For example, we are signatories to the convention on the rights of the child and the convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women. The specific rights in those conventions equally merit dissemination by the commission, so I hope that I can be reassured that clause 9 is not intended to limit the commission's ambit.

On the commission's budget, I wish to raise a rather different point from that made by the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham). I think the commission will have an annual budget of £70 million plus start-up costs. All three current commissions think that that will not be sufficient and reckon that a budget of £120 million would be closer to that required. Together they get approximately £50 million, so even with the efficiency savings of which Conservative Members understandably made much, the proposed allocation of £70 million would leave only £20 million extra to deal with the three additional strands of equality: the human rights remit, the expanded operation into Scotland, Wales and the English regions—that is an important point for someone with a north-east constituency—and the important requirements of the new commission's community functions. It is hard to see how £20 million more than that for the current three commissions would be an adequate sum.

Let me turn briefly to the points made by the hon. Member for Buckingham about the Equal Opportunities Commission's fears about what I call in shorthand "the missing powers". Section 55 of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 currently gives the EOC the power to review discriminatory health and safety provisions. That is important when there is a requirement to treat women and men differently, such as the way in which pregnant women are treated at work. Section 73 of that Act allows the EOC to tackle persistent discrimination when an individual is unwilling or unable to pursue a complaint. It is important that the commission can take the matter to an employment tribunal, get a ruling and subsequently rely on that in civil proceedings. The power is useful and used frequently, but it is not in the Bill and I cannot think why.

Let me praise the gender duty. The Bill imposes a duty on all public bodies to have due regard to the need "to eliminate unlawful discrimination, and ... promote equality ... between men and women."

What a wonderful turn of phrase, so hallelujah for it. The provision was promised in 1999 and has now been delivered by the Government. Women will be glad to hear of it in the advent of an election and will be increasingly glad as its impact starts to bite in the years to come. The duty will shift responsibility on to public authorities and they will have to ensure that they take active steps to promote gender equality.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. and learned Lady give way?

Vera Baird: I will—I was actually just about to turn to a point that the hon. Gentleman made.

Mr. Bercow: Given the circumstances, the hon. and learned Lady is especially generous in giving way. Given the importance that the Government rightly attach to the duty to promote gender equality, does she agree that it is not too much to expect—either by amendment in Committee or through secondary legislation—a firm commitment to require pay reviews and action to counter pay discrimination not only in the provision of in-house services by public authorities, but in relation to contractors? When services are outsourced, action must be taken to ensure that those who service the Government operate by the standards that the Government apply in-house.

Vera Baird: Three aspects of how the gender duty will impact on the pay gap need clarification. Presumably—I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister will confirm this—public bodies will be required to address unlawful pay discrimination and carry out pay reviews. However, will the duty go beyond pay reviews and pay discrimination so that the kind of matters that the Women and Work Commission is starting to throw up can be examined? It has issued only a position paper thus far, but it has already found subtle ways in which the emergence of women into equal pay is being obstructed, although they can be remedied. As the hon. Gentleman says, the provision is necessary because although the definition of a public body covers any body that has functions of a public nature and the duty will therefore cover a private security firm that is contracted to provide a public function, for example, that duty will extend only to the public function, not to the whole of the private company. Consequently, the application of contract compliance becomes extremely important. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister can confirm that that is what is anticipated and intended, although I do not expect much detail at this early and rather queer stage of the Bill.

I shall end where I started by giving a welcome to the Bill and a predictive welcome to what I think of as the single equalities Bill that will soon follow. In a few weeks' time, when Labour has been re-elected for an historic third time and that Bill is introduced, we will, with a straight face, have to say what we have said today all over again. Our re-election is an exhilarating prospect, whereas the repetition of this debate is a somewhat debilitating prospect, but I say of both: the sooner, the better.

6.31 pm

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I am in the peculiar position of agreeing with almost everything that everyone has said in this afternoon's debate, which is hardly the right atmosphere in the Chamber on the day that the Prime Minister has asked Her Majesty to dissolve Parliament. However, I disagree with the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) in that I look forward to having the debate again, because some extremely important issues have been raised and although we have had plenty of time today to discuss them and we have heard some excellent speeches, it is worth re-examining them so that we can perfect the legislation before it is properly introduced in the House.

I agreed with much of what the Secretary of State said, in particular her remark that equality is a basic moral imperative—or words to that effect. I agree 100 per cent. and I think that all Members of this House do. It is not so long ago that that statement would not have commanded complete agreement within the Chamber, but it is now accepted that equality is a basic moral imperative and no party would argue differently. What is good about the proposals is that instead of being negative and designed to prevent discrimination, they are positive and designed to promote equality. I welcome that approach.

[Mrs. Eleanor Laing]

It is unfortunate that the Government have timetabled the Second Reading today, when the Bill has no chance of becoming law. What a pity that we did not use all those hours that we spent debating the rights and wrongs of fox hunting to consider this Bill, which, had it become law—in a slightly different form, having been through a proper Committee stage—could have done so much good.

Angela Eagle: I am confused, because the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) suggested that we delay the Bill until all the work had been done on the single equality Bill that must surely follow, whereas the hon. Lady wants us to have introduced this Bill sooner. Clearly, we all want legislation on the statute book as soon as possible, but I am confused about the Opposition Front-Bench team's position.

Mrs. Laing: I am saying that it is a pity that the whole issue was not discussed sooner—not only weeks, but months or years sooner. However, I pay tribute to the Secretary of State and her Ministers for much of the work that has been done on equality issues. We discuss those issues week after week, and much progress has been made, which I welcome.

Also welcome is my expectation that in a few weeks' time, when my colleagues and I are sitting on the other side of the Chamber—[Laughter.] The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) scoffs, but just let him wait. When we are sitting on the Government Benches, we shall have another debate of this type as a prelude to introducing our legislation on equality, to which we are all committed. The hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) asked when that was likely to happen. All I can say is that it has taken the Labour Government eight years to reach this stage, but it will not take the next Conservative Government as long, because for us it is a priority.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) put our case extremely eloquently. I reiterate what he said about the importance of the value of the work force and of fair and equal treatment. He put it so well, saying that what we are trying to do, if this proposed legislation were properly to be brought forward, is to encourage all employers to do what good employers have always done. At the same time we must not put unnecessary burdens on businesses and on employers, especially on small and medium-sized businesses. My worry is that if an employer knows that employing a certain type of employee—be it somebody with a disability, somebody who happens to be female or somebody from a different country—is likely to lead to a case being brought against them for some sort of unfairness, that employer, unfortunately, is likely not to employ that person in the first place. That would be a retrograde step. I do not want to see that happening because I believe passionately in equality of opportunity for everyone in the workplace.

The right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) is right in his plea for the need for strong advocacy in enforcement of the rules that would be brought forward by the commission. Any sort of legislation is meaningless without enforcement. I commend the right hon. Gentleman's patience and perseverance, having spent 19 years waiting to see the fruition of the work that he began a fair while ago. I am sure that he must be pleased to see a little step forward, and that much that he wishes to see happening will probably happen in the months ahead.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) made an interesting speech. I agree with his point about the importance of a positive approach and the need to promote a duty of equality rather than just to provide a right to complain in retrospect. He is right to promote sign language, which is what he called his personal soap box. It is so important but it is a much neglected area. I completely support what he has been trying to do. However, how strange it is that when asked how he and his party would implement what he was putting forward as being a reasonable idea, he said at the same time that his party would abolish the Department of Trade and Industry. The hon. Gentleman is a clever man and a quick thinker but he had no answer to the question. The truth is that he and his party know that there is no chance that they will be in Government to implement any of the things to which he is referring. He has no answer and he has not thought things through because he does not have to do so.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): My hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) answered the hon. Lady. He told her that the Home Office was the obvious place from which to bring forward this sort of legislation. If she reads the words of Lord Lester of Herne Hill, who used to work for Roy Jenkins, she will find that it was a Department that was capable of bringing forward legislation of this sort in the past, and would be capable of bringing it forward in future. Possibly it is a failing of the Department of Trade and Industry that the Home Office is failing to recognise how important human rights are to this country. Perhaps if the Home Office had the connection with human rights, it would be the Department that might start to recognise and respect human rights.

Mrs. Laing: The hon. Gentleman has had a few hours since the hon. Member for Gordon failed to answer the question, and he has thought up a really good answer. Perhaps he has worked out in the intervening period that his party might be trying to position itself in some form of coalition in the weeks ahead. That is extremely interesting. I commend him on trying to sort out a difficult situation. It might well come to that.

The hon. Gentleman for Sheffield, Hillsborough—[Interruption.] I beg the hon. Lady's pardon. I should have said the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Helen Jackson).

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): It is equality.

Mrs. Laing: No. I never think that addressing a lady as a gentleman means equality. After all, a woman who seeks equality lacks ambition. The hon. Lady has been committed to these issues for many years, and she made a spirited speech today. I am sure that the whole House will wish her well in whatever the future holds for her.

My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) made an impassioned speech in which he referred to respect and used the excellent phrase "equality before the law". That is what this is all about. He and I have supported some slightly unpopular causes, and we have always been right; we are winning through. With his usual eloquence, he explained how the Bill could be improved, and I look forward to that happening in the near future. He asked the Minister an important question, of which I am sure she has taken note, about the obligations on public authorities in regard to equal pay. We look forward to hearing her answer.

The hon. Member for Ilford, North (Linda Perham) has shown a consistent commitment to age equality. I recall the private Member's Bill that she introduced some time ago, about which she was extremely enthusiastic and on which she worked very hard. She made a good point today about the lack of a positive outlook on age. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) intervened on her to point out that the work force needed older people, and that is true. However, we must also remember that, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made such a dreadful mess of the pensions system, older people often no longer have a choice about whether to work; many of them have to work because the pensions in which they have invested during the whole of their working lives have been plundered by the Chancellor's taking £5 billion per annum out of private pension schemes. Surely we therefore owe it to the older people in society who have been forced to work when they want to retire to ensure that they should not be discriminated against when they apply for jobs. Let us not forget that, while most of us can never change our race or ethnic origin and very few of us change our sex, we shall all change our age. It would be rather short-sighted not to look forward to the time when that happens.

My hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) has been dedicated to promoting issues of disability, special needs education and equality for many years. He has committed himself to championing some unglamorous causes with his customary understatement and forensic accuracy. He is totally right to say that there is a business case for taking action. There is certainly a moral case for doing so, but there is also a business case. He also made some important suggestions on how the Bill could be improved, and I very much look forward to seeing him and my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk introducing a new Bill when they become Ministers in a few weeks' time.

Keith Vaz: As the hon. Lady prepares for ministerial office, will she address the point that I made in my speech that it is important that the new commission should be located outside London? I put forward the view that Leicester would be an excellent place for it. Will she make an early commitment, before she becomes a Minister, to accept Leicester as the location?

Mrs. Laing: I think that I could make a commitment that, when I am in that position, I could come to Leicester to review the possibilities.

Keith Vaz: You are already wriggling.

Mrs. Laing: No—Leicester would be an excellent place. It is in the middle of country, so why not?

The hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle) was right to say that we must ensure that no teeth are lost in the streamlining process. I wonder whether that was in the Age Concern brief.

Sir Robert Smith: Some of the new body's teeth are to promote human rights and the European convention in this country. Would the hon. Lady pull those teeth from the Bill under the leadership of the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) or would she keep them to promote the rights?

Mrs. Laing: The Conservative version of the Bill will have all the teeth that the measure currently possesses. That is a reasonable commitment.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) has been committed to equality for many years and she spoke passionately about it. That also applies to my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait), who is right to make the case for small businesses and saving money. There is no point in putting three bodies into one if the costs increase. Creating one body out of three is the perfect opportunity to save costs; the public expenditure thereby saved could then be better spent on other things.

The hon. Member for Leicester, East was right to say that members of all sectors of our society must be given opportunity on merit but, sadly, some parties on the fringes of British politics do not agree. I hope that very few people cast votes for those parties in the forthcoming general election.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar who is chairman of the all-party group on equalities, of which I am pleased to be an officer, as ever made an excellent and impassioned speech. We can all work together on the issue.

The Bill is correct, not only because it is the right thing to do but because it is good for the people of this country and our economy. We all believe in equality; let us go forward and try to achieve it.

6.47 pm

The Deputy Minister for Women and Equality (Jacqui Smith): I agree with hon. Members from all parties about the quality of our debate today. I should like to put on record my thanks to my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke), my hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Helen Jackson), for Ilford, North (Linda Perham), for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan), for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) and, for an intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant). All have a proud record of campaigning for equality and against discrimination in the House, in our party and in their communities. I also put on record my welcome for the support from Opposition parties for the Bill, especially given that the measure is so ambitious, as the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) said.

[Jacqui Smith]

The Bill needs to be ambitious because it aims to help nurture the sort of society that can meet with confidence the challenges of the future. We want a society in which, as the Bill makes clear in clause 3's groundbreaking fundamental duty, every individual can achieve their full potential and enjoy equal respect and dignity. We want a society in which every one of us has an equal chance to participate and contribute, and where our communities are strong, vibrant and celebrated as part of the essential fabric of modern Britain. The Bill is the latest step in the development of our equality and human rights framework. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State says, it builds on the excellent work of the existing equality commissions, to which I pay tribute, and that of many other organisations that strive to make Britain a better place for all.

Despite the progress that we have made in the past 30 years, there is still too much evidence of persistent inequalities, whereby people's life chances are blighted because of who they are instead of enhanced by what they can bring to our workplaces, communities and civil society. Although our law has moved on, no institutions exist to enforce new regulations on sexual orientation, religion and belief—and, when they arrive, on age. Despite our historic human rights legislation, there is no institution providing advice on or promoting human rights. Individuals facing discrimination need to decide into which box they fit in order to get support, and employers large and small who want to do the right thing to tackle discrimination need to shop around for the right advice. The time is therefore right for a step change to meet those future challenges.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): Will the Minister give way?

Jacqui Smith: No, because I am short of time. I am sorry.

The single commission for equality and human rights will ensure greater impact, relevance, ease of access and coherence.

I want to try to respond to some of the points made about the commission. For example, my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough—to whom I also extend my best wishes for what I know will continue to be an active and, in the broadest sense, political life following her retirement from the House—made the case strongly for legislation to change culture. In particular, she argued that we need both promotion of the values of equality and diversity and sufficient enforcement powers to make a difference. I assure her that we have put in place the necessary teeth in terms of modern enforcement powers to ensure that the commission is able to do that.

In relation to individual cases, which were raised by the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), funding will come from the commission for equality and human rights budget. At the behest of stakeholders, we have not set down specific criteria on which cases should be supported. That will rightly be a decision for the commission to take, and will be part of its strategic planning in relation to spending priorities.

I know that there is concern about rolling forward the provisions in sections 55 and 73 of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975. It is our intention that there will be no regression in the powers of the commission, particularly with regard to section 73. We are examining carefully what to do to ensure that that is the case. Perhaps I can write to the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk on the point about freedom of information in relation to clause 6.

I want to respond, however, to the point made about the state of the nation report and the function of the commission to monitor equality. That is an innovative new duty to measure progress on human rights and equality. It is important, of course, that the commission gets it right. The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk argued that the process should happen every year. In fact, we will need to take time both to gather evidence and to ensure that the right indicators are in place. That is why clause 13 provides for wide consultation. It is important that that process should not be rushed. I assure him that under clause 44, the commission will be able to continue an action started by one of the three existing commissions.

One of the important things about the commission will be the way in which it recognises the new nature of devolution in the UK. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North raised issues in relation to Wales. I assure her that members of the Wales committee, while appointed by the CEHR board, will in practice be appointed in consultation with the National Assembly for Wales. Of course, the chair of that committee will be the commissioner with special responsibility for Wales, who will have been appointed in agreement with the Assembly. We will of course want to ensure that the commission works closely with both the Children's Commissioner for Wales and the older persons' commissioner for Wales.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston and others raised the issue of disability in particular. We have listened carefully and taken into consideration the recent history of development in relation to disability, not least the important progress made with the Disability Rights Commission. That is why we have made provision for a disability commissioner and disability committee. As my right hon. Friend said, many people in the disability world are now convinced and more confident that they will benefit from a commission that can not only give a strong voice to disabled people in determining progress on their legislation, which is right, but address cross-strand issues and be a more powerful and effective body.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East for his comments about the way in which the Government have tried to listen to the understandable concerns of black and ethnic minority communities, especially those represented by the Commission for Racial Equality, the 1990 Trust and others.

We have listened, I believe that we have addressed those concerns, and I can give my hon. Friend this commitment: we will continue to listen to those communities and ensure that they have a voice through the commission. I entirely agree that we must ensure that both commissioners and staff represent a model for the diversity that we feel should be promoted.

Keith Vaz: Can my right hon. Friend also answer my question about the commission's location? Will she consider Leicester as a possible venue?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend wins today's prize for trying very hard on behalf of his constituency. I assure him that I will consider Leicester—at the same time as considering Redditch.

As for the important issue of the significance of the commission for business, Members are right: the CBI has welcomed the establishment of a one-stop shop where all the business expertise will be in one place. I take particularly seriously the need to ensure that small and medium-sized businesses can benefit from that. The opportunity to build up regional support and to use intermediaries is especially important.

Costs have been mentioned. I believe that savings will result from the combination of administration, property and other backroom services, but those savings must be ploughed back into front-line services. I therefore consider that £70 million—which builds on the £43.5 million currently being spent on the commission—is appropriate, given the commission's new responsibilities.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar and others rightly spoke of the importance of the commission's work on human rights. Human rights are about more than compliance, and the commission will enable us to take them out of the courtroom and on to the front line of public service delivery. That applies particularly to the promotion of public awareness, and to encouraging public authorities to comply with their obligations to undertake inquiries about human rights problem areas, give advice and intervene in cases. The commission must add value, however. My hon. and learned Friend mentioned additional enforcement powers, which we do not think would add value in the current circumstances. There is already a well-understood and well-used process for challenging alleged breaches of convention rights in courts and at tribunals. Nevertheless, like my hon. and learned Friend, I have no doubt that the commission will make a significant difference.

In the limited time that remains, I want to deal with what has been said about the development of harmonised legislation. It is because we recognise the need to consider our discrimination legislation in detail that we have set up not just the equalities review but the discrimination law review. That will enable us to create a simpler, fairer legal framework with a view to introducing a single equality Bill in due course. I know that many Members, especially my hon. Friends, will welcome that. Certainly the case was made strongly by my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey. However, I do not think that we should delay this Bill for that purpose.

Representatives of the new strands, in particular, think it important for us to make progress in giving them institutional support for the first time. The equalities review will enable the commission to begin its work with a proper understanding of where equalities persist, and the ability to make a real difference.

The Bill marks a step along the journey towards a prosperous and fair society. It is, I believe, a better Bill than it was when we began to plan and consult on it. Its scope is wider, its powers are stronger and it is more effective and relevant. It is a good Bill, and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

MENTAL CAPACITY BILL (PROGRAMME) (NO. 4)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme Motions),

That the following proceedings shall apply to the Mental Capacity Bill for the purpose of supplementing the Order of 11th October 2004, as varied by the Orders of 12th October 2004 and 14th December 2004:

Consideration of Lords Amendments

1. Proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments shall be completed at this day's sitting and shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement.

Subsequent stages

2. Any further Message from the Lords may be considered forthwith without any further question being put.

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement.—[James Purnell.]

The House divided: Ayes 277, Noes 97.

Division No. 150] [7pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Adams, Irene (Paisley N)
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Bob (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, rh Donald (Swansea E)
Armstrong, rh Ms Hilary
Bailey, Adrian
Baird, Vera
Banks, Tony
Barnes, Harry
Barron, rh Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beard, Nigel
Benn, rh Hilary
Bennett, Andrew
Benton, Joe (Bootle)
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Bradley, rh Keith (Withington)
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Bradshaw, Ben
Brennan, Kevin
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burnham, Andy
Byers, rh Stephen
Byrne, Liam (B'ham Hodge H)
Cairns, David
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)
Campbell, Ronnie (Blyth V)
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Cawsey, Ian (Brigg)
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Mrs Helen (Peterborough)
Clarke, rh Tom (Coatbridge & Chryston)
Clarke, Tony (Northampton S)
Clelland, David
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, rh Robin (Livingston)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, rh Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cranston, Ross
Crausby, David
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Ann (Keighley)
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Jim (Coventry S)
Cunningham, Tony (Workington)
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs Claire
Dalyell, Tam
David, Wayne
Davidson, Ian
Davies, rh Denzil (Llanelli)
Dawson, Hilton
Denham, rh John
Dhanda, Parmjit
Dismore, Andrew
Dobbin, Jim (Heywood)
Donohoe, Brian H.
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim (Lewisham W)
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Edwards, Huw
Efford, Clive

Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff (Barnsley E)
Etherington, Bill
Farrelly, Paul
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul (Newport W)
Follett, Barbara
Foster, rh Derek
Foulkes, rh George
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike (Ilford S)
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Bruce (Walsall S)
Gerrard, Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Hain, rh Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hamilton, David (Midlothian)
Hanson, David
Harris, Tom (Glasgow Cathcart)
Havard, Dai (MerthyrTydfil & Rhymney)
Healey, John
Henderson, Doug (Newcastle N)
Hendrick, Mark
Hepburn, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hood, Jimmy (Clydesdale)
Hoon, rh Geoffrey
Hope, Phil (Corby)
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, rh Alan (Newport E)
Howarth, George (Knowsley N & Sefton E)
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hughes, rh Beverley (Stretford & Urmston)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hume, John (Foyle)
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Eric
Ingram, rh Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda (Hampstead & Highgate)
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Kevan (N Durham)
Jones, Lynne (Selly Oak)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Joyce, Eric (Falkirk W)
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keen, Alan (Feltham)
Keen, Ann (Brentford)
Khabra, Piara S.
Kilfoyle, Peter
Knight, Jim (S Dorset)
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, David
Laxton, Bob (Derby N)
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom (High Peak)
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Liddell, rh Mrs Helen
Lloyd, Tony (Manchester C)
Lucas, Ian (Wrexham)
McAvoy, rh Thomas
McCabe, Stephen
McCartney, rh Ian
MacDonald, Calum
McDonnell, John
MacDougall, John
McFall, rh John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
Mackinlay, Andrew
MacShane, Denis
McWilliam, John
Mahmood, Khalid
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Mann, John (Bassetlaw)
Marsden, Gordon (Blackpool S)
Marshall, David (Glasgow Shettleston)
Marshall-Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Meacher, rh Michael
Michael, rh Alun
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin (Gt Grimsby)
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moonie, Dr. Lewis
Moran, Margaret
Morgan, Julie
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Munn, Ms Meg
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
O'Hara, Edward
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Organ, Diana
Osborne, Sandra (Ayr)
Pearson, Ian
Picking, Anne
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter (Burnley)
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg (Hyndburn)
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Prescott, rh John
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Purnell, James
Quin, rh Joyce
Rapson, Syd (Portsmouth N)
Raynsford, rh Nick
Reed, Andy (Loughborough)
Robertson, John (Glasgow Anniesland)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Coventry NW)
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Roy, Frank (Motherwell)
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Salter, Martin
Sawford, Phil
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simon, Siôn (B'ham Erdington)
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, rh Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, rh Chris (Islington S & Finsbury)
Smith, rh Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Soley, Clive
Southworth, Helen
Squire, Rachel
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stewart, Ian (Eccles)
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Tami, Mark (Alyn)
Taylor, rh Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Dr. Richard (Wyre F)
Thomas, Gareth (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Touhig, Don (Islwyn)
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr. Desmond (Brighton Kemptown)
Turner, Neil (Wigan)
Tynan, Bill (Hamilton S)
Vaz, Keith (Leicester E)
Vis, Dr. Rudi
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N.
Watson, Tom
Watts, David
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Williams, Betty (Conwy)
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wood, Mike (Batley)
Woodward, Shaun
Worthington, Tony
Wright, Anthony D. (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, David (Telford)
Wright, Iain (Hartlepool)
Wright, Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Gillian Merron and
Mr. John Heppell

NOES

Allan, Richard
Ames, David
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Bellingham, Henry
Bercow, John
Boswell, Tim
Brady, Graham
Brazier, Julian
Burnside, David
Burstow, Paul
Carmichael, Alistair
Cash, William
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Clarke, rh Kenneth (Rushcliffe)
Conway, Derek
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davies, Quentin (Grantham & Stamford)
Djanogly, Jonathan
Donaldson, Jeffrey M.
Dorrell, rh Stephen
Duncan, Alan (Rutland)
Duncan Smith, rh Iain
Evans, Nigel
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Michael
Foster, Don (Bath)
Francois, Mark
Gale, Roger (N Thanet)
Garnier, Edward
Gill, Parmjit Singh
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Greyling, Chris
Green, Damian (Ashford)
Green, Matthew (Ludlow)
Greenway, John
Gummer, rh John
Hammond, Philip
Heath, David
Hendry, Charles
Hoban, Mark (Fareham)
Hogg, rh Douglas
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, rh Michael
Jenkin, Bernard
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Key, Robert (Salisbury)
Knight, rh Greg (E Yorkshire)
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Leigh, Edward
Lewis, Dr. Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Lilley, rh Peter
Luff, Peter (M-Worcs)
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, Patrick
Malins, Humfrey
Mawhinney, rh Sir Brian
Mercer, Patrick
Mitchell, Andrew (Sutton Coldfield)
Moss, Malcolm
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Öpik, Lembit
Page, Richard
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Redwood, rh John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Sanders, Adrian
Selous, Andrew
Simpson, Keith (M-Norfolk)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns & Kincardine)
Smyth, Rev. Martin (Belfast S)
Spring, Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John (Solihull)

Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Tyrie, Andrew
Viggers, Peter
Walter, Robert
Watkinson, Angela
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, David
Willis, Phil
Wilshire, David
Winterton, Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Sir Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Yeo, Tim (S Suffolk)
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. John Randall and Mr. Eric Forth

Question accordingly agreed to.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you confirm that Standing Orders state that, after the House has debated and divided on my amendment (a), any Division on an amendment will be in the hands of the Crown unless there is any free time at the end of the allocated period?

Mr. Speaker: That is correct, if all these matters can be discussed in the hour available. However, if the whole hour is devoted to his amendment, that will be the only one to be voted on, unless a Minister of the Crown were prepared to facilitate otherwise.

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek clarification in respect of my amendment. Are you saying that there will not be a separate vote on that?

Mr. Speaker: That is correct, unless we dispose of other amendments in the hour at our disposal and are thus able to get to your amendment.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek clarification on this matter. There will be a Division on the amendment tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), and I believe that there may be a subsequent vote on the lead amendment in the group. However, will the House have an opportunity to express its opinion on the remaining amendments in the group and on the amendments in the other two groups? If not, will the votes on the remaining amendments in the first group and on the amendments in the other two groups be taken separately?

Mr. Speaker: That would be the scenario, if we take the full hour on the first group. It is then a case of the knife coming down and everything else falling.

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that when the Bill was last debated in the House, letters exchanged between the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs and the Archbishop of Cardiff were circulated to hon. Members. Has it been indicated to you whether further correspondence has taken place, and whether the Archbishop of Cardiff has made a statement following the proceedings in the other place?

Mr. Speaker: That is information that the right hon. Gentleman can draw out in the course of the debate.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. For guidance, can you clarify that what you are saying to us essentially is that the House now has a choice between debating these important issues or voting on them? The Government's timetable has forced that on us, and here in the House of Commons we can have neither a proper debate nor the votes that we need to tease out these important issues. Is that the position?

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman is using a point of order to express an opinion, which he is entitled to do from time to time, but I will not be drawn into whether I agree with that opinion or not.

Mental Capacity Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 2

PEOPLE WHO LACK CAPACITY

Lords amendment: No. 1.

Mr. Speaker: With this we may consider amendment (a) thereto, Lords amendment No. 2, Lords amendment No. 3 and amendment (a) thereto, Lords amendment No. 4 and amendments (a) to (e) thereto, Lords amendments Nos. 5 and 6, Lords amendment No. 7 and amendment (a) thereto, Lords amendments Nos. 14, 17 to 19, 22 and 23, Lords amendment No. 24 and amendment (b) thereto, and Lords amendments Nos. 71, 74 and 93.

7.16 pm

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): I beg to move amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 1.

I draw the attention of the House to other amendments that I have tabled in the first group: amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 3, amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 4, amendments (b) to (e) to Lords amendment No. 4, amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 7, and amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 11. I have also signed amendment (b) to Lords amendment No. 24 and others.

I shall not go through the amendments in detail. As has already been made clear, we have only one hour and I know that many other hon. Members wish to get in. Each of the amendments was designed to demonstrate that, during the passage of the Bill through the House and another place, the Government have not met many of the major concerns of those who made representations to the Government during the consultation period and subsequently. There are many serious flaws in the Bill.

On the point about the correspondence between the Archbishop and the Government, I know it is on the record in the other place, but the Archbishop has expressed his deep unhappiness with the fact that the Government, having given undertakings in the House, have not met them during the Bill's passage through the Lords. At the time of that rather messy conclusion to the debate in the House, a letter was circulated on the Government Benches which purported to suggest that there had been tacit agreement between the Government and, at that stage, Archbishop Smith about which amendments would be acceptable in the Lords. That was not circulated in all parts of the House. The Archbishop has said that the spirit and wording of that letter have not been met.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Is my right hon. Friend saying that the Government circulated a letter among chosen Members of the House, that that letter was not revealed to the House, and that it now turns out that the promises contained in the letter were not carried through in the debates in the other House?

Mr. Duncan Smith: That is pretty much the case. If my right hon. Friend reads Hansard, he will see clearly that most of that messy conclusion is fully recorded and that the Minister finally had to read out the letter so that everyone understood what was in it.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Duncan Smith: I shall give way only once more, because other hon. Members want to speak.

Mr. Leigh: Does my right hon. Friend agree that this week we have shown that there are limits to moral relativism and that not only does the Bill reek of moral relativism, but the way in which it has been conducted reeks of moral relativism? At the end of this hour surely we must have opportunities to state that there are absolute truths, such as the right to life.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I agree. The Bill contains a number of problems, but most importantly I am reminded that we have delayed business in this House because of the death of the Pope. Everyone celebrates his belief, but tonight we are discussing a Bill that cuts across that belief.

Many hon. Members have faith and many do not. I do not want to speak on behalf of anyone, but the Government have a great opportunity to stand by their commitment in this House and the other place and say that they are against euthanasia in all its forms. They know very well that that is still not clear enough in the Bill and that it will be possible for someone who might otherwise live to have life-sustaining treatment withdrawn because someone who was appointed as attorney believes that it is the right thing to do. The Government's problem is that the language used to modify the provision is still not strong enough. It still refers to motive, but the key word that should have been used throughout is "purpose". The Bill should state that if someone acting as an attorney and making a decision can be demonstrated to have the purpose of ending someone's life, that decision should be null and void. That lies at the heart of all our debates.

Many right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House hold strong opinions about the matter. They have behaved impeccably, with great honour, and have consulted across the Floor of the House to ensure that we have compromised enough and that the amendments are right. Throughout the passage of the Bill amendments tabled by Back Benchers have offered the Government a solution. They have not always been perfect, but they have been available to ensure that the Bill shuts the door on euthanasia by omission. That is the problem. We now have the prospect of a Bill being railroaded through the House when the Government know full well that they do not have the backing of the vast majority of Members of this House. Labour Members who are not prepared to be dragooned by threats or promises have chosen to oppose it honourably. I simply do not understand how the Minister responsible for the matter or his colleagues in the other place can put their hands on their hearts and genuinely say that they believe that the Bill is now strong enough to exclude the possibility of euthanasia by omission. Someone charged as an attorney could make a decision with the purpose of ending life. That is in the Bill.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): My right hon. Friend is doing a marvellous job for a noble cause. Can he explain why, when the Government say that they share our wish not to make euthanasia legal, they cavil at putting words into the Bill that would guarantee that?

Mr. Duncan Smith: The Government have got themselves into a terrible state about whether the provisions that we are discussing might have affected the judgment in the Bland case. I accept that that is one of their main concerns. They have been anxious to get the Bill through because many charities want it. There is a legitimate reason for that and I do not cavil at it, but what bothers me is that the Government have split the difference. Ultimately the problem boils down to a word or, in the case of their hon. Friends' amendment, a single line. It would cost them nothing, even now, to turn to their Back Benchers who tabled the amendment and agree to include it in the Bill. Even I would be satisfied that that would at last safeguard the problems that we are talking about. They cannot even bring themselves to do that. That is essentially what happens when civil servants take control of an issue and Ministers are, as happens too often, driven by those civil servants. They are generalists, in this particular case, who do not understand, or do not wish to understand, the deep problems that exist in some of the wording that they will allow to go through.

We have limited time and I wish to draw to a close. I shall not talk in detail about the problems, but will simply say that one simple principle is at stake. We have a Bill that has been through a fair amount of debate in both Houses and which, in its last phases, is about to be driven through at speed by a Government who appear, or who give the sense of appearing, to be frightened of further debate, because that debate would expose the reality that the Bill is deeply flawed. The Bill is unlike most others that the House passes and votes on: most Bills are not likely to end in death for somebody who is subject to its failures. That is the reality of this Bill, however. Somebody in future years may find themselves incapable of speaking or controlling events for themselves and relying on someone else whose motivation and purpose is not what it should be. They will have food and fluids withdrawn. In short, they will lose their life. That is the difference between this Bill and many others.

It is not too much to say that a Government who have refused to give their own side a free vote, who have railroaded their own Members as hard as they can, and who have refused to accept the advice or helpful assistance of almost everybody who wanted to see the Bill through, albeit with safeguards, show an arrogance that simply will not stand up over the next few years. I guarantee—it is a small prophecy—that in future years the Bill will be challenged, and I hope that it happens soon. They will be forced to bring it back to reverse some of the provisions that they have allowed to go through.

I urge all right hon. and hon. Members to take the Government at their word in the House the last time the Bill was before us. They said that they intended to do the decent thing; they have not. I urge Members to vote for my amendment and to vote down all the Government amendments.

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): I have spent long periods in consultation on the Bill and in negotiation with officials and Ministers in both Houses. I must record that I will strike a slightly different tone from that of the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), in that I welcome much of what has happened and many of the amendments that have been made. I speak, I know, for Archbishop Peter Smith in saying that.

My recent amendment to Lords amendment No. 24 highlights an area in which I still feel there is room for movement by the Government, however. The Bill has been debated at length and amended in specific areas. The area I am talking about now is that of advance decisions. My amendment deals with advance directives and whether suicidally motivated advance directives should be given force in the Bill to bring about a person's death.

My amendment seeks to close a glaring loophole in the Bill as drafted. Advance decisions, as the Government have acknowledged, are not covered by the welcome declaratory provision formerly contained in clause 58, now in clause 61, that restates that the Bill does not change the law on assisted suicide. We need to be extremely clear about that. The preservation of the prohibition in the Suicide Act 1961 on assisting suicide will not stop doctors being forced by the unamended Bill to engage in what many regard, in common sense, as complicity in expressly suicidal refusals of treatment. We need to be clear, too, as the Government have acknowledged, that the best interest criteria in the Bill do not apply to advance decisions. We welcome those best interest clauses.

7.30 pm

In my view, the Bill will, if unamended, give statutory force to expressly suicidally motivated advance decisions. As night follows day, this glaring loophole will be exploited by the Voluntary Euthanasia Society, which will promote carefully drafted advance decisions that will force doctors to be complicit in assisted suicide and may make a mockery of our prohibition against assisted suicide.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) said on Report before Christmas, the Voluntary Euthanasia Society is determined to use advance decisions to weaken our legal prohibition against euthanasia, and I feel that the form in which advance decisions are included in the Bill will give it a helping hand. It is interesting that the society has been strangely silent all through the passage of the Bill.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the publication this week of the House of Lords Select Committee report on the Assisted Dying for the Terminally Ill Bill, introduced in the other place by Lord Joffe, a member of the Voluntary Euthanasia Society, underlines the statement that my hon. Friend has just made in this House?

Jim Dobbin: Yes, I agree entirely. There is a determination by the Voluntary Euthanasia Society to make sure that that Bill, introduced in the Lords for the second time, will re-emerge at some time in the future.

My amendment was drafted by Professor Finnis, a professor of law at Oxford university and an internationally renowned authority on these matters.

[Jim Dobbin]

Obviously the Government believed that he was a competent witness, as it were, because they happily engaged with him in the preparation of clause 61, and he was happy to take part in that discussion. Professor Finnis argues that if we approve the Bill without closing the loophole, the Bill will carelessly introduce a new culture of prescribing death by the artifice of arranged and managed omissions. That is the view of the person who helped to draft the declatory provision in the first place.

The Archbishop of Cardiff said:

"Professor Finnis and I believe that a further amendment is still needed to ensure that the Bill confers no authority on expressly suicidal advance decisions. We therefore strongly support efforts of Members of both Houses who are seeking to introduce an amendment to exclude decisions from being given validity or authority by a Bill where they have a purpose of bringing about death or are motivated by a desire of doing so."

I had a letter today from Archbishop Peter Smith which backs up that statement. He added:

"I very much hope the government will reconsider its opposition to inserting such an amendment, which we firmly believe can be made without affecting the jurisdiction of the courts affirmed in the Bland case."

That, too, is a very clear statement that there is no wish by the hierarchy or Professor Finnis to overturn the Bland judgement; the amendment would not do that. Professor Finnis was asked to draw up the amendment on the basis of that being the case, and that is what he has endeavoured to do.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): My hon. Friend said some moments ago that he believed that clause 61 did not protect people in the case of an advance directive. Will he explain why he thinks that is the case? My reading of the clause is completely the opposite.

Jim Dobbin: That is the legal advice that I have been given, and I understand that it is also the Government's position—perhaps the Minister will want to clarify that later.

The amendment would not force doctors to keep treating a dying, unconscious patient where the treatment was futile and even where the family expressed the wish for the patient to die peacefully at home. By contrast, the amendment would not prevent doctors from giving palliative treatment to a dying patient if foreseeably that might shorten the patient's life. We have had a superb example of that in recent days. In his last days, the Holy Father displayed the true meaning of dying with dignity. He did not ask for all the stops to be pulled out to keep him alive; he even declined to return to hospital, preferring to die at home, at the Vatican. He demonstrated that those of us opposed to any weakening of the legal prohibition and assisted suicide are not vitalists, and I hope that the Minister will acknowledge that today.

Without the amendment, we have only clause 4(5), the best interests provision, which prevents anyone, in considering a person's best interests, from being motivated by a desire to bring about death, but the clause does not apply to advance decisions, as the Government have made clear. Without my amendment it would be possible under the Bill for an expressly suicidal advance decision to be legal and binding on the doctor with care of the patient.

Throughout discussion of the Bill, I have not doubted the Government's good intentions, but good law is far more important. In addition to the loophole that I have already identified, there is nothing in the Bill to deal with a dangerous situation such as the one we witnessed in the United States last week in the Terri Schiavo case, where the attorney had a vested financial interest in the incapacitated patient's premature death. We do not want to get into such a situation, but if the Bill is not amended we shall be starting down that dangerous road. It is not too late for the Government to amend the Bill, and many people up and down the country, who are closely monitoring today's events, will be sorely disappointed if the Government fail to respond appropriately.

I accept your ruling about a vote on my amendment, Mr. Speaker. In that event, I should seek powerful reassurances from the Government that all the concerns that I have raised in my speech be taken into consideration and covered in some detail.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): It would be redundant and tedious for the House if I were to go on at length about the difficulties in which the Government have put us by their choice of the programme motion that the House has just passed. It is a matter of record that after the most exhaustive consideration in the other place, including three hours on Third Reading—when, as the Minister knows, the convention is to move and consider amendments—it has fallen to us to consider a huge range of Lords amendments, and amendments proposed thereto, in a mere hour. That has put the House in a difficult position.

I genuinely have not reached a final conclusion about my course of action at the end of the debate, so it would help me if the Minister could give the House two assurances. He needs some time to explain his position. First, will he tell the House straight that in his considered view there is no possibility of euthanasia by omission in any circumstances under the Bill? My second fundamental concern relates to the issues raised by the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) when he spoke about his all-party amendment. Will it be possible to conclude a valid advance directive, on which there would be an implied obligation to act, by somebody with a suicidal motive? I am not legally informed, and it seems that there is a clash of legal opinion on the matter, but it is my understanding that, if somebody—as in any other case—sought to take suicidal action, it would invalidate such a decision. Furthermore, if somebody were to assist them in complying with that apparent advance directive, that would still be tantamount to assisting suicide and would be covered by clause 61. It is terribly important that the Minister clarify that.

Bearing in mind the downside—that unresolved issues in the Bill could lead to its fall and that there would be real drawbacks if it were aborted because of these continuing concerns—the Minister owes it to the House to get things absolutely straight so that we can consider his assurances and take appropriate action.

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on the Lords amendments. I shall centre my comments on amendment (b) to Lords amendment No. 24, tabled in my name and that of many other Members.

I was present on Second Reading and privileged to sit on the Standing Committee that scrutinised the Bill. I am pleased that some of the concerns that we expressed in the Chamber and in Committee were accepted by the Lords and are reflected in their amendments. I am pleased that we have moved to written advance directives. That is immensely important and provides huge reassurance, but I am deeply concerned about our failure adequately to address advance directions and the admissions within that.

It is still possible for an individual to specify in an advance directive that they do not wish to receive food or water. That individual is essentially giving other individuals the right to kill them either through hunger or dehydration. Neither method of death is humane. We would not tolerate them for an animal, nor for any other people in society who are fit, able and capable of deciding for themselves, but it seems that we will tolerate those methods of death for the most vulnerable of all in our society.

For those reasons, I cannot agree to the Bill, which does not afford protection to people in that position. While people are incapacitated and in that state, they cannot stand for themselves, but others will. I personally would not want to stand by and see someone die of starvation. I would not want to see them die of dehydration. I would go to court to say, "If the Government have given licence to this individual to die using the method of starvation or dehydration, I want to challenge that because it is inhumane." It would not be right for me as a family member, an advocate, a deputy or a friend to stand by and watch that happen. If the Government have allowed that individual to exercise that right, why should they decide the means? Why should they decide the time? If that individual elects to die, why should we not allow them to do so in the manner of their choosing and at a time of their choosing? That is why, as the clauses that relate to advance directives have not been amended, it is effectively euthanasia by omission.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) that the House will have to deal with the issue again. Just as the Bland judgment brought us to this point with the Bill, we will be brought back and asked to codify the law.

Mr. George Howarth: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me, but I want to continue.

We will be asked to codify the decisions made by the courts. Who could resist an argument that rules out death by starvation or dehydration? Certainly, I do not think that any hon. Member would want to see such a provision remain. That will be on the statute book and we will be given a clear choice: it is either that or death by lethal injection at a time of the individual's choosing. That is where we will end up. I do not want to go there—it is the wrong place to be. This is the wrong Bill to achieve that purpose. If the Houses of Parliament want to discuss euthanasia, let them do so openly. The Labour party is being whipped on this issue. I find that personally very objectionable. The Bill should not be whipped.

I may remain deeply concerned about the Bill and its impact. I do not doubt for a moment the numerous benefits associated with the Bill, and they are long awaited. I openly welcome and embrace many of the measures, but we have made a serious mistake. It is not too late for the Minister to accede, although I have received no indication that he will, so I await with interest the first judgments that we will receive from the courts. The Voluntary Euthanasia Society has been quiet, because it expects to go to court with this issue.

I will resist any further temptation to legalise euthanasia by omission and I ask colleagues and my hon. Friend the Minister to embrace the comments made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin), to try to take on board some of the deep reservations that we still have and to afford those individuals who depend on us most the sort of care and concern that we all have for them but have expressed in different ways this evening.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) and hon. Members on both sides of the House for the way in which they have pursued their concerns about aspects of the Bill during its passage. I certainly echo the comments of the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) about the adequacy of the time that we have tonight to do justice to those concerns. However, anyone who has read the proceedings of the other House's consideration of the Bill and the detailed exchanges of views that took place among those with legal and medical backgrounds cannot fail to have been impressed by the way in which the other place considered the legislation and diligently advanced the improvements to it that are before us tonight. The Bill has been significantly improved by that process.

7.45 pm

On Report, I added my name to several amendments tabled by the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) about the question of purpose. Having read and studied the matters considered in the other place in some detail, the amendment that he has tabled tonight raises other concerns.

I was especially struck by an exchange on Report in the other place on 15 March. My noble friend Lord Carlile put seven points to the Government, two of which were referred to by the hon. Member for Daventry: whether the Bill could be stretched in such a way as to allow euthanasia—voluntary or otherwise—by the back door or through the front door, and whether it could allow assisted suicide and whether advance directives could allow someone with suicidal intent to use the Bill for that purpose. The answers to those questions are set out in great detail at column 1278 of the relevant Hansard, so I urge hon. Members who still have worries to study it. I hope that the Minister will be able to reaffirm what was said in the other place.

Advance decisions are important and clearly still cause concern. They cannot require doctors to do anything and would not require them to do anything that would aid and abet a suicide. English law is clear that no person can ask for assistance in committing suicide by refusing treatment, but the Bill puts into statute the common-law right to refuse treatment. The important thing is that the Bill errs on the side of life. It protects doctors. If doctors had any doubt about the state of mind of individuals when they wrote their advance decisions or when they lost capacity, or if medicine had moved on so that things of which individuals were not aware became possible, doctors could step in and act to safeguard life. Surely we should celebrate that as a way in which the Bill has moved forward.

[Mr. Paul Burstow]

I was struck forcefully by an example cited in the other place about Jehovah's Witnesses, who, on the ground of strongly held convictions, refuse blood transfusions. They may do that while they have capacity, but if several of the amendments tabled tonight were accepted, they would not be able to have their views, wishes and values—their belief system—respected through the treatment that they received if they lost capacity. If they had a car crash, someone else could decide, against their belief, that they should have a blood transfusion. We are talking about the right of individuals to refuse treatment, or their personal autonomy. We must be careful when we encroach on people's autonomy, although I think that the Bill tries to avoid doing that by carefully constructing a framework to safeguard the individual.

Mr. Leigh: If it is true that the Bill errs on the side of life, does the hon. Gentleman agree that there would thus be absolutely no harm in accepting the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin), because that would mean that the Bill would say that an advance directive could not be used to lead to a situation in which a person would not be given life-sustaining treatment in the form of fluid or another substance? Why not put that provision in the Bill? Surely the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) accepts that.

Mr. Burstow: I shall listen carefully to what the Minister says in response to that amendment—

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): How will you vote on it?

Mr. Burstow: Surely listening carefully to an argument and then coming to a conclusion is what we should be doing in this place. That is what free votes are all about, and a free vote is what my party is having on this matter. I shall listen to the Minister's response to the reasoned and reasonable arguments made by the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton. My concern is that the way in which the amendment is formulated sows the seeds of confusion where there is currently no confusion in law. That is why I am not convinced that the amendment should be supported and currently I do not intend to support it. I shall listen to what the Minister has to say. That is not an unreasonable position to adopt.

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman says, and in my view it cannot be disputed, that if, say, a Jehovah's Witness—a sentient person—refuses a blood transfusion, that is a conscious act by a sentient person and it is perhaps equivalent to suicide. However, we are not dealing with suicide as such. We are dealing with what happens if a Jehovah's Witness refuses a blood transfusion for his or her child, which is a very different matter from an adult sentient person refusing medical treatment out of conviction.

Mr. Burstow: As I understand the legislation, that would not be possible in those circumstances. I hope that the Minister will confirm that.

The amendments tabled by the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green are well intentioned and I understand them entirely, but clause 4(5) deals with the matter in a way that enables us not to confuse English law. By using the word "purpose", we would inadvertently put into law a provision that could have the effect of criminalising an act that we all want to happen—that is, the act of giving palliative care and providing assistance and pain relief at the end of life. The amendments might make that unlawful.

The Bill contains so much that is good and important about a person's quality of life and their right to lead their life as they choose that it should make its way on to the statute book today. However, I hope that the Minister can respond to the many concerns that have been aired during this short debate.

Mr. George Howarth: I wish to cover two matters: the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin), and the assertion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas). If I misrepresent my hon. Friend's views, I am happy to be corrected by her, but the burden of her argument seemed to be that it is always, in every circumstance, in a patient's best interest to receive food and hydration. I think that that was her point.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: No. I do not wish to imply that every person, irrespective of their state, should receive food and fluid, only that people who are living with a condition should do so. When someone begins to die and food and fluid become burdensome, they should be withdrawn. However, if the person is not dying and has no other threatening condition, but needs only food and fluid to survive, that person should receive food and fluid.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that clarification, but I think that that formulation would lead to enormous confusion. At some point, someone has to decide when the provision of food and fluid is in a person's best interest and when it is not. My other problem with that argument is that, having listened to medical evidence, like many other hon. Members, I am aware that the pain and suffering of patients with certain conditions can be aggravated by hydration in particular.

The second point that I wanted to make is in response to an issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton—that clause 61 does not apply in cases where there is an advance directive. That is not my reading of the position now that the Bill has been amended by the House of Lords. I do not know where my hon. Friend is getting his advice from, but I suspect that he is wrong in this instance. I should be grateful if the Minister could confirm that my interpretation of the position—that clause 61 would override the circumstances that my hon. Friend describes—is right, or whether my hon. Friend is right.

Secondly, does the Minister accept the burden of the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby about food and water? Would there be circumstances where people would feel it absolutely necessary to go ahead with feeding or hydrating people through tubes even though it would not necessarily be in their best interests?

Sir Gerald Kaufman: We recognise that these are agonising issues. Recent events in the United States, which we have seen on television, have shown just how agonising these issues are. They are not simple issues, but there is a simple issue behind what some of us seek to achieve, which is to prevent legislation that would allow euthanasia by the back door. That is what has motivated my approach to the Bill from the beginning.

I am baffled by the way in which the Government have handled the Bill from the beginning of its passage through Parliament. If I am fortunate enough to be re-elected in four weeks' time, I shall have sat in the House a few weeks after that for 35 years. Never have I known a Government handle a Bill of this sort in this way. To begin with, no Bill that I have been involved in, dealing with issues of this kind, has been whipped. It has been a tradition of my party—I am not interested in how the other parties conduct themselves—that on issues of conscience such as capital punishment, gay rights or abortion, we are not whipped.

I pleaded with the Government, both at meetings of the parliamentary Labour party and at private meetings with the Chief Whip, not to whip us on this Bill. It is still beyond my understanding why we are being whipped. It is totally beyond me. Yet we are proceeding with the Bill and with the aspects with which the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) is dealing in his amendments, on the basis of an extraordinary preoccupation that it is vital, in the dying stages of this Parliament, with only a few days left, that this piece of legislation survives.

This is not a Labour Bill—it did not originate within the Labour party. It is not a manifesto commitment. The Bill originated 16 years ago under the previous Conservative Government as an omission by the Law Commission. For some reason, it has now surfaced as a piece of legislation that a Labour Government, working hard to get themselves re-elected for an historic third term, believe is essential and should receive Royal Assent.

8 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): Besides the issue of the Whip, is not the answer that people outside the House who have worked with people with mental incapacity for the past decade or more have been waiting for legislation of this breadth to come along, to give those people the rights that society has denied them for far too long?

Sir Gerald Kaufman: I accept every word that my right hon. Friend says when he refers to the breadth of the legislation. Every one of us has received letters this week from esteemed charities saying that they want the Bill to become law, and I am not arguing with my right hon. Friend about that. However, he rightly suggests that this is a matter of conscience. This ought not to be a matter of contention between political parties; it should be a matter of honest and respected disagreement between right hon. and hon. Members of the House.

Mr. Barron: If the Bill were about putting euthanasia on to the statute book, is it not the case that we would have a free vote on it?

Sir Gerald Kaufman: That depends on how we interpret it. The fact is that, when the Bill came before the House of Commons last December, and when we were dealing with the very issues on which the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green has tabled his amendment, the Government were so concerned that it should not be defeated that we got the exhibition of correspondence between the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs and the Archbishop of Cardiff being circulated among Labour Back Benchers—something else that I have not seen before in my 35 years in the House. I have never known anything like that to happen on an issue of conscience. What that told us was that the Government had accepted, very belatedly, that this was an issue of conscience. In order to seek to assuage the consciences of a considerable number of Labour Members, they circulated that correspondence. That day, the Prime Minister is said to have been on the telephone to the Cardinal Archbishop in an effort to get an agreement with him that would persuade right hon. and hon. Members on this side of the House.

I do not want the Bill to fall, but I recognise the concerns that are being expressed. Many of us have personal experience of these matters. I had a sister who died after having suffered from Alzheimer's disease for many years. I have an elder brother who does not know me when I go to see him; he, too, is suffering from Alzheimer's. My sister's son and my brother's daughter are loving children. Fine, but we cannot assume that, in a situation relating to the amendment that we are now considering, my nephew and niece would be typical. That is why we have sought the safeguards that we are debating this evening.

I accept that improvements have been made to the Bill in the House of Lords. That cannot be denied. After all, the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green is tabling an amendment to a Lords amendment. If we compare the Bill with the one that left the House of Commons in December, there is no doubt that it has been improved. However, it still contains this loophole, which causes a twinge of agony to many of us who understand the circumstances in which these decisions might well be made. That is why what my hon. Friends the Members for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) and for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) are saying is important. They are disputing a matter of ethics that impinges on the very nature of human life. What I want to hear from the Minister is either that the contents of the letter from the Archbishop of Cardiff to my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor have been effected to the Archbishop's satisfaction, or a clear and specific assurance that will assuage hon. Members' consciences because we are considering a clause and an amendment about conscience. We are considering human life and the deepest single issue that relates to human beings.

[Sir Gerald Kaufman]

Mr. Leigh: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are listening to an interesting speech, but we have less than 12 minutes to hear from the Minister. Can we get on to the Minister's speech as quickly as possible?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman) appreciates the time.

Sir Gerald Kaufman: I apologise to the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh); I was not looking at the clock and I did not note when the debate was due to end. However, the hon. Gentleman is right that it is essential to hear from the Minister before reaching a decision. I shall therefore sit down, but I hope that the Government take account of the fact that people feel very uneasy at this stage of the debate.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): When we considered the Bill on Report, concerns were expressed about attorneys and deputies and people who would seek to harm those at the end of their lives. Along with my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor, I undertook to continue dialogue with the Catholic Church and specifically Archbishop Peter Smith. Much has been said in his name tonight and I want to assure hon. Members that amendment No. 4, which proposes a new subsection (5) to clause 4, goes to the heart of the points that he made. He was quoted in Committee in the other place on 25 January 2005 and also said in a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) that proposed new subsection (5),

"makes it explicit that the Bill does not give authority to doctors, proxies or other third parties considering a patient's best interests to make any decision that is motivated by a desire to kill the person."

Jim Dobbin: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Lammy: In a moment. The concerns that have been expressed in the debate today relate not to the best interests aspect of the Bill but to advance decisions. That is all that is left for the House to determine. We should remember that it is possible to make an advance decision now—that fact was lost in some parts of the discussion. An advance decision does not mean electing for suicide. The Government stand firm on suicide and have continually made that clear. We did that in relation to clause 58 and best interests and in the context of advance decisions.

Mr. Boswell: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lammy: Let me finish. One can make an advance decision now. The House has to decide whether to vote for the additional safeguards on advance decisions for which the Bill provides or to retain the current position, with no safeguards. Let me list those safeguards because it is important to set them out. First, importantly, under this Bill, if a doctor is not satisfied, he can decide that he will not accept the advance decision as valid and applicable. We therefore either vote to give the doctor that right, or we leave it, and doctors will not have that security.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): I am listening carefully to what my hon. Friend has said, and I accept his view that this Bill has been much improved in the House of Lords. Will he address, however, the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) in relation to ensuring that we prevent advance directives containing suicidal intentions from being carried out? If, as the Minister said, that is the Government's intention—I accept his honest view on that—what is wrong with accepting the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton?

Mr. Lammy: The Bill—

Jim Dobbin: I just want to follow up with the rest of the letter. The archbishop goes on to say:

"But this amendment still leaves a major gap. It does not cover advance decisions. The clauses dealing with advance decisions, although tightened up, still leave open the possibility that an expressly suicidal advance decision is binding".

Mr. Lammy: As I was saying, doctors cannot now be forced to accept advance decisions, because, under the Bill, if they are not satisfied, they do not have to do so. On the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones), the Bill states specifically that someone must have capacity and be able to weigh information. Someone who is suicidally motivated cannot legally do those things—

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I really hope that this is a point of order.

Mr. Cash: It is indeed. The Minister has just been referring to issues that he claims have been raised by the Archbishop of Cardiff, which is not the case. He is using that as evidence against a professor of law—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I really knew that that was not a point of order.

Mr. Lammy: In addition, there are provisions under clauses 25(5) and (6) of the Bill in relation to the person who elects to have an advance decision. Let us be clear that the Government are not saying that people must have an advance decision; we are accepting that there are those in our community who want to make advance decisions and refuse certain types of treatment. We are accepting that Jehovah's Witnesses, Christian Scientists and all sorts of people want to make that decision. That is why the Bill is supported by the Alzheimer's Society, Age Concern, Mencap and the mental health community, who have written to all Members of the House to argue for the Bill. They have said that it is necessary.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I realise that we are short of time. Let me make sure that the Minister clearly understands the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin). If the Minister says that the Government's determination and intention is that advance decisions should not represent suicidal intentions, all that he has to do is amend the provision as follows:

"a decision or statement complies with this subsection only if"— the amendment says—

"it does not state a desire to bring about P's death by forgoing that treatment".

Why is that so hard to do if, as he says, that is the Government's intention?

Mr. Lammy: I would have thought that that was patently obvious. The reason is that that would force people to stay and die in hospital—[Interruption.] It would mean that people cannot elect to die at home. That would be the consequence—

Mr. Duncan Smith: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman has had a good say in this debate. He must allow the Minister to speak without interruption.

Mr. Lammy: There will always be a difficult balance between personal autonomy—the person's right to say, "No, thanks, not for me"—and having the right safeguards governing that, to allow doctors to say, "I am not satisfied", and to ensure that someone has all their mental faculties and is capable of making their decision.

Mr. Leigh rose—

Mr. George Howarth rose—

Mr. Lammy: Our further amendment today says that where someone recognises that the risk is to their life, they must make a further statement that is written and witnessed.

8.15 pm

On all those counts, while the law makes it clear that we do not support assisted suicide—Members will remember the Diane Pretty case, which went to the European Court of Human Rights and was effectively thrown out—I urge Members who are concerned about advance decisions and would not choose to make such decisions themselves, but who want to ensure that safeguards exist, to vote for the Bill. They will be ensuring that doctors can make the decision, and that it is in writing that people can make an advance decision only when they are capacitated. On that basis, I commend a Bill for which we have waited 15 years, and for which outside organisations are campaigning.

Question put, That the amendment to the Lords amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 98, Noes 240.

Division No. 151] [8.16 pm

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)
Allan, Richard
Amess, David
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Beggs, Roy (E Antrim)
Benton, Joe (Bootle)
Bercow, John
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Brady, Graham
Brazier, Julian
Burnside, David
Burstow, Paul
Burt, Alistair
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies (NE Fife)
Campbell, Ronnie (Blyth V)
Carmichael, Alistair
Cash, William
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Conway, Derek
Cummings, John
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs Claire
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davies, rh Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Quentin (Grantham & Stamford)
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice & Howden)
Donaldson, Jeffrey M.
Duncan, Alan (Rutland)
Duncan Smith, rh Iain
Evans, Nigel
Fallon, Michael
Field, rh Frank (Birkenhead)
Flight, Howard
Forth, rh Eric
Francois, Mark
Gale, Roger (N Thanet)
Garnier, Edward
Gill, Parmjit Singh
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian (Ashford)
Greenway, John
Gummer, rh John
Hammond, Philip
Hayes, John (S Holland)
Heath, David
Hendry, Charles
Hoban, Mark (Fareham)
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, rh Michael
Jenkin, Bernard
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Kirkwood, Sir Archy
Knight, rh Greg (E Yorkshire)
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lansley, Andrew
Lewis, Dr. Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Lilley, rh Peter
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter (M-Worcs)
McIntosh, Miss Anne
Mackay, rh Andrew
McLoughlin, Patrick
Malins, Humfrey
Moss, Malcolm
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Opik, Lembit
Osborne, George (Tatton)
Page, Richard
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Randall, John
Redwood, rh John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Hugh (Faversham & M-Kent)
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Sanders, Adrian
Selous, Andrew
Simpson, Keith (M-Norfolk)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns & Kincardine)
Smyth, Rev. Martin (Belfast S)
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Thurso, John
Walter, Robert
Watkinson, Angela
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Wiggin, Bill
Willis, Phil
Winterton, Sir Nicholas (Macclesfield)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Ann Winterton and
Mr. Edward Leigh

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Adams, Irene (Paisley N)
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Bob (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, rh Donald (Swansea E)
Armstrong, rh Ms Hilary
Bailey, Adrian
Baird, Vera
Banks, Tony
Barnes, Harry
Barron, rh Kevin
Bayley, Hugh
Beard, Nigel
Benn, rh Hilary
Bennett, Andrew
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Boateng, rh Paul
Bradley, rh Keith (Withington)
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Bradshaw, Ben
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burnham, Andy
Byrne, Liam (B'ham Hodge H)
Cairns, David
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)

Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Cawsey, Ian (Brigg)
Challen, Colin
Clapham, Michael
Clarke, rh Kenneth (Rushcliffe)
Clarke, Tony (Northampton S)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann (Cynon V)
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cook, rh Robin (Livingston)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, rh Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cranston, Ross
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cunningham, Tony (Workington)
Dalyell, Tam
David, Wayne
Davidson, Ian
Denham, rh John
Dhanda, Parmjit
Dismore, Andrew
Dobson, rh Frank
Doran, Frank
Dorrell, rh Stephen
Dowd, Jim (Lewisham W)
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff (Barnsley E)
Etherington, Bill
Farrelly, Paul
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul (Newport W)
Foster, rh Derek
Foulkes, rh George
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike (Ilford S)
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Bruce (Walsall S)
Gerrard, Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hamilton, David (Midlothian)
Hanson, David
Harris, Tom (Glasgow Cathcart)
Havard, Dai (MerthyrTydfil & Rhymney)
Healey, John
Henderson, Doug (Newcastle N)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hendrick, Mark
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith (Streatham)
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hoon, rh Geoffrey
Hope, Phil (Corby)
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, rh Alan (Newport E)
Howarth, George (Knowsley N & Sefton E)
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hughes, rh Beverley (Stretford & Urmston)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Eric
Ingram, rh Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda (Hampstead & Highgate)
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jamieson, David
Jones, Kevan (N Durham)
Jones, Lynne (Selly Oak)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Joyce, Eric (Falkirk W)
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keen, Alan (Feltham)
Khabra, Piara S.
Kilfoyle, Peter
Knight, Jim (S Dorset)
Lammy, David
Laxton, Bob (Derby N)
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom (High Peak)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lloyd, Tony (Manchester C)
Lucas, Ian (Wrexham)
McAvoy, rh Thomas
McCabe, Stephen
McDonnell, John
MacDougall, John
McFall, rh John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
MacShane, Denis
McWilliam, John
Mahmood, Khalid
Mann, John (Bassetlaw)
Marshall, David (Glasgow Shettleston)
Martlew, Eric
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, David
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin (Gt Grimsby)
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moonie, Dr. Lewis
Moran, Margaret
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mullin, Chris
Munn, Ms Meg
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
O'Hara, Edward
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Osborne, Sandra (Ayr)
Pearson, Ian
Picking, Anne
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter (Burnley)
Pope, Greg (Hyndburn)
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Prescott, rh John
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Purnell, James
Quin, rh Joyce
Rapson, Syd (Portsmouth N)
Raynsford, rh Nick
Robertson, John (Glasgow Anniesland)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Coventry NW)
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Ruddock, Joan
Salter, Martin
Savidge, Malcolm
Sawford, Phil
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simon, Siôn (B'ham Erdington)
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, rh Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, rh Chris (Islington S & Finsbury)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Soley, Clive
Southworth, Helen
Squire, Rachel
Steinberg, Gerry
Stewart, Ian (Eccles)
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Tami, Mark (Alyn)
Taylor, rh Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, Dr. Richard (Wyre F)
Thomas, Gareth (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tonge, Dr. Jenny
Touhig, Don (Islwyn)
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr. Desmond (Brighton Kemptown)
Turner, Neil (Wigan)
Tynan, Bill (Hamilton S)
Vaz, Keith (Leicester E)
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N.
Watson, Tom
Watts, David
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Williams, Betty (Conwy)
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wood, Mike (Batley)
Woodward, Shaun
Worthington, Tony
Wright, Anthony D. (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, David (Telford)
Wright, Iain (Hartlepool)
Wright, Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Noes:
Jim Fitzpatrick and Gillian Merron

Question accordingly negatived.

Motion made, and Question put, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Ainger.]

The House divided: Ayes 269, Noes 68.

Division No. 152] [8.27 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Adams, Irene (Paisley N)
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Bob (Cov'try NE)
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, rh Donald (Swansea E)
Armstrong, rh Ms Hilary
Bailey, Adrian
Baird, Vera
Banks, Tony
Barnes, Harry
Barron, rh Kevin
Bayley, Hugh
Beard, Nigel
Benn, rh Hilary
Bennett, Andrew
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Bradley, rh Keith (Withington)
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Bradshaw, Ben
Brennan, Kevin
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burnham, Andy
Burstow, Paul
Byrne, Liam (B'ham Hodge H)
Cairns, David
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies (NE Fife)
Carmichael, Alistair
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Cawsey, Ian (Brigg)
Challen, Colin
Clapham, Michael
Clarke, rh Kenneth (Rushcliffe)
Clarke, rh Tom (Coatbridge & Chryston)
Clarke, Tony (Northampton S)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann (Cynon V)
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Colman, Tony

Connarty, Michael
Cook, rh Robin (Livingston)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, rh Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cranston, Ross
Crausby, David
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cunningham, Tony (Workington)
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs Claire
Dalyell, Tam
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
David, Wayne
Davidson, Ian
Dawson, Hilton
Denham, rh John
Dhanda, Parmjit
Dismore, Andrew
Dobbin, Jim (Heywood)
Dobson, rh Frank
Doran, Frank
Dorrell, rh Stephen
Dowd, Jim (Lewisham W)
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela (Wallsey)
Edwards, Huw
Elman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff (Barnsley E)
Etherington, Bill
Farrelly, Paul
Field, rh Frank (Birkenhead)
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul (Newport W)
Foster, rh Derek
Foulkes, rh George
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike (Ilford S)
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Bruce (Walsall S)
Gerrard, Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gill, Parmjit Singh
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hamilton, David (Midlothian)
Hanson, David
Harris, Tom (Glasgow Cathcart)
Havard, Dai (Merthyr Tydfil & Rhymney)
Healey, John
Heath, David
Henderson, Doug (Newcastle N)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hendrick, Mark
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Heyes, David
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hood, Jimmy (Clydesdale)
Hoon, rh Geoffrey
Hope, Phil (Corby)
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, rh Alan (Newport E)
Howarth, George (Knowsley N & Sefton E)
Hughes, rh Beverley (Stretford & Urmston)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Eric
Ingram, rh Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda (Hampstead & Highgate)
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jamieson, David
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Kevan (N Durham)
Jones, Lynne (Selly Oak)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Joyce, Eric (Falkirk W)
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keen, Alan (Feltham)
Khabra, Piara S.
Kilfoyle, Peter
Kirkwood, Sir Archy
Knight, Jim (S Dorset)
Lammy, David
Laxton, Bob (Derby N)
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom (High Peak)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lloyd, Tony (Manchester C)
Lucas, Ian (Wrexham)
McAvoy, rh Thomas
McCabe, Stephen
McDonnell, John
MacDougall, John
McFall, rh John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
Mackinlay, Andrew
MacShane, Denis
McWilliam, John
Mahmood, Khalid
Mann, John (Bassetlaw)
Marshall, David (Glasgow Shettleston)
Martlew, Eric
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, David
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin (Gt Grimsby)
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moonie, Dr. Lewis
Moran, Margaret
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Munn, Ms Meg
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
O'Hara, Edward
Olner, Bill
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Sandra (Ayr)
Page, Richard
Pearson, Ian
Picking, Anne
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter (Burnley)
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg (Hyndburn)
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Prescott, rh John
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Purnell, James
Quin, rh Joyce
Rapson, Syd (Portsmouth N)
Raynsford, rh Nick
Reed, Andy (Loughborough)
Robertson, John (Glasgow Anniesland)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Coventry NW)
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Roy, Frank (Motherwell)
Ruddock, Joan
Salter, Martin
Sanders, Adrian
Savidge, Malcolm
Sawford, Phil
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheridan, Jim
Simon, Siôn (B'ham Erdington)
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, rh Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, rh Chris (Islington S & Finsbury)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns & Kincardine)
Soley, Clive
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh John
Squire, Rachel
Steinberg, Gerry
Stewart, Ian (Eccles)
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Stunell, Andrew
Tami, Mark (Alyn)
Taylor, rh Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Dr. Richard (Wyre F)
Thomas, Gareth (Harrow W)
Thurso, John
Timms, Stephen
Tonge, Dr. Jenny
Touhig, Don (Islwyn)
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr. Desmond (Brighton Kemptown)
Turner, Neil (Wigan)
Tynan, Bill (Hamilton S)
Tyrie, Andrew
Vaz, Keith (Leicester E)
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N.
Watson, Tom
Watts, David
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Williams, Betty (Conwy)
Willis, Phil
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wood, Mike (Batley)
Woodward, Shaun
Wright, Anthony D. (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, David (Telford)
Wright, Iain (Hartlepool)
Wright, Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Jim Murphy and Jim Fitzpatrick

NOES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)
Amess, David
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Beggs, Roy (E Antrim)
Bercow, John
Brazier, Julian
Burnside, David
Burt, Alistair
Campbell, Ronnie (Blyth V)
Cash, William
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Conway, Derek
Davies, rh Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Quentin (Grantham & Stamford)
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice & Howden)
Donaldson, Jeffrey M.
Duncan, Alan (Rutland)
Duncan Smith, rh Iain
Evans, Nigel
Fallon, Michael
Forth, rh Eric
Francois, Mark
Gale, Roger (N Thanet)
Garnier, Edward
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian (Ashford)
Gummer, rh John
Hammond, Philip
Hayes, John (S Holland)
Hendry, Charles
Hoban, Mark (Fareham)
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Jack, rh Michael
Jenkin, Bernard
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Knight, rh Greg (E Yorkshire)
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Lewis, Dr. Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Lilley, rh Peter
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter (M-Worcs)
McIntosh, Miss Anne
Mackay, rh Andrew
McLoughlin, Patrick
Malins, Humfrey
Morrison, Dr. Andrew
Osborne, George (Tatton)
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Randall, John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Hugh (Faversham & M-Kent)
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Selous, Andrew

Smyth, Rev. Martin (Belfast S)
Spicer, Sir Michael
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Walter, Robert
Watkinson, Angela
Wiggin, Bill
Winterton, Sir Nicholas (Macclesfield)

Tellers for the Noes:
Miss Ann Widdecombe and Ann Winterton

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of the House to the fact that privilege is involved in Lords amendment No. 69. If it is agreed to, an appropriate entry will be made in the Journal.

Question put, That this House agrees with the Lords in their remaining amendments.

The House divided: Ayes 236, Noes 51.

Division No. 153] [8.39 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Adams, Irene (Paisley N)
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Bob (Cov'try NE)
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, rh Donald (Swansea E)
Armstrong, rh Ms Hilary
Bailey, Adrian
Baird, Vera
Banks, Tony
Barnes, Harry
Barron, rh Kevin
Bayley, Hugh
Beard, Nigel
Beckett, rh Margaret
Benn, rh Hilary
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Bradley, rh Keith (Withington)
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Bradshaw, Ben
Brennan, Kevin
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burnham, Andy
Burstow, Paul
Byrne, Liam (B'ham Hodge H)
Cairns, David
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies (NE Fife)
Carmichael, Alistair
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Cawsey, Ian (Brigg)
Clapham, Michael
Clarke, Tony (Northampton S)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann (Cynon V)
Coffey, Ms Ann
Connarty, Michael
Cook, rh Robin (Livingston)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, rh Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cranston, Ross
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cunningham, Tony (Workington)
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs Claire
Dalyell, Tam
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
David, Wayne
Davidson, Ian
Davies, rh Denzil (Llanelli)
Denham, rh John
Dhanda, Parmjit
Dismore, Andrew
Dobson, rh Frank
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim (Lewisham W)
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff (Barnsley E)
Etherington, Bill
Farrelly, Paul
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul (Newport W)
Foster, rh Derek
Foulkes, rh George
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike (Ilford S)
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Bruce (Walsall S)
Gerrard, Neil
Gill, Parmjit Singh
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hamilton, David (Midlothian)
Hanson, David
Harris, Tom (Glasgow Cathcart)
Havard, Dai (MerthyrTydfil & Rhymney)
Healey, John
Heath, David
Henderson, Doug (Newcastle N)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hendrick, Mark
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Heyes, David
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hood, Jimmy (Clydesdale)
Hope, Phil (Corby)
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, rh Alan (Newport E)
Howarth, George (Knowsley N & Sefton E)
Hughes, rh Beverley (Stretford & Urmston)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Illsley, Eric
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda (Hampstead & Highgate)
Jamieson, David
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Kevan (N Durham)
Jones, Lynne (Selly Oak)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Joyce, Eric (Falkirk W)
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keen, Alan (Feltham)
Khabra, Piara S.
Kilfoyle, Peter
Kirkwood, Sir Archy
Knight, Jim (S Dorset)
Lammy, David
Laxton, Bob (Derby N)
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom (High Peak)
Lloyd, Tony (Manchester C)
Lucas, Ian (Wrexham)
McAvoy, rh Thomas
McCabe, Stephen
McDonnell, John
MacDougall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
MacShane, Denis
McWilliam, John
Mahmood, Khalid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John (Bassetlaw)
Marshall, David (Glasgow Shettleston)
Martlew, Eric
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, David
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin (Gt Grimsby)
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moran, Margaret
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mullin, Chris
Munn, Ms Meg
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
O'Hara, Edward
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Sandra (Ayr)
Pearson, Ian
Picking, Anne
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter (Burnley)
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg (Hyndburn)
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Prescott, rh John
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Purnell, James
Quin, rh Joyce
Quinn, Lawrie
Rapson, Syd (Portsmouth N)
Raynsford, rh Nick
Robertson, John (Glasgow Anniesland)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Coventry NW)
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Ruddock, Joan
Savidge, Malcolm
Sawford, Phil
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheridan, Jim
Simon, Siôn (B'ham Erdington)
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, rh Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, rh Chris (Islington S & Finsbury)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns & Kincardine)
Soley, Clive
Southworth, Helen
Speller, rh John
Squire, Rachel
Stewart, Ian (Eccles)
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Stunell, Andrew
Tami, Mark (Alyn)
Taylor, rh Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, Dr. Richard (Wyre F)
Thomas, Gareth (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tonge, Dr. Jenny
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr. Desmond (Brighton Kemptown)
Turner, Neil (Wigan)
Vaz, Keith (Leicester E)
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N.
Watson, Tom
Watts, David
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Williams, Betty (Conwy)
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wood, Mike (Batley)
Woodward, Shaun
Wright, Anthony D. (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, David (Telford)
Wright, Iain (Hartlepool)
Wright, Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Jim Murphy and Jim Fitzpatrick

NOES

Amess, David
Beggs, Roy (E Antrim)
Bercow, John
Burnside, David
Cash, William
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Colman, Tony
Conway, Derek
Davies, Quentin (Grantham & Stamford)
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice & Howden)
Dobbin, Jim (Heywood)
Donaldson, Jeffrey M.
Duncan Smith, rh Iain
Evans, Nigel
Fallon, Michael
Forth, rh Eric
Francois, Mark
Garnier, Edward
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Grayling, Chris
Hammond, Philip
Hayes, John (S Holland)
Hendry, Charles
Hoban, Mark (Fareham)
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Jenkin, Bernard
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Lilley, rh Peter
Loughton, Tim
Mackay, rh Andrew
Mackinlay, Andrew
McLoughlin, Patrick
Mudie, George
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Osborne, George (Tatton)
Paterson, Owen
Reed, Andy (Loughborough)
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Hugh (Faversham & M-Kent)
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Selous, Andrew
Smyth, Rev. Martin (Belfast S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Watkinson, Angela
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Wiggin, Bill
Winterton, Sir Nicholas (Macclesfield)

Tellers for the Noes:
Ann Winterton and
Mr. Desmond Swayne

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 95 agreed to [one with Special Entry].

HIV/AIDS (Africa)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.— [Mr. Ainger]

8.49 pm

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I am grateful to have secured this Adjournment debate about HIV/AIDS orphans and vulnerable children in sub-Saharan Africa. This has been an historic day in the middle of a remarkable week, and I am particularly pleased to be able to speak on an issue on which Labour has set the agenda not just for the country but for the world. It is this Labour Government who have led the world in tackling debt relief, global poverty, trade reform and HIV/AIDS and who have, more recently, been leading the debate on the future of Africa. Those are policies that have resonated around the country, with young and old, and around the world. They have been a hallmark of the values that we in the Labour party hold dear, and a shining beacon of Labour's achievements and of the kind of world that we want to create.

The group that I want to talk about, however, is one for which there is still a desperate need for support. We will all have our images and memories from the past four years of this Parliament. Certainly for me, the saddest ones were of the HIV/AIDS orphans whom I saw and met in sub-Saharan Africa. A whole generation of children are growing up without parents and, so often, without hope. On a personal level, I found that to hold one of these little children, so very fragile that the wind could blow them away, was one of the saddest experiences of my whole life. To see them growing up alone in their huts in the African countryside or on the streets of African cities, children who have literally been abandoned to fend as best they can in a harsh, cruel world, is tragic. There is a whole generation of these children: some 12 million now, some 25 million by 2010. Whatever happens to HIV and AIDS—and there are signs that in some places infection rates may, thankfully, be slowing down—the number of orphans will rise inexorably.

One person described that generation to me as the brick wall that Africa is heading for, and quite apart from the human tragedy, these children are also a massive social and development challenge. They will grow up mostly without health, without schooling, without social skills, often with illness and with high levels of crime and delinquency. My hon. Friend the Minister knows the statistics; they are horrendous, so I will not recite them.

This evening I want to press my hon. Friend on what the Government are doing about the orphans and vulnerable children within their overall HIV/AIDS strategy and to press for funding for community-based services. I am grateful to a number of agencies for their help, support, advice and, indeed, inspiration over the past 18 months. One is World Vision, whose work for HIV/AIDS orphans I have seen in Lesotho, South Africa and Ethiopia. Another is UNICEF, which arranged for me to see HIV/AIDS orphans work in Mozambique, and has provided advice and support. Another is NCH, which has provided advice on child care policies; often HIV/AIDS work focuses on health care, whereas work with orphans and vulnerable children needs to be guided by sound child care policies. SABMiller has also provided valuable insights from its experience in sub-Saharan Africa.

[Ms Sally Keeble]

Most of all, I want to pay tribute to the community-based organisations that do such remarkable work in the most difficult circumstances to look after these children. The Kenyan Network of Women Against Aids, which cares for some 1,300 children in Nairobi, provides food for children five days a week—including teenage girls, to keep them from prostituting themselves just for the price of a meal. It provides meals during the week, but at weekends it cannot, so the children do not eat at weekends. Yet that organisation, which advises the Kenyan Government, receives international delegations and has, I believe, organised events for the UK Government, does not have secure funding. Children in my constituency twinned with KENWA—the Kenya Network of Women with Aids/HIV—and sent the orphans gifts last Christmas, which was a most heart-warming experience.

There is also Kuvumbane in Mozambique, which supports 900 women with HIV/AIDS and about 2,000 orphans. It is based in Xai-Xai, the capital of the province of Gaza, just three hours' drive on a tarred road north of Maputu, so it is not a remote project, yet it has no regular funding. It has occasional supplies of food from the World Food Programme and teams of volunteers, most of them completely unpaid, to provide community-based care, but with no equipment at all.

I went out with that organisation recently and saw a family of orphan children living in a hut on their own. The thatched roof had been damaged, so the rain came in and the younger children had coughs and colds. They also had fungal disease on their heads. The youngest was only a year old when his mother died a year ago, and we can only imagine what his prospects are. I met another family of five children whose father had died a couple of years ago. When I arrived, their mother was lying down, desperately ill with AIDS. She managed to stand up and speak briefly and we could but wonder at the horror for those children of watching their surviving parent die.

I shall remember for a long time the plight of another young woman. She was not a child, but she was very young to be dying such a horrible death. Her parents had died. Her aunt had died. She had no siblings and her own baby died at a year old. When I arrived, she was lying on the floor of her hut moaning. She could not drink and was in complete agony. A volunteer was with her, the only person to be there at her death; but there were no painkillers to ease her suffering and give her more dignity in dying—no mattress, no pillow. Nothing. The lack of resources for community care is horrific.

There are several projects in Zimbabwe, in Harare and Bulawayo, which probably do not want to be identified, but where people have thought through with the greatest attention sophisticated strategies for child care. They shelter children from abuse by the police and take them off the streets. They help them with memory books so that they can come to terms with the loss of their parents. Most of all, they feed children—not enough to satisfy them, but it keeps them from starving.

People who undertake such work have commitment and are enormously dedicated, with the insight and thought to care for children, but they completely lack the resources to put care services in place. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister can point to the policies of the Government, their support for the UNICEF framework and the money to implement policies. It is true that the UK Government have led the way in combating HIV/AIDS with financial resources, support for the use of anti-retrovirals, the allocation of funds for orphans and in pressing for a more co-ordinated approach to the UNICEF framework, but there is an issue about delivery. The best intentions in the world will fail if they are not efficiently implemented and monitored, and there are some difficulties with that.

Of the £150 million that the Department for International Development has set aside for HIV/AIDS orphans and vulnerable children, £85 million is being spent through the Department's African country programmes. Some of the money is going into budget support for Governments to advance their national orphans and vulnerable children plans. Having spent some time looking at the work in six of the sub-Saharan countries most affected by HIV/AIDS, it is not at all clear, with the exception of South Africa, that there is any capacity to deliver programmes. There are not even departments to run them. Even if there are central Government departments, there are no regional or local structures so that policies and resources can cascade down.

To say that is not to belittle those countries. Complex services are needed and they are difficult to deliver. After all, only under the Labour Government have we had a Minister for children and co-ordinated children's services across Government. In Kenya, the department with lead responsibility for children is the equivalent of our Department for Culture, Media and Sport, and children's services are very much a junior partner. In Lesotho, the First Lady has responsibility for such services. I had long discussions with her. She is an inspiring woman with a deep commitment and a profound understanding of what is needed to bring about change in her country, but she is not actually in government and has no departmental resources. The situation in Zimbabwe is desperate; for example, in Bulawayo, the second city, there are fewer social workers than there are Zimbabwean social workers in the social services department of one outer London hospital.

If the money is to deliver services, there must be some clear accounting for how it is spent. Providing a form of words to fit the policy requirement simply will not deliver the services on the ground that children need. Perhaps what is needed is a kind of barium meal for the international community's financial systems, which would trace the money that goes from the British taxpayer to the delivery of services for the orphans and vulnerable children in sub-Saharan Africa.

As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, I have put a proposal to him for a funding stream structure that could provide financial support directly to the community-based services concerned. In practical terms, that would provide support where it is most needed: at the community level where the caring takes place—food for the feeding schemes, hygiene items for the home-visiting schemes, school fees or, where school is free, money for school books and uniforms, and money to re-thatch hut roofs. The organisations that carry out those activities operate well below the radar of national and international Government agencies, but they are able to provide the small-scale interventions that make all the difference to enable children to have some reasonable prospect for the future.

Such a proposal would also have two other important functions—first, to develop and systematise community care programmes. That is desperately important. It is better understood in the communities that I visited in Africa than it has ever been in the UK that children belong in their own homes, not in residential institutions. What is needed to keep them in their own homes is, as I said, a complex network of small-scale interventions.

Such interventions include, for example, help with getting birth certificates, so that children can get Government grants for free schooling, which is the kind of thing that I saw the volunteers of Kuvumbane do for the children in Mozambique; protection of their property rights, so that they can keep ownership of their parents' homes, which is often the first step to being able to provide them with a secure life after their parents have died; help with food and clothing; and home visiting by an adult. Home visiting also includes providing the help, psychological support and counselling that children need when they are grieving the loss of their parents. That is something that we do not often think about, because we so often think about how to feed children who are hungry, rather than how to comfort them when they are mourning. Those are very hard services to develop and deliver, and they may have to be provided from the base up, rather from central Government down.

The other big purpose that such a funding stream would achieve is to support African civil society. In a number of cases, the organisations that I have visited group together into some kind of network, but they very much lack the resources to develop and to extend their work and impact through their countries.

The amounts of money needed for such activity are quite small, and I fully recognise that it is impossible for the UK Government to provide individual grants at such a small scale and localised level. Arguably, the level is too small even for the country Governments. It is the kind of function that, in this country, local government would undertake, and could be managed by a group of organisations—indeed, some organisations have expressed an interest in doing so.

Half of everything that we know, we learn in the first five years. We in this country recognise, in providing services for our own children, that those early years are when we must put in the investment if we are to influence the adults of the future and the shape of society in future.

The wheels of the international community may be grinding on this issue, but they grind extremely slowly. Those children cannot wait for the money that has been earmarked for them to trickle down. I press my hon. Friend the Minister to give a commitment on this, and he can do so in the certain knowledge that after the election, a Labour Government will continue to transform not just this country, but the wider world and lead the international community in development policy, as they have done in the past eight years, thus ensuring that the otherwise lost generation of HIV/AIDS orphans and vulnerable children will inherit a very different world.

9.4 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) on securing the debate and on the way in which she continues to campaign on the issue. I appreciate the number of oral and written parliamentary questions that she has asked on the matter and the considerable amount of travel that she has undertaken to investigate it, especially in Africa. I am also aware, from meetings that she has had with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and me, of her considerable knowledge of the challenges that we and the international community more broadly face when trying to scale up support for those orphaned by the terrible epidemic.

I also join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to World Vision and UNICEF, especially, with which I have held several conversations about the AIDS epidemic in general and specifically about how we should respond to the orphan crisis. I also join her in paying tribute to the organisations that she met on her travels in Africa to examine the issue to which she referred, and, indeed, to the National Children's Home and SABMiller.

The sheer scale of the AIDS pandemic is well know to all hon. Members. The number of people affected is truly staggering and, as my hon. Friend said, increasing each year. However, the matter that clearly concerns us today is the tragic plight of children affected by AIDS. The increasing numbers of poor children who are living with HIV, or orphaned by AIDS, cannot fail to move us, as the example that she cited in her opening remarks made clear. I visited the Dukhathole township in Germiston, near Johannesburg, in May 2004 to see a project that we are funding, which Christian Aid and the Anglican Church are running, so I know about the scale of the challenge in just that one township. Support is being provided to those who are helping orphans and vulnerable children to access primary education and helping people to claim benefits to enable the provision of healthy food and reasonable-quality lives. Remarkable women in the township support orphans, and grandmothers and other relatives, by looking after orphans and other vulnerable children. I completely accept the fundamental point behind my hon. Friend's speech: we need to do more.

My hon. Friend also talked about the social cost of AIDS, with many families losing one or two breadwinners. The number of children orphaned by AIDS is expected to grow from 12.3 million in 2003 to 18.4 million in 2010, and those figures are just for Africa. The risk of the AIDS epidemic taking off in a truly alarming way in Asia is fast gaining more international attention. The orphans crisis in Africa could perhaps become a significant problem there.

My hon. Friend has rightly focused the bulk of her remarks and campaigning work on sub-Saharan Africa. Already more than a third of households in Uganda are caring for at least one orphan. It is estimated that, by 2010, some 50 million children in Africa will have lost at least one parent and that nearly 40 per cent. of those losses will be as a result of AIDS.

There have always been orphans, of course, and in Africa they have always been cared for by their extended families. However, the effect of the AIDS pandemic is undoubtedly stretching the ability to cope in many communities to breaking point. Orphans need caring for, so carers have to find extra resources from somewhere. As the number of orphans rises, less well-off carers have to make sacrifices. Children, most often girls, are taken out of school and families have to make do with less.

[Mr. Gareth Thomas]

Increased poverty has a marked impact, not only owing to the immediate effects caused by poorer nutrition and poorer health, but also over the longer term. Children who are poorly nourished early in life will never reach their full potential. Poorer children often do not go to school. Evidence shows that, especially for girls, lack of education is associated with a higher risk of being both poor and of HIV infection. Hunger and poverty may lead orphans to exchange sex for money or food, so comprehensive sexual health services are thus fundamental to a truly effective and comprehensive approach. As my hon. Friend said, if we do not act to improve the opportunities for orphans and vulnerable children, poverty will continue to be transmitted down the generations, with millions denied the chances that they deserve.

The Government made their intention clear in the strategy on AIDS in the developing world, which we published in July last year. We have committed £1.5 billion of taxpayers' money over the next three years to tackling the HIV/AIDS epidemic, of which £150 million has been set aside for action to help orphans and vulnerable children. We shall also help orphans and vulnerable children through the doubling of our support for the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, bringing our total support to some £250 million through to 2008. HIV/AIDS orphans will also benefit from the additional funding of £36 million over four years that we provided to UNAIDS—the Joint UN Programme on HIV/AIDS—to support its global leadership work. That work focuses on the pandemic as a whole, but HIV/AIDS orphans are clearly part of that response. We are also providing additional funding of £80 million over four years to support the United Nations Population Fund's HIV prevention and sexual and reproductive health work with women. That, too, will help the fight against AIDS in the longer term.

My hon. Friend will know that our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said that the fight against HIV and AIDS and our work to highlight the needs of Africa will be the centrepiece of our presidencies of the G8 and the European Union. During 2005, we shall focus on two areas. First, our aim is to co-ordinate more effectively the money that is available for the fight against AIDS and to leverage in more of the resources necessary to fight AIDS in general, as well as to deal with the specific problem of HIV/AIDS orphans. Secondly, we want to maintain HIV prevention momentum and to ensure an adequate focus on balanced prevention strategies such as microbicides and vaccines to reduce HIV incidence globally. Again, that will help to provide further support for HIV/AIDS orphans in the long run.

Looking ahead, in September we will host the conference on replenishment of the global fund, back to back with a broader AIDS funding conference to examine the needs of other parts of the international system. UNICEF will, no doubt, play a key role—my hon. Friend rightly mentioned UNICEF's crucial role in the fight against AIDS. Its strategic framework, which the UK was one of the first to endorse, provides guidelines for the global response to those issues. At the global partners forum in December in Washington, I was able to set out our initial thinking on how we will spend the £150 million that we have committed to children affected by AIDS. We are committed to spending £44 million of that support through UNICEF over the next three years.

Part of our funding will go towards supporting national Governments' analysis of the extent of the problem and their planning of an adequate response. To date, 17 African countries have completed comprehensive national action plans to support children affected by AIDS. My hon. Friend rightly said that national action plans are welcome, but we must monitor how they are delivered on the ground. She was also right to focus attention on developing countries' capacity to respond to the challenges of HIV/AIDS. Whereas once the high price of anti-retroviral drugs constrained our ability to respond appropriately to the epidemic in many developing countries, the issue now is whether there are enough nurses, doctors and other workers to provide support on the ground.

Ms Keeble: Does my hon. Friend accept that although we have cheaper anti-retroviral drugs for adults, the same is not true of drugs for children? Getting the price of paediatric medicines reduced is also a major issue.

Mr. Thomas: I accept that absolutely. I would not want to suggest that we do not want to see more action to reduce drug prices further. I simply say that I think that my hon. Friend's point about capacity and the need to train up more people to help to provide support to orphans and vulnerable children, and more broadly to those who are HIV positive or have full-blown AIDS, is absolutely right.

In the context of the drugs that we can provide and are available at present to help children living with HIV, one of the things that we have been able to do to provide support through the £1.5 billion that we have set aside is to invest in trials of cheaper drugs. The particular one that I am thinking of is co-trimoxazole, which could halve the death rate for HIV infected children in Africa.

We have invested also in a new research programme to examine the provision of anti-retroviral treatment for children in areas where money, health staff and transport facilities are in short supply. We are already providing support to a range of civil society organisations, including organisations based in the UK—I gave the example of Christian Aid, which we are supporting in South Africa, which works with the Anglican Church there. There are other such organisations. We have recently increased our funding for those organisations with which we have long-term relationships. We have asked them, in a sense as part of their response to receiving the extra money, to prioritise additional work on HIV/AIDS issues.

My hon. Friend has brought forward a particularly interesting proposal. I am grateful to her for her recent letter, setting out her proposals to support the civil society response to children affected by AIDS in sub-Saharan Africa. I can assure my hon. Friend that as a result of her letter we are considering her idea seriously. I have asked my officials to discuss it with other partners, including the UN and UNICEF in particular, to explore whether there are additional things that we can do in line with the idea that my hon. Friend has identified.

This is, as my hon. Friend has alluded to, a difficult area in which to reach the right partners in a sustainable way. There are real issues about how we provide support to community-based organisations that seeks to scale up sustainable support and allows the development of capacity on the ground.

It is right that we continue to prioritise the bulk of our funding on HIV-AIDS, so as to scale up the ability of Government to provide effective responses to the challenge in developing countries. However, I recognise that there are too many HIV and AIDS orphans in developing countries, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa, who are not getting the support that they need now. For that reason, my hon. Friend's proposal is timely. We are considering her idea seriously. We are discussing it with partners. I hope that she will be willing to discuss the idea further with us at the Department, when our thinking has developed and after the election has taken place.

I believe that the £1.5 billion that we have made available over the next three years to scale up our response to HIV and AIDS orphans has set a template for others in the international community to respond to. I believe also that our replenishment conference for the global fund and our broader AIDS funding conference will help to scale up and to leverage additionally our funding for those members of the international community and those multilateral organisations that are playing such a key role in the fight against AIDS. HIV/AIDS orphans must continue to receive attention from Members of this place. My hon. Friend, as I have said, is a doughty campaigner on this issue. I look forward—

The motion having been made after Seven o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at nineteen minutes past Nine o'clock.

House of Commons

Wednesday 6 April 2005

The House met at half-past Eleven o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Employment

1. Alan Howarth (Newport, East) (Lab): What his latest assessment is of the change in the number of jobs in south-east Wales since 1997. [224369]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): According to the labour force survey, 622,000 people were in employment in south-east Wales over the 12 months to November 2004—47,000 or 8.2 per cent. more than in 1997.

Alan Howarth: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in Newport, unemployment has fallen by more than half since 1997 and that, in the last year alone, more than 1,700 new jobs have been announced in Newport by a wide variety of employers, including the Office for National Statistics and the Prison Service? Is that not a tribute to the quality of Newport's work force, as well as to the efforts by Newport city council and Newport Unlimited to attract employers to Newport? Does he share my pride about how Newport's people and economy have grown in strength and confidence in the past eight years under this Labour Government?

Mr. Hain: I do indeed. Newport is now one of the fastest-growing cities in Britain, with business start-up rates very high, a lot of confidence and more jobs being attracted by the Office for National Statistics, the Prison Service and world-class companies, such as Cogent and others. That just shows that, under Labour, Wales is working—do not let the Conservatives wreck it!

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): Today's decision by Dairy Farmers of Britain to close the Llangadog creamery, which will also affect the milk bottling plant in Cardiff, shows the difficulty that we have in the dairy industry in Wales at the moment. What can the Secretary of State say for dairy farmers throughout south Wales and about the job losses being experienced by that industry? What steps can he, with the National Assembly Government, now take to ensure that there is a farming co-operative that can take over plants such as Llangadog and continue to run them for the benefit of the dairy industry in Wales?

Mr. Hain: I understand the problem: the closure notice faced by that creamery is indeed very disappointing and disturbing, although I understand that efforts are being made to find an alternative purchaser and operator. We hope that those are brought to fruition because we want to see a healthy industry in the milk sector, as indeed it is in many other respects.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) (Lab): As someone who represents south-west Wales, may I ask my right hon. Friend to bear in mind that, although unemployment in all three Swansea constituencies has fallen by more than 50 per cent., we stand to lose some jobs because of civil service changes? Will he try to ensure that Swansea and south-west Wales—his own constituency included—stand to benefit from the UK redistribution of civil service jobs?

Mr. Hain: Indeed. As my right hon. Friend knows, 500 jobs were recently relocated by the national Pension Service. We are looking for more opportunities, as a result of the Government's plans to redistribute jobs from the over-congested parts of England into parts of Wales, such as Swansea, that need more jobs—although, as he knows, Swansea has been doing very well with business start-ups, the SA1 development and the two techniums there. Swansea is now a city that is really buzzing, as the Prime Minister recently saw for himself, and that is partly due to the excellent representation of the two Swansea Members of Parliament, including my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): The fact is that the Secretary of State for Wales uses one set of statistics but ignores another. He never mentioned anything about manufacturing decline in south-east Wales at all. He talks about going forward, not back, but is it not a fact that anyone who votes Labour at the next election will be going forward to even more manufacturing meltdown in Wales?

Mr. Hain: That is from a Conservative Member who supported the policies of the last Conservative Government that saw more than 100,000 manufacturing jobs decimated in Wales. What we have seen is that the Welsh manufacturing sector continues to account for 21 per cent. of Wales's national wealth—a higher proportion than in the rest of the United Kingdom—employing 17 per cent. of the Welsh work force. Indeed, Welsh manufacturing output for the past four quarters was 0.3 per cent. higher than in the previous four years. Welsh export orders were up 7.3 per cent. on last year—bigger than the UK rate. Welsh manufacturing is now healthy, expanding and growing, compared with contracting and in a dismal position under the Conservatives.

Child Poverty

2. Mr. Martin Caton (Gower) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with Cabinet and National Assembly for Wales Government colleagues on measures taken to combat child poverty in Wales. [224370]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have regular discussions with colleagues here and in the National Assembly about our shared objectives of eradicating child poverty in Wales. As I told the House on Monday night, I am deeply proud of this Labour Government's historic commitment to halving child poverty by 2010 and eradicating it within a generation.

Mr. Caton: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that the issue of child poverty should be at the centre of the general election debate in Wales? Does he recall that, in 1997, Britain had record levels of child poverty and that, in Wales, the situation was even more acute? Do we not need, in the weeks ahead, to contrast that with the situation today when UNICEF can report that Britain is leading the developed world in tackling child poverty? We are on track to meeting the targets that he has just mentioned.

Mr. Touhig: My hon. Friend is quite right. I remember the days when the Tories said that they wanted wealth to cascade down the generations. We know in Wales that it was poverty that they passed down through the generations. The great Scottish socialist MP, James Maxton, said that poverty is man made and therefore open to change. This Labour Government are doing just that.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): Given the correlation between higher incomes and better health, can my hon. Friend tell me whether any studies have been commissioned—if not, will he commission them?—to see at which point children can benefit from the prospects of better health and the increase in family income?

Mr. Touhig: My hon. Friend makes an important point: there is a correlation. What is important is that under this Government, we are seeking to make work pay and make families better off. That is why we have had record increases in child benefit; that is why we have the child tax credit; and that is why we have the national minimum wage.

I pay tribute to my colleagues in the Assembly who do a great deal of work to ensure that we end poverty, the problem of child poverty and continue to invest in the health service. Coming from the valleys, there is no doubt in my mind—and as my hon. Friend knows—that poverty has been exacerbated over the years, and ill health has been a consequence of that. It is only by putting in the investment that this Government are putting in—not the £35 billion of cuts that the Tories would put in—that we will do anything about it.

Hospital Trusts

3. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): what discussions he has had with (a) the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales and (b) Cabinet colleagues on the financial position of hospital trusts in Wales. [224371]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I regularly meet the Assembly First Minister to discuss health and funding matters.

Miss McIntosh: In thanking the Secretary of State for that less than full reply, may I ask him whether he agrees that to improve the health service in Wales, he will have to increase its budget? Why, then, has he cut the health budget for the forthcoming year?

Mr. Hain: I do not know where the hon. Lady gets her figures from—perhaps from the shadow Chancellor. His figures are about as trustworthy as Mickey Mouse's.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): That is an insult to Mickey Mouse.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman says that that comment was an insult to Mickey Mouse. In that case, I withdraw it.

The truth is that the Welsh health budget will have doubled under this Labour Government and compares with the situation in which patients lost treatment from NHS dentists under the last Conservative Government, nurses' jobs were cut, hospital jobs were cut and hospitals were closed. I should have thought that the hon. Lady would have got up to apologise for the dreadful Conservative record and to welcome the doubling of the Welsh health budget.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend bring his Cabinet colleagues to the Gwent Healthcare NHS Trust, whose financial position has allowed us to have a new community hospital in Chepstow, a new day surgery unit in Nevill Hall, a new CT scanner and a new coronary care unit costing £2.5 million? We are also about to start work on a new health and social care facility in Monmouth, as well as a new orthopaedic centre at St. Woolas. Does he agree that the people of Wales want that investment in the health service and not the public expenditure cuts promised by the Tories?

Mr. Hain: Absolutely—that is why the people of Monmouth will re-elect my hon. Friend as their Member of Parliament on 5 May. They will take note of the fact that the Conservatives, as part of their £35 billion of cuts, will rob the health service and public services in Wales of £2 billion. In addition, with their patient's passport, which will charge people to have operations, they plan to take £60 million out of the Welsh national health service and to encourage people to go down the road of having their operations done privately. That £60 million is the equivalent of 2,400 nurses or 660 Welsh consultants. If the Conservatives were elected, such a cut would damage the health service in Gwent and right across Wales.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): Can the Secretary of State confirm whether it is true that, according to the Evening Post, Swansea faces debts of up to £15 million, and Neath, Port Talbot and Bridgend £10 million each? The fact that the British Medical Association has passed a vote of no confidence in the Assembly clearly shows how badly it feels it has been let down. Given the headline that appears in The Western Mail today, I could sign that motion. Why could not he?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman can sign a pledge in the knowledge that it would be totally worthless, because as a result of the spending cuts that the Conservatives intend to introduce, the Welsh health service would be back to the dismal state that it was in when we began to rescue it in 1997.

As for the deficits in the health budgets, this is the third year running in which the deficit has fallen. The Assembly is on target to achieve financial balance by 2008–09, thus eliminating the deficit, including in Swansea.

Medical Staff

4. Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): What discussions he has had with the National Assembly for Wales Government on joint initiatives to increase the numbers of medical staff in Wales. [224372]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I regularly meet the Assembly First Minister to discuss health matters.

Patrick Mercer: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his reply. He will be aware that over the past 15 months, Welsh consultants have not been paid for the extra shifts that they are having to work due to the failure to implement new contracts. Is it any wonder, therefore, that there are twice as many empty consultant posts in Wales as in England? Surely the situation is unfair, so how does he intend to resolve it?

Mr. Hain: There has been a dispute with consultants, but we hope that it will resolve itself sooner rather than later. May I just remind the hon. Gentleman of the facts? There are now 350 more whole-time equivalent consultants than when we came to power in 1997, along with 5,000 more qualified nurses, as a result of which the health service in Wales is improving. Nearly 190,000 more patients are being seen in Welsh hospitals than was the case under the Conservatives and we are performing many more operations. The health service is going from strength to strength with its budget doubled. The Conservatives would attack the health service, and privatise and charge in the way in which they always wanted to do—if they win the election, they certainly will do so.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): When the North Wales clinical school opened in Wrexham in January this year, I had the opportunity to discuss with trainee doctors the fact that they were training in north Wales for the very first time. They were complimentary about the National Assembly's policies on bringing forward training for doctors in north Wales. Will the Secretary of State speak to the National Assembly to try to extend that initiative in north Wales to nurse practitioners and other medical staff in the NHS so that the increased provision that is going into the health service can be reflected by more training for medical professionals in north Wales?

Mr. Hain: I will certainly do so. That just shows how, under Labour, investment in the health service is producing better quality. Since we came to power, the number of medical and nursing students in Wales has doubled and it continues to increase steadily. By 2008, Wales will be producing 360 medical graduates a year, which can be compared with the situation under the Conservatives when we were starved of training places for both nurses and other medical staff.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): Will the Secretary of State break with tradition and give me a straightforward answer to a straightforward question? Why is it that so many people from Ynys Môn have to travel three and a half hours to access NHS dentistry in Barmouth in my constituency?

Mr. Hain: There has been a serious problem with dentistry, but it is a result of the problems that we inherited, which we are trying to put right. [Interruption.] No, no. We did inherit a serious problem: the Conservatives closed two entire dental schools. As far as Ynys Môn is concerned, over the past two years, 10 new dental practices offering NHS dentistry have opened throughout Wales and 26 practices have expanded their NHS dental provision. The number of NHS dentists in Wales has increased by 168, or a fifth, over recent years. Increasingly, we will see more NHS dentists provided under Labour in Ynys Môn. However, if the people of Ynys Môn follow the hon. Gentleman's lead and vote for the nationalists, they will get a Conservative Government and we will see health cuts all over again.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Following on from that, with Wales being governed by the Labour party and Britain—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is far too much noise in the House.

Lembit Öpik: With the Labour party in power in Wales and Westminster, the right hon. Gentleman must accept that it has become virtually impossible to access NHS dental provision in Wales. When the Liberal Democrats form the Government of this country on 6 May 2005, we will fix the problem, working with the Assembly. Since the Secretary of State for Wales has had the chance to fix the problem but has failed to do so, why should anyone believe that a re-elected Labour Administration will prevent the effective privatisation of NHS dental services in Wales?

Mr. Hain: All I can say is that with two Liberal Democrat MPs in Wales, the hon. Gentleman has a long way to go to achieve his objectives. A vote for the Liberal Democrats in key Labour-Tory marginal seats across Wales and Britain will put the Conservatives into power through the back door. That is why Labour supporters and every fair-minded person in Wales should vote Labour on 5 May.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): The Secretary of State just told the House that the health service in Wales is going from strength to strength. Can he now tell us why GP registrars have not had the pay rise they were promised in May 2004?

Mr. Hain: They certainly would not get any pay rises if the Conservative cuts were implemented as part of their plans for £35 billion-worth of cuts. Let us stick to the facts. We have seen significant progress on reducing waiting lists. In the past month, out-patient waits of more than 18 months have been cut by more than 2,000—a reduction of 38.4 per cent. Eighteen months is unacceptable for waits, but in the past year the number of patients waiting longer than that time has been cut by nearly 5,000—a massive 60 per cent. We are bringing waiting times down to 26 weeks within the next few years in Wales, meaning that in Wales people will get world-class treatment. Under the Conservatives, they would go back to the cuts, misery and hospital closures for which they were responsible in Wales last time.

Mr. Wiggin: I am not surprised that the Secretary of State did not answer the question. The chairman of the GP committee of the British Medical Association Wales, Andrew Deardon, said that the "Assembly hasn't given us any reason".

It

"has just not got round to it and there is no excuse."

Dr. Neil Statham, the GP trainer, said:

"Registrars . . . were promised this money and they haven't had it. It is either inept or deliberate."

Why will the Secretary of State not encourage the Assembly to pay up and treat medical staff with the respect that they deserve? No wonder nobody believes a word he says.

Mr. Hain: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman pursues the question again when the truth is that the health budget in Wales has more than doubled under Labour. We recruited more nurses and consultants, and waiting times are coming down. Under Labour, the health service is safe, but it would be in a dire position if the people of Britain voted Conservative. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appeal to the House again. It is unfair to hon. Members if there is so much noise. Perhaps Ministers could bear that in mind.

Concessionary Fares

5. Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): What discussions he has had with the National Assembly for Wales Minister for Transport on concessionary fares on public transport in Wales. [224373]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): My right hon. Friend and I hold regular discussions with Assembly colleagues. The Assembly introduced free travel on local bus services for women aged 60 and over, men aged 65 and over and disabled people on 1 April 2002. This was extended to include men aged 60 to 64 on 1 April 2003.

Mr. Turner: So the Chancellor's announcement in his Budget was absolutely worthless as far as pensioners in Wales are concerned. How does that compare with the amount pensioners will have to spend in Wales as a result of the 70 per cent. council tax rise and the impending cost of revaluation?

Mr. Touhig: Unlike the plans of the hon. Gentleman's party, pensioners in Wales will get £200 to help offset their council tax. [HON. MEMBERS: "£500!"] Oh yes, £500; I am sure. His party's record on looking after pensioners was appalling. When it was in government, it thought that they could survive on £69 a week. That is what it did for pensioners. Under this Government, we have achieved record support for pensioners. Pensioners in Britain know: Labour delivers for them; the Tories would abandon them.

Donald Anderson (Swansea, East) (Lab): As one who is shortly to move into the category of Welsh pensioner, may I, on behalf of Welsh pensioners, thank the Government and the Assembly for the tremendous job that they have done and express surprise that the Opposition are playing to our strongest suit—what we in government and in the Assembly have done for Welsh pensioners?

Mr. Touhig: I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend's dedication over many years and wish him well in his retirement. He has represented the people of Wales and of his city well. He is absolutely right: the Labour Government have put at the heart of their policies ensuring that pensioners have dignity in old age and have the support they need. The Labour Government will look after pensioners—he can be certain of that in his retirement. Vote Labour.

Public Transport (Disabled Access)

6. Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): What discussions he has had with the National Assembly for Wales Minister for Transport on disabled access on public transport in Wales. [224374]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): My right hon. Friend and I have regular discussions with Assembly Ministers on matters affecting Wales. Under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, transport providers must take reasonable steps to remove physical barriers to making their services accessible.

Gregory Barker: Interesting words, but if that Act is effective why do 60 per cent. of disabled people in Wales surveyed by Leonard Cheshire say that they have real difficulty accessing public transport? What action has the Minister taken on installing lifts at Bangor, Llandudno Junction, Colwyn Bay and other real stations? Is it not true that the Government are all talk and no action?

Mr. Touhig: Accessible buses are increasingly available in Wales. My Assembly colleagues have pledged a further £250,000 to upgrade buses in the Caerphilly area to make them accessible to pensioners. What is important is that the Government will continue to support and invest in public transport in Wales. The Conservatives have no record of doing that: they are the authors of the discredited rail privatisation, for which some of us are still paying the price.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): Does not the introduction of the discretionary fares scheme, including free access to buses for the disabled in Wales, mean that there are more buses than ever and more access for disabled people than ever?

Mr. Touhig: Yes it does. A great many public transport services in Wales have been sustained and supported by the Assembly's policy of providing free transport for pensioners and people with disabilities. We shall continue to do that.

Community Support Officers

7. Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): How many community support officers have been appointed in Wales. [224375]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): In February 2005, there were 156 community support officers in Wales, with funding secured to increase their number to 300.

Mr. David: Does my hon. Friend agree that CSOs are doing an excellent job, especially in combating antisocial behaviour and that it would be an absolute disgrace if their number were cut because of Tory public expenditure cuts?

Mr. Touhig: I most certainly do agree. My hon. Friend and I share the borough of Caerphilly, where the first CSOs were pioneered. CSOs are doing a tremendous job, making a difference in the policing of our streets, and making our towns and communities safer. The investment that the Labour Government have committed compares well with the cuts that the Opposition would introduce.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What does the Minister say to the North Wales police officers who have told me that CSOs are just policing on the cheap? CSOs have no power of arrest, many of them work only 9 to 5 and they are used merely because their area is not being supplied with extra police officers. Will the hon. Gentleman match the Conservative commitment to provide 40,000 extra police officers in England and Wales?

Mr. Touhig: I seem to recall that police numbers fell when the Conservatives were in power. Under the Labour Government, Wales has had more than 850 extra officers. If the hon. Gentleman wants to get up in a pulpit and preach a sermon, may I suggest a text for the day? Matthew 7:16—

"By their fruits ye shall know them."

Under the Conservatives, recorded violent crime increased by 166 per cent., the chance of being a victim of violent crime trebled, the chance of being burgled doubled and convictions fell by a third. Under Labour, crime has fallen by 30 per cent., burglary by 42 per cent. and vehicle crime by 30 per cent. I think that, come the general election, people will vote Labour, and we say amen to that.

Budget

8. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What discussions he has had with Cabinet colleagues on the impact of the Budget on the economy in Wales. [224376]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): Regular ones. As a result of the Budget, an additional £155 million will be invested in Wales on top of measures to improve skills, productivity and entrepreneurship, as well as council tax support. Indeed, it was a grand-slam Budget for Wales, with a triple crown for Labour on 5 May.

Julie Morgan: Is my right hon. Friend aware that because of the buoyant Welsh economy achieved by successive successful Budget measures and steady, sustained growth, unemployment in my Cardiff, North constituency and in Wales is at its lowest since January 1975, and is a third of the average during the Tories' 18 years? Does he not agree that the people of Wales need to vote Labour on 5 May?

Mr. Hain: I certainly do. Wales is working under Labour, and Cardiff is working. Do not let the Tories wreck it. Vote Labour on 5 May.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [224434] Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): If he will list his engagements for Wednesday 6 April.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before I turn to my engagements, may I begin by extending, probably on behalf of the whole House, our profound sympathies to the Catholic Church on the death of His Holiness Pope John Paul II? The world has lost a religious leader who was revered by people of all faiths and none, and we mourn his passing.

I am sure that the whole House will join me in congratulating the new members of the Iraqi presidency council who have been confirmed today by the Transitional National Assembly, the outcome of the first ever democratic elections in Iraq.

This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Tony Lloyd: Does the Prime Minister recall that when Labour came to office in 1997 in constituencies such as mine the biggest single issue was unemployment? The preferred public spending of the outgoing Tory Government was wasteful, shameful spending to prop up unemployment. As the economy has stabilised and grown, that public spending has been turned into Sure Start schemes, doctors, nurses, teachers, pensions and benefits that people have come to expect from the Labour Government. What advice can the Prime Minister give to my constituents—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am looking for briefer supplementaries.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is of course absolutely right. There are 2 million more people in jobs since 1997. We now have the highest employment rate of any major industrial country. We have low mortgage rates that help home owners, low inflation and a stable economy. It is the Labour party today that is the party of economic competence. It is interesting that in elections the Conservatives used to run on the economy—now they run away from it.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): May I begin by associating myself with the Prime Minister's words on the death of the Pope? The world has lost a towering spiritual leader, whose passing truly diminishes us all. I also associate myself with the Prime Minister's words on the Iraqi Government.

At the last election, the Prime Minister promised not to raise national insurance contributions. In their first Budget afterwards, the Government raised national insurance contributions. In the words of the Chancellor, why should people ever believe him again?

The Prime Minister: We made specific promises on the basic and top rate of income tax, and we have kept those promises. It is correct that we raised national insurance to pay for extra investment in the national health service. We want to keep that investment going into the national health service. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's plans are to take more than £1 billion out of the health service to pay half the cost of operations in the private sector, and there is no policy more elitist than that. We are proud of the investment in the national health service and proud of the work that it is doing. Under this Government at least, the national health service is safe.

Mr. Howard: Before the last election the Prime Minister was asked specifically whether people should suppose he was going to increase national insurance contributions. He said, "They shouldn't." Now he says that that was not a promise. Does not that tell people everything they need to know about the Prime Minister? In 1997 he said:

"Labour has no plans to introduce tuition fees for higher education".

He then introduced tuition fees. In 2001 he said:

"We will not introduce 'top-up' fees and have legislated to prevent them."

He then introduced top-up fees. In the words of the Chancellor, why should people ever believe a word he says again?

The Prime Minister: I am very happy to compare our record in government with the record of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. We are proud of the fact that our economy is strong, and that the investment goes into our schools and our hospitals. It is what we promised and what we have done. Let me just remind him of what he did when he was in government. When Minister of State for the Environment, he introduced the poll tax—correct? When he was Secretary of State for Employment, unemployment rose by 1 million. When Minister in charge of labour regulation, he ended up opposing the minimum wage, and when he was Home Secretary he cut the numbers of police. In the end, the judgment that people will make is between our record and future programme, and his. I know what judgment they will make.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister was asked specifically about his broken promises on top-up fees and tuition fees, and he could not bring himself to say a word in defence of those broken promises. In 1997 he promised "firm control" over immigration, but since then net immigration has tripled. In the words of the Chancellor, why should people ever believe him again?

The Prime Minister: I will tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman about the immigration and asylum system that we inherited. We inherited a situation where, when he was Home Secretary, it took 20 months to process an asylum claim and the number of removals was one in 10. Yes, it is true that we need to control immigration, but the way to do it is not his proposal of halving the immigration budget. Yes, immigration is an issue. Yes, it is important that we discuss it, but it is an issue that should be dealt with, not exploited.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard: Labour Members are cheering the Prime Minister now, but let us find out what they really think of him. How many of them are putting his photo on their election addresses? Hands up! One, two, three, four, five, six. Does not that tell us all we need to know about what they really think of him? [HON. MEMBERS: "More!"] The Prime Minister promised to "tackle the unacceptable level of anti-social behaviour".

Two and a half years ago he said he would remove housing benefit from antisocial tenants. Antisocial tenants still have their housing benefit and antisocial behaviour has got worse. In the words of the Chancellor, why should people ever believe him again?

The Prime Minister: Let me just remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman—[Interruption.] I think we know which photograph we certainly do have up. It will probably be the right hon. and learned Gentleman's, to remind people exactly of what they would be going back to. Since he has raised the issue of crime, let me remind him of what the chief constable of North Wales said about the Conservative party policy and its advertisement on crime. He said:

"This misleading advert quite improperly seeks to stir up fear of rising crime when it is a well-established fact that crime has been falling for years, both locally and nationally".

When the right hon. and learned Gentleman was in office, crime doubled under the Conservatives. It has fallen under Labour, so we have the strongest economy, falling unemployment, investment in our health and education services, falling crime and investment in the police. That is opposed to a policy that would put our economic stability at risk and make cuts in public services. Once people know that choice, and they will over the coming weeks, it is very clear how they will choose.

Mr. Howard: The figures that we use in those advertisements are the police's own figures: the figures that the right hon. Gentleman used just two minutes ago when he was describing the record of the last Government. Let us have no such claptrap.

The right hon. Gentleman talks about his record, but his chief election co-ordinator—where is he? He is not even here today. His chief election co-ordinator says that his biggest fear—there he is; I have spotted him; excellent—has always been that this election will turn into a referendum on the Labour party. Is that what the Prime Minister thinks too?

The Prime Minister: No, I think that it is a choice. I think that it is a choice between a Conservative party that when it was in office had unemployment at 3 million, had interest rates at 10 per cent. for four years, had boom and bust recession twice, and ended up cutting spending on our NHS and in our schools, and a Labour Government who, over the past eight years, have delivered economic stability, low mortgages, low unemployment, low inflation and record investment in our NHS and in our schools. I think that that is the choice, and I think that when the country comes to consider not just the record of the Conservative party, but the fact that its economic, health and education plans are exactly the ones that it rejected in 1997, yes, I will be very happy that people should compare the choice between the Conservative's record and ours; between our future programme and theirs.

Mr. Howard: The right hon. Gentleman talks about his record. Let us look at his record. I will tell him about his record: taxes—[HON. MEMBERS: "Up."]; crime—[HON. MEMBERS: "Up."]; immigration—[HON. MEMBERS: "Up."]; waiting times—[HON. MEMBERS: "Up."]; MRSA—[HON. MEMBERS: "Up."]; truancy—[HON. MEMBERS: "Up"]. Let us have a look at what has gone down: take-home pay—[HON. MEMBERS: "Down."]; pensions—[HON. MEMBERS: "Down."]; productivity growth—[HON. MEMBERS: "Down."]; manufacturing employment—[HON. MEMBERS: "Down."]; detection rates—[HON. MEMBERS: "Down."]. After eight years of Labour government, we are locking up teachers not yobs, our voting system resembles a banana republic's, and pensioners who cannot find an NHS dentist are reduced to pulling out their own teeth. Is there not now a clear choice at this election: rewarding this Prime Minister for eight years of broken promises or choosing a Government who will take action on the things that matter to hard-working Britons.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the Prime Minister speak.

The Prime Minister: I am going to begin by agreeing with the right hon. and learned Gentleman: I think that it does mean a choice, and the choice is very clear. People remember the years before 1997. They remember the people who lost their homes in the recession, who lost their jobs in the recession, who used to end up with mortgages that they could not afford. They remember the winter crises every year in the NHS. They remember the outside toilets and the creaking classrooms in the schools. They remember when the police officers were cut while the right hon. and learned Gentleman was Home Secretary. They remember all that. And between now and polling day we will remind them of what they have now, and what is therefore at risk. What they have now is economic stability, investment in public services and action on crime.

So the choice is indeed very clear. What I say to the British people is this: "Economic stability is at risk, your job is at risk, your mortgage is at risk, the economy is at risk, and therefore when you come to make that choice on 5 May, realise the fundamental nature of it, realise what you experienced under 18 years of Conservative government, realise the progress that we have made under eight years of Labour government, and then go out and realise too that unless you come out and support Labour, that stability, that investment, will no longer happen, the clock will be turned back, and the very self-same crew that you voted to get rid of in 1997 will come back." Yes, it is a big choice, and I cannot wait for the public to make it.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle) (SDLP): Prime Minister, could we get back to serious matters? Given that there has never been a war in the history of the world in which the vast majority of victims have not been innocent civilians, does the Prime Minister agree that the time has come to create a world where there is no longer war or conflict? Given his massive international respect, will he join together with other world leaders to create the means of ensuring that there is no longer any war or conflict in the world? Does he agree that the best way of doing that, given that the European Union is the best example in history of conflict resolution, is for a special department of the European Union for peace and reconciliation to be created and to visit all areas of conflict with the principles of the EU, which will create a resolution of conflict anywhere in the world? Will he and his international colleagues make that historic decision as soon as possible?

The Prime Minister: First, I pay tribute to the work that my hon. Friend has done for peace in this country, and in Northern Ireland in particular. I entirely agree with him that one of the most important things is what we can do to try to spread the type of peace and reconciliation that he pioneered in Northern Ireland throughout the rest of the world. I will certainly use our best offices and the European Union presidency to do so, and also within the G8.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): On behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I associate myself entirely, of course, with the opening comments of tribute by the Prime Minister.

After eight years of this Labour Government, the Prime Minister will recognise that most women in this country still do not receive a full state pension in their own right, because they have had to take time out of work to raise children or, in many cases, to care for elderly relatives. Surely women should receive a pension as of right, rather than on the basis of national insurance contributions. After eight years, why has the Prime Minister not put that fundamental unfairness right?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman knows that two thirds of the beneficiaries of the pension credit are, in fact, women, and that helps enormously with relieving people in poverty and raising pensioners' living standards. Living standards for pensioners have risen considerably above not just inflation, but earnings over the past few years. Of course, we have always got to try to do more, but when we look back over the record of eight years—the winter fuel allowance, the free TV licences for the over-75s and, in particular, the pension credit, the help for the poorest pensioners in our country and the help that the Chancellor has just announced with the council tax for pensioners—I think that this Government have a record on pensioners of which we can be very proud. Of course, there is always more to do, but we will do it, if elected.

Mr. Kennedy: Staying on the issue of fairness, but looking at the other end of the age spectrum, why is it that we are now saddling so many of our young people with thousands of pounds' worth of debt wrapped around their necks because of the policy of imposing top-up fees? The Prime Minister's policy of top-up fees is in direct breach of the pledge that he made in his last general election manifesto, so why should any of us believe any of the promises that he is about to make in the next general election manifesto?

The Prime Minister: Of course, there are now going to be no fees paid at all when someone goes through university. What is more, the repayment that will be made by people once they graduate will be linked to their ability to pay. There will be no real rate of interest on that loan and there will be special help with the reintroduced maintenance grant for the poorest people. Of course, we believe that we have to get more money into our university system—I think that the right hon. Gentleman does as well—but I do not think that his proposal to take that money out of general taxation by a 50 per cent. top rate of tax is something that will recommend itself to people. It is a proposal that in my view would not raise the money that he thinks it would raise. In any event, it would not be a fair use of resources.

On education, I would just remind the right hon. Gentleman that this country is now investing more each year as a proportion of our national income on education—in Sure Start, nursery education, primary schools, secondary schools, and, yes, universities, and for those taking skills courses as well. I think that we can be very proud of our record in education, but it is true that we have to modernise our system continually to keep up with the new world in which we live.

Iraq War

Q2. [224435] Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): whether a full written legal opinion by the Attorney-General on the legality of a possible war against Iraq was shown to the Cabinet in 2003, in addition to the summary of the legal opinion it was shown.

The Prime Minister: As I have said before, the Attorney-General himself came to Cabinet, where he explained his view of the legal position and was able to answer any queries that people raised.

Dr. Lewis: The Prime Minister has repeated today what he said on 9 March and again on 16 March, and what the Foreign Secretary said on 24 March—that the Attorney-General took questions at that Cabinet meeting. However, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short) is absolutely adamant that members of the Cabinet were not allowed to ask questions. Which is the truth and which is fiction? I know whom I believe—and it is not a man.

The Prime Minister: The Foreign Secretary has explained the position, and I repeat what he has said. I must say this to the hon. Gentleman and some other Conservative Members—I am happy to debate Iraq with people who disagreed fundamentally with that decision. What I find contemptible, however, is that parts of the Conservative party that agreed with the war in Iraq and that urged it upon us are now attempting to resile from that position. That approach will not command respect anywhere.

Engagements

Q3. [224436] Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that when I entered the House, 1,500 young people under the age of 25 were queuing up at jobcentres in my constituency for the right to work? Now, unemployment in my constituency is right down to 2 per cent., 1,000 of those young people have been helped into work through the new deal, and the major steel manufacturing unit is producing a record output of world-class aerospace steel. Will he promise to keep full employment at the top of the agenda and to maintain that fine economic record?

The Prime Minister: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for her work on women's rights and in battling unemployment throughout the long years in opposition and then again in government. She is right to emphasise that the new deal, which the Conservative party has pledged to scrap, has helped more than 1 million people—young people, unemployed people, lone parents and disabled people—into jobs, and it is extremely important that we keep it going.

On unemployment, I can do no better than quote the shadow Foreign Secretary, who said the other day:

"Quite honestly I go to Germany now, and they say to me, 'I wish we had your unemployment.'"

They did not say that during the 18 years of Conservative government, but they do now.

Q4. [224437] Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): The Prime Minister will be aware of the Clackmannanshire research, which shows how effective synthetic phonics are in raising reading standards. Does he agree that one of the most urgent tasks for the incoming Secretary of State for Education and Skills is to order a complete review of the national literacy strategy to ensure that synthetic phonics is taught fast and first in all our primary schools?

The Prime Minister: We keep the national literacy strategy under review. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that major gains have been made in our primary schools in literacy and numeracy over the past few years. When we came to office, something like just over half of 11-year-olds actually passed their 11-year-old tests. Now the figure is about 75 per cent. and rising. We keep all those matters under review, but we can only tackle the issue with the right policy and by keeping investment going into the state education system and not using it to subsidise private education.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): Amid the speculation in the press about the progress of negotiations between MG Rover and Shanghai Automotive, does my right hon. Friend agree that we must keep at the forefront of our minds the 6,000 employees at MG Rover, the employees' families, the communities that depend on MG Rover and the businesses whose futures are intertwined with MG Rover? Will he assure me that the Government will continue to do all that they can successfully to conclude those negotiations and that, come what may, this Government will continue to stand by manufacturing in the west midlands and MG Rover workers?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance. All the members of the Government with an interest in the matter, including my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Chancellor, and I, keep in close touch on that issue, and we will do whatever we can to help to achieve a successful resolution. As he has rightly said, the jobs, living standards and livelihoods of those people who work at MG Rover must be foremost in our minds.

Q5. [224438] Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): What does the Prime Minister most regret about his time in office?

The Prime Minister: I think that although we did pretty well on this score, we could have done with even fewer Tories sitting opposite. But since the hon. Gentleman has given me the opportunity, I will tell him what I do not regret—[Interruption.] It is always important to balance the regrets with the plus points. What I do not regret is the strong economy, investment in public services and falling crime, and I thank him for giving me the opportunity to say so.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich) (Lab): May I tell my right hon. Friend that the district of Tendring in my constituency has been named as one of the safest districts to live in; that the local Tory district council makes that clear in the newspaper that it has just released; and that the figures put out by the chief superintendent in my area also say that crime is down? Who does my right hon. Friend think is right—those with the facts or the Leader of the Opposition with the fiction?

The Prime Minister: I am absolutely sure that the chief police officer and other officers in my hon. Friend's area know exactly what is happening, which is that crime is falling. We still have a long way to go. We must keep up the investment in the criminal justice system and in extra numbers of police and community support officers: that is why we will continue to have a rising police budget. We will not go down the path advocated by the Conservatives—of freezing the Home Office budget, which would cut police numbers.

Q6. [224439] Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): My local primary care trust recently wrote to local doctors urging them not to send people to hospital because of a beds crisis. At one point, more than 80 people in two casualty units were unable to find beds, yet there are plans to merge my two local hospitals into one, with fewer beds than at present. Can the Prime Minister give a guarantee to my constituents that there will not be cuts in NHS beds?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly guarantee that there will not be cuts in NHS spending, because we have a proposal that would allow us to keep raising spending on the national health service year on year in the coming years. If we take the whole period of this Government, we have spent far more on our national health service than the Liberal Democrats ever asked us to. The way in which local hospital services are configured is obviously a matter for local people, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that if we are re-elected the investment that has been pouring into his constituency and others will continue to do so.

Q7. [224440] Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): What advice can the Prime Minister give the House on how we can all inspire people to turn out and vote on 5 May so that in future they do not have to look back in anger at the unanticipated consequences of apathy, namely, a Government with "something of the Flight" about them?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right to point out that in constituencies such as his, during the 18 years of Conservative government, there were unemployed people and two recessions which hit constituencies in Wales particularly hard. [Interruption.] Conservative Members may yawn, but I think that the public know that the strong economy is the foundation of this country's success, and I can assure him that with this party in government, that economic stability will continue and the investment in public services will continue, not be put at risk.

Q8. [224441] Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): It is clear from the recent inspectorate's report that the Home Office intends to reinforce Nottinghamshire constabulary merely with other inspectors and supervising officers. Nottinghamshire needs bobbies, not bureaucrats. Is not that another good reason to vote Conservative?

The Prime Minister: That is not a very wise thing for the hon. Gentleman to raise. As far as I am aware, in Nottinghamshire there are actually more than 200 more police officers than in March 1997, and more than 100 community support officers. What is more, as a result of our proposals to invest in public services for the future, as opposed to the Conservatives' proposal to take £35 billion in cuts out of our spending programme—[Interruption.] Oh yes, that is their policy.

I am afraid that the only way for them to get more police and community support officers in Nottinghamshire is to vote Labour.

Q9. [224442] Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Although it has not always been the case, does the Prime Minister agree that on this occasion the Government have a unique two-for-one offer to make at the general election—vote Labour, and keep not only an experienced Prime Minister tested by fire but a successful Chancellor with good future prospects?

The Prime Minister: On that happy note, I wish everyone well.

Q10. [224443] Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): Does the Prime Minister share my surprise at the fact that the Office of Fair Trading failed in its recent report to find any abuse by supermarkets of their dominant market position in their dealings with farmers and crofters? Does he agree that that report demonstrates the failure of the current voluntary code of practice, and—if he is in a position to do anything about the matter after the general election—will he give a commitment to considering introducing a compulsory code to protect our farmers and crofters?

The Prime Minister: It is a serious issue and we are going to study the code of practice very carefully. It is important that it be implemented—after all, that was part of the agreement that we came to with the supermarkets. So I can assure the hon. Gentleman that if we are in a position to do so, we will certainly look at this issue.

Equal Enforcement of the Law

12.31 pm

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision for direction to police forces to enforce the law equally as it applies to settled communities and to travellers; to amend the law on trespass; and for connected purposes.

One of the abiding principles that runs through the development of British democracy and society is that of equality before the law. The peasants' revolt, Magna Carta, the civil war, habeas corpus, the abolition of the Test Acts and many other instances show the development of this principle, and a vital principle it has been. But under this Government, some people have discovered that the law will not be applied to them equally. The terrorists of Sinn Fein are one such group, but I wish to dwell on the current treatment of Travellers in the country.

As far as I am concerned, if people wish to live in caravans and travel around the country that is entirely their own affair. I do not believe in prescribing how people lead their lives, just as long as they do not impinge unreasonably on the lives of others. There is a permanent campsite at Aston Firs, in my constituency, which I have visited in the past and will probably visit during this election campaign. I believe the people there to be law abiding, and while there might not be many votes there for me, I think it important to make myself available to all my constituents.

I was brought up on the romantic notion of Gypsies in attractive and colourful caravans pulled by horses, and of Romany people living their unique lifestyle travelling around the country. This still happens—indeed, only last week, there was a traditional caravan in Swinford, in my constituency. However, in contrast and entirely by coincidence, on Monday my constituency office was deluged with calls from concerned people in Lutterworth about an illegal Gypsy encampment at the Ladywood works. I went to see the site, where half a dozen caravans had moved in on Saturday night. A local garage had been closed because the 17-year-old female cashier said that she had been intimidated by Travellers. When I spoke to the owner, he told me that he had not reported it to the police because the last time he caught a Gypsy on closed circuit television stealing something from his forecourt, the local police had advised him not to press charges because he might be vulnerable to criminal damage in retaliation. What a disgrace!

Another three caravans have now arrived in Lutterworth on the same illegal site, where they are trespassing. When the first ones arrived, one of the Travellers made an offer to the manager of the site, saying that they would leave straight away if paid £350 for a van. When I visited the site, helpful police officers were present. When I pointed out that one car had no road fund licence, the officer explained that although the owner of it was committing an act of trespass, the police had no rights to enforce the law on private land. The phrase Catch-22 comes to mind.

At this site, one of the particular complaints of the businesses based there was that human excrement had been left on their doorsteps. A couple of years ago in Northfield park in Blaby, I saw an astonishing amount of rubbish, including abandoned cars, that had been dumped by Travellers. Local residents were so intimidated that they did not dare use the park. I met some aggressive Travellers who were, shall I say, extremely impolite to me, but the police stood off, not wishing to make trouble. That is a pity, because two issues relating to caravans and the police have been drawn to my attention by people involved in the legal caravanning world.

The first is the width and length of caravans. Photographs published in The Sun and elsewhere show that some caravans have twin or even triple axles and they are too long to be towed legally by anything other than a full-sized commercial vehicle in the UK. At the same time, a maximum-width caravan that can be towed in the UK is just over 7 ft 5 in. Photographs in The Sun on 12 March show a German-made LMC caravan just under 8 ft wide. That is illegal, yet the police very rarely stop those sorts of illegal vehicles. Perhaps the Minister might like to answer the written question that I have already tabled about prosecutions for over-wide or over-long caravans in this country.

The second and enormously important issue for the police is theft. Some 5,000 touring caravans are stolen and not recovered each year—about 20 per cent. of the total UK sales of new caravans. All these new caravans have CRIS identification numbers and generally have transponders in them. If a new caravan is found without such means of identification, the question should be asked, "Why not, and is it stolen?" Unfortunately, when one police officer in Bedfordshire followed such a course of action, he was moved to an office job because he was upsetting Travellers in Bedfordshire. He also upset the local social services, which feared that they might have to find accommodation for families whose caravans were confiscated. Surely it is the duty of the police to make simple inquiries to ascertain whether caravans are stolen.

It is also interesting to note how many brand-new vehicles tend to be pulling these vans, and it might be pertinent for the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise to be making inquiries about taxation and VAT. Little council tax gets paid and I doubt whether much else gets paid either.

If any hon. Member fails to tax his car, I would expect him to be prosecuted with the assistance of the police. If he or she dumps rubbish on public land or by the side of the road, he or she is committing an offence. Human excrement in a public place should incur the wrath of environmental health departments. Furthermore, we all pay taxes and the overwhelming majority of our constituents pay council tax for the services that they expect to receive.

It is not unreasonable for us all to obey the laws of this country, whether they be planning laws, motoring laws or laws relating to environmental health. Illegal encampments of Travellers have been much in the news recently and one does not have to be a reader of The Sun or the Daily Mail, which I understand have both campaigned on this issue, to believe that it is wrong for people to flout the planning law in a flagrant fashion and then apply for retrospective planning permission.

BEST COPY AVAILBLE

[Mr. Andrew Robathan]

Sadly, the Government believe, and I am quoting from a Government document:

"Whilst some planners think that treating everyone the same helps to ensure equality, this is not the case. Explicit recognition of difference is needed to ensure that the right action can be taken to deliver a planning service responsive to different needs within the communities it serves".

Similarly, on unauthorised camping, the Government have said:

"Where the occupier of the land is a public body such as a local authority, then every effort should be made to avert forced eviction. Where trespassers are for instance Irish travellers, public bodies are required under the Race Relations Act to have due regard to the need to promote good race relations".

The law does not apply to everyone; the law is not applied equally to all people in this country.

I think that the overwhelming majority of people in this country, faced with casting their votes in a general election, will take the view that everybody should be subject to the same laws. I propose that trespass, where it involves occupancy, be made a criminal offence. That would give the police the certain power to move on trespassing Travellers. The House will know that that is exactly what happened in Ireland under the Housing (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2002. That, of course, is why there has been an influx of Irish Travellers into this country, where we are seen as a soft touch.

I further propose that councils be allowed to refuse applications for retrospective planning permission by Travellers or rogue developers who, often advised by disreputable lawyers, are cynically manipulating the planning system. I would allow local councils to ensure that, where planning permission does not exist, caravans are rapidly removed and that large fines or confiscation of assets are imposed on Travellers who are trying to profit from illegal developments.

Police must know that they have not only the power but the duty to stop Travellers of whom they are suspicious and to check their road fund licences and the roadworthiness and provenance of their vehicles. If I am stopped by a police officer, I must be displaying my road fund licence on my car and I may be required to produce my insurance. There is no reason why that law, too, should not be applied to Travellers, but police officers seem wary of doing so because they fear that it may cause trouble.

Finally, the Travellers who are behaving illegally—they are probably a minority of the travelling community—know their rights, but not their responsibilities. I propose a review, or even the repeal, of the so-called Human Rights Act 1998. That Act sounds attractive, but it is used by smart, slick lawyers to drive a coach and horses through the laws that the rest of us have to obey. In particular, the Act has allowed Travellers to break planning laws, but it takes no account of the rights of others whose lives are made a misery by illegal Traveller encampments. When my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition made exactly that suggestion, one person commented that it had "the whiff of the gas chamber about it".

Only a bitter, twisted and perverted mind could imagine that to say that all people should obey the same laws is in some way wrong. We are all equal before the law, and I propose that that equality should be enforced.

I urge the House to support this Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Andrew Robathan.

EQUAL ENFORCEMENT OF THE LAW

Mr. Andrew Robathan accordingly presented a Bill to make provision for direction to police forces to enforce the law equally as it applies to settled communities and to Travellers; to amend the law on trespass; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Thursday 5 May, and to be printed [Bill 106].

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. About a fortnight ago, 1,600 of my constituents queued for seven hours to register with a national health service dentist. I wrote to the Prime Minister about that immediately afterwards, asking him to take action. I seek your guidance on this matter. Before the forthcoming dissolution of Parliament, what pressure do the rules allow to be brought on the Prime Minister to reply to my letter and reassure my constituents who, as you will understand, are anxious about this crisis? I feel that I owe them a duty to answer their proper questions, and that the Prime Minister owes me a duty to answer me, so that I can answer them. What pressure can I bring to bear on the Prime Minister to deal with the NHS dental crisis?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me but, as a Member of Parliament in my own right, with my own constituency, I would telephone Downing street. That is what I would do.

Business of the House

12.43 pm

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): I beg to move,

That the following provisions shall have effect—

Sittings on 6th, 7th and 8th April: general

1. At this day's sitting and at the sittings tomorrow and on Friday—

(1) any motion made by a Minister of the Crown may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour, and shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House;

(2) proceedings on Lords Amendments or any subsequent Lords Message in respect of any Bill may be considered forthwith without any further Question being put and shall be brought to a conclusion (unless already concluded) one hour after their commencement (subject to paragraph 3(1));

(3) Standing Orders Nos. 83D to 83H and 83I(2) to (6) (conclusion of proceedings, &c.) shall apply to proceedings to be taken in accordance with this Order (but with the omission of Standing Orders Nos. 83D(2)(c) and 83E(2)(c));

(4) notices of Amendments, new Clauses or new Schedules to be moved in Committee on any Bill may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a second time;

(5) Standing Order No. 41A (Deferred divisions) shall not apply; and

(6) the Speaker shall not adjourn the House until any Messages from the Lords have been received and any Committee to draw up Reasons has reported.

Wednesday 6th April

2. At the sitting this day the following business shall be brought to a conclusion (unless already concluded) at the time after its commencement shown in brackets at the end of each sub-paragraph—

(1) any motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the reading of specified Resolutions of 22nd March, presentation and first reading of any Finance (No. 2) Bill brought in on those resolutions and remaining proceedings on any such Bill (four hours);

(2) any motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the bringing in of an Appropriation Bill, presentation and first reading of any Bill brought in in pursuance of that motion and remaining proceedings on any such Bill, to which Standing Order No. 56 (Consolidated Fund Bills) shall apply (forthwith);

(3) remaining proceedings on the Inquiries Bill [Lords] (one hour);

(4) Committee of the whole House and remaining proceedings on the Disability Discrimination Bill [Lords] (one hour); and

(5) Committee of the whole House and remaining proceedings on the Public Services Ombudsman (Wales) Bill [Lords] (one hour).

Thursday 7th April

3. At the sitting tomorrow the following business shall be brought to a conclusion (unless already concluded) at the time after its commencement shown in brackets at the end of each sub-paragraph—

(1) proceedings on any Lords Amendments to the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill which may be received (one and a half hours);

(2) remaining proceedings on the Education Bill [Lords] (one hour);

(3) the motion relating to suspension and revival of the Crossrail Bill (one hour); and

(4) second reading and remaining proceedings on the International Organisations Bill [Lords] (one and a half hours).

4. On Thursday 7th April there shall be no sitting in Westminster Hall.

Friday 8th April

5. On Friday—

(1) Standing Order No. 14(4) (Private Members' Bills) shall not apply; and

(2) the Speaker shall not adjourn the House until a Message has been received from the Lords Commissioners.

General

6. If any Finance (No. 2) Bill, or the International Organisations Bill [Lords], is read a second time, it shall stand committed to a Committee of the whole House.

7. The Orders that the Disability Discrimination Bill [Lords] and the Public Services Ombudsman (Wales) Bill [Lords] be committed to a Standing Committee shall be discharged and the Bills shall be committed to a Committee of the whole House.

8. A reference in this Order to proceedings on or in respect of a Bill includes a reference to proceedings on any Money Resolution, Ways and Means Resolution or Order of Consideration motion in relation to those proceedings.

9. The Order of Consideration motion of which Maria Eagle has given notice in respect of the Standing Committee on the Disability Discrimination Bill [Lords] may be moved by a Minister of the Crown in respect of the Committee of the whole House to which the Bill is committed under paragraph 7.

10. Paragraph 2(1) shall have effect notwithstanding the practice of the House as to the intervals between stages of Bill brought in upon Ways and Means Resolutions.

11. If the sitting this day continues after 11.30 a.m. on Thursday 7th April, this Order shall have effect as if any reference to the sitting on Thursday 7th April or Friday 8th April included a reference to the sitting this day.

12. If the sitting tomorrow continues after 9.30 a.m. on Friday 8th April, this Order shall have effect as if any reference to the sitting on Friday 8th April included a reference to the sitting tomorrow.

This is a motion designed to facilitate our business between now and Prorogation, and it may help the House if I say something about its effect.

The motion provides that today, Wednesday, after we have concluded our consideration of this Business of the House motion, we will proceed as follows. First, we will take all stages of the new Finance Bill, for up to four hours. Instead of seeking to amend the original Bill, which would require a complex Committee stage, the Government will—on the advice of the Clerks and with the agreement of the Opposition—withdraw that Bill and reintroduce part of it as a new Bill.

Secondly, we will take all stages of an Appropriation Bill, without debate. Thirdly, we will debate the remaining stages of the Inquiries Bill for up to one hour, followed by Committee of the whole House and remaining stages of the Disability Discrimination Bill for up to one hour. We will then take Committee of the whole House and remaining stages of the Public Service Ombudsman (Wales) Bill for up to one hour. Finally, we expect to take some Lords amendments or messages for up to an hour on each Bill.

Tomorrow, Thursday, we will consider the following, although not necessarily in this order: Lords amendments to the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill, for up to one and a half hours; remaining proceedings on the Education Bill for up to one hour; the motion to suspend the Crossrail Bill for up to one hour; Second Reading and remaining stages of the International Organisations Bill for up to one and a half hours. During the course of the day, we may consider other Government motions, including motions relating to Lords amendments or messages. I hope and intend that we will conclude our business and be prorogued on Thursday evening.

[Mr. Peter Hain]

The motion makes general provision for debate on Government motions to continue until any hour without the need for motions at the moment of interruption. Amendments to be moved in Committee may be tabled before Second Reading. There will be no deferred Divisions and Mr. Speaker will not adjourn the House until any Lords messages have been received and any Reasons Committee has reported.

The motion provides that there will be no sitting in Westminster Hall on Thursday.

I hope that the House will agree to this motion swiftly so that we can proceed to consider the important legislation before us.

Before closing, I would like to thank all the staff and Officers of the House for their hard work during this Parliament. Without them this House would not operate as effectively as it does. I would also like to pass on my thanks for all the work undertaken in Departments, private offices and parliamentary sections. In particular, I thank my two private offices: the Leader's Office and the Wales Office. The hard work, professionalism and integrity of the civil servants in both those offices have served me and my predecessors well.

I commend the motion to the House.

12.46 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I join the tributes paid by the Leader of the House to all those who work here and help us so much in everything we do. I thank them for their work throughout this Parliament. I also thank the officers at Conservative headquarters who help me with the necessary research in my role.

I join the tribute that the Leader of the House paid yesterday to the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), who has had a long career here and is now retiring. We wish him well in his retirement. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear.]

I thank the Leader of the House for consulting, through the usual channels, on the form of the motion. We agreed that it would be for the convenience of right hon. and hon. Members throughout the House to include everything in one motion, particularly the programmes for the various Bills in so far as they are known. That is acceptable to us as a suitable way of dealing with business only at this stage of a Parliament and not as a wider precedent. I hope that the Leader of the House will confirm that that is his understanding.

Mr. Hain: I am happy to confirm that the motion does not set a precedent for the general conduct of business. The shadow Leader of the House is aware of the unusual circumstances that always occur at the end of a Parliament. I take this opportunity to thank him and the usual channels for expediting matters and for the constructive approach that meets both Opposition and Government interests and, ultimately, the national interest.

Mr. Heald: I thank the Leader of the House for his comments. I said yesterday that we would take a constructive approach to the Bills before Parliament. Good progress has been made and the Government have accommodated our requirements on the Bills that are proceeding. However, would the Leader of the House look again at the Inquiries Bill? Two Lords amendments were removed in Committee here, but concern has been expressed throughout the House. When an inquiry touches on ministerial conduct, surely it is right that Parliament should approve the details of the setting up of an inquiry, as happens now under the Tribunals of Inquiry Evidence Act 1921. What is the reason for taking that power away from Parliament unless it is to be able to hold such inquiries in a way that might not be approved by both Houses of Parliament? Surely that is not something that the Leader of the House wants. In the interests of having inquiries that have the support of Parliament and the public, surely the Government could look at the matter again.

12.48 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I add my thanks on behalf of my colleagues to those that have been expressed. Perhaps I could also be allowed to thank not just the Officers of the House, but right hon. and hon. Members of all parties with whom I have been happy to work for some years. The House is often at its best when we work across party lines for the achievement of better business and a better legislative product. We all regret it when a straitjacket is imposed but, as the Leader of the House said, this is not a precedent for the way in which Parliament usually operates. These are abnormal times and I accept that this is evidence of the way in which constructive consultation behind the scenes in both Houses can achieve a sensible way of doing business in abnormal circumstances.

If I have any reputation at all as I leave this House, I hope that it is that I am capable of making both a brief point and a point briefly, so I hope that by making a succinct contribution this afternoon I do not endanger that reputation. We should get on with the substance of the business so that we have the maximum time for scrutiny.

Finally, I thank both the Leader of the House and his Conservative shadow for their kind remarks about me.

12.50 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): I would not like the House to prorogue without my joining in the tributes paid by the Leader of the House and the spokesmen for the Opposition parties to the staff. This establishment has not always caught up with modern management techniques and, inevitably, it cannot run in the same way as a structured, commercial organisation, nor should it choose to do so. It is thus essential that our staff at every level, whether direct employees or members of associated firms, are not only sufficiently flexible to fit in with the needs of the House of Commons and the Members, but that they also meet the very real need of the general public to know what is happening here and to understand our sometimes arcane procedures.

It is easy to criticise and occasionally to knock those who maintain traditional forms of dress, but who marry with that extremely modern forms of administration. It is important that Members understand what an enormously effective job the House of Commons does in servicing the needs of a Parliament. That goes right the way through, whether it is the Refreshment Department staff, the people who service the building or the industrial or non-industrial civil service. It is essential not only that Members understand that, but that we say firmly how grateful we are to the staff for the way in which they perform their duties day in, day out, and occasionally, even now, night in and night out.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) and I have west-country connections that go back a long way. He will be missed in this place; he is an individual voice and a very plain one. I shall miss all the other Members who are retiring. Some of them are going far too soon, and I hope that they will regret leaving us so early. Every one of them has contributed in a unique and essential way to the work of Parliament. Long may they enjoy their future careers. Long may we record with affection and respect the work that they have done in this Parliament.

12.52 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I am always suspicious when the House indulges in an orgy of self-congratulation and mutual admiration. It makes me suspect that something rather unpleasant is going on, and I had only to read the words of the motion that we are being asked to approve for that to be confirmed fully.

In the good old days, I would have looked at the Order Paper, seen the words "until any hour" and been thrilled at the prospect. I am tempted to explore those words to the full, but those days, for the moment, have passed, although I hope they return soon; even I recognise that this is probably not the occasion for a full exploration of the motion, but I want to touch on one or two points.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Given that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) properly focused on Members who are not seeking re-election, I reassure my right hon. Friend that I certainly shall be seeking re-election, both because I love parliamentary life and, quite frankly, because I am too young and cannot possibly afford to retire. I put it to my right hon. Friend that if it is true that the Government are abandoning the Identity Cards Bill, that is magnificent news. It is a thoroughly bad and obnoxious Bill; it has not been properly considered by the House of Lords, so it is extremely welcome that, despite the breast-beating of the Home Secretary, the Government are ditching that piece of nonsense.

Mr. Forth: I can give my hon. Friend a little bit of reassurance as I do not see that Bill mentioned in the motion, although it could always be subsumed in some mysterious way into the words "any other motions", to which I may return in a moment.

There is a parliamentary danger—a constitutional danger, even—in the proceedings that we face when we come to Prorogation and Dissolution. Because of our rather unusual parliamentary system, a Prime Minister can call an election at any time, so we are faced with an abrupt ending to our proceedings right in the middle of the parliamentary cycle. The danger lies in the fact that at that point consultations are undertaken between a very small number of people, on both sides of the House, who reach a cosy agreement and then, congratulating each other, present us with a fait accompli. The words of the motion reflect that all too fully.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) has said from the Front Bench how delighted he is that we can sign up to everything and the Leader of the House has said how delighted he is that the Government are getting what they want: "We are getting what we want". But the we on this occasion is them. Nobody has consulted me about this at any stage.

Mr. Hain: May I point out to the former shadow Leader of the House, that if he had been sitting on the Front Bench he would have been absolutely delighted as well?

Mr. Forth: No, because if I had been on the Front Bench the Leader of the House would have got none of his Bills, and that would have been absolutely proper.

Mr. Heald: Why was my right hon. Friend offered a pint by the Leader of the House yesterday yet I was not?

Mr. Forth: I am not sure that I was, but we shall settle that later in the usual way. The Leader of the House is looking very embarrassed and we would not want that, would we?

There is a serious point. I do not want to dwell on it excessively, but merely to put down a marker. It is that we are being asked to legislate—to make the law of the land—in an extremely truncated and restricted way, on the basis that a small number of no doubt senior and eminent people have decided what will be and are then asking the rest of us, as Members of Parliament, to say, "Oh, all right then. You're only giving us an hour to consider an entire Bill". Even worse, we are being asked to sign up to the fact that "any motion made by a Minister of the Crown may be proceeded with . . . until any hour, and shall not be interrupted".

That exemplifies the degree of control that the Government seek and have been given by the motion. They call the shots and the rest of us have to fall meekly into our places.

When we consider the detail of the motion, we find that the House of Commons is being asked to deal with the entire Finance Bill in four hours, and that other serious measures—on disability discrimination, international organisations or whatever—are to be agreed to in one hour for each. In all reasonableness, that cannot permit any degree of proper parliamentary scrutiny. In what we are told are exceptional and unusual circumstances—although I worry about that—the Government are saying, "Trust me. We the leadership have agreed that this will be the case and the rest of you are expected to fall into place." I have to say that looking around the Chamber it looks as though that is highly likely to happen, but we should be worried about it. It is yet another indication of the extent to which the proceedings of this House have been downgraded that we are being asked to sign up to the motion with a smile.

[Mr. Forth]

Of course, everybody's thoughts are on the upcoming election. That is perfectly natural. But it should not mean that we legislate in such a way that we eliminate all possibility of parliamentary scrutiny, with one great exception—the saving of our constitution and our parliamentary process; thank goodness for it—the House of Lords is still not controlled by the Government. Their timetable is still theirs to control. The Government still do not have a majority in the House of Lords.

As a Member of this House for some time, and someone who loves this place and is happy to spend much of my time here, it saddens me to acknowledge that in the motion we are surrendering our role in the legislative process and expecting our colleagues in the House of Lords to do the real work of scrutiny. That has been the reality for some time. It continues to be the reality and the motion reflects that; in fact, it sets it out in words simple to understand.

Mr. Bercow: My right hon. Friend is consistent on these things. Surely, the essence of the matter is ministerial self-importance. Does he agree that the problem is that Ministers are very important, very senior, very respected, very influential, very busy, with very many commitments and very full diaries, so they think that it is a bit undignified to have to find the time to come to the House to explain and justify their legislative measures?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend reflects all too well the current "modern" attitude of the Government and their Ministers to the parliamentary process and to the House of Commons. It comes from the top of course. The Prime Minister has never had any time for the parliamentary process and, sadly, shows that repeatedly.

Mr. Heald: I do not entirely agree with my right hon. Friend about the motion—in fact, I do not agree with him at all—but on the general point that there is far too much programming and not enough time for scrutiny, has he seen early-day motion 945, which points out that about 40 per cent. of the groups of amendments tabled on Report this Session have not been debated because of severe guillotining?

Mr. Forth: Sadly, I neither read nor sign early-day motions because I think that they are parliamentary graffiti of the worst and most useless kind, but if my hon. Friend tells me that there is something of value in that early-day motion, I am half inclined to believe him.

Although my hon. Friends keep tempting me and it feels more and more like the good old days, I will soon conclude, but before I do so, I simply want to tell colleagues that I really hope that in the next Parliament—if I have the honour of being returned to it—we will be prepared to look again at what we have done to our House as part of the legislative process, how we have diminished our role and how we have increasingly to rely, ironically, on the unelected, appointed House of Lords to do the real parliamentary work, while we are increasingly expected to act as legislative rubber stamps. The motion reflects that as well as anything that I have seen recently. I regret that, and I wish we did not have to act in that manner.

Mr. Hain: I am grateful to the shadow Leader of the House for his opening remarks.

Discussions are still continuing on the Inquiries Bill, but I understand that the major issue at stake is the Prime Minister's ability to maintain control over his Government, whom he appoints and Ministers' conduct and behaviour. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will understand, on reflection, that if he were in my position and the Leader of the Opposition were in the Prime Minister's position, they would take exactly the same view. The good conduct of government is the issue at stake.

As I said yesterday, I pay tribute to the long parliamentary career of the Liberal Democrat shadow Leader of the House. He is a brilliant parliamentarian, as well as a good colleague, despite the party differences, and I wish him all the best in the future. He was indeed very brief, but he is not someone to spin out his points.

Given the long parliamentary experience of my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), I agree with the generous tribute that she paid to the staff. She reminded us of their crucial role. I particularly welcome her reference to the catering staff, who are sometimes called on to perform their duties at very short notice and have their hours extended at short notice. They do so with good fortitude and good cheer, and we are indebted to them.

The same is true of the Doorkeepers, to whom I pay special tribute. Indeed, my only quarrel with them is our serious arguments about rugby—they do not appreciate the value of the Welsh rugby team enough for my liking, although, with the grand slam that we accomplished, they acknowledged, to be generous, the expertise and brilliance of that performance.

I also pay tribute to work of the new Serjeant at Arms, who has settled into his job very well, as has the new security co-ordinator.

Finally, in response to the points made by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), I would feel bereft if he had not got up to make them, and he does so with great honour and determination. I was interested to research a previous occasion just before the last general election when one of my predecessors, my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Margaret Beckett), now the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, had an exchange with the right hon. Gentleman in which she pointed out that this wash-up period procedure goes on at the end of all Parliaments and has done so for decades. Indeed, when he was an Education Minister, his own Bill was taken through at great speed in exactly the same way. He did not seem to object to that process then, and I wonder whether he should be objecting now.

Mr. Bercow: I very much wish to echo the tributes that the Leader of the House has paid to the staff of the House. I cannot resist making an effort to elicit from him a statement in his own words that the Government are withdrawing the Identity Cards Bill. Will he please tell us that that is the case? Perhaps he will admit that he is secretly rather delighted that that obnoxious Bill is being withdrawn because, as he has a long track record as a civil libertarian, he cannot seriously believe in that nonsense.

Mr. Hain: It is not the place to discuss the merits of the Identity Cards Bill, about which I have an honest disagreement with the hon. Gentleman. I am a long-standing civil libertarian and proud of it, and remain so, but I honestly think that the Identity Cards Bill is a common-sense measure in an age when we must supply photographic proof of identity to take an internal flight in Britain. Increasingly, we must come up with the kind of identification to travel abroad that the new identity card will provide on our passports, driving licences and so on. It is a common-sense measure and, no, we have not withdrawn it; we could not get the Opposition's agreement to allow it through, as other Bills have gone through, so it will fall, but it will do so as a result of the express opposition of the Liberal Democrats and Conservatives, who did not give it the passage that it needed and should have had in the interests of security and the safety of all our citizens. I regret that very much.

Mr. Heald: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hain: I am sorry, but I will not give way.

I am sorry to disagree on that point with the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) because he is an effective parliamentarian in every other respect. I admire him greatly, but I do not want to diminish the prospects for his future career by adding to that in any way.

Question put and agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Ordered,

That, of the Resolutions of the 22nd day of March last, the following be read—

(a) Nos. 1 to 6, 11 to 17, 22 to 27, 30, 43, 47, 48, 50 to 53, 56 and 58;

(b) Procedure (Lorry Road-User Charge);

(c) paragraphs (a), (e) and (f) of Procedure (Future Taxation); and

(d) paragraph (b) of Finance (Money).

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the said resolutions: And that the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Secretary Darling, Mr. Secretary Reid, Ms Secretary Hewitt, Mr. Secretary Johnson, Secretary Ruth Kelly, Mr. Paul Boateng, Dawn Primarolo, Mr. Stephen Timms and John Healey do prepare and bring it in.

FINANCE (NO. 2) BILL

Mr. Stephen Timms accordingly presented a Bill to grant certain duties, to alter other duties and to amend the law relating to the national debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance: And the same was read the First time and ordered to be read a Second time and to be printed [Bill 104].

Finance (No. 2) Bill

[Relevant documents: oral and written evidence taken by the Treasury Committee on 21 and 22 March, HC 482-i and -ii, on the 2005 Budget.]

Order for Second Reading read.

1.7 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Paul Boateng): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This is a somewhat shortened version of the Finance Bill. Owing to the Dissolution of Parliament, it now contains some 106 clauses, compared with the original 172 presented to the House. However, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor outlined in the Budget statement what we will be doing to maintain British stability and growth in the face of a future of intense global competition and the Bill continues to reflect our determination to meet those challenges and to maintain stability, promote fairness and maximise the opportunities for our nation both now and in the future.

For a tax system to be effective, everyone must pay their fair share of taxes and receive the credits that they are entitled to and that is why the Government have already published proposals to prevent the avoidance of tax on capital gains by people using options to sell or buy assets at uncommercial prices and to close a loophole in the controlled foreign company—or CFC—rules that are designed to prevent UK multinationals from diverting profits to low-tax regimes.

We have set out legislation to close arrangements that seek to avoid or reduce income tax and national insurance contributions on remuneration by using employment-related securities. As outlined in the pre-Budget report, we have published proposals to remove annuities and other annual payments from the types of payment treated as charges on income.

The Government are also committed to closing a number of marketed avoidance schemes that involve financial products that have been disclosed under the rules introduced in the Finance Act 2004, and as announced in the Budget, to legislating to counter the exploitation by companies of differences within and between tax codes to get a UK tax advantage.

The Government believe that these measures and others that were included in the original Finance Bill presented to the House are essential for an effective, principled, targeted and fair tax system. It is therefore our full intention to introduce a second Finance Bill after the election—should it be the wish of the British people—in which the measures not included in this revised version will be brought back. We will, of course, aim to ensure that the statutory dates for these measures will continue to apply, as announced in the Budget.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The Chief Secretary has just referred to people receiving the tax credits to which they are entitled. What assurances can he give that every effort will be made to resolving the mounting tide of problems faced by people with payable tax credits and overpayments, particularly during the course of the election campaign when Members of Parliament will clearly not be in the position that they were to argue the case for their constituents? In my case, it is a rising tide of human misery that does not appear to be being solved.

[Mr. Michael Jack]

Mr. Boateng: The right hon. Gentleman is, uncharacteristically, indulging in pre-election hyperbole and has gone over the top. He knows that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General takes any concerns about the tax credit system and its efficient working very seriously. I assure him that the measures are in place that will continue to ensure that the Inland Revenue and those responsible for this issue respond efficiently and effectively in the way that they normally do.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Boateng: I am fond of the hon. Gentleman, but I want to make some headway. I will then, of course, give way. I am sure that he has something interesting to say.

In the meantime, the Bill introduces anti-avoidance measures in clauses 85 and 87 to 91 that seek to prevent avoidance when there are contrived claims of artificially high double tax relief—claims that are made against United Kingdom profits in order to minimise tax liability in the UK.

Alongside that, clauses 59 to 79 will introduce anti-avoidance legislation for film relief. The targeted aim of these measures is to remove opportunities for abusing film tax reliefs and to put matters beyond doubt for the industry in future. That should be seen against the important role that Britain's creative industries now play, comprising 8 per cent. of our national income. To reflect that, clause 58 will temporarily extend existing relief for limited budget films. It provides for the existing relief to continue to apply for films on which principal photography commences before 1 April 2006, so long as they are completed on or before 31 December 2006.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Boateng: I must first give way to the hon. Member for Aylesbury.

Mr. Bercow: Or even for Buckingham.

Given the importance of clause 21(8) on research institution spin-out companies, can the right hon. Gentleman explain why that very important provision is not subject to the affirmative procedure of the House?

Mr. Boateng: I am glad that the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) raises that point. If he restrains his characteristic exuberance, he will hear me come to that provision in the fullness of time.

Mr. Prisk rose—

Mr. Boateng: If I can make a little headway, I will of course give to the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that he also has interesting points to make.

These measures reflect the Government's ongoing determination to ensure that our tax system is fair and competitive. Just last September, the World Bank ranked the UK first in Europe and seventh of the top 20 countries to conduct business in. In January 2004, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development ranked our economic and administrative regulations as being among the lowest in the OECD. I therefore hope that Members on both sides of this House will surely recognise the need to introduce measures now that enable Britain to maintain that position within the global economy.

Faced with an accelerating pace of technological change and a rapid expansion of global competition, our economic future should not be founded upon low-skill, low-tech enterprise. It depends, instead, on establishing British leadership in skills, science and the knowledge economy, as the hon. Member for Buckingham recognises. After all, developing countries are on course to produce half the world's manufacturing exports and we need to ensure that ours is an added-value economy.

Britain now has one of the most open competition policies in the world and we are the most effective and active advocate of free trade. Today, the enterprise challenge is to enhance the flexibility needed for a successful economy and tackle the regulatory concerns that all industrial economies face while securing the standards required in a successful society.

Mr. Prisk: The Chief Secretary talks about the enterprise challenge. Is he aware of the rising tide of concern among those in the film industry that this is the third Finance Bill in three years that changes the way in which the industry is regulated? They believe that that creates serious disadvantages in locating films in this country. Why did the Government not get it right first time?

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. Indeed, we miss his contributions from the Opposition Front Bench to our debates on the economy. I hope that those who currently occupy that Bench will reflect on the contribution that he might make to a future Opposition Front-Bench team.

I know that the hon. Gentleman takes an interest in the film industry and I would have expected him to recognise the way in which we have listened to the industry and sought to work with it in identifying effectively and in a focused way the undoubted abuse of the system that was taking place and in responding to it. I hope that there is support on both sides of the House for the British film industry. I well remember when I was shadow Economic Secretary, sitting on the Opposition Benches—[Interruption.] I did enjoy those days. Both sides of the House then made common cause on recognising that the film industry needed the support that we are endeavouring to give it. However, we have to be vigilant against the sort of abuse that was undoubtedly taking place.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Prisk rose—

Mr. Boateng: I will make more headway before I consider giving way to Opposition Members who have points to make.

Enhancing flexibility, tackling regulation and ensuring competitiveness inform the detail of this Bill and I will now turn to those matters. Clauses 10 to 13 mean that, this year, rates of capital gains tax and corporation tax will remain frozen, maintaining the 0 per cent. starting rate of corporation tax for small companies. Clause 144 brings the time-limited stamp duty relief in disadvantaged areas to an end as the new, better targeted local enterprise growth initiative drives forward local business-led regeneration, providing local authorities with the resources and flexibility to target the long-term issues that will promote enterprise in the most deprived areas.

Clauses 20 to 22 will help counteract a tax uncertainty that has proved to be a stumbling block—here, I turn to the point made by the hon. Member for Buckingham—in forming university spin-out companies. This will provide rules that will apply to researchers who acquire shares in spin-out companies created with research institutions to develop intellectual property. The rules ignore the effect on a researcher's shares of the transfer of intellectual property into that company. They will also remove the consequent up-front tax and national insurance contribution charge.

Mr. Jack: On a point of clarification, did the Chief Secretary refer to clause 144? My copy of the Bill stops at clause 106.

Mr. Boateng: I do not recall mentioning that clause, but if I did, it was certainly in error. The clause that I referred to brings the time-limited stamp duty relief in disadvantaged areas to an end as the new better targeted local enterprise growth initiative drives forward local business-led regeneration.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con) rose—

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Boateng: I will make more headway before I give way again.

Mr. Dorrell rose—

Mr. Boateng: I will give way in a moment, because I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman has something interesting to say.

The Bill also sets out key steps to ensuring that our country is prepared for the challenges of the future. For example, it is important that young people—first-time buyers—can have access to the housing market. I know that all of us are concerned about that in one way or another. Therefore, the clauses that double the zero-rate threshold for stamp duty land tax—from £60,000 to £120,000—will be particularly welcome. That means that a purchaser of a residential property who completes a purchase on or after 17 March 2005 will not pay stamp duty land tax if the purchase price is £120,000 or less.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): Will the Chief Secretary tell us his estimate of the overall effect on the yield of the measures on stamp duty in the Bill?

Mr. Boateng: We have had this discussion in the past. The hon. Gentleman knows that, as a result of the amendments that we have made, there is an increase in the yield. That is clear in the Red Book and we have never made any pretence otherwise, but we have focused and targeted the relief better. We have ensured that we are assisting first-time buyers. Doubling the threshold means that some 50 per cent. of first-time buyers will not pay stamp duty, and that must be welcomed by all.

Mr. Dorrell: Will the Chief Secretary confirm for absolute clarity that, contrary to the impression that the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave in his Budget speech, the benefit of raising the threshold from £60,000 to £120,000 is more than paid for by withdrawing the relief that had the purpose of encouraging non-residential development in deprived areas? That is the effect of the package of measures on stamp duty land tax that the Government have introduced.

Mr. Boateng: We have focused relief where it can do the most good. I should have thought that everyone would welcome that. I do not recognise the presentation of the Budget that the right hon. Gentleman describes. The combined effect of the Budget measures is that revenues from residential property transactions are forecast to fall by £220 million and revenues from commercial property transactions are forecast to rise by £580 million. We have always made that absolutely clear. It has always been clear in the Red Book for all to see. It was always crystal clear in the extensive debates and discussions that my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Paymaster General, my hon. Friends the Financial Secretary and the Economic Secretary and I held with Opposition Members in the immediate aftermath of the Budget.

I always enjoy the contributions of the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) because he has extensive knowledge and experience of government. However, it is rich for him to now play the innocent—the shocked maiden—in such a way about the presentation of these matters. I do not think that he can expect us to take his complaints seriously.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Prisk rose—

Mr. Boateng: I am going to make more progress before once again giving way to Conservative Members.

Mr. Jack: But my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) knows about this.

Mr. Boateng: I am sure that the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) does know about the matter, so it is a pity that he will not be sharing his knowledge with the House from the Front Bench, if he knows so much about it. Several of us who watch such things closely certainly have the view that he deserves to be there.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Boateng: With the indulgence of the House, I wish to proceed before I give way again. The Finance Bill—

Mr. Bercow: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chief Secretary has said that he is not giving way at the moment—perhaps he will later.

Mr. Boateng: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Bill sets out the key steps necessary to ensure that our country is prepared for the challenges of the future. For example, it is important for us to use the Bill to build on the progress that we have made on home ownership, which has been not only referred to extensively by ourselves, but recognised by others. As I have said, it will exempt an additional 300,000 buyers each year and more than 50 per cent. of first-time buyers. In regional terms, it will exempt approximately 70 per cent. of buyers in the north and throughout Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, and more than 50 per cent. of buyers in the midlands.

Clause 98 focuses on the inheritance tax threshold for each of the next three tax years, with increases above indexation. It sets out the inheritance tax threshold at £275,000 for 2005–06, £285,000 for 2006–07 and £300,000 for 2007-08. It also ensures that 95 per cent. of estates remain tax free, which is something that we must all bear in mind.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Prisk rose—

Mr. Boateng: I shall now give way to the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford.

Mr. Prisk: I am grateful to the Chief Secretary for finally giving way. He mentioned 95 per cent. of estates, but may I return to stamp duty? In the light of his impending house move, will he confirm that in the borough of Brent only 4 per cent. of first-time buyers will benefit from the measures, so 96 per cent. will not?

Mr. Boateng: I do not have the figures for Brent, but I fancy that they will be available to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary by the end of the debate. I am sure that he will provide a characteristically robust response to the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Bercow: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Boateng: No, not at the moment. I intend to make a little more headway before giving way to the hon. Gentleman.

It is important that we protect and support our older citizens, which is why clause 9 is specifically designed to help to reduce pensioner poverty. It will increase age-related personal allowances for those aged over 65 in line with earnings and ensure that more than half of pensioners do not have to pay income tax. In practice, that will mean that for those aged 65 to 74, the allowance will be increased to £7,090. The allowance for those aged 75 and over will be increased to £7,220.

In the Finance Act 2004 we legislated for a radical simplification of the tax rules for pensions. From April 2006, the numerous existing regimes, each with its own set of rules, will be replaced by a single, universal regime for tax-privileged pensions savings. It is important to remember that clause 101 introduces a package of supplementary measures to refine the 2004 Act. The measures will provide additional flexibility for schemes and individuals and allow a smoother transition from the current regime to the new one.

Mr. Tyrie: rose—

Mr. Boateng: I shall give way first to the hon. Member for Buckingham and then, of course, to the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman.

Mr. Bercow: It is always a pleasure to listen to the Chief Secretary's mellifluous tones—this might be the last time on which we have the opportunity to do so. However, although this might be his last appearance before the House, I would still like to be reassured that he is master of his subject. Given that he glossed rather superficially and inappropriately over clauses 20 to 22, and thus broke his promise to deal with my specific inquiry, will he now tell me why clause 21(8), on research institution spin-out companies, is not subject to the affirmative procedure of the House? That is a straightforward question and I want a straightforward answer.

Mr. Prisk: Why not write to my hon. Friend?

Mr. Boateng: I do not need much temptation to go into detail, but I understood that my brief for this afternoon was to resist temptation. I find the blandishments of the hon. Member for Buckingham absolutely irresistible. What concerns me is why he would favour the affirmative resolution procedure—[Interruption.] Let me finish my point. What concerns me is why he prefers the affirmative resolution procedure to the procedure that we have adopted, which enables us to have this debate. It meets the concerns and the substantive points made to us by academia and those engaged in spin-outs. If he sees a particular advantage in the affirmative resolution procedure, I am sure that the House would be glad to hear what it is.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Boateng: I shall give way in a moment.

It seems to us that the proposed changes, on which we have exte[illegible]y canvassed the sector, have been widely welcom[illegible]e received more than 45 responses to the cons[illegible]ollowing publication of the technical note[illegible]partial regulatory impact assessment at the [illegible] report stage. UNICO, which the hon. Gen[illegible]knows is the University Companies Assoc[illegible], says that feedback to the draft legislation, which we published as long ago as February this year, has been

"Overall, very positive" and people have found

"very little to complain about."

I fancy it did not take into account the seemingly infinite capacity of the hon. Gentleman to complain. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Oh yes, no more Mr. Nice Guy. I was only too happy to approach the debate in a non-partisan way and to be brief, but my patience has been tested.

Mr. Bercow: I congratulate the Chief Secretary on his appointment as British high commissioner in South Africa. He will do a fantastic job in that role, and I wish him well. Frankly, though, that was a ponderous and meandering response to a straightforward question. If he had just said that he did not know the difference between negative and affirmative procedure, the House would have been greatly obliged. The affirmative procedure maximises ministerial accountability to Parliament and the negative procedure minimises it. It could hardly be clearer.

Mr. Boateng: If my memory serves me well, the hon. Gentleman and I have had this debate in relation to other clauses in the course of other Finance Bills discussed Upstairs. Those Conservative right hon. Members present who have had to do what my right hon. and hon. Friends have had to do in Committee know very well that it is to assist the ministerial conduct of business that one prefers the negative to the affirmative. In due course, 20 or 25 years hence, it is possible that the hon. Gentleman might discover why Ministers tend to prefer the negative to the affirmative.

Mr. Dorrell: Will the Chief Secretary confirm that he once appreciated the force of the argument that my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) advances, not least when the right hon. Gentleman advanced exactly that argument from the Opposition Benches? Does he recall the precise Damascene moment when he was converted to the view always taken by the Treasury Bench?

Mr. Boateng: It was in May 1997. Hands up; it's a fair cop, guv. We all know the reason for that, and there is widespread acceptance on both sides of the House that that is the best way to proceed in the circumstances.

We want to build on the steps taken in successive Finance Bills, which is why clause 101 introduces a package of supplementary measures to refine the 2004 legislation. The measures will provide additional flexibility for schemes and individuals, and smooth the transition from the current regime to the new regime. Moreover, the Pensions Act 2004 legislated for the pension protection fund, which comes into being today. Clauses ensure that the PPF has the same tax privileges as the pension schemes that it protects, but to make our tax system fairer, we must also ensure that it applies equally to all. That is why these clauses are designed to introduce changes to income tax, corporation tax and capital gains tax rules relating to alternative finance arrangements that do not involve either payment or receipt of interest, including those that are designed to be Sharia compliant.

Mr. Tyrie: While the Chief Secretary is on the subject of pensioner poverty and measures to deal with pensioners, will he explain why the Government have decided to give a £200 relief for council tax to pensioners for one year only? Will he also explain why the fact that it was for one year only was dropped from the Chancellor's Budget speech?

Mr. Boateng: I do not want to engage in retrospective analysis of the Budget presentation. We made the position clear at the time. [Interruption.] I and all my colleagues made it clear that we were trying to respond to the concerns of pensioners. We introduced the Lyons review to enable us to arrive at a position in which the issues are seen within the context of local government finance overall and the undoubted need for reform, which we have recognised in relation to council tax.

I do not want to get drawn down that road, but if the hon. Gentleman tempts me, I will. We all know that the council tax arose out of the poll tax debacle. We all know that the origins of the poll tax lay with the Conservative party and in particular—I know this because I was in the House at the time—with the contribution to local government finance made by the Leader of the Opposition. We do not want to return to those days because we know what it would mean for local government finance and pensioners, as it would increase pensioner poverty.

Mr. Tyrie: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Boateng: No, I am afraid not. I want to make headway because I have a responsibility to the House to get through today's business so that we give the Bill the proper scrutiny that it deserves.

When two people enter a civil partnership, they make a responsible commitment to each other. Our policy is that civil partners should be entitled to the same legal rights and responsibilities as spouses. This means that our tax system should, where possible, adapt to reflect the changes in society that brought civil partnerships into being. Last December, the Civil Partnership Act 2004 received Royal Assent. It provides a new legal framework that enables recognition of same-sex relationships through the new status of civil partnership. Same-sex couples across the UK will be able to form a civil partnership. That is reflected in the relevant clause, as it provides powers to ensure that civil partners are treated the same as married couples, both for tax purposes and to ensure that tax legislation is compatible with the Human Rights Act 1998.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Will the Minister remind the House of the reason for excluding from those tax benefits or tax reliefs couples who may have lived together for 30 or 40 years, such as siblings, a child and an elderly parent or, for that matter, a very close householder and housekeeper?

Mr. Boateng: We had a full discussion on that when the House was coming to a view on civil partnerships. I know and respect the hon. Gentleman's views on the issue, although I do not share them. I believe that the House came to the right conclusion on how to reflect societal change in the Civil Partnerships Act and the provisions of the Finance Bill.

The immense contribution made by our armed forces, who serve our country so well in peace and in war, is reflected in the clause that will ensure that lump sum awards paid to servicemen and women injured in the line of duty are tax free, whether paid to a serving member of the armed forces or to a person who has left the service. The provision amends the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003 to ensure that benefits payable under the Armed Forces (Pensions and Compensation) Act 2004 are treated in the same way for tax as the equivalent benefits payable under the armed forces pension scheme. The new lump sum in-service injury awards will be exempted by the clause—a measure that I know has the support, which it warrants, of all hon. Members.

[Mr. Boateng]

The measures and others like them help to modernise the tax system. They will enable a fairer society to emerge and reflect the new challenges arising from that changing society. Britain also faces new and evolving environmental challenges, in respect of which we have an obligation to future generations. We have therefore provided for the standard rate of landfill tax to increase as part of a principled national policy to reduce the volumes of waste sent to landfill and to encourage more environmentally friendly alternatives. Building on the changes to vehicle excise duty made in 2003 that reflect vehicle carbon emissions, the Bill provides for an increase in VED rates only for the two highest carbon dioxide bands; the four least-polluting carbon dioxide bands will remain frozen.

The Budget lays down measures that will enable our country to respond to and meet the challenges of our changing society in the global economy. The Finance Bill enacts measures to which the House has already agreed in principle. I commend it to the House.

1.42 pm

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): We all enjoyed listening to the would-be high commissioner in what I suppose is his last appearance in the Commons. I am sorry that more of his hon. Friends did not turn up to listen to him, but we Opposition Members enjoyed his speech. In the past few weeks, the right hon. Gentleman has been showered with tributes every time that he has appeared at the Dispatch Box—he has had more farewells than Frank Sinatra, which is appropriate, given that the Cabinet he is leaving is the biggest rat pack of them all. Like any good swan-song, his speech was somewhat theatrical and overblown—true to form for the right hon. Gentleman—but during his 18 years in Parliament no one has ever accused him of being a shrinking violet. I have certainly enjoyed shadowing him in recent months. He has always been courteous and I wish him well in the future—when I suspect he will join many other Labour MPs in the swelling ranks of the economically inactive.

It is a shame that we do not have more time to examine what remains after the extensive deletions on which we insisted of a complex piece of financial legislation. Four hours is wholly inadequate to debate, scrutinise and pass 106 clauses. In 1992, when the Conservative Government called an election immediately after the Budget, the Finance Bill presented to the House was a mere 11 clauses long, those 11 being the essential and wholly uncontroversial revenue-raising clauses that are required each year. Four hours was provided to debate those 11 clauses; even so, the then shadow Chief Secretary, now Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, proclaimed that it was a constitutional outrage, saying that "Four hours for all the stages of a Finance Bill from start to finish ... is a most extraordinary precedent ... due not to accident or misfortune but to the sheer incompetence and mismanagement of the Government".

Given that he attended that debate and, judging by the Hansard report, got very over-excited during the proceedings, the putative high commissioner must remember the comment made by the present Chancellor's chief lieutenant, the right hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown), that allowing four hours for a Finance Bill was

"a fundamentally undemocratic way to proceed ... That shows a complete contempt for the democratic process."—[Official Report, 13 March 1992; Vol. 205, c. 1141–52.]

Thirteen years later, we have before us a Labour Finance Bill of 106 clauses, not 11, which is also to be rushed through in four hours. Times have changed and so have the cherished principles of the Labour party.

Although more debate would have been welcomed today, it is fair to say that there is not much in the Bill to which we object. It contains the clauses that set out the various tax and duty rates that are required to maintain the flow of revenue to the Exchequer. We, of course, will reduce that revenue flow by £4 billion when we present our Budget and Finance Bill in two months' time. The Bill also contains more complex provisions that, although they deserve fuller scrutiny, are broadly welcome: they have been consulted on and we felt that it would be wrong to remove them from the Bill.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): The point is not whether we in the House object to any of the clauses, but that they will not be exposed to scrutiny and proper deliberation by those outside the House, who may well have views—indeed, some have sent us representations on certain clauses. The travesty of taking more than 100 clauses in four hours means that many items will pass on to the statute book without having been subjected to the proper deliberative scrutiny that they should have and would have received in a Committee.

Mr. Osborne: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. My approach to the washing-up negotiations with the Chief Secretary was to concentrate on removing those clauses on which there had been no consultation with outside bodies and ensuring that those that remained were those on which there had been at least some consultation. I readily accept that that is no substitute for adequate parliamentary scrutiny, going through the Bill in proper detail and at length in Committee—

Mr. Fallon: So why are we allowing it?

Mr. Osborne: Because the negotiations took part as part of the washing-up process covering every piece of legislation that we will discuss today and in the next couple of days. We have let certain provisions through, and I shall explain why.

We have let through the new regime for trusts for vulnerable people, which has been consulted on, which all the disability charities broadly welcome and which we support. We have agreed to the alternative finance arrangements to ensure that people whose religious beliefs forbid them from receiving or paying interest—such as those who adhere to Sharia law—are not discriminated against by the tax system. We think that is fair.

The Chief Secretary unfairly implied that my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) had been dismissed from the Front Bench; in fact, he is an Opposition Whip but he is using his experience to speak in today's debate from the Back Benches. My hon. Friend said that the clauses on film tax relief continue the sorry tale of the Government's increasingly convoluted attempts to give tax breaks to film production without creating huge tax loopholes—a tale of how not to write tax law. As I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) agrees, we should consider those clauses in much greater detail, but in the past two days we have received strong representations from the film industry expressing its wish that the relief be extended past July, when it is due to run out. The industry felt that the confusion and chaos caused by the changes that the Government have made in the past couple of years would be increased if the measures were not included in the Bill. Having listened to the representations made by the film industry and by MPs representing film production companies, we are prepared to allow the clauses to pass to enable the extension of the tax relief beyond July.

Mr. Jack: Can my hon. Friend give me an assurance that when he introduces his first Finance Bill and takes part in the first Conservative Budget after 5 May he will carry out a proper evaluation of the help that has been given to the film industry? Because of the difficulties encountered by the Government it is genuinely difficult to see the wood for the trees, and I would be grateful for an assurance that those reliefs have benefited the British film industry.

Mr. Osborne: My right hon. Friend is right to be sceptical. It is our view, and indeed it is the view of the industry, which has undertaken a review of these issues, that we should move from a tax relief on production to one on the distribution of British films. As I said, the film industry was particularly concerned about the uncertainty caused by the expiry of the relief in July, and made strong representations. Some of my hon. Friends have made strong representations to me on behalf of the film production companies in their constituencies—obviously the film business did a good job—and we are prepared to accept the relevant provisions.

The new schedule on the taxation of pensions includes some sensible provisions, many of which are amendments that I tabled in Committee to the previous Finance Bill. They were rejected then by the Government, but I am glad that with the passage of time and a bit of wisdom the Treasury has accepted that I made a great deal of sense. Last June was therefore not entirely wasted. The Chief Secretary mentioned the clause that ensures that homosexual civil partners are treated the same as married couples for tax purposes. Personally, I support civil partnerships for gay people, and I support the clause. That may help to increase my score of 57 per cent. on Stonewall's score chart of MPs' record on gay equality issues, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) is always teasing me. We very much welcome clause 19, which is a sensible provision on the payment of armed forces pensions.

Those clauses are broadly welcome, but doubtless they could have been improved by proper parliamentary scrutiny. On balance, however, we should allow them to pass into law. However, we could not allow to pass into law without any examination the dozens of clauses and hundreds of pages of complex tax legislation, which the Government said were necessary to counter tax avoidance and which appeared in the initial Finance Bill that was published just a couple of weeks ago. We agree with the Government about the need to tackle tax avoidance and we agree on principle with the many measures that they have introduced to close tax loopholes. However, the detail of such measures requires the closest possible examination, to ensure that we do not inadvertently damage the competitiveness of UK industry and further increase burdens on business. Indeed, many anti-tax avoidance measures are retrospective, as they would come into force on the day on which they were announced. There would therefore be no revenue implications if we considered them after the election in a Conservative Finance Bill or, in the unlikely event that Labour wins, a Labour one.

The initial Finance Bill that was published a couple of weeks ago included novel and questionable clauses on tax arbitrage that the CBI and many others fear could seriously reduce the appeal of Britain as a place in which to do business and attract inward investment. Given that inward investment has already fallen under the Government, we should pay heed to such warnings and subject the clauses on tax arbitrage to rigorous scrutiny. Indeed, many people in the industry who approached us, including the Institute of Chartered Accountants, thought that they would be ruled illegal. Given the problems that the Treasury has had at the European Court, I would expect it to look at those provisions more closely. It was never going to be possible to rush through the tax arbitrage clauses in a pre-election period, and it was wrong of the Government even to suggest that they were going to do so. The Chief Secretary described those clauses to me as the flagship of the Finance Bill. Unfortunately for him, like the Mary Rose, his flagship has been sunk, and we must wait to see what happens when it is raised.

Similarly, the Association of British Insurers voiced "very considerable concern" on behalf of the insurance industry about the Inland Revenue's plans to give itself powers to alter the key areas of taxation of life insurance by regulation instead of primary legislation—something in which my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) takes a particular interest. I am glad to assure him and others that we have put a stop to those provisions and to schedule 13 of the old Bill, which was causing considerable alarm in financial circles. The Government's initial aim to ram through all those complex tax changes without any scrutiny or consultation rightly caused indignation and outrage in the financial services and business community. The Institute of Chartered Accountants wrote to the Paymaster General on 31 March to say that "we are strongly of the view that if the provisions in the Finance Bill are not subject to appropriate Parliamentary scrutiny then this will be to the detriment of UK business and will undermine confidence and trust in the Parliamentary process".

We agree. Thanks to our actions, the most controversial and complex provisions will now be subject to appropriate parliamentary scrutiny before they are introduced, and trust and confidence in the parliamentary process has been sustained.

Returning to the Finance (No. 2) Bill before us today—as opposed to the provisions that we have pushed out over the past couple of days—it includes welcome moves on tax, which the Chancellor trumpeted on Budget day, including finally raising the stamp duty and inheritance tax thresholds to take account of the growth of house prices over the past decade, although the Chief Secretary is unaware that that will have little impact in his own constituency. The Chancellor did not mention in his Budget speech—and the Chief Secretary did not mention it today—that the small tax cuts about which he boasted at the Dispatch Box are more than cancelled out by the stealthy tax increases buried in the detail of the Red Book, or, in the Chief Secretary's case, given his answers today, perhaps we should call it the unread book.

[Mr. Osborne]

Mr. Prisk: Unless I misheard the Chief Secretary, he suggested that there was a £500 million change in disadvantaged areas. Is my hon. Friend aware that the correct figure is a £340 million differential? Is he as concerned as I am that the Chief Secretary is not even aware of how much additional revenue he plans to take?

Mr. Osborne: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I think that he is referring to table 1.2 on page 12 of the Red Book, which shows that the initial impact of ending stamp duty land tax relief in disadvantaged areas will cost £340 million. As I said, in the Chief Secretary's case, it appears to be the unread book.

As always with the Government, it is not what they say that is real story but what they do. In the Budget, what the Chancellor "gave with one hand he took away with the other".

Those are not my words, but the words of the much respected independent Institute for Fiscal Studies. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) reminded us, raising the stamp duty threshold from £60,000 to £120,000 in clause 95—a long overdue but none the less welcome measure—is more than cancelled out by clause 96, which removes stamp duty land tax relief for disadvantaged areas. The Chief Secretary has not given us a good explanation of why he is ending that much trumpeted relief for disadvantaged areas. He said that he would replace it with another scheme, but it is worth only £300 million over three years, which is considerably less than the £340 million in the first year—and I think that the figure will rise—that is taken away by the ending of that relief for disadvantaged areas.

The Chancellor said, as though it were a mere technicality, that he was "aligning the timing of oil companies' corporation tax payments more closely with petroleum revenue tax."—[Official Report, 16 March 2005; Vol. 432, c. 264.]

Who would have guessed that what he really meant was a £1.1 billion windfall tax on the oil industry? The oil industry, I suspect, has learned to live with that tax, but pensioners will be dismayed to discover, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) reminded us, that the £200 payment that the Chancellor flourished as an answer to his soaring council taxes is a one-off. Page 12 of the Red Book makes that clear, even if the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary have not done so.

Unlike every other measure in the Budget, the £200 payout to pensioners is for this election year only, whereas the hikes in council tax will go on year after year if Labour is re-elected. What a cynical pre-election manoeuvre from a Government who have lost any sense of fair play. What a contrast to the sustained year on year on year council tax discount that we are offering, which will be worth up to £500 for millions of pensioners. What a classic example from this vote now, pay later Budget.

There is a secret tax-and-spend agenda in this election. It just happens to be the Labour party's: a secret agenda to try to conceal from voters the massive tax rises that Labour needs to pay for its spending plans. Even after 66 tax increases on hard-working families, the Government have managed to create a black hole in the public finances. The Chancellor admitted as much when he was forced to concede that the current deficit is £5 billion higher than he forecast last year, and that he will borrow £168 billion over the next five years—more in each year than he forecast even 12 months ago.

It is not just our view that there is a black hole. It is the view of almost every single independent organisation and economic commentator. They are clearly thinking what we are thinking. The International Monetary Fund is thinking what we are thinking when it says that Britain's national accounts have in other words, from the moment that the Labour Government ceased to follow the previous Conservative Government's spending plans. The Institute for Fiscal Studies is thinking what we are thinking when it says that taxes will have to go up £11 billion a year after the election to pay for Labour's spending.

"deteriorated sharply over the last five years"—

The question for Labour in the election, and for the Chief Secretary, either now or as we encounter each other in the television studios over the next couple of weeks, as we will no doubt do, unless he is already off to his posting and being measured up for his high commissioner's outfit—the ostrich feathers and all that—is not whether taxes will go up, but which taxes Labour will increase in future Finance Bills. Will it be capital gains tax on homes, or council taxes, pushing bills towards the £2,000 mark, or national insurance—Labour's tax of choice? To raise the £11 billion in taxes that the IFS says the Government need, national insurance will have to go up 3p in the pound. That is £1,000 more a year in taxes for a typical hard-working couple.

Before the last election, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition reminded us earlier today, the Prime Minister said that reasonable people should not suppose that Labour would raise national insurance, then in the first Budget after the election he put it up. What does the Chief Secretary think reasonable people should suppose before this election about Labour's plans for national insurance? I am not sure whether he will have an opportunity later in the debate to answer the question, so perhaps the Financial Secretary will do so instead.

Taxes will go up if Labour is elected. That is the simple truth at the heart of the election—a truth that, as far as Labour is concerned, dare not speak its name. What will those taxes pay for? More waste, more bureaucracy, more bureaucrats—in other words, more of what we have seen for the past eight years. The Financial Secretary knows that all the money has been wasted, because he famously told us so. He said that

"we're going to have an election. . . when people will say 'we've paid a lot of taxes but what has really been achieved with all that money?' . . . Too often a lot of money has been spent. But very little seems to have been achieved".

What sound words from the Financial Secretary. He is right. A lot of money has been spent, but very little seems to have been achieved. After 66 tax rises and eight years of talk, average hospital waiting times are higher, cancelled operations are up, and more people die of hospital superbugs than die on Britain's roads every year. After 66 tax rises and eight years of talk, one in three 11-year-olds leaves school unable to write properly, and school truancy has risen by a third. After 66 tax rises and eight years of talk, crime has risen, violent crime has almost doubled and the detection rate has fallen.

Even on the economy, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer says he wants to put at the heart of the election campaign, after eight years of boasts and 66 tax rises, we have fallen from fourth to 11th in the world competitiveness league, our trade has gone from a surplus to a record deficit, a million manufacturing jobs have been lost, productivity growth is down by a third, as is the savings ratio, and now we discover that average take-home incomes for families have fallen for the first time in almost 15 years. Labour has taxed, wasted and failed, and hard-working families have paid the price.

So it will fall to the next Conservative Government to sort out the mess in the public finances and to deliver the lower taxes, cleaner hospitals, school discipline, controlled immigration and more police that the people of this country want to see. It will fall to the next Conservative Government to put public spending on an affordable path that avoids Labour's tax rises and delivers tax reductions for hard-working families. We will begin that task in our first Budget and our first Finance Bill in just two months' time.

2.5 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Much in the Finance Bill is uncontroversial. When the revenue clauses were put to the House a few weeks ago, I do not recall that there was more than one Division, and that was on a Scottish nationalist motion for which only four Members voted, so on the revenue provisions there has not been a great deal of controversy. As I understand it, the implication of the Bill is to tighten the economy by the grand total of 0.02 per cent. in terms of fiscal policy, so we are not talking about great changes in economic policy.

What remains for debate is the way in which the Government have treated some complex provisions. In the Budget debate we had a useful exchange about the stamp duty provisions, which brought out the fact that what sounded like an attractive idea—the idea of giving stamp duty relief on commercial property in disadvantaged areas—turned out not to have been thought through. I am disappointed that the Government have not produced a reasoned research paper of any kind to explain how we got to that point, what the consequences were, who benefited, and what will happen as a result of the local enterprise initiative, which I suspect will encounter the same problems as the previous tax relief. There has been a lack of reasoning and a lack of understanding about a rather complex policy.

We had argued for lifting the threshold for stamp duty and had calculated that it would be possible to lift it to £150,000, giving the scrapping of the disadvantaged area relief. In view of the revenue that the Government have saved through that measure, it is disappointing that they were not able to lift the threshold further. For most of us in the south of England, the provision is useless, but none the less welcome to the limited extent to which it is proceeding.

Mr. Tyrie: The spokesman for the Liberals has just created a black hole in a prospective Liberal Budget, not that there ever would be such a thing. He suggested that the money that the Government are raising on stamp duty should go back into stamp duty relief. Could he explain how he would fill that hole?

Dr. Cable: The commitment to increase the threshold for stamp duty to £150,000 will be in our manifesto. I have already said that publicly. There will be no black hole because it is fully costed. The manifesto with full costings will be published in 10 days, and will explain precisely how the cost is covered. We will not be proceeding with the Government's alternative local enterprise proposals. Our plans have all been fully costed, in contrast with the James initiative, on which I have commented frequently and about which doubts are shared by many of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues, although we will not go into the sad history of the past couple of weeks.

Mr. Fallon: Before we leave the subject of stamp duty, can we be clear what Liberal Democrat policy is? It is to further transfer stamp duty relief from the inner urban areas to the more affluent areas, especially in the south. Will the hon. Gentleman be promulgating that loudly in places such as Sheffield and Newcastle?

Dr. Cable: I was completely up front in the weeks running up to the Budget, arguing that the disadvantaged area tax relief provision for commercial property should be dispensed with, because the main beneficiaries were not small shops in Sheffield, but large commercial property developers in Canary Wharf and such areas. That is why we argued for getting rid of it and we believe that is the correct thing to do. We remain committed to lifting the stamp duty threshold for domestic properties further to £150,000 a year. That is fully costed and will be fully explained in the manifesto when we present it shortly.

On the specific Budget provisions, I agree with the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) that what has been taken out is appropriate and what remains is sensible and something that we can all support. On the major change, the anti-avoidance measures, we need a great deal more time for reflection. We are all committed to such measures where they are effective, but they are at the core of the Government's budgetary arithmetic, as the Chief Secretary knows. They propose to raise £3 billion over three years, so the ability to make the measures stick is central to the Budget's credibility. For the reasons that have partly been given, it is right that we be given further time for reflection.

[Dr. Cable]

On the international provisions, the so-called double no tax agreements, the point has been made, not just by people who currently benefit from these measures in multinational companies but by accountants who deal with them, that by dealing with such matters in too clumsy a way there might be some short-term gain in revenue, but some long-term loss. Equally, I understand that there is an enormous degree of complex argument around the 15 or 20 anti-avoidance measures concerned with financial derivatives, with which the Government propose to deal, and the danger of tackling those in the wrong way or in a clumsy way would simply be to raise the cost of capital for companies, not necessarily to save revenue for the Government. So a great deal of thought is required on the various measures, and I welcome the opportunity to pursue them further in that proper way.

Our main criticism of the Finance Bill was not so much for what was in it as for what was not in it, and we hope that whoever forms the Government in a few weeks' time will address these issues. The first is the transparency of the budget process. It is already very clear, because of the uncertainties surrounding the £3 billion revenue from anti-avoidance measures, that we would have to take on trust much of what the Inland Revenue says about projected revenue. There is also much room for controversy about projected growth rates, and that is one reason why we have argued strongly that there has to be a proper system of independent audits of the Budget's assumptions to give to fiscal policy the same kind of integrity that exists in monetary policy. That is not a doorstep campaigning issue, but I hope that the Government are listening to the arguments and that if they are returned they will address the problem—that we have a proper degree of independence in the appraisal of fiscal policy that a body such as the National Audit Office, properly supported by economic advice, would be able to give.

The Chief Secretary acknowledged the second omission when he said that the Government are responsive to the need for reform of local taxation. I do not know what that is coded language for and how radical the reform will be when we get it, but as he knows we are committed to scrapping the council tax altogether, and the sticking plaster solution of £200 in one year is clearly not satisfactory, although I am not sure that the Conservative's £500 is satisfactory either. I happen to live in a constituency that for the last three years has had a Conservative-controlled council that has raised council tax by £500 per household over that period, so my constituents will derive no benefit from that. In addition, there are many households where one occupant is a pensioner and one is not that would not qualify for the discount, and there are many low-income families without pensioners who would not qualify for that discount either. Therefore, that provision is itself inadequate. It may be sustained, but it is not adequate and it does not deal with many of the injustices that lie at the heart of the council tax. It does not create a system based on ability to pay. If the Chief Secretary is as good as his word and we have fundamental reform if the Government are re-elected, I hope that they will consider income-based systems of taxation, as the Liberal Democrats have suggested.

The third omission relates to pensions. The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) made the point earlier that over the next few weeks many people will be struggling with all the complexities of pension credit and other forms of means-tested benefit without the help that we are sometimes able to give them. That illustrates the much wider point that trying to deal with pensioner poverty in this way excludes many pensioners, it creates high rates of marginal withdrawal or marginal rates of tax for pensioners and is a fundamentally unsatisfactory system. We know that the Government are considering, through the Turner commission, a much wider-ranging reform. We hope that they eventually come out, as we have, with the concept of a citizen's pension payable to at least older pensioners without extensive means-testing and without the complexity and the high marginal rates that currently apply.

Again in a spirit of consensus, it is clear that the three parties among us that are competing at the election, whatever the sound and fury, are agreed on a series of propositions. The first concerns taxation. The simple brutal fact of the matter is, as the Institute for Fiscal Studies, which the hon. Member for Tatton called in aid several times, has pointed out, that all three parties would increase taxation after the next election, and that there would be a minimum £24 billion a year increase under the Conservatives as a result of fiscal drag throughout the next public spending review period. That is common ground.

Mr. Dorrell: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not want to mislead the House, still less the voters. Is it not true that the Institute for Fiscal Studies has looked at the Government's plans and concluded that there is a structural deficit, and has looked at the plans published by the Conservative Front Bench and said that the arithmetic adds up?

Dr. Cable: It has said that the arithmetic adds up in a purely mechanical sense. Perhaps it should be more widely known that the IFS has said that it has no competence to judge the credibility of the cuts that were proposed by the James report, and it specifically disclaimed any competence in evaluating those proposals. Yet the whole Conservative taxation and spending programme hinges on that. It has not been independently evaluated. Certainly when the Liberal Democrats have considered it on a purely technical level, probably at least £8 billion-worth of those cuts make no sense whatever.

Mr. Dorrell: It is obviously true that any Government who implemented changes in the spending plans would have to accept responsibility for those changes, but the hon. Gentleman was suggesting that a Conservative Government based on those plans would have to increase rates of taxation, which is simply not correct.

Dr. Cable: I did not use the phrase "rates of taxation". What I said was that taxation in aggregate, the amount raised in taxation, the share of taxation in the national economy, would rise under the Conservatives' proposals. If they were honest and open about that and acknowledged that there would be a rising burden of taxation under their proposals, under Labour's proposals and ours, at least we would start with a sensible common base for debate. Equally, we will all have to accept, on each of our three sets of proposals, that there will have to be a high degree of fiscal discipline in respect of public spending. That is the common basis on which this debate should proceed.

I am happy to support the Bill and I wish the Chief Secretary well in his next job. He will be greatly missed in the House.

2.17 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): I begin by declaring an interest as a director and shareholder of a manufacturing business. Like many others, I would like to echo the closing remarks of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) in wishing the Chief Secretary success in his new career. We will follow his developing life with interest and we shall miss his bonhomie.

We are discussing a reasonably heavily truncated finance Bill today in the circumstances of the run-up to a general election, but as my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) reminded us, the degree of change that has been introduced by the Government in the originally published Bill is nowhere near the degree of change that was agreed to in the run-up to the 1992 election. I remember some of that because I became Financial Secretary immediately after the 1992 election and had to pick up a substantial amount of legislation that had been drafted ahead of the election and dropped in the finance Bill in the run-up to the 1992 general election. I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the Government's agreement to drop some of the most complex aspects of the original legislation, but my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) was correct to remind the House of the difference between the Finance (No. 2) Bill that we are discussing now and the Finance Bill that was put through ahead of the 1992 general election. It is regrettable, although I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton secured the best deal possible, that the Government were not willing to delay the legislation that is included in the Bill in order to ensure that it was subject to proper parliamentary scrutiny after the general election.

The real issue with this Finance Bill is not the measures in it, but those that are not in it, but would be necessary if the Government's plans were in truth to add up. I am interested not in what is in the Finance (No.2) Bill that we are discussing today, but in what would be in the Finance (No.3) Bill that a re-elected Labour Government would have to introduce.

All our constituents know, and every Member of this House knows, that we have been here before. In 2001, ahead of that year's general election, we and our constituents were told by the Prime Minister and the Chancellor that there would be no need for tax increases if a Labour Government were re-elected. At the first occasion after that election the Chancellor came to this place and proposed in the 2002 Budget an £8 billion tax increase—an increase in the national insurance contributions paid by both employers and employees. The argument advanced at the time was that all of that was necessary because the money was all going into national health service expenditure. That always was a dishonest argument—it was just as dishonest today, when the Prime Minister used it at the Dispatch Box during Prime Minister's questions, as it was on the day it was first used in the 2002 Budget.

We all know that the total tax yield that comes out of the tax system goes into the Consolidated Fund and that it is then for the Government to decide priorities on the use of that money. All the Chancellor was seeking to do by labelling that £8 billion tax increase in 2002 as money for the NHS was to sweeten the pill of the extra burden that the Labour Government were imposing on voters.

Mr. Prisk: I am hesitant to interrupt my right hon. Friend's excellent flow, but I want to remind him of what happened after the 1997 election. We were not advised that our pensions were going to be raided, but a £5 billion annual raid was executed then. Does he agree that there is a record of not one election, but two, in which this Government have taxed without warning?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is entirely right; there was an unheralded tax increase after the 1997 election and another after the 2001 election. Of course, we all now know the effect that was achieved, and I want to focus on the tax increase following the 2001 election, because the Institute for Fiscal Studies published last week an analysis of the effect of that increase on disposable incomes.

It is helpful to us in the run-up to this general election for voters to be reminded of the effect of the tax increase that the Government introduced immediately after the previous general election in order to make the books balance in the early years of this Parliament. Last week, the Institute for Fiscal Studies published a report on the movement of disposable incomes during recent years. It reported that, for the first time since the early 1990s, real disposable incomes fell in 2003–04 compared with 2002–03. Why did they fall? They fell because of the £8 billion tax increase that the Chancellor introduced after the previous general election, having promised beforehand that an increase would not be necessary.

It is not just a matter of the total taxation that the Government have imposed, which has had the effect of cutting real disposable incomes in the last year for which figures are available, which is 2003–04. It is also important to examine the distributional effect of the tax policies that have been pursued by this Government, not just in this Parliament, but throughout the period since 1997, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) rightly says.

The Chancellor is very fond of saying that he has not increased rates of income tax. That is a dishonest argument for two reasons. First, it draws a polite veil over the fact that he has increased the rates of national insurance contributions. Most of our constituents and, I suspect, most of us, do not notice the difference in our pay packets between increases in income tax and increases in national insurance contributions. The truth is that marginal tax rates have increased, as one sees if one considers tax and national insurance together. Beyond that, the combined effect of freezing both the personal allowance in 2002 and the higher rate bands, in addition to rising income levels, is that 7.5 million income tax payers are paying at a higher rate than they would have done if the whole system had been fully indexed to earnings in 1997.

So when the Chancellor of the Exchequer talks about tax rates not having gone up, he is wrong on two counts: first, national insurance contributions; and secondly, the unplanned and unfair effect of holding down the allowances and bands in the tax system and not indexing them to earnings. We should do well to remember and to remind our voters of this statistic: the Labour Government since 1997 has meant that 7.5 million—very nearly one third—of all income tax payers are paying at a higher marginal rate than they would have done if the system had been fully indexed to earnings since 1997.

[Mr. Dorrell]

The Institute for Fiscal Studies and an analysis of the tax record of this Government in office have demonstrated that the effect of a Labour Government is to raise the tax burden on income tax payers. The IFS is relevant to this debate not just because of its analysis of the effect of a Labour Government on the tax burden in the past, but because, as we have already mentioned in this debate, it is offering a warning of what a re-elected Labour Government would mean again.

I said in an intervention on the hon. Member for Twickenham that the IFS had examined the Government's published plans and those of my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Conservative Front Bench, and concluded that the Government's plans include what in the jargon is called a structural deficit—that is to say, a black hole or a need to raise taxes in the next Parliament in exactly the same way as they were raised in this Parliament because the Government have not been able to control the growth of Government expenditure.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman saw the point made by Goldman Sachs last month, which was that there is no black hole.

Mr. Dorrell: I have seen a wide range of published material on this subject. If the Financial Secretary will allow me to make this point, it is entirely fair to say that the overwhelming majority of published opinions from the IFS and all the other independent commentariat employed in the City, and the overwhelming weight of that judgment, is that there is a structural deficit in the Government's plans. It is not difficult to see why they reached that conclusion. It is because the Government's published plans report a rising share of national income accounted for by Government expenditure and, as the hon. Member for Twickenham pointed out, a rising share of national income accounted for by tax yield, without any plausible explanation of how the money will be produced. I have seen no analysis of the figures for tax yield that supports the Government's view that they can secure the specified level of tax income out of the economy without having to change the tax rates.

Mr. George Osborne: The Financial Secretary mentioned Goldman Sachs. He did not mention the Institute for Fiscal Studies, Ernst and Young, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the International Monetary Fund, the CBI, the British Chambers of Commerce, the Centre for Economics and Business Research, Numerica, Lehman Brothers, HSBC, Barclays Capital, Gerrard, PricewaterhouseCoopers, Deloitte and Touche or Lombard Street Research.

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I regret to say that I have not committed that list to memory, but perhaps it might now be obvious to the House why I did not attempt to do so. My memory is failing me and I do not have that ability.

Almost nobody who has examined the Government's financial plans believes that the Government can deliver on tax and revenue through the next Parliament without resorting to precisely the same expedient that they used in 2002—a post-election tax increase. When the Chancellor says that he wants to put the economy at the centre of the election campaign, I say, "Hooray!" Conservative Members must argue to the electorate that the meaning of a re-elected Labour Government is entirely clear—it is clear in the figures and evidence and, if one does not want to look into a crystal ball, it is clear in the Red Book. A Labour Government means a further substantial tax increase.

Labour has delivered tax increases. In recent times, it has also delivered falling living standards, because government has grown faster than the individual's capacity to pay for it. This year, the IFS published two studies, one considering the Government's future plans and the other examining the Government's record in office, which demonstrate that when Labour raised taxes in 2001 and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford rightly pointed out, in 1997, it had the effect of cutting living standards. The IFS said that we must expect a re-elected Labour Government to do the same again. The choice for voters in this election could not be clearer, and I cannot wait to explain it to them.

2.31 pm

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): I shall speak briefly, simply to register a complaint. If discussing 11 clauses in 1992 was a constitutional outrage, what is discussing 106 clauses and 203 pages of legislation in four hours?

I do not doubt that my hon. Friend the shadow Chief Secretary was faced by an unenviable choice—he did not have the whip hand in those negotiations—but it is extremely unsatisfactory that more than 100 clauses, and more than 200 pages of financial legislation, will pass into law without their being properly scrutinised. If those clauses are not scrutinised in Committee, they will not be scrutinised in the other place.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) said, some of those clauses may be welcome and others, which have been subject to consultation, may raise no serious dispute. However, the purpose of the Standing Committee on the Finance Bill is to go through those clauses in detail—the process is familiar to all of us who have served on a Standing Committee on the Finance Bill—and to consider representations that emerge after the final text has been published. Such representations do not always come from bodies that the Revenue or the Treasury have consulted directly. The Chartered Institute of Taxation, for example, has already made representations about a number of the clauses, and the Law Society has sent me, and I am sure other hon. Members, a catalogue of suggested improvements. Such amendments will not even be considered, and we will pass ill-considered and badly judged legislation into law.

If the clauses have already been partially consulted on, there is no rush. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton would be happier to reconsider those clauses and include them in his own finance Bill, which I look forward to his presenting to the House in the summer months. Even in the unlikely event—a catastrophe—of this awful Government being re-elected, it would be perfectly possible for them to seek to re-enact the clauses in just two or three months' time. Even those clauses that the Government claim are necessary to tackle tax avoidance would not lose from being delayed by a matter of weeks, if not a couple of months.

Mr. Prisk: My hon. Friend and other hon. Members know that rushing through legislation is part of this Government's pattern of behaviour. Two Budgets ago, the Chief Secretary himself told us that the Government intended to spend two years correcting stamp duty land tax legislation. Does my hon. Friend share my concern that the Government legislate first and think second?

Mr. Fallon: Having served on the Front Bench in a Standing Committee on the Finance Bill, I believe that the Government legislate far too rapidly on tax. I would like to return to some of the schemes and reliefs to measure their effects—perhaps that is a role that the Treasury Committee should perform—which is a role that no one seems to perform. We simply have the Government's word for it that a particular tax relief is either not working as originally alleged or is being seriously abused and must be stopped at midnight. We need a more considered way to audit tax changes—I am not discussing the re-write process or anything like that—two, three or five years after their implementation, so that all hon. Members can measure their effects.

Given today's situation, however, we must take the wording of the clauses on trust. We are setting a bad precedent by passing so much legislation on to the statute book without proper scrutiny. If it was a constitutional outrage in 1992 to consider 11 clauses in four hours, the outrage is far greater today. In the end, hon. Members and other bodies outside this House will regret what we are doing this afternoon.

2.36 pm

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): I suppose that I can count myself as a Finance Bill veteran. I start by reminding the House of my declaration of business interests, which is properly recorded in the Register of Members' Interests.

In today's debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), to whom I listened with interest, quickly sped past the question of life assurance taxation. I had hoped that I might hear from him that an incoming Conservative Government would examine that area. I, for one, am disappointed that this truncated Finance Bill contains no measures to re-examine how the internal rates of return and taxation are calculated on life assurance products and to try to improve the rates of return for such financial devices. Those rates of return are particularly important to, for example, pensioners and those on endowment mortgages, who have seen substantial drops in the performance of those products, which are part of their long-term financial security.

One of the many missing themes from this Finance Bill is a lack of attention to detail on long-term savings. One of the interesting features of the current financial press are articles pointing out the slow uptake of ISAs at the end of the financial year, one reason for which is that the Chancellor has slowly but surely stripped out many of the initial starting benefits of ISAs.

If the Chief Secretary decides to go to South Africa, I wish him well. He may decide to go South Africa anyway when he is in opposition, because he will have plenty of time on his hands.

ISAs and other financial products have not closed the savings gap in this country, and savings have fallen substantially under this Chancellor. Although it is entirely correct to examine tax and revenue issues, which I shall discuss in a few moments, savings are important in terms of capital accumulation in this country. Under this Government, savings have fallen, and this Finance Bill contains no measures whatsoever to address that important point.

I want to examine a number of measures in the order in which they appear in the Bill. One of the first measures to which we are invited to agree is the "Consolidation of current rates of hydrocarbon oil duties".

The Chancellor has had to postpone his revaluation of those rates in the light of turbulent conditions in the oil market. But there is a more important conclusion that comes from the question of oil pricing and upon which the Government should be reflecting. The Prime Minister has made it clear that matters connected with climate change are one of his top priorities, and they lie at the heart of the G8 priorities. As a result of the markets, there has been a substantial increase in the cost of hydrocarbon fuel, but no proportionate decline in the use of motor-powered vehicles. The market price increases, notwithstanding the revalorisation that the Chancellor still has up his sleeve, represent an important challenge to the Government's environment agenda, because they will have to look for other measures to try to reduce the output of greenhouse and other associated gases from motor vehicles if their targets for climate change are to be met. When I asked a question at the last Treasury questions, the Economic Secretary responded by talking about improvements in air quality, which I accept have occurred, but did not wish openly to acknowledge the fact that greenhouse gas emissions from the transport sector have been rising substantially. Government measures have been inadequate in dealing with those issues.

In the same context, I draw the House's attention to the table that goes with clause 7, which deals with the Government's proposals on vehicle excise duty. Ministers have trumpeted the success of the proposals to lower the level of vehicle excise duty for cars with low CO_2 emissions. Picking up on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon), the Government have provided no analysis whatsoever of the real-world sales effect of those proposals in terms of the differentials in vehicle excise duty. I am surprised that a Government who have rightly put climate change at the top of their agenda have been so unimaginative and lacking in boldness in terms of looking again at whether their proposed structure for vehicle excise duty rates is the right one to achieve a greater and quicker uptake of vehicles with low CO_2 emissions. Why, for example, is not there a nil rate band for hydrogen-powered cars? Prototypes of those have been tried in the United States; where is the encouragement to bring them into the United Kingdom? Where is the substantial discount for petrol and diesel equivalents for mixed electric and hydrocarbon-powered vehicles? The Bill lacks boldness. If the Government do not address that, they will continue to underperform against their own targets in relation to the Kyoto priorities. I say that as the Chair of the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which recently produced a report on the Government's performance in that respect. There is some suggestion that even meeting the Kyoto targets could be in doubt.

[Mr. Michael Jack]

Let me move on to air transport. The Bill contains nothing to deal with emissions from aircraft. There is one thing that the Government could have done in relation to aircraft, motor vehicles and any other sources of emissions. As the Chief Secretary and the Financial Secretary are aware, the Government have at their disposal the use of capital allowances, and if they had wanted to accelerate still further the pace of the introduction of more environmentally-friendly systems, they could have introduced an enhanced rate of capital write-down. As you will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, from your experience of Stansted in your constituency, there is a need to introduce the most modern aircraft as quickly as possible. They pollute less with noise and are more efficient in terms of fuel, yet the Government are silent on providing any mechanism to enhance the write-down rate for aircraft to encourage the uptake of more modern air vehicles. The same principle could be applied right across industry to try to add some carrots to the sticks on which the Government's environmental policy relies.

The Bill moves on to invite us to confirm the rates of income tax. Following the interesting observations of my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), I want to pose a question to Ministers: can they give an unequivocal guarantee that the 10 per cent. starting rate for tax that is confirmed in the Bill would, if Labour were re-elected, remain for the duration of the next Parliament? I would be interested to know whether that structural configuration of the tax rates remains part of Treasury thinking.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood rightly drew the House's attention to the work undertaken by the Institute for Fiscal Studies. He could have focused on another factor that affected the institute's findings—the rise in council tax. That is the ultimate stealth tax, which the Government do not overtly increase except by starving local authorities of the necessary resources to meet the mounting costs of the responsibilities that the Government keep putting on them.

When the right hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) was a Treasury Front Bencher in opposition, he and subsequent Opposition spokesmen used to ask the Government of the day this awkward question: what is the impact on incomes by decile of all tax changes, both direct and indirect? That was sometimes an embarrassing question to have to answer when we were in government because the news was not always good. It is interesting that when that difficult-to-answer question was first posed to the incoming Labour Government, they refused to answer it, saying that the assumptions did not make for a meaningful answer. The latest findings by the IFS have brought that particular pigeon home to roost, because they provide us with the answer that "average . . . household incomes after tax and benefit payments fell by 0.2 per cent. in real terms between 2002/03 and 2003/04".

That was, it says,

"the first decline in any single year since the early 1990s."

What a record for the Government to take into the general election. They are able to boast that since the 1990s—the period when they were always criticising the Conservative Government for their economic performance—they have managed to create the first fall in average household incomes.

Mr. Prisk: My right hon. Friend, who is, as always, giving an excellent exposition, mentioned the stealthy nature of the council tax increases. He may not have had the opportunity to consider page 250 of the Red Book, where the third column shows that the council tax revenue that the Government are already planning to draw out from the hard-working families of this country will be 11 per cent. more next year than this year—£20.9 billion. Does he share my concern that they are already planning how to take even more money from people?

Mr. Jack: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing that out. A 75 per cent. increase in council tax over the lifetime of this Government is testament to their addiction to taxing in this particular way.

The IFS continues with its analysis and makes this telling point:

"The income of the household in the middle of the income distribution—the median—rose by just under £2 a week in 2003/04 to £336 a week. This 0.5 per cent. increase was much smaller than those seen in previous years under this government."

So they are now not only clobbering the average, but hitting the middle. The IFS goes on to say:

"The drop in average take-home income . . . in part reflects measures announced in Budget 2002, Mr Brown's biggest tax-raising budget to date."

It then goes on list the points that my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood made.

Mr. Timms: I just want to make sure that the House did not miss an important point that the right hon. Gentleman slipped past. Even according to the IFS survey, median take-home pay has increased.

Mr. Jack: Indeed. We can trade statistical minutiae to make our debating points, but the Financial Secretary might also care to interrupt me to explain about Christmas trading on the high street and the subsequent warnings that many retailers have given, showing the squeeze on retail spending. Why is that happening? It is because people have not got the money to spend.

The situation can be expressed in very simple terms. The pinch has come and people now understand what a tax-and-spend Labour Government mean to the pocket. It is painful and they do not like it, and at the ballot box they will have the opportunity to express an irrevocable opinion on this Government.

This Government have spent much of their time trying to encourage initiative, but the IFS has observed that the measures in this Finance Bill and preceding Finance Bills have contributed to a "drop in income from self-employment."

So much for Labour's attempts to boost the entrepreneurial economy.

Mr. Prisk: I hesitate to interrupt my right hon. Friend for a second time, but as someone who used to be self-employed, I have grown despairing of this Government's attitude. Did my right hon. Friend notice that when the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—rather than of the Exchequer—was interviewed about this very point, he tried to suggest that the self-employed were somehow irrelevant to the figures and could be swept to one side? Is that not wrong?

Mr. Jack: Not only is it wrong; it also shows blind ignorance of the national insurance class 2 and class 4 payments that self-employed people make. I am surprised that a former Chief Secretary to the Treasury should make such a glaring error, which perhaps underscores a lack of real understanding of what is going on in the economy. That should make people seriously question the credibility of Labour policies as they affect businesses in this country.

Table C5 of the Red Book should be required reading for anybody who wants to see the unexpurgated version of Labour's tax proposals. In the current financial year, current receipts account for 39.3 per cent. of gross domestic product. This Government project that that figure will have risen to 40.6 per cent. by the time that the next Parliament comes to an end, so by their own admission the tax burden is rising. The point is illustrated in visual form in chart C3 of the Red Book, which, interestingly, shows that tax as a percentage of GDP fell in 1994–95. But like a ski-jump in reverse, it has risen and continued to rise under this Government.

I have remarked on many occasions about my disappointment with the Government's level of fiscal encouragement for biofuels. I draw Ministers' attention to a parliamentary answer to me from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which confirmed the dearth of a UK biofuels industry. So far as I can see, the only plant currently manufacturing biodiesel—it uses animal fats as a feedstock, rather than oilseed rape—opened this February in Motherwell. The rest of the plants are under construction and have projected modest production levels. The exception is a UK bioethanol plant, for which a planning decision is pending.

If the Government can give a 40p duty discount for liquefied petroleum gas, they should look again at the duty derogation on biofuels and make a real effort to get the industry moving. If they really want to meet their inclusion targets under the European directive and help us to meet our greenhouse gas emission targets, they must, by definition, have UK-manufactured biofuels. The lack of such biofuels is a notable omission.

Clause 86 deals with double taxation relief. The Chartered Institute of Taxation is concerned about this clause, and I hope that the Financial Secretary is on "receive" mode as I point out to him the following observation on the construct of the clause, which the CIOT made in the briefing helpfully sent to Members before the debate started:

"What this potentially means is that legislation could have a far wider impact than is suggested by the guidance"—

the notes on clauses to the original Finance Bill—

"imposing significant restrictions on the foreign tax credit relief available to most UK companies owning foreign subsidiaries and investments."

I hope that Ministers will deal with that point in the wind-ups, because it is clear that the CIOT feels that in effect, this clause could adversely impact on every company in this country with overseas interests.

I conclude with a brief comment on a tax that I wish had gone up by more, and with some observations on inheritance tax. The increase in landfill tax for which clause 99 provides is not sufficient rapidly to progress the Government's agenda of meeting their European recycling criteria. Although the three-year indexation proposal for inheritance tax is welcome, because of the increase in house prices it will not be welcomed by the many thousands of estates owners. These are people of modest income whose lifestyle is also modest, yet they will be sucked into paying inheritance tax. It amazes me that a socialist Government can allow a tax that people of means can avoid paying some or all of by buying the professional advice that they need, but which those of modest means, or none, end up paying. Is it not about time that the Treasury re-examined the entire structure of inheritance tax? This industry of avoidance is complex and expensive. It benefits only those who can afford the advice, and it does not help those who are innocently caught up in the house price spiral.

For all the Treasury's pontificating about the number of estates that escape inheritance tax, the number paying it has increased. In 1998–99, 6,295 estates in the £300,000 bracket paid inheritance tax, but according to the figures for 2001–02, which were updated in July 2004, the number doing so had risen to 9,661. The tide is running and the wave is getting bigger. It is time for this Government to address some of the iniquities caused by inheritance tax.

We shall have the opportunity during this general election to debate all these matters, but there is no doubt that people are learning exactly what a tax-and-spend Government are all about.

2.58 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): I remind the House of my interest as declared in the register.

There are a number of things that need to be said about this Finance Bill, but the overwhelmingly most immediate and important needs to be said strongly and several times, and I therefore make no apology for following on from the excellent speech on this subject by my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon). The point is that we simply should not be legislating in this fashion in this House—indeed, it is a complete disgrace—and least of all should we be doing so in respect of a Finance Bill, which goes to the heart of the relationship between the legislature and the people whom we represent. We are talking about the process through which we take away their money and property. Of course, it was around the issues of how that could be achieved fairly that Parliament emerged from the constitutional conflicts of the 17th century.

[Mr. Quentin Davies]

We are now being asked to take a view on a Bill of 106 clauses, yet they have been available for scrutiny for only a few hours. They have been abstracted from another Bill that was printed last week. A few hours is far too short a time to examine the difference between the earlier Bill and the Bill that is now before us. How can we take a view of the merits of the Bill on that basis? Serious scrutiny cannot take place and the tragedy is that no one expects Parliament to do a serious job. That is the extremely sad position that we have reached in this country.

All that is part of the erosion of Parliament's role—not just in the matter of Finance Bills, but more generally—as a result of the bad habits that the Executive have picked up steadily over the years. I admit that there were traces of it during the period of the previous Conservative Administration, but it has become infinitely worse over the last eight years. Parliament just provides a rubber stamp—it has become part of the ceremonial and decorative part of the constitution. Decisions are taken in No. 10 or Whitehall and it is assumed that Parliament will do what it is told within whatever time scale the Executive are gracious enough to grant. Whether it is convenient for the Executive branch to allow us four hours, two and a half hours or two and a half minutes does not really matter. Our role in legislation is no longer taken seriously—[Interruption.] I am not exaggerating at all. That is precisely the situation in which we find ourselves this afternoon.

It has been a convention for generations that, if a general election is called and a Finance Bill is pending after a Budget, Parliament allows the Executive branch some emergency powers required to keep the revenue of the state flowing during that period. That is the convention and, as recently as 1992, when the position arose under a Conservative Administration, the Conservative Government lived up to that principle and brought before Parliament only the minimal Bill necessary to ensure that the Government could go on functioning during the subsequent month or so before a proper Finance Bill could be introduced in the next Parliament. That principle has now been discarded and thrown in the waste paper basket.

The Government have introduced a Bill containing many complex and technical provisions and some new ones. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks said, in a way, it does not really matter whether those provisions have been consulted on with the relevant professional bodies. I am glad, of course, that the Government consult in a formalised way but, unfortunately, they tend to consult only on matters that they feel it is convenient for them to consult on. The consultation system is good, but it is in no way a substitute for proper parliamentary scrutiny.

In that light, what we are doing here this afternoon is not that serious. I would not like to describe a parliamentary procedure as a farce, but we are moving down that road. We have not had the time to do the necessary homework and, on this occasion, we have not been physically able to consult all those affected by the Finance Bill or all those who have views on it. That is simply unacceptable.

I am sure that it will soon change, but at the moment, Conservative Members are a small minority in the House. The Government have an overriding majority and believe that they can get away with anything. That is an unhealthy position from which the democratic process in this country has suffered for too long. I would like to appeal to the democratic consciences of Labour Members. I know that many of them do have consciences about these matters and the fact that they are in a position of enormous power with such a great majority should make them very reticent about abusing that power. That, however, is what they have been doing in many contexts and they are certainly doing it this afternoon.

Labour Members should reflect on how far the process will go. What would happen if there were another Labour Government or, God forbid, a Labour Government for another eight years? Where would we find ourselves eight years further down the line when we know that we have already moved from a position where a Government tentatively introduce a minimalist Finance Bill to ensure the continued flow of Government expenditure to one in which the Government feel that they can get away with bringing 106 clauses before the House with four hours to debate them? If we extrapolate from that process, where will we find ourselves eight years later? We might be debating an entire Finance Bill in 10 minutes with no warning at all. In other words, our parliamentary procedures would have become a complete travesty. That is why I invite Government Members to reflect on these matters much more seriously than they have so far.

That is far and away the most important point that I want to make about the Bill, but I have attempted to examine this new Bill as conscientiously as I can in such a limited amount of time and I have noticed some problematic aspects. I have noted the tendency—it started under Conservative Governments but has got steadily worse under the present Government—to use the negative procedure and legislate by order or statutory instrument. More and more taxes find themselves on the statute book on that basis. The Government are giving themselves a blank cheque and we all know how thoroughly inadequate statutory instrument procedure is for examining legislative proposals. We all know that hon. Members turn up for such Committees without any preparation, often not even understanding what issues are at stake. They have no opportunity to amend the orders, so why should they make the effort to understand them? There is little that they can do, which is demoralising and demotivating in itself.

I shall use one particular example to bring the matter home. Let us examine clause 102, which deals with the Pension Protection Fund. It states:

> "The Treasury may by regulations make provision for and in connection with the application of the relevant taxes in relation to—"

and it then refers to various pension protection funds. The relevant taxes are subsequently defined in subsection (3) as income tax, capital gains tax, corporation tax, inheritance tax, value added tax and stamp duty land tax—virtually every major tax. Thus the funds will be taxed by the Government in a way that we cannot predict and whenever they want to do it. They will simply write their own tax laws, which is wholly unsatisfactory.

The Committee considering Finance Bills always faces that difficulty and it is getting progressively worse every year. What is more, the Government are not in the least ashamed to proceed in that manner. Instead of producing a minimalist, emergency Bill to deal with the electoral period, the Government have introduced this 106-clause Finance Bill.

I have to say that clause 102, which I have already cited, is a less-than-honest provision. It starts in the way that I have already described and continues with a number of subsections. Being conscientious, I felt that I should read them. When I did, I found that the subsequent subsections in no way constrict the right given to the Government to make whatever tax laws they want for these funds by regulation. They merely state that the power "includes" this or that. For example, subsection (2) states:

"The provision that may be made by regulations includes provision imposing any of the relevant taxes".

Subsection (4) states:

"The regulations may, in particular, include",

and subsection (5) states:

"The exemptions and reliefs that may be given by the regulations include".

Subsection (6) states:

"The regulations may make provision in relation to any time after 5th April".

Clearly, what might seem at first glance to be defining subsections are, in fact, tautologous and unnecessary. They say what the regulations may include, but the provisions are unnecessary because the Government's power to write whatever tax laws they want for these particular funds is already granted in subsection (1).

I draw two conclusions from that. First, the Bill contains a lot of unnecessary verbiage. Finance Bills are always much too long and complex, but there was no need to encumber this Bill with such unnecessary wording. Secondly, there is no intention to make the Bill clear or transparent so that taxpayers can know what the rules are. I can assume only that 90 per cent. of the clause to which I have referred is intended to be obfuscatory. Civil servants and parliamentary draftsman have spent hours and days producing what is completely unnecessary rubbish. The powers granted to the Government require only the first sentence of the clause.

That is another but more minor illustration of the direction that tax law is taking in this country. It is a very bad tendency.

Of course, we know that this Bill is designed to hide the nasty truth of what will happen if there is a new Labour Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) and all the independent commentators have made it clear that the Government's fiscal policy is out of control and that there is a structural deficit. The Government will have to increase tax revenues and the only question is how they go about it.

Moreover, the Government have a record of promising before elections that they will not increase taxes and then of breaking those promises. At Prime Minister's questions, it was notable that the Prime Minister avoided responding to that accusation and tried to talk about something else. He knows that the accusation is all too true.

There is great concern in the country about the Government's secret tax-raising plans. I hope that we will be able to draw them out on these matters during the election campaign. That is very important and it is better to get an untrue declaration or statement from the Government than nothing at all.

In the interests of an honest election campaign, we should ensure that we ask the right questions. For example, the newspapers have reported considerable concern that the Government have a secret plan to extend capital gains tax to owner-occupied property. That would be a devastating blow to millions of home owners and an economically stupid mistake. It would place an enormous cost on labour mobility, which is an essential part of a successful economy. The labour force is our most important resource and it must be used efficiently. People must be able to move from one part of the country to another to take up new jobs or promotions. They will not do so if that incurs a tax penalty and the economy will suffer enormously.

Another suggestion is that the Government will increase national insurance contributions. We all know that they long ago abandoned the idea that national insurance was anything other than a tax. The Chancellor has increased contributions, contradicting undertakings given before the last election, but without making a corresponding change in benefits. The Government have abandoned the idea that the national insurance fund has any authentic status. They like to work by stealth and dislike being straightforward. They have never said openly that national insurance is a tax and that the fund is merely a fiction, a bogus concept that does not really exist, but it would have been more honest of them to do so.

The Government will try to bamboozle people by raising national insurance contributions and pretend that that is different from increasing income tax. In fact, the only difference is that higher national insurance contributions have no corresponding reliefs. Raising national insurance contributions would be an enormous mistake. The Government think that they got away with it last time and there is no doubt that they will be tempted down that road again if they are returned to power.

It is very important that we expose the Government's record on this matter during the election campaign. We must also make clear the great risks that the country will face if there is a Labour Government after 5 May.

I turn now to pensions. Several Opposition Members have mentioned the enormous damage that has been done to our pensions industry and I spoke on that subject in the Budget debate a few weeks ago. It may be a cliché to say that our pensions system was the envy of the world but, with the exception of the Netherlands, where the system is very similar, all our EU partners used to envy it.

Ironically, in their first few years in office, the Government used to tell our EU partners that they should set up a funded pension system like ours. Until 1997, the system was successful, but that is no longer true. Not one defined benefit pension scheme has been created since this Government came to power. About one third of such schemes have been closed down in that time and another third have been closed to new entrants. That devastating attack on the security of retired people and on the prospects for succeeding generations is due entirely to this Government's policy.

[Mr. Quentin Davies]

I do not accept that what happened was the inevitable result of rising life expectancy or of the 1998 stock market fall. There have been much more serious crashes in the past 50 years, including the devastating collapse in 1974 and 1975 and the small falls in the early 1980s and early 1990s. Moreover, the increase in life expectancy has been steady—[Interruption.]

I see that the Chief Secretary is leaving the Chamber. I thought for a moment that he was going to defend himself against my complaints, but like the Prime Minister earlier he has no defence. I suppose he is leaving out of shame at the exposure of the record of the Government that he has represented. Whether he goes to South Africa or not, he will have a more comfortable time than has been his experience in trying to defend the Government's fiscal record.

The damage done to our pensions system has caused people to worry that the Government will come back for a second bite, like a shark that bites off a person's leg having previously bitten off his arm.

Mr. Tyrie: My hon. Friend sounds as though he has experienced that.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend makes an intervention from a sedentary position that was worth making standing up. I should be happy to give way to him.

Mr. Tyrie indicated dissent.

Mr. Davies: Not unnaturally, there is great concern that, if we are unlucky enough to have another Labour Government, the Treasury might be planning to tax the so far tax-free lump sum. Another worry is that there is a plan to reduce the level of tax relief for pension contributions up to the new global limit, moving away from an individual's marginal rate of tax to the standard rate of 22 per cent.

Either of those moves would be devastating to the incentive to save and to contribute to a pension scheme and would automatically and immediately result in a further reduction in our already extremely low savings ratio. That would be in conflict with what the Government say about their apparent attachment to improving the savings ratio and increasing the provision people make for their retirement. I fear that the Government will find themselves in a contradictory situation with fiscal policy collapsing. They have been overspending and the only ways to avoid increasing taxes if they return to power would be to revise the spending plans that they are selling to the electorate substantially downwards or to abandon the golden rule, and they would then not be committed to the principle that enshrines considerable fiscal stability and prudence. The Chancellor talks as though the growth of the economy will bail him out, but his projection is that economic growth will be permanently above the trend rate or that the average rate of economic growth over time will be greater than the maximum rate of growth. That does not make sense.

The Government will have to do something desperate unless they agree to adopt our suggestions for some sensible policy changes in the new deal and in asylum and immigration. The next Conservative Government will make some policy changes and save money on administration. The Labour Government's record is appalling. They cannot go a day without setting up a new quango or more bureaucracy. Every time they introduce a new initiative, we hear about a new quango—the latest one will cost £26 million or so to set up. That must stop.

There are greater prospects for administrative savings than were identified in the Gershon review and many were identified in the James report. We have a well-thought-through and reasonable programme for policy changes and administrative savings that will lead to our being able to have £12 billion more available in the second financial year of the next Government than this Government would have on their projections. That will enable us to cut spending by £8 billion and reduce taxes by £4 billion, which will be a modest but significant step in the right direction. It will be the turnaround that this country badly needs.

3.24 pm

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): I thought that Finance Bills might be behind me but the calibre of the speeches today has moved me to make a short contribution. I suspect that this will be the valedictory contribution from the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and I would be upset if I were unable to make at least a short contribution. Before I discuss the details of the Bill before us and of the Bill that should have been before us I want to add my personal congratulations to him, although his appointment is dependent on other matters. He has made unique, sometimes theatrical and often charming contributions to our debates in Committee and in the Chamber. I wish him well.

My right hon. and hon. Friends rightly highlighted one of the most important points of our deliberations—the quality of the scrutiny that the House can undertake. I am still a relatively new Member, having been elected four years ago, and I still believe that it is important to allow for debate and preparation of our thoughts. We have been given just four hours to consider 106 clauses, 11 schedules and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) rightly highlighted, 203 pages of primary legislation. That is unacceptable. Time for debate is crucial to allow us not, as Ministers may suggest, needlessly to drag the matter out but to probe the what-if questions. That is the point of parliamentary debate. The essence of parliamentary discussion is to identify what Ministers and their advisers may not have anticipated and to use that process to ensure that at the end of our deliberations the legislation is better than when it came before us. That is important.

A second aspect of the quality of scrutiny is preparation time. I hoped to have the opportunity last night to consider the Bill in detail and to compare it with the main Bill, but that was not open to me. I inquired at the Vote Office but the Bill was not available. The Prime Minister's decision to go to the country a year before he needs to has made it necessary to have this debate today. Hon. Members will be restricted in their ability to contribute to the debate in a thoughtful and considered way so one of our functions—to listen to outside experts and to draw on that expertise to better inform the legislation—has been removed.

In the few hours available to them some of my right hon. and hon. Friends have been able to inquire into the concerns of experts in the tax, accountancy and legal professions, but the chances of amending the Bill or debating the benefits of amendments have been negated because we do not have that opportunity. I have contributed to the consideration of two Finance Bills during the past two years and that outside expertise enabled sensible and often non-partisan discussions to improve the legislation. I am disappointed with the Government and that will reflect on them as the legislation is passed later today.

Having put those concerns on the record, I want to turn to more specific matters. I suspect that right hon. and hon. Members will be not entirely surprised that I want to talk about stamp duty land tax. There is undoubtedly something to welcome in the change in the threshold from £60,000 to £120,000 and it would be remiss of me not to recognise that as a positive step forward. It was interesting that the Chief Secretary was unable to identify or confirm the number of households in his constituency that would benefit, although he said that the Financial Secretary would do that for him. In my constituency, which is not a million miles away from the leafy suburbs of Brent, the reality is that less than 3 per cent. of first-time buyers could benefit from the change. That means that the hopes of 97 per cent. for some positive change from the Government have been dashed.

When one considers the total revenue that the Government plan to receive in the coming year, one discovers the reality of the situation. It is not, as one might have gathered from listening to the Chancellor, a benevolent reduction in the tax burden: quite the contrary. If one looks at the Red Book—the Government's own figures—it shows that they anticipate a 9 per cent. increase in the total stamp duty land tax revenue. It would rise from £8.9 billion to £9.7 billion. That 9 per cent. rise is a significant increase in the tax burden.

Experts in the house-buying market do not anticipate that house prices will rise by more than 4 or 5 per cent. in the coming year, so where does that 9 per cent. additional total revenue come from? It may be argued that it will come from the changes in disadvantaged area relief, although those are relatively small figures. What worries me, and it relates to an excellent point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks, is that we have no genuinely independent audit on which we can base our assessment as to whether the total burden of individual taxes is correctly estimated. We see a figure in the Red Book and we have to assume that it is correct. It may be correct, but the problem is that we have no means by which to judge that. I hope that the Financial Secretary will address that concern.

Although the Chancellor has taken a minuscule step forward in increasing the threshold to £120,000, he has missed a great opportunity and I shall explain why that is so. The tax is regressive and unfair. It is not, as in income tax, based on the margins of income; rather, it has what is known as a slab effect. Thus, under the Government's proposals, if one bought a home for £119,999, there would be no stamp duty land tax to pay—not a penny. However, pay a pound more for that house and the tax will be £1,200. That is because the tax rate applies to the whole price, not just the margin. The effect is repeated at the £250,000 threshold. At £249,999, the tax is 1 per cent., but at £250,000 the tax bill trebles, rising from £2,490 to a massive £7,500—a trebling of the tax bill for a £1 price change.

What is wrong with that? First, it is unfair. Secondly, and I hope that the Financial Secretary will address this point as I understand that it is his direct ministerial responsibility, it distorts the house price market. If someone knows that at £250,000 there will be a trebling of their tax bill, it cannot be beyond the wit of the civil service to realise that they will attempt to avoid the price of the house or flat rising to £250,000. I would not necessarily condone or agree with individuals who took such decisions, but they will occur.

The Government's answer was to put in a whole raft of bureaucratic and complex administrative procedures to try to clamp down on the problem, whereas they should have had the temerity and courage to reform the tax and remove the anomaly at source, thereby removing the need for any form of avoidance activity. On numerous occasions, the Opposition have pressed that point on the Government but, sadly, they have been deaf to reason.

The problem is repeated not just at £250,000, but also at £500,000. The Government's tax policies are encouraging tax avoidance. In previous debates with Treasury Ministers, I have tried to understand with them exactly why the paperwork was growing. After all, under the old stamp duty, which had been in existence for 300 years, we could manage with just one piece of paper. Only a one-page form was required, yet under the apparent modernisation of stamp duty what do we have? Twelve pages of forms to fill in, with 43 pages of notes that try to explain them. What nonsense. Why are the Government so firmly set against reforming the tax and so determined to go down that bureaucratic route? It seems anomalous and I am afraid that most first-time buyers will decide that the Government are not interested in the problem and do not care. The Government simply want their 9 per cent. revenue increase and that is all that matters to them.

I want to consider briefly the commercial aspects of stamp duty land tax and the removal of the relief for disadvantaged areas. I recall that we were told when debating the issue with Treasury Ministers that this crucial relief would bring hope and joy to the many urban deprived areas and that it was something that the Chancellor felt passionately about—so he got rid of it, and he did so because he needed somehow to find the money to pay for the tiny increase from £60,000 to £120,000. Of course, he discovered that there was £340 million tucked down the back of the sofa, and he thought that he could use that without anyone noticing. Sadly, for him, they noticed.

I shall correct the figures that the Chief Secretary identified. He said that there was a £90 million difference between the £340 million that the disadvantaged area tax relief changes bring into the Treasury and the £250 million that will go out because of the domestic change. However, another £20 million is tucked away in the Red Book in relation to dealing with tax avoidance. I hope that he will be able to clarify the total figure—I believe that it is about £105 million—by which the Chancellor is ahead.

[Mr. Mark Prisk]

Mr. Boateng rose—

Mr. Prisk: I am happy for the Chief Secretary to correct his figures.

Mr. Boateng: Let me deal with this. I well remember our debate upstairs on stamp duty land tax. It was a good debate, and there was honest disagreement among hon. Members on both sides of the Committee about the desirability of those measures. We took the view that it was important to introduce the reform. We took the view that a potential could be realised given the contribution to regeneration of the assistance provided by the measures that we proposed. As I said during my speech and as has been said in the debates on the Budget generally, we have reached the view that we can better focus the relief, and that is what we have done.

On the figures, I appreciate the care that the hon. Gentleman takes with such matters. Table C8 of the Red Book shows that stamp duty receipts are projected to increase by about £0.8 billion as result of the forecast effect of the Budget measures from 2004–05 to 2005–06. That includes receipts from residential, commercial and, indeed, share transactions. Hon. Members who were upstairs in Committee at the time—it was a couple of years ago—will remember that we also discussed share transactions.

The Treasury's best estimate is that there will be a £220 million reduction in receipts from residential property and a £580 million increase from commercial property, including the £340 million to which the hon. Gentleman refers in the Red Book that will arise from the measures that we have taken in the Budget and the Bill. Those estimates are approximate.

The hon. Gentleman will know, too—indeed, as I said in my contribution and as he correctly identifies—that those figures are also based on the full package of Budget measures and the forecast effects. I simply say that for the purposes of clarity. He is quite right to point out—in no way do I intend to resile from it—that those sums come from the full package of measures. I hope that that clarifies the situation.

Mr. Prisk: I am grateful to the Chief Secretary for that clarification. He said £220 million; I think that he meant £250 million. That is certainly what is stated in the Red Book for the stamp duty land tax. I am referring to table 1.2, and without wishing to be too pedantic—although I already have a significant reputation for it on this tax—I think that the figure for the domestic change is £250 million.

Mr. Boateng indicated assent.

Mr. Prisk: That is super. Given the £90 million balance between the two sums and the additional £20 million that relates to tax avoidance, the Chancellor is obviously ahead by about £110 million in revenues because of the various changes. That is an important point to get on to the record.

To return to the principle of the disadvantage tax relief on commercial sites, my instinct and personal preference would be to have fewer little tinkering reliefs. If we had clearer, simpler, lower taxes, we would all be better off. I suspect that we can have that philosophical debate on another occasion. I am not personally wedded to the longevity of that relief. However, given the way that the Chancellor tinkers with such things every year, my concern, as ever, is that companies are put off engaging in the changes in their activity that the Government seek to encourage simply because they do not believe that the reliefs will be around next year, so why should they bother to go through the paperwork and so on? That is a very important point to make in terms of the way in which taxation has been dealt with under this Government.

I always hear from Labour Members how they are not willing to lecture us, but I remember the occasion when they were happy to regale us—indeed, they lectured us—with the fact that they passionately believe in consultation before making changes. Where was the consultation on this? It was done overnight. The Minister may refer to confidentiality and the fact that the Government must not allow anyone to take advantage, but a point of fairness is involved. The large property companies have lawyers and advisers who are able to move quickly. I appreciate that the concept of a lawyer moving quickly is perhaps a strange one, but that is what lawyers have been able to do on this occasion. Given that the provision is about disadvantaged areas, my worry is that small companies—the small fry, the family businesses and the enterprises that were considering the proposal—do not have such resources immediately available to them. They are not able to adjust their arrangements accordingly. The way in which the reliefs are offered, taken away and adjusted, tinkered and meddled with is significantly to the disadvantage of small firms. In principle, it is bad taxation policy.

That leads me on to several other thoughts about smaller enterprises and how the Bill and its larger brother might affect them. The first relates to clause 13 on the charmingly termed "non-corporate distribution rate for small companies". I am told by the Bill that it will remain at 19 per cent. That phrase is far from being as innocent as it appears. It masks a history in which a tax was once promoted by the Paymaster General. Sadly, she is not with us today, but she told us that small businesses should consider the change that the Government were making to try to reduce their tax burden to 0 per cent. It was a gift horse that small businesses should not look in mouth. I forget the exact words, but the point was the same. However, two years later, when the Government discovered that the number of corporates being created was far in excess of what they anticipated and that the poor, old Chancellor was losing money faster than he expected, they needed to change it. Businesses that were previously encouraged to take up the provision—such was the Government's benevolence—were suddenly told that it was wicked and shameful behaviour. It was a form of tax avoidance on which they needed to clamp down. None the less, it was the same policy.

This constant attempt to rotate policies—to try something and, if it does not work, to adjust it—seriously damages small businesses. Sadly, and all too often, the Government do not understand the distinction between a "firm" and a "company", but they have encouraged many firms to become incorporated because that is how the firms thought that they were meant to arrange their affairs. They do that to keep their tax bills at a reasonable level, but they are then told that that is wicked and nasty. They are nasty tax avoiders who must be clamped down on.

Such behaviour by the Government makes most entrepreneurs say, "Forget it. I'll give up setting up my next business to create the next set of jobs and the next tranche of wealth and I'll go and enjoy my villa in Portugal. I wasn't planning to go there now, but I will do so because I'm fed up with the way that the Government treat things." That is one aspect of the way in which the Government deal with small businesses.

The last aspect of the Bill to which I wish to refer is an omission as much as anything else. I refer to the way in which the self-employed—not companies—are dealt with. Earlier, I mentioned the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. When trying to explain away the awkward figures on the fall in certain incomes, he said that they were irrelevant because they had been skewed by the self-employed, who were less relevant to the central question.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said that the incomes of the self-employed were entirely global, and I appreciate that he was self-employed for only a short time when he was able to spend more time with his family. For those of us who were self-employed for 10 or 11 years and who actually understand the principles behind the figures, the idea that the majority of the self-employed are globetrotting entrepreneurs who are on and off jets each and every hour is complete bunkum. That demonstrates both his economic ignorance and, frankly, the Government's unwillingness to understand the smallest of our entrepreneurs—the self-employed.

I am disappointed that the Paymaster General is not in the Chamber because the classic example of that attitude is, of course, the infamous IR35. When the measure was introduced, we were told that it would deal with wicked practice and tax avoidance that should not take place. We were told that £400 million would come back to the UK Government that was rightly theirs. Here we are, two or three years later in 2005. When we make inquiries of the Inland Revenue to find out how many cases have been brought, we are told that the number is 200 or more. We then inquire how many of the cases have succeeded and how much of that £400 million revenue has actually come pouring through the doors of the Treasury. I am told that roughly two of the 200 cases have been successful, so 198 have failed.

The frustrating aspect of the situation is that all the other self-employed souls who had to try to change their arrangements to comply with the legislation have suffered cost and a waste of their time only to find that the measure does not work. It has not brought in the revenue that we were told that it would and it has created a bureaucratic nightmare for the law-abiding majority who have tried to comply with it. The situation shows that, as is so often the case with the Government, they are all talk and no action.

I have worries about this Bill and the Bill that we should have considered, but I have hopes for the Bill that I know we will consider under a Conservative Government in just a few weeks. The Bill is ill considered and has been poorly drafted in a rush with little care, consideration or consultation, but that is typical of the Government. It is frankly incomplete.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): Before my hon. Friend concludes what has been a good speech, may I take him back briefly to stamp duty land tax, on which he is not a pedant, but most certainly an expert? Did he notice the article that appeared in The Independent on the morning immediately after the Budget, which mocked the Chancellor for effectively presenting the measure to reduce the relief for disadvantaged areas as a productivity measure? The article said that even this Chancellor of the Exchequer could not argue that that tax increase was actually a productivity measure. Does my hon. Friend have any sympathy with that sentiment?

Mr. Prisk: I have come to learn that the Chancellor and indeed the Prime Minister can argue anything that they wish. They can certainly have a conviction, but it might be a different conviction today from what it was yesterday. I agree with my hon. Friend that the article is another sign that people are beginning to see through the smoke and mirrors of the current Chancellor. When he gets to the awkward figures, he has a lovely way of rushing through them. When he gets to the tricky parts, one notices that there is a subtext in the clause that one must read an hour later with a wet towel around one's head in a dark room. I am afraid that I must describe his presentation, especially when he speaks in front of his party, as the incomprehensible lecturing the innumerate, and that is all too often the nature of his Budgets.

The Bill has been poorly drafted and ill considered, although not for want of our trying. It was very generous of the Government to leave the open green acres in front of us where their 400-odd Members could have been sitting—sadly they must have something else to do, although I cannot imagine what. We have tried our best to draw out some of the details of the Bill, so we look forward to the full and frank explanation that I know the Financial Secretary will wish to give us.

3.49 pm

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I refer the House to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

Last time there was an attempt to rush through a Finance Bill in one day, which was in 1992—I have had more time to look at that than I have at the Bill itself because it has been produced at such short notice—proceedings were interrupted by a fire.

Mr. Boateng: I remember it well.

Mr. Tyrie: I vaguely remember that a Labour Member—it might even have been the Chief Secretary—accused the Conservatives of having started the fire. There has been no such disaster in the House yet, but there has been a huge power cut just south of the river. Disasters seem to accompany attempts to rush through Finance Bills, but so far, so good. We have not had any trouble yet.

[Mr. Tyrie]

I associate myself with the good wishes that have been expressed for the Chief Secretary's proposed career move to South Africa. I hope all goes well, if it goes at all. I note that not a single Labour Back Bencher has felt the need or the urge to say anything about the Bill. I find that pretty extraordinary.

Mr. Prisk: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend by offering a possible explanation. It has been suggested to me that either Labour Back Benchers do not like the Budget or they are desperate to hold on to their seats. Which does he think is true?

Mr. Tyrie: Those are two interesting options, and we can all make up our own minds.

Despite the fact that no Labour Back Bencher has been present, we have not been short of interesting contributions by Opposition Members. We had an interesting speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who mentioned the Institute for Fiscal Studies study. He made the relevant point that for the first time since the early 1990s, real disposable incomes have fallen. That is because of the increases in taxation pushed through by the Chancellor since 2001, despite promises not to do so.

My right hon. Friend also correctly alluded to the distributional effects of freezing personal allowances, also mentioned by the IFS. As a result, 7.5 million more taxpayers are paying tax at a higher marginal rate than they would have done had allowances been indexed. That is a crucial point. Of course, the tax burden is going up and up, and it will carry on doing so. Labour used to try to conceal that in the Red Book. Now, the graph just shows the upward trend, which can be found on page 255.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) made an important point about how Finance Bills are inadequately scrutinised. I completely agree. He is a member of the Treasury Committee. This is not the appropriate time to expand on this, but the Select Committee should play a much larger role in the scrutiny of Finance Bills. We should come to this place and debate what needs to be done on the basis of detailed scrutiny produced by the Committee before we go through the Bill clause by clause. We have moved in the opposite direction today, and there has been virtually no time to prepare for adequate scrutiny.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) also made some very important points, in a typically engaging and lucid speech. He mentioned ISAs and the extent to which the Government have eroded the attractiveness of the incentive to save throughout the tax system. Of course, that is only one of the causes of the fall in the savings ratio. There are a number of others. Financial scandals have not helped, especially Equitable Life. The Government have done their best to sweep that under the carpet and to avoid paying compensation for it.

Another cause of the fall in the savings ratio is the fall in the stock market, but that is not separate from the fiscal concerns, because of course one of the causes of the stock market falls was the Government's £5 billion raid on pension funds. When £5 billion is taken from pension funds, what is the effect on share prices? Answer: all things being equal, share prices fall. Therefore the origin of the market fall, often described as a separate cause of the fall in the ratio, lies partly with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

My right hon. Friend also commented on the fact that the Government have not produced an estimate of the effects on carbon emissions of changing the structure of VED rates. He also talked about biofuels, on which he is an expert—indeed, he is the leading expert on that subject in the House of Commons, a result of his time as a Treasury Minister and a Select Committee Chairman.

My right hon. Friend described the effect on taxpayers of successive Budgets in a pertinent phrase, "the pinch has come on the mass of taxpayers". He is quite right. That pinch has taken some time to come on, for reasons that he and others have explored. The savings ratio has roughly halved, although that is a net figure. The other side of that ratio is the increase in borrowing—people increased their borrowing to maintain their spending, which delayed the onset of the pinch. Now, they are finally beginning to think about how to pay back that borrowing, so the pinch really is coming on. The two points that my right hon. Friend made at the beginning and the end of his speech are therefore closely connected. He also made some excellent points about inheritance tax. I shall not repeat them, but they were important and powerful points.

My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) made a characteristically erudite and forceful speech in which he drew attention to the shoddy nature of some of the Finance Bills that we have been expected to consider. When I picked up the Bill this morning, it was described to me by the man who passed it to me from the Table Office, not as the Finance Bill or even as the revised Finance Bill, but as the draft Finance Bill. I replied that as I had to try to speak to it this afternoon, I wanted the final version. It is pretty disgraceful that we have to scrutinise legislation in such a fashion. My hon. Friend made several other trenchant points, not least about the damage done to the pensions industry in recent years and the reasons why final salary schemes have got into difficulties. One of the main reasons is, of course, Government policy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) correctly pointed out that we saw the revised Bill only this morning. He also alluded to the importance of listening to experts before we attempt to scrutinise a Bill in detail. A key part of the Finance Bill process is that we are able to draw on the considered views of others. Presumably, they too have been passed this bundle of papers on a Treasury tag and been told that it is a draft Bill. They are now expected to get their points across in the brief period available to us before the debate ends—indeed, they have been trying to do so.

Next, my hon. Friend talked about stamp duty, and when he talks about stamp duty, I listen. He knows a great deal about the subject. He correctly pointed out that the Government only want their money—the extra revenue—and are not really interested in making stamp duty work better or more effectively. As he said, every time the Government reform stamp duty, the paperwork burden seems to increase. That will almost certainly be the result of the latest proposed changes.

The House and the country have grown accustomed to the way in which these things happen. The Chancellor announces a Budget, then a Finance Bill is introduced, which we discuss in the Chamber. We start with bluff and bluster. There is a firework display from the Chancellor on Budget day that no one can understand, but everyone thinks it sounds okay. We are thrown dozens of statistics in a wholly indigestible form, then we are expected to try to work out what is going on from a Red Book—I have the two most recent Red Books with me today—that increasingly owes more to party propaganda than to an explanation of economic developments in the country. Despite the Chancellor's best efforts to cover his tracks, in most years, although the Budget receives a good reception for a few days, it soon becomes a one-week wonder. The paint starts to peel off as people have an opportunity to study the detailed press releases. As soon as the Finance Bill is published and they have a chance to look at it carefully, they realise that a bit more paint deserves to come off.

This year's Budget was not a one-week wonder, and not even a one-day wonder. It can best be described as a one-hour wonder, because it took only minutes to flip through the Red Book and discover, for example, that the £200 allowance for the over-65s to compensate them for a huge increase in council tax over the past eight years will be implemented for one year only. When the Chief Secretary was challenged on that very point in an interview on, I believe, Budget day, he said, "Well, all our measures are only for one year." [Interruption.] I do not have the transcript with me, but if he would like to deny that that was the purport of his remarks, I am happy to give him the opportunity to do so. He does not seem to want to do so. He effectively said, "Don't trust us to implement any of the later years stuff in the Red Book. It's all for one year only. Don't worry, it's not just the £200 that you can rely on us to implement for one year but everything." Perhaps he did not say so—he is welcome to deny it at the Dispatch Box.

When that £200 was announced in the Budget speech, I was watching members of the Government carefully. The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions formed his fingers into the shape of a gun, which he pointed at the Conservatives, as if to fire a bullet. It made a good image for television for an hour or so—as I said, the Budget was a one-hour wonder—but by the evening the more alert broadcasters had removed it from their clips, because they realised that the £200 was available for one year only. A good number of pensioners in my constituency have already written to me, and like pensioners across the country, they have twigged that the £200 is for one year only. In the coming campaign, I shall make sure that every pensioner knows about that Labour measure. I will tell them that Labour has offered them £200, but that if the party is re-elected, they will lose it next year. It is a spectacular own goal from Labour. To put it another way, the Work and Pensions Secretary would have done much better to point that pistol at his own head.

Nothing better illustrates what has been wrong with Labour over most of the past decade than that measure, which is designed to create a specific impression, and is public relations spin over substance. We have heard the same story on stamp relief—relief for disadvantaged areas will be ended while at the same time in the Budget speech there was a pretence that some extra relief will be given. There has also been a hidden raid on oil companies, and a good deal more.

In a few weeks' time, we will present a Budget that can be trusted. We will publish a Red Book that can be understood, and we will ensure that the Office for National Statistics, made fully independent by an incoming Conservative Government, publishes figures on which we can all rely for the first time in almost a decade. We will use forecasts that have been put together independently of the Government, under the supervision of the Comptroller and Auditor General of the National Audit Office. I have argued for over a decade that we should move in that direction, and I am pleased that in a few weeks we shall have the opportunity to do so.

It is high time that we ended the disgraceful gerrymandering of the statistics that has taken place. The fiddling on the private finance initiative, the attempt to reclassify working family tax credits and much else in the accounts was a scandal, and we ought to bring it to an end. When the tax revenues were pouring in, it did not matter so much, because the Government felt sure that they were well within their fiscal rules. Now the shoe is beginning to pinch. Now it looks as though every little bit is vital to enable the Government to meet their fiscal rules. That is where the Government will come under pressure in the next few weeks.

At the heart of the Finance Bill is the issue of trust. Why should the electorate trust the Chancellor and the Prime Minister when they tell us that there will be no further tax rises after the election, should they win it? There are two overwhelming reasons why the electorate will not trust them. The first is that we have been there before. We have heard it all before. Before the 1997 election the Prime Minister said that he had no plans to raise taxes at all. What happened immediately afterwards? Tax rises for everybody. Then there was the 2001 pledge. The Prime Minister said words to the effect that it would be reasonable to conclude that national insurance contributions would not go up. What happened after the election? They went up. That is the first reason why the public will not trust what the Government are saying about the economy.

The second reason has already been discussed extensively. The Financial Secretary did his best to handle the situation by plucking Goldman Sachs out of the hat, up against about 20 commentators, including the International Monetary Fund, which is extremely cautious about the statements that it produces. I know how the IMF operates, and I know that it checks its statements with the country's Finance Ministry before putting them out, and invites the Finance Ministry to challenge the detailed methodology that lies behind its calculations. Even the IMF concluded that there is a black hole in the accounts, which will have to be filled somehow. The Government's history shows that if they get the chance, they will fill it through higher taxation.

The Government have consistently overestimated corporate tax revenues. The Institute for Fiscal Studies asked the right question the morning after the Budget when it said:

"The key question confronting whoever is Chancellor after the election remains the same . . . is it plausible to expect the current budget balance to improve by 2.2 per cent. of national income . . .

[Mr. Tyrie]

by 2009–10? . . . is it prudent to expect revenues to go up by £27 billion over the same 5-year period without fresh tax raising announcements?"

That was the correct and crucial question. As I pointed out in the Budget debate, the IFS answered its own question. It said:

"We think that to achieve these forecasts requires the Chancellor to raise taxes . . . by £11 billion a year."

The Opposition are not in the forecasting business, and we do not intend to get into it, but we are listening to outside forecasters. They tell us there is a structural deficit—a black hole in the accounts. The choice for the electorate is clear. If people vote Labour, the black hole will be filled by higher taxes, but there is much more at stake than merely a tax rise.

The Bill, even though I have not had a chance to read it properly—I do not think that any Opposition Member has, because we have had it for only a few hours—illustrates the bigger problem. Successive Finance Bills have ended up reducing wealth creation—complicated, difficult to understand, loading enforcement costs on a range of wealth creators in the country. I cannot do better than to end with the words of the Prime Minister's former chief economic adviser on exactly that point. [Interruption.] Someone shouts "Who?" across the Floor of the House, as if by doing so they can somehow expunge this fellow from history—a sort of latter-day painting-out of Trotsky from the photograph of those who did all the hard and dirty work in Nos. 10 and 11 these past days. I am referring to the former chief economic adviser to the Prime Minister, who said:

"Britain's economic arteries are slowly being furred up by a higher and more complicated tax system, excessive regulation and . . . endless micro-management."

I could not have put it better myself.

4.11 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): We have had an interesting debate and I am pleased to be able to respond to a number of the points that have been made.

The key to this year's Budget is the remarkable stability that we have seen in the British economy since 1997. In the 18 years from 1979 to 1997, the UK had the least stable economy in the G7, with the single exception of Canada. Since 1997, the UK has had the most stable economy in the G7, bar none. That has been a remarkable transformation, benefiting every aspect of Britain's economy and of our society.

National debt is down. Since 1997, no G7 country has had lower debts and deficits than we have had. Inflation since 1997 has been half on average what it was before. Interest rates and mortgage rates have been halved. Disposable income has grown faster than it did under the previous Government. Unemployment is the lowest that it has been for a generation and there are 2 million more people in work. Every week, another 125,000 men and women find new jobs, and an additional 50,000 new vacancies are advertised.

We have had 50 consecutive quarters of growth in the economy for the first time since quarterly records began.

Mr. Tyrie: How many of those were under a Conservative Government?

Mr. Timms: There was a period of growth under the previous Government. What is remarkable, however, and what was never achieved under any Conservative Government, was the securing of 50 consecutive quarters of growth. It is the transformation from the short booms and then the busts that characterised the previous Government to this long period of stability and steady growth that has been so remarkable and so important and valuable to our economy and society.

The economy grew by over 3 per cent. last year for the second year running, hitting, incidentally, precisely the forecast that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had made and for which he was attacked by Opposition Members for being far too optimistic. We have had some discussion today about forecasts and projections. My right hon. Friend was entirely vindicated over that issue and will be over the other matters that we have discussed as well.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman draws attention to the Chancellor's record in forecasting growth in the economy, and he is right to say that the Chancellor's record in forecasting the growth of GDP is not bad. Would he like to address his attention to the Chancellor's record in forecasting the public sector deficit, which is under his direct control, and would he remind the House that in every year of the last five, the Chancellor has projected that that will turn down, and none of those five forecasts has been correct?

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for rightly paying tribute to my right hon. Friend for the accuracy of his forecasts on growth. We have not heard much about that today from Opposition Members and one understands why, but it is important and right to put that on the record.

As to the other issues that the right hon. Gentleman raises, as he knows, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out in 1997 the fiscal rules, including the golden rule and the sustainable investment rule, and we have kept to them. We have set out the figures in the Red Book showing that we will keep to those rules on the basis of cautious assumptions. That is the basis on which the economy has been managed and on which this new stability has so successfully been built. It is the basis on which we need to continue to go forward and maintain this new, transformed record of stability and growth in the economy.

Mr. Dorrell: The Financial Secretary has shifted the terms of the argument. He was inviting the House to applaud the Chancellor's forecasting record. When one looks at the Chancellor's record in forecasting the public sector deficit, one sees that he has got it catastrophically wrong, with the result that we are landed with more debt and more interest costs going forward than he planned or promised in his last Budget before the previous general election.

Mr. Timms: The national debt is down and we have the lowest debt in the whole G7. There has been an extraordinary record of success under this Government and Chancellor. It is essential for the future that we lock in that record of stability that has been so important and valuable. The new confidence that has come from that stability has been of immense importance. We have 300,000 more business in the UK than in 1997, and every week there are 4,000 more. There has been a 50 per cent. increase in net household wealth and 1.5 million more people own their homes. Those are just some of the gains from the transformation that has occurred in the British economy since 1997. We and the country know that our first priority must be to hold on to that prize of stability, and not to put it at risk by policy lurches or by £35 billion-worth of reductions in public spending commitments. Stability has been a massive prize for Britain, and the Bill helps to ensure that it will be maintained and locked in for the future.

Mr. Jack: Let me take the Financial Secretary back to the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell). The Financial Secretary has not answered the central question as to what factors in the forecasting performance of the Chancellor have led to the fact that, since the 2001–02 financial year, the deficit has grown by about two and a half times in real terms compared with the original forecast figures. At a time when the economy has been growing at such a rate, we should be accumulating balances, not increasing deficits. He talks about the structural soundness of the economy, so will he explain why the economy is not doing what it should do?

Mr. Timms: The right hon. Gentleman is focusing on the difference between two very large numbers. The fact is that we have the lowest debt in the whole G7 and a remarkably successful record. The IMF has been referred to, and it has repeated that point recently. We must now ensure that we maintain that record of stability, which has been so valuable to us.

The Bill builds on Britain's new-found economic stability. It helps to prepare us for the challenges of the future, supports innovation and investment in new technologies and helps to ensure that the tax system is fair and that everybody pays their share. It safeguards the environment, recognising our responsibility for long-term stewardship of the earth's resources. I am pleased that that topic was raised.

Mr. George Osborne: The Financial Secretary quoted the IMF with approval. Does he therefore accept its judgment that the national accounts have "deteriorated sharply" in the past five years?

Mr. Timms: The key to the success that we have seen in managing the economy over the eight years since 1997 is stability and the fact that we have published and kept to the fiscal rules, the golden rule and sustainable investment rule. We have published the figures in the Red Book showing how we will do that in the future, in this cycle and the next, on the basis of cautious assumptions. Our record is enviable—it is 1 million times better than that of the previous Government, and the hon. Gentleman should pay tribute to it.

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Mr. Timms: I will not give way for a little while, because I must make some progress. I have been extremely generous to Conservative Members.

The Bill provides much-needed help to children, pensioners and home buyers. The increase in the child element of the child tax credit means that the effective income tax rate for a family with two children earning £25,000 a year will be just 6 per cent. At £30,000 it will be 10 per cent., so it is a family tax cut that targets the hardworking low and middle-income families who will benefit from it most.

The Bill includes important changes to remove the tax impediments to Sharia-compliant Islamic finance products. Last year's Bill fixed a problem with the way in which stamp duty affected Sharia-compliant mortgages. This year, the Bill extends the benefits of that change and alters the rules for income tax, corporation tax and capital gains tax to remove impediments to Sharia-compliant saving and loan products. It is important that everyone in our society has access to financial services that meet their needs, so that everyone can be included and benefit fully from the strength of our economy.

The measures in the Bill to simplify pensions taxation will provide more flexibility and choice as people plan for retirement. They will help employers and pension providers, and they have received very wide support from pensions providers, employers, and individual pension savers. The assurance that people will receive a meaningful proportion of their pension saving in the event of their employer becoming insolvent provides an important boost to confidence in pension saving.

I want to respond to a number of points raised in the debate. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) helpfully explained to the House why the Opposition accepted the clauses in the Bill. He also mentioned representations on behalf of companies in the film industry. He spent a good deal of his time objecting to things that are not in the Bill, however, and I look forward to debating those matters with him after the election.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) made several points with which I agree, but I did not agree with a number of his other points. He discussed his party's plans for local income tax. Under Liberal Democrat plans, a couple on average earnings with a combined income of £41,000 would see their income tax increase by £1,170, which, on average, would make them more than £260 worse off compared with council tax. Once people realise that if two people are working in a household, that household will have pay its local income tax twice, the apparent attractions of that proposal rapidly disappear.

The hon. Member for Twickenham mentioned the pension credit. The Financial Services Authority has stated that pension credit means that "for most people, most of the time, it will pay to have saved."

The pension credit has been extremely effective in addressing pensioner poverty, which was a big problem in 1997.

Mr. Tyrie: The Financial Secretary has just said that there will be some benefit in saving for most people, most of the time. What about the rest of the people?

Mr. Timms: It is certainly worth while for the great majority of people to save for their retirements. At the time of the 1997 election, large numbers of people had an income of £69 a week. From this month, all of those people are entitled to an income of at least £109 a week, which is a massive change for the better. We have focused on addressing pensioner poverty in an extremely effective way through the pension credit.

[Mr. Timms]

On the specific point raised by the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie), the pension credit gives credit for savings. It removes the problem of large numbers of people being on 100 per cent. withdrawal rates, which was a result of how income support arrangements worked under the previous Government, and many more than 1 million people were affected by those 100 per cent. withdrawal rates.

I should like to spend time responding to many of the points that have been made, but I must be a little briefer than I would have been because of the interventions that I have taken. I need to comment particularly on the comments of the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who talked about the way in which tax thresholds have changed. Listening to him, an innocent observer would have believed that under his stewardship—as he told us, he was Financial Secretary after 1992— thresholds went up in line with earnings. Helpfully, I have been able to dig out what actually happened to the higher rate threshold in the period that he discussed. It is true that in 1991–92—the period leading up to the 1992 election—the threshold was over-indexed; one cannot deny that that occurred. However, in 1992–93, when the right hon. Gentleman was Financial Secretary, the threshold was not only not increased in line with earnings, but not increased at all—and, blow me down, it was exactly the same the following year and the year after that. It was frozen for three years in a row.

Mr. Dorrell: I compared the record over the period of this Government from 1997 to 2005, during which time 7.5 million people have seen their marginal rate of tax increase. For the period from 1979 to 1997, will the Financial Secretary confirm that the Conservative Government cut marginal rates of tax for all income tax payers during those 18 years?

Mr. Timms: The right hon. Gentleman is shifting the goalposts somewhat. He chided me about uprating thresholds, which we have done consistently; under his stewardship, those thresholds were frozen. Incidentally, the hon. Member for Chichester accused us of freezing the threshold, but we have not—we have consistently uprated it in line with inflation. Under the stewardship of the right hon. Member for Charnwood, the thresholds were completely unchanged for three years in a row; in this Budget, we increased them.

Mr. Tyrie: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Timms: No, I will not.

I want to come on to the other issue that the right hon. Member for Charnwood raised. Of course, it is true that nowadays people are earning more. More than twice the number of people are earning more than £30,000, more than £50,000 and more than £100,000 than in 1997. It is absolutely right that as people's real income rises so does the average tax that they pay. That is the basis of a fair, progressive income tax system, and that is the system that we have ensured that we have in place.

The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) made an interesting speech. I can tell him that we certainly are going to achieve our Kyoto targets. On vehicle emissions, we have a good record compared with other European Union members. For example, box 7.3 in the Red Book provides information about how the changes to company car tax have affected CO_2 emissions; that work will need to continue.

The right hon. Gentleman talked about biofuels, which is a subject of great interest to him. We have been very supportive of the growth in biofuels sales—that is why we introduced the 20p per litre level for biodiesel in 1992. I think that he will be aware, although he did not mention it, of the work that is going on in relation to a renewable transport fuels obligation. Good progress has been made on the feasibility study, and we are continuing discussions with industry on a possible enhanced capital allowance for the cleanest processing plants. That directly addresses the point that he made.

We have had an interesting debate, throughout which one point of consistent unanimity was the warm praise and generous tributes accorded to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary. It is clear from what everyone has said that the whole House wishes my right hon. Friend well in the future. To those tributes to him that have already been expressed, I add my own.

The Bill before the House builds on the stability that has been achieved in the past eight years, takes that stability forward and addresses the priorities of fairness and sustainable growth. I commend it to the House and I commend the values that underpin it to the people.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 63 (Committal of Bills),

That the Bill be committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Question agreed to.

Bill immediately considered in Committee.

[SYLVIA HEAL in the Chair]

Clause 1

RATES OF TOBACCO PRODUCTS DUTY

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

4.30 pm

Mr. Francois: I will make a few brief remarks on the clause, but before doing so I also want to refer to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. I paid tribute to him when I wound up for the Opposition on the evening of Monday 21 March during the Budget debate, and the House will be pleased to hear that I do not propose to reprise all of that now. But I should point out briefly that the shadow Paymaster General, my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie), reminded the House a few minutes ago that a major power cut has taken place in south London today. To paraphrase Lord Grey, the lights are going out all over Britain for this Labour Government, so the Chief Secretary—

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sylvia Heal): Order. The clause under discussion is actually "Rates of tobacco products duty".

Mr. Francois: Thank you, Mrs. Heal. I was simply going to say that I wish the Chief Secretary to the Treasury all success in the future, and he has clearly picked the right time to get out.

We are now in Committee and in the curious position of having to deal with 106 clauses, in what is still a 1 inch thick Bill, in barely half an hour. Given our constrained circumstances, I will make just a few quick points on each of the clauses that we Conservatives wish to highlight.

On clause 1, I want to press Ministers on what actions they are taking to combat tobacco smuggling. That issue has been raised with me on a number of occasions, particularly by small retailers, who are seriously suffering from the effects of such smuggling. I am thinking of organisations such as "Retailers Against Smuggling", which have made several representations on that point. I also have a letter from the chief executive of the Tobacco Manufacturers' Association, who wrote very promptly—as recently as yesterday—about the matter. He said:

"I write to you with some urgency, as I understand that certain sections of the Finance Bill including the clause on increased tobacco tax, are soon to be debated in the House. We were disappointed that the Chancellor proposed increases in taxation, particularly the rises on hand rolling tobacco, where 73 per cent. consumed in the UK last year were non duty paid i.e. they avoided UK taxes.

The Treasury sub-committee warned in their recent report that the smuggling of hand rolling tobacco was 'out of control'. Furthermore we estimate that 28 per cent. of cigarettes consumed avoided UK duty . . . The Treasury sub-committee also reported that one in four shopkeepers were considering closing down as a result of the impact tobacco smuggling was having on their business . . . In the limited opportunity left to you because of the restricted time I would urge you to question Her Majesty's Government's thinking on this subject, and speak up for the small retailers whose livelihood is severely threatened as a result of these Budgetary proposals."

On that basis, I would like to ask the Financial Secretary—[Interruption.] Oh, I see that the Economic Secretary, who has direct responsibility for these matters, is now in his place—[Interruption.] He was in his place only for part of the debate, but has just re-entered the Chamber. Perhaps he will listen to my three questions and either he or the Financial Secretary will reply to them.

First, what further actions does the Treasury propose to combat tobacco smuggling in general? Secondly and more specifically, what measures are proposed to combat the smuggling of hand-rolled tobacco, which has become a particular problem? Clearly, small retailers are suffering disproportionately from the smuggling of that form of tobacco and Conservative Members want to know exactly what the Government propose to combat it. Thirdly, how will the Government ensure that controls remain in place, given the impending merger of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue? I ask that question because, with any merger, it is sometimes the case that important measures can fall between two stools during the period of transition. That cannot be allowed to happen. I hope that the appropriate Minister will answer those three specific questions in a specific manner.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): I was hoping to speak when we reached stamp duty land tax, but perhaps I have an opportunity to say a few words now. We have in the House, though unfortunately not for much longer, the world's greatest living expert on stamp duty land tax—the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. He took the brief at the last minute and, as usual, he acquitted himself with great style and verve. He is unfailingly courteous and I view his leaving the House as a very sad loss, indeed. I want to pay tribute to him for his courteousness, his expertise and his pleasant convivial demeanour. He has added greatly to the proceedings of this place.

I should like to say a few words about tobacco products duty. I may be somewhat jumping the gun because clauses 2 and 3 refer to alcoholic liquor duties. The Economic Secretary and I have discussed at length the problems of London City Bond and Mr. Justice Butterfield's report on the hundreds of millions of pounds lost through liquor duty fraud. I am anxious to hear that Ministers have got a grip on this situation; we cannot allow such fraud to continue.

The First Deputy Chairman: We shall reach clauses 2 and 3 after we have finished debating clause 1, so the hon. Member will have an opportunity to comment further then.

Mr. Burnett: I am grateful: I believe that the smuggling involved cigarettes as well as liquor, but I could be wrong and stand to be corrected. I shall give Ministers ample advance warning—about a minute—that I hope to hear what they have done in respect of the Butterfield report and its recommendations. We cannot allow any recurrence of this sort of fraud when hundreds of millions of pounds are lost to the Revenue. When that happens, who picks up the Bill? It is our fellow citizens and taxpayers of this country.

Mr. Fallon: I rise briefly to follow up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) about the report of the Treasury Sub-Committee on excise duty fraud. Given how little time remains for the Government to reply, it would be helpful if a Minister clarified whether we will receive a full Government response to our recommendations, which are very relevant to the three questions that my hon. Friend proposed. Before the House dissolves on Monday, perhaps we could have such a reassurance.

Mr. Timms: The inflation increase in clause 1 maintains the high real price of cigarettes. The aim is to encourage people to smoke less or to quit, and to discourage children and young people from taking up the habit. The organisation Action on Smoking and Health has welcomed the proposal.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) is right to raise the issue of smuggling. The Government have acknowledged that that is a pressing and important problem, and we have taken effective action over an extended period to address it. As a result, tobacco smuggling is being contained. In the past four years, Customs and Excise has succeeded in halting the previous rapid growth in cigarette smuggling, and in reducing the market share for illicit cigarettes to the current level of 15 per cent. That is still too high, but it is significantly lower than previously.

[Mr. Timms]

The total number of cigarettes smuggled into the UK each year has been reduced by more than 5 billion sticks, a fall of more than a third. In the same period, when cross-channel passenger smuggling was cut by more than three quarters, there has been a rise of 33 per cent. in legal cross-border shopping for alcohol and tobacco. That clearly shows that an effective balance has been struck between maintaining the rights and opportunities of shoppers and cracking down on smuggling.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh mentioned hand-rolling tobacco specifically. As he will know, the Budget statement acknowledged explicitly that the pattern of smuggling for such tobacco is different, and made it clear that the Government are responding accordingly. I can reassure him that the very effective focus on tackling smuggling will be maintained through the forthcoming merger of the Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue. I agree that it is important that that focus is not lost, and assure him that it will not be.

Mr. Francois: I heard what the Minister said, and do not wish to detain the House for long, given the present circumstances. He acknowledged the specific problem in relation to hand-rolling tobacco—on behalf of the industry, I thank him for that—but made no specific suggestions for further Government action to combat it, which will disappoint retailers around the country. With an election pending, it is only fair to warn him that we intend to do what we can to warn retailers that the Government do not take their concerns seriously.

Mr. Timms: That is a very unfair response. The Government have brought about a very dramatic reduction in the smuggling of tobacco and cigarettes. The problem is being contained, and that certainly was not the case under the previous Conservative Government. That is a reflection of the vigour with which we have pursued the problem, and we will ensure that we continue to apply the same vigour in the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Burnett: On a point of order, Mrs. Heal. I have been asking all day for a copy of the regulations governing inheritance tax on pre-owned assets, which were published a week or two ago. Vote Office staff have been unable to get hold of those regulations, even though they will be debated in connection with clause 98. I should be grateful if you would do all that you can to ensure that a copy of those regulations is made available to the Committee.

The First Deputy Chairman: Ministers on the Treasury Bench will have heard what the hon. Gentleman had to say, but I am afraid that there is nothing that I personally can do. However, I think that the message will have been conveyed.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3

RATES OF DUTY ON WINE AND MADE-WINE

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

The First Deputy Chairman: I call Mr. Michael Fallon—I mean Mr. Michael Jack.

4.45 pm

Mr. Jack: That is the second time today that my name has not been called correctly, but perhaps it will be third time lucky.

Can the Minister satisfy my curiosity about the relative rates of duty per hectolitre on the wines described in the clause. The table in the clause starts with a reference to the percentage of alcohol by volume of the wines that are subject to the tax, so I conclude that the principal purpose of the clause is to tax the alcoholic content of the wine. However, I note that the duty rate on still wine—

"Wine or made-wine of a strength exceeding 5.5 per cent but not exceeding 15 per cent"— is £167.72 a hectolitre. I also note that within that category a wine that might be partially fermented—it would have the name frizzante, for example, if it was Italian—would be taxed at that rate and not at the much higher rate of £220.54 a hectolitre on wine that is fully sparkling.

It might be argued that that covers the majority of champagnes, for example, which are more expensive and could stand a higher rate of duty. However, the spumante-type sparkling wines and the cremant de Loire are lower-priced wines but have an alcoholic content of around 12 per cent. and seem to bear a disproportionately high rate of duty compared with the more expensive champagne-type wines and certainly more expensive than a wine with a higher alcoholic content in the first category that I mentioned. The rate of duty per hectolitre seems to be irrational if the duty rate relates to the alcohol content of the wine.

Those of us who enjoy wine and occasionally venture to sparkling wine—I am thinking of those of us who will want to celebrate the Conservative victory in the election on 5 May—would like a clear explanation of the duty rate differentials.

Mr. Timms: The Bill uprates the duty on still wine by 2.6 per cent., but there is a freeze on the duty on sparkling wine. The industry has argued for the differential between sparkling and still wine to be eliminated and by uprating the duty only on still wine we have narrowed that differential because the rate of duty on sparkling wine is unchanged. The hon. Gentleman's point is a reflection of historic development over an extended period. We believe that it is right to narrow the differential and that is why there is an increase in the duty on still wine but not that on sparkling wine.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4

CONSOLIDATION OF CURRENT RATES OF HYDROCARBON OIL DUTIES ETC.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Jack: I make no apology for rising again to discuss biofuels for a moment or two. I acknowledge at the outset the Financial Secretary's helpful comments when he wound up on Second Reading. Although discussions are taking place on the obligations, the emergence in the United Kingdom of a biofuels manufacturing industry still seems to be some way off, notwithstanding the observation in box 7.3 of the Red Book which states that "Since 2002, 43 million litres of biodiesel have been sold."

I acknowledge that there is an embryo sales industry, but there is an almost non-existent manufacturing source.

I continue to be worried by the representations made to my Committee, the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, that the current duty derogation rate is not of sufficient attraction to start an industry using UK-sourced oilseed rape as raw material. A parliamentary answer, to which I referred earlier, indicated that some manufacturing capacity was coming on stream, but not enough will come from UK sources to meet the target of 2.5 per cent. of biofuels included in hydrocarbon fuel sources which we must meet by 2006, and which rises to 6 per cent. in 2008. I apologise to the Committee if those figures and dates were slightly wrong; I do not have my detailed notes with me so I am speaking from memory.

It is argued that if we increased the duty beyond the derogation rate of 20p a litre, the UK would attract overseas sources of supply. Indeed, I am certain that Brazil could supply all our bioethanol needs. That seems to dodge the issue, however. At a time when UK agriculture is going through a singularly important process of change, as it adapts to the revised common agricultural policy, I should have thought that Ministers would want to encourage home-grown sources, in both the bioethanol and biodiesel industries, so that UK agriculture could be involved. The Minister will be aware that British Sugar, which is pioneering work on bioethanol in the UK, has at least submitted a planning application for a plant, but only subject to the conclusion of discussions with the Government on some form of aid. The long and the short of it is that if we do not have duty derogation rates, or possibly capital allowances, of such an order as to get that embryo industry off the ground, we shall have to import our biofuels if the Government want to achieve the European targets for the incorporation of biofuels in the hydrocarbon fuel supply.

It is illogical not to encourage that industry at the outset, because there are precedents. When the liquefied petroleum gas industry sought help, especially for investment in the necessary fuel station infrastructure, the Government provided a generous 40p per litre discount, which is gradually being unwound because the infrastructure has been established. One stage back, when we were moving from leaded to unleaded fuel, there was also a generous initial discount that was gradually unwound. I have not yet received a cogent explanation from the Treasury as to why, if we want to get our manufacturing industry off the ground, we are not being more generous in the first stages, so that economies of scale in biofuels production will eventually take over and enable the price to come down.

In debate on a previous Finance Bill, I pointed out to the Treasury that they could have all that for nothing, simply through an obligation of inclusion. They could say that there will be 2.5 per cent. biofuel, with the balance of 97.5 per cent. being hydrocarbons, and that the price will be such and such. That would exactly mirror and match what happens under the renewable fuels obligation in electricity generation. So far, Treasury Ministers have shied away from that, although I think that the Energy Act 2004 contains such a provision to solve the biofuels conundrum.

Ministers' colleagues in DEFRA show great enthusiasm and have even produced a beautiful, coloured booklet to tell us about the benefits of biofuels and the 5,000 jobs that will be created in rural Britain, yet sadly the Treasury is still camping on the ground that 20p is sufficient. However, the facts, as confirmed to me in a parliamentary answer from DEFRA, tell a different story. Will Treasury Ministers tell us when we shall actually get our UK biofuels industry?

Mr. Timms: The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) will have heard me refer earlier to the continued discussions with industry about the possibility of providing an enhanced capital allowance for the cleanest processing plants, which would directly address the issue that he raises. However, he would agree that the key prerequisite is to have an attractive market for suppliers to address. So, as we confirmed in the pre-Budget report, we are carrying out a feasibility study on the renewable transport fuels obligation, and good progress has been made in that study. That is the reason why we introduced the 20p a litre incentive for biodiesel in 2002, and the same differential for bioethanol from 1 January this year.

The right hon. Gentleman was a little dismissive, but early indications of the impact of the support for bioethanol show encouraging signs. We expect sales to increase from zero to 60 million litres a year by the end of this year, so a substantial market is starting to emerge. In addition—again, to address another of the specific points that he raised—those duty rates are guaranteed until 2008, under our commitment in the alternative fuels framework to provide industry with certainty and a three-year rolling guarantee for rates. So we are putting in place the building blocks for what I, too, hope will be a successful and sustainable industry in the future.

Mr. Jack: First, will the Financial Secretary confirm for the record where the 60 million litres of bioethanol will come from? Secondly, will he clarify whether he envisages a regime of twin-track fiscal help that combines the duty derogation with the capital allowances to which he refers? Will the two operate simultaneously?

Mr. Timms: Of course, the right hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that this is extremely early days for the industry and to make the point about the paucity of plants in the UK currently. Yes, I can confirm that we are simultaneously undertaking work on both the duty issues and the possibility of providing an enhanced capital allowance arrangement as well.

[Mr. Timms]

Mr. Francois: To comply with a self-denying ordinance that I announced a few minutes ago, I shall keep my remarks on the clause extremely brief, but I was attracted by the argument made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack). He referred to the fact that the duty differential for liquid petroleum gas has allowed LPG to spread relatively widely over the past few years. Slightly fewer than 1 million LPG vehicles or dual-use, petrol or diesel-LPG vehicles are now in use in the United Kingdom. The duty differential has been important in persuading oil companies, for example, to invest in the technology necessary to make that fuel available at petrol stations around the UK. So an example is already extant of how such things can work, and my right hon. Friend is right to raise it.

The farmers in my constituency would be willing to invest in that type of product if and when they believed that it was truly economically viable. The feedback that I have had from them in informal meetings with my local branches of the National Farmers Union is that we are not quite there yet and that the tipping point has not been reached, although I take note of the 60 million litre figure that the Financial Secretary recounted to the Committee.

Part of the problem is that something of a lively debate has been going on behind the scenes between DEFRA on one hand and the Treasury on the other, and to some extent, DEFRA has been looking for movement in this realm and, to some extent, the Treasury has been resistant. So I should like briefly to press the Financial Secretary, on behalf of my right hon. Friend and UK farmers, on whether he has anything else to offer in the few minutes of the debate that remain that may be of comfort to them and positively affect the investment decisions that they must make in the next year or so.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 4 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 5 to 9 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10

CORPORATION TAX

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Tyrie: This and the following clauses set the rates of corporation tax. In many ways, they are unexceptional. However, a number of issues are worth probing. The mainstream corporation tax rate of 30 per cent. has remained at that level for a long time. When it was brought down to that level, it was proudly boasted for a spell that it was the lowest in Europe. The small further fall took place after the main and very important reforms that were taken in the mid and late 1980s, which transformed the tax and the corporate environment in the United Kingdom. Incidentally, those reforms were vigorously opposed by Labour Members.

5 pm

The current rate of 30 per cent. certainly is not the lowest in Europe. Ireland has a rate of 12.5 per cent., Germany is announcing plans to bring its rate below 30 per cent. and a good number of accession countries have extremely attractive rates that are well below 30 per cent. I am a little concerned that the Government do not appreciate that the UK's rate is beginning to look a bit high. In a few weeks, we will be on the other side of the Committee and will be able to sort that out and start pointing a way towards further reform of the tax. We have already outlined one or two suggestions. I am particularly concerned that the Government do not appear to have a clear view about where they want to take corporation tax. I would be grateful if they said something about that and the competitive environment.

Another concern is that corporation tax is only one of a number of tax burdens on business that companies are expected to pay. Its yield constitutes only about a quarter of the total yield that comes from businesses, and that excludes pay-as-you-earn, national insurance contributions, salaries and VAT.

Can the Financial Secretary say a little about the recent European Court of Justice decisions that are coming through? What is his estimate of the likely losses to the UK's yield from those decisions? It is an important issue that we will have to address when we are on the other side of the Committee, but I shall be interested to hear whether the Government have made an effort to think it through.

Mr. Timms: I shall be brief given the time constraints that we are under. Our corporation tax rate—at 30 per cent.—is lower than in any other major European country. The hon. Gentleman implicitly stated, and I shall make it explicit, that this Government reduced the rate to 30 per cent. from the higher rate that it had been under the previous Government. In addition, in the Budget of 2002, we cut the starting rate of corporation tax from 10 per cent. to zero, and the lower rate for small companies from 20 per cent. to 19 per cent. I have no doubt at all that that is one of the reasons that the World Bank in September last year ranked the UK first in Europe and seventh of the top 20 countries to conduct business in and why the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development last year put the UK's economic and administrative regulations among the lowest in the OECD.

It is important that we continue to maintain a competitive and attractive tax environment in the UK for businesses. The fact that we have such an attractive environment is the reason that we continue to be the most attractive destination in Europe for inward investment. We are determined that that should continue.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 10 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 11 and 12 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 13

NON-CORPORATE DISTRIBUTION RATE FOR FINANCIAL YEAR 2005

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Dorrell: I would like to speak briefly to clause 13 because it makes well a point that several of my hon. Friends raised on Second Reading. The Bill is being rushed through without the opportunity to consider fully the practical effect that it will have. Of course, clause 13 is in the Bill only because there was an ill-considered proposal to introduce new arrangements to encourage incorporation by businesses that were previously incorporated in an earlier Finance Bill. The Chancellor himself introduced an unnecessary complexity into the tax system, so we are now being asked, at the run, to agree to the clause, which I think has the practical effect of dealing with one of the consequences of the Chancellor's earlier rushed and ill-advised legislation.

The clause is a good example of a measure that would have been better dealt with after mature reflection in the summer following the general election when it would have been available to hon. Members—

It being four hours after the commencement of proceedings on the Ways and Means motion, THE FIRST DEPUTY CHAIRMAN put the Questions necessary to dispose of the business to be concluded at that hour, pursuant to Order [this day].

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 13 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 14 to 106 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedules 1 to 11 agreed to.

Bill reported, without amendment; read the Third time, and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL

Ordered,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to appropriate the supply authorised in this Session of Parliament for the service of the year ending with 31st March 2006.—[Jim Fitzpatrick.]

Bill ordered to be brought in by the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Paul Boateng, Dawn Primarolo, Mr. Stephen Timms and John Healey.

APPROPRIATION

Mr. Stephen Timms accordingly presented a Bill to appropriate the supply authorised in this Session of Parliament for the service of the year ending with 31 March 2006: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be printed [Bill 103].

Order for Second Reading read.

Question, That the Bill be now read a Second time, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 56 (Consolidated Fund Bills), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith, and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Orders of the Day

Inquiries Bill [Lords]

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

5.9 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

One of the fundamental principles in our democracy is accountability to the public. They rightly expect that, when something goes wrong, it will be investigated and put right. We have a long tradition of establishing formal independent and open inquiries into matters that have caused public concern. We have seen how valuable inquiries are at getting to the truth and learning lessons to prevent the same thing from going wrong again. In that sense, they serve to restore public confidence by doing just that. We have also seen the significant impact that they have had on our public services.

The Stephen Lawrence inquiry brought about profound and important changes that continue to this day in the police force and other public bodies. The Victoria Climbié inquiry into a young girl's tragic death in my constituency is another example of an inquiry that was instrumental in bringing about reform to public services and, in this case, children's services.

The Bill has a simple purpose: to enable the people who conduct inquiries to do their job and to get to the truth in the most open way possible more effectively. It contains new measures to ensure that the three vital principles of independence, transparency and accountability of those inquiries are achieved. It is essential that any inquiry is independent and is seen to be so.

The Bill strengthens the independence of an inquiry by creating a new statutory requirement to ensure that inquiry panels are impartial. It also gives the inquiry chairman full legal powers to seek whatever evidence he needs within the inquiry's terms of reference. It does not, as some have suggested, give Ministers free rein to control inquiries in a way that suits their interests. It clearly sets out the respective roles of Ministers and those conducting the inquiry. It clearly spells out in statute what has been regarded as good practice in many inquiries.

The Bill will lead to greater accountability to the public, bringing new requirements to publish and contain costs. The chairman must have regard to costs as well as fairness when planning and conducting proceedings. The procedural rules to be made under the Bill will also aid decision making and strengthen the chairman's hand in controlling costs.

Many hon. Members made valuable contributions to the Bill's scrutiny and we had the opportunity to examine key aspects in debates on probing amendments. My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright) and his colleagues on the Public Administration Committee merit particular credit for their work. The Committee produced a thorough report on many aspects of the inquiry system and helped to inform debates. It will no doubt be a valuable source of best practice. I also express my thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell), who contributed her useful experience from the Select Committee to the work of the Standing Committee.

[Mr. David Lammy]

Of great concern to the Select Committee and to other hon. Members is the proper role of Parliament in inquiries. The hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) raised the matter earlier. The Committee made a number of recommendations that led to much interesting debate.

The Government accept that there is an important role for Parliament in all types of inquiry. We have introduced the requirement for Ministers to make statements to Parliament about the establishment of every inquiry under it so that Parliament can scrutinise those decisions. The Bill builds Parliament into the process for every inquiry conducted under the legislation and provides a framework for an appropriate amount of parliamentary involvement in each case. Under most of the legislation that the Bill will replace, there is no provision for any parliamentary involvement.

We were interested in the Select Committee's ideas about a wider role for Parliament in inquiries outside the Bill. As we said in our response to the Committee's report:

"There is no reason why the good work done by members through the present Select Committee system cannot be translated into a commission equipped to conduct a public inquiry."

We also said:

"The Government can see some merit in a formal channel for considering representations made via Members of either House of Parliament concerning whether an inquiry should be set up on a particular issue."

That is clearly for Parliament to consider, but the Government would be supportive of any work that Parliament wanted to do on developing parliamentary mechanisms of inquiry. From this point, we head out into a general election, but I have no doubt that my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase will play a part in that work after the election.

Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): May I put on the record my appreciation of the way in which my hon. Friend has handled this matter? He has acknowledged the specific question about Parliament's role in relation to a certain category of inquiry that is not caught by the Bill and I am grateful for his comments. I hope that, when we return after the election, he and the Government will be prepared to give the matter further thought, so that the House can reach a view on how it wants to carry it forward.

Mr. Lammy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

The Bill is important and I am pleased that we have been able to see it through. This is an historic moment for families, for people who use our public services and for people who are experiencing problems. The shining of public light on such problems that the Bill enables is fundamental to our democratic arrangements and we have brought the system into the 21st century. On that basis, I commend the Bill to the House.

5.17 pm

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): We agree that new legislation is required to initiate and regulate public inquiries. There is a pressing need to consolidate the many statutory and non-statutory bases for public inquiries and we need universal procedures that can be applied with certainty to such inquiries. Those procedures must allow sufficient powers to call witnesses and evidence while maintaining safeguards and minimising red tape and costs. It is important that we retain the appropriate level of independence, openness and parliamentary involvement to ensure public confidence in any conclusions drawn by a public inquiry.

The Government introduced the Bill in the other place at the end of last year. Although it dealt with some of the deficiencies of the present hotch-potch of rules, the Bill was fundamentally flawed. First, it removed all parliamentary involvement and thus democratic legitimacy from the public inquiry process. Secondly, it over-extended Ministers' powers to interfere in an inquiry at the expense of the inquiry's chairman, which would compromise an inquiry's independence, effectiveness and credibility. Thirdly, the Bill failed to address our concerns, due not least to the Saville inquiry, regarding the proper control of costs. In its original form, the Bill was wholly unacceptable to the Conservative Opposition.

I acknowledge that, since then, we have made great progress in amending the Bill to meet those concerns. First, through a compromise position reached in another place, we have ensured that Parliament has some involvement in public inquiries. Under the Bill as it is now, a Minister must inform Parliament of his intention to set up an inquiry, the extent of its terms of reference, who will chair it and how many will serve on the inquiry panel. Further clauses provide that a Minister must lay before Parliament any decision, supported by reasons, to suspend an inquiry or to bring it to an end before it has fulfilled its terms of reference. Those provisions will ensure parliamentary scrutiny and, I hope, debate. They will also facilitate public scrutiny of Ministers' central decisions relating to an inquiry.

Secondly, following the strong and eloquent argument of Lords Kingsland and Howe of Aberavon in the other place, we have boosted the chairman's involvement in key decisions relating to an inquiry. The chairman must now be consulted before a Minister decides who serves on the inquiry panel and when their appointment may be terminated; the extent of the inquiry's terms of reference and any modifications to them; whether it is appropriate to appoint assessors; when an inquiry is suspended; and when an inquiry may be terminated before the publication of its report. The added involvement of the chairman will help to promote the independence and effectiveness of inquiries. I hope that the chairman will not be political but have intimate knowledge of the progress and detail of the inquiry which, in turn, will help to improve public confidence in its conclusions.

It should be said, however, that those changes do not go as far as we had hoped in reining back the Government's extensive powers. In Committee, we proposed several further amendments to ensure the greater involvement of Parliament and chairmen in the inquiry process. Unfortunately, the Government rejected all our amendments, despite wide-ranging support from numerous human rights groups and parliamentary Committees. I certainly mirror the Minister's congratulations to the Public Administration Committee, which has done much work on the Bill, but its recommendations have been largely ignored by the Government.

In addition to obstructing our positive amendments in Committee, the Government pushed through two unfortunate amendments of their own, which removed the compromise positions reached after much debate in the other place that allowed parliamentary involvement in inquiries into ministerial conduct and gave a veto to the Lord Chief Justice on the appointment of a judge to an inquiry panel. The amendments undo the efforts of our noble Friends and are of particular concern to the Conservatives. Like the original version of the Bill, the current post-Commons Committee version does not allow for any special procedure to be used to investigate ministerial misconduct. It will now be a Minister who sets up such an inquiry, determines its scope, the members of the panel and public access. A Minister will also decide whether it is to be terminated and whether a report will be published. It does not require a great leap of faith to realise that a Minister may have little or no interest in launching an investigation into conduct by himself or the Government. If the inquiry discovers an embarrassing or incriminating fact, he may be tempted either to restrict its scope or public access, or to interfere with the timing, form or publication of the report.

It is Parliament's role to hold the Executive to account and we maintain that Parliament should be involved in any inquiry into the Executive's actions. We proposed appropriate amendments in both Houses that would have ensured such involvement. The other place made some headway in cutting the democratic deficit by providing the option of laying a resolution before Parliament, but that progress was reversed by the Government in Committee. The Opposition have noted that the hon. Members for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright) and for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) proposed a new amendment to address the issue, although I hear that it has since been withdrawn. It is worth considering it, however, as it would require a resolution by both Houses where public concern focuses on the conduct of Ministers or Government Departments and where other forms of inquiry are not appropriate. The drafting of the amendment is not clear, but I interpret to mean ministerial misconduct. Where Government Departments are under investigation, one or more Ministers would have to take responsibility. The amendment went some way towards introducing the necessary parliamentary involvement in inquiries into ministerial misconduct. However, in the eyes of the Conservative Opposition, it would not have gone far enough. A parliamentary resolution should be required for every public inquiry into ministerial misconduct, not just in those cases where other forms of inquiry would not be appropriate.

"the conduct of Ministers or Government Departments"

The provision is not only limited, but uncertain, which further restricts its usefulness. Who would decide whether other forms of inquiry were appropriate? Furthermore, there is no specific mechanism through which to debate the matter in Parliament. It may be the Minister who decides whether another type of inquiry is appropriate, which removes the benefit of taking the matter out of the Minister's hands. Also, there are no set criteria by which to judge whether another type of inquiry would be appropriate. That removes both certainty and consistency. The amendment was by no means perfect and did not adequately cure the deficiencies of the Bill in relation to inquiries into ministerial misconduct, but we recognise that it would have been an improvement on the Bill as it stands.

The second matter that causes great disappointment to the Conservative Opposition is the limited involvement of the Lord Chief Justice when a judge is asked by a Minister to serve on an inquiry panel. The current version of the Bill requires only that the Minister consult the appropriate judge, usually the Lord Chief Justice. That was the case in the original draft Bill but, following the compelling arguments of the Lord Chief Justice and other noble Lords, the other place divided against the Government to ensure that the Lord Chief Justice consents to a judge's involvement in an inquiry. Unfortunately, the Government used their majority in the House to reverse the good work done in the other place.

It is important that the Lord Chief Justice can veto the use of a judge on an inquiry panel. If not, the Bill will remain inconsistent with the concordat agreed between the Lord Chief Justice and the Lord Chancellor that only days ago became embodied in the Constitutional Reform Act 2005. Only the Lord Chief Justice retains the necessary independence and knowledge of the courts' resources to judge whether it would be appropriate to use a particular judge for an inquiry. Finally, the current situation could leave a judge in a difficult situation where a Minister and the Lord Chief Justice disagreed about his appointment. Could he refuse the Minister? It is unfortunate that the Government did not accept the Lords amendment.

In conclusion, the Conservative Opposition support the legislation to regulate public inquiries. We are encouraged by the many positive amendments that were secured in the other place but remain disappointed that so many amendments were rejected by the Government, particularly on the two key issues relating to parliamentary involvement in inquiries into ministerial misconduct and the Lord Chief Justice's involvement in the appointment of judges to inquiry panels. I ask the Minister to consider those issues carefully and note that, as they arise from amendments introduced in another place, the Bill must now return to the other place for further consideration. We shall observe with interest what progress may be achieved by their lordships.

5.28 pm

Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): I shall be brief. I welcome the Bill, which in some ways took us by surprise. Those of us who were investigating the matter of inquiries were surprised when the Government decided to legislate during the same period. It is good that they should, for two reasons.

One is that the Bill focuses attention on the importance of inquiries. We take them for granted, but inquiries play a hugely important role in our public life. Usually in the context of something bad having happened that needs to be investigated, they enable us to take a step backwards, to subject a part of our public life to microscopic investigation and, hopefully, to learn lessons for the future from whatever has happened. It is a crucial part of our tradition of public life and public administration, and it is right that we should therefore focus on it in the way that the Bill forces us to do. We owe a huge debt to those who undertake inquiries and we have an obligation to learn from them. That is the first reason.

[Tony Wright]

The second reason is that the effect of having this Bill is that many more inquiries will now be conducted on a statutory basis. At the moment, they are conducted on a variety of bases, many of them on an ad hoc basis. The effect of the Bill, contrary to some of the suggestions that have been made, is that it will bring far more inquiries within the orbit of statute, and so equip them with the powers contained in the Bill. Therefore, it is to be welcomed as a strengthening of the inquiry tradition as a whole.

Having said that, I want to put on record why some anxieties remain, to which I hope that we can return on another occasion. My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) and I tabled an amendment to explore some of those. As I have acknowledged already, the fact that the Government have been able to say something positive on the parliamentary issue has enabled us to withdraw that, but the matter still sits there and two issues connect.

One issue concerns the role of judges in inquiries and the role of the Lord Chief Justice in assenting to a judge serving on an inquiry. Having heard the evidence of the Lord Chief Justice on that point, it is clear that the judges take seriously what we invited them to take seriously, which is a move further down the road towards a separation of powers in this country. In the context of inquiries, they say that, if that is to be case, we must not think in the future, as has been the case in the past, that we can simply summon up a judge to conduct an inquiry in politically contentious areas, because that raises particular problems for the judiciary. That is well known in other systems. Over the years, it has become massively fudged in our system, but the judges now want to take that more seriously. We should be alert to that. It is not the case that judges are universally the best people to undertake inquiries. Some of the best recent inquiries have been undertaken by people other than judges.

A particular issue has arisen there that connects directly with the second outstanding issue. There is a category of inquiries that only Parliament should properly undertake. There is always difficulty in finding the words to describe those inquiries, but we know which they are and we heard evidence on the matter from many recent inquirers who said that there is a whole category of inquiry that it would not be proper for people such as them to undertake, because they are politically contentious inquiries that turn on the conduct of Ministers and on what happened in Departments. These are matters that Parliament must consider.

If we are honest with ourselves we will accept that Parliament is good at many, many things, but it is not well equipped to undertake forensic fact-finding inquiries. That is not what it does. It used to be so equipped in another age, but it is not any longer and we have had some recent examples of the difficulties that it gets into if it tries to undertake such inquiries. We have a choice here. Either we simply say that Parliament cannot undertake such inquiries any more and we must contract them out to somebody else, or not do them at all or we can say that there is a category of inquiries that only Parliament can properly undertake, so we must find a mechanism within Parliament for undertaking them. Some of us have been exploring what such a mechanism might be. That is the clear choice. The reason I was happy to withdraw my amendment was because I was and am confident that the Government have at least accepted our analysis, even if on this occasion they have not accepted our conclusion. However, it is an important issue and I hope that we can return to it early in the next Parliament, because if we do not, Parliament's standing will be diminished further. We either have to abandon formally this territory or reclaim it. There is no other choice in the matter. I hope that, after the election, the Government will enable Parliament to reclaim this inquiry territory.

5.35 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright) for two reasons. First, he speaks with great authority on this issue and has experience and eloquence that I cannot match. He has given much attention to the subject both in his Committee and elsewhere. Secondly, I agree with the concerns that he expressed. At this stage, it will not be possible in a matter of a few minutes to address them in the Bill, but I hope that what the Minister said about unfinished business in this respect will be held to when Parliament meets again after the general election.

I and my colleagues in both Houses welcomed the opportunity of this Bill—an opportunity that I hope we have used for constructive improvement. As the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) said, the Bill has improved since the Government introduced it. One issue of principle is extremely important, particularly, but not exclusively, in relation to the issues raised by the hon. Member for Cannock Chase. His Select Committee, the Public Administration Committee, gave a great deal of attention to the issues that are now before us and were before us in Standing Committee. Yet, the cross-fertilisation of that detailed inquiry into inquiries was not treated with the serious attention that it deserved.

As has been mentioned, the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) sought to introduce some major principles from that previous investigation by our Select Committee, which, after all, has a Government majority. As far as I recall, its recommendations were virtually unanimous, as the hon. Member for Cannock Chase may confirm. Yet the cross-fertilisation of that Select Committee work into a Standing Committee on the Bill simply did not take place.

There are wider issues that go beyond this Bill. A great deal of the most important work in this House is now done in Select Committee. If we cannot at least guarantee a clear channel to a Standing Committee of information, instruction and guidance from Select Committee work specific to a Bill such as this, there is something wrong with one Committee or other, or with the communication between the two. I suggest that the problem lies in the Standing Committee.

There is unfinished business, and not just in relation to the role of the Lord Chief Justice. I agree with the point made by the hon. Member for Cannock Chase, but I suggest that the issue is more specifically about the parliamentary role. The Minister referred to that, but I do not find the reassurance that he gave us wholly adequate. I hope that there will be a return to the issue. Much careful thought was given in Select Committee and in the other House to how inquiries that touch on the conduct of Ministers could be effectively set up. That involved terms of reference and how the inquiries were to conduct themselves while taking note of the fact that there was a ministerial component.

I regret that we have not made more progress on that matter. I have had experience of inquiries of various sorts, both statutory and non-statutory. To fail to address the problem and to have made so little progress on that thorny issue is unfortunate, given that we have only rare occasions on which legislation can improve such matters and that there may not be another such occasion for some years. As I said before, that is unfinished business. The integrity, independence and efficacy of inquiries is at stake if we do not get this right and it is unfortunate that we have not made more progress.

I pay tribute to the work of the hon. Member for Cannock Chase and his Committee, as, indeed, the Minister did, but I think that it would have been even better if the words that we have all expressed had been reflected in action and if the Committee's recommendations had been taken to heart and put into the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Disability Discrimination Bill [Lords]

Considered in Committee.

[SIR MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

5.39 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): I beg to move,

That the Bill be considered in the following order, namely, clause 18, clauses 1 to 17, new clauses, new schedules, clause 19, schedules 1 and 2, clause 20 and remaining proceedings on the Bill.

The proposed order of consideration will ensure that we can deal with the reasons why the Government are amending clause 18. I know that it is a remaining area of concern, and I want hon. Members to have a chance properly to consider the detailed reasoning behind our decision to remove the "depression amendment", as it has become known, which was introduced by the other place. That explains the somewhat strange order of consideration in terms of the numbering of the clauses.

I hope that that is sufficient explanation for the Committee to agree to the order of consideration.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): On Second Reading, I asked the Secretary of State whether we would have time to consider the Bill in Committee and on Report, and he replied that he was confident that we would. That confidence has proved to be misplaced, and the proceedings before us are truncated. The Minister is right to want to provide a full opportunity to discuss what I shall describe in shorthand as the "depression amendment" and to devote some time to the matter. Although the proceedings are truncated—we are not happy about that—the Minister has set out a sensible basis on which we can proceed.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): My hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes) raised similar concerns on Second Reading. Hon. Members from both sides of the Committee fully support the Bill and do not want to see it obstructed, although Liberal Democrat Members have raised concerns about its late arrival in this Parliament. If we are to make the best of a bad job today by using the time as effectively as we can, the Minister's proposal is probably the best way, so we can at least get on the record some of the remaining concerns that exist around the difficult issues.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 18

MEANING OF "DISABILITY"

Maria Eagle: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 46, line 1, leave out subsection (3).

This is the "depression amendment", which is a useful shorthand description that we are all using. It reverses the amendment introduced in the other place by removing clause 18(3), which inserts new sub-paragraph (2A) into schedule 1 to the Disability Discrimination

[Maria Eagle]

Act 1995. The Government firmly believe that that amendment of the definition of disability is not the right thing to do.

I assure the Committee that we have thought long and hard about the new sub-paragraph (2A), but we have concluded that we cannot accept it. Fundamentally, it undermines the most basic principle of the DDA—that a disability must be a long-term or permanent condition. Under the new provision, a person with depression could qualify under the legislation as disabled after experiencing unrelated depressive episodes totalling little more than six months, and it constitutes a special arrangement for one form of mental impairment, which I believe to be unwise. It introduces the arrangement with arbitrary boundaries, which are both unfair and confusing to those trying to understand its operation, either because they have depression and want to see whether they meet the definition or because they have obligations under the law and want to see whether a particular person to whom they have those obligations qualifies.

To be absolutely clear, new sub-paragraph (2A) would extend the DDA to people who have recurrent but unconnected short-term episodes of depression in a way that would be confusing, complicated to administer and potentially unfair to other disabled people and other people with depression.

Mr. Goodman: The Minister would confirm, would she not, that the clause includes new, radical and sensible arrangements from the point of diagnosis for those who have HIV and cancer? She therefore finds herself in the difficult position of arguing that there should be a departure in those cases but not in this one.

5.45 pm

Maria Eagle: I am not arguing against all extensions or changes to the definition, and we have thought long and hard about whether this one can be incorporated. Our difficulty is that the fundamental requirement of the Bill is that in order to be a disability a condition or impairment must be long term. We do not believe that short episodes of up to only just over six months could possibly qualify, particularly given that this relates to just one type of mental impairment. I will come on to say something about recurrence of short-term conditions; I hope that that may be helpful.

We believe that the amendment from the other place would be confusing and burdensome because everyone with duties under the 1995 Act—and the Committee should recall that we have just extended those obligations to cover 1 million small employers—would find it difficult to determine, without making extremely detailed inquiries, exactly who is covered by the new provision. It would be complicated to administer because there would be different rules to be applied depending on whether a person has depression or some other impairment. Employers, service providers and others with duties under the Act would have to keep detailed records in order to establish whether a person has met the "six months in the last five years" rule that the amendment would insert into the definition.

The amendment would be unfair to other disabled people. The majority of disabled people do not have special provisions enabling them to meet the long-term condition of the definition, and would have to prove that their impairment has lasted, or is likely to last, for at least 12 months. Creating a separate and more advantageous rule for some people with depression, but not all such people, is not fair on those other people. Moreover, people with other forms of mental illness would not be covered by the new rule. It would be unfair on other people with depression. Someone with a six-month episode followed by a one-month episode would find themselves within the definition, whereas someone with two five-month episodes would find themselves outside it. That is what I mean by saying that the amendment would impose arbitrary boundaries. It does not really make sense and therefore would not make sensible law.

It is important to recognise—people sometimes forget this—that the 1995 Act already provides protection if an impairment has recurring effects. Where an impairment ceases to have a substantial adverse effect on a person's ability to carry out normal day-to-day activities, it is treated as continuing to have that effect if the effect is likely to recur. Conditions with substantial adverse effects that recur only sporadically or for short periods will therefore qualify for protection under the existing legislation, provided that they are part of the same underlying impairment. That will include mental illnesses such as depression.

Let me make it clear to the Committee and to those who have supported the amendment's remaining in the Bill, that our seeking to reverse it does not indicate that we take the matter of mental illness lightly. On the contrary, we have demonstrated that we are willing to listen to concerns about mental health conditions and to amend the Bill where that is appropriate and desirable. That is why we have agreed to remove the requirement that a mental illness must be clinically well recognised, thus putting mental illness on a par with other, physical, impairments in the way that they are recognised in the definition. We have promised to consider whether the statutory guidance on the definition can be improved to show more clearly how mental illnesses, including depression, are already covered by the 1995 Act.

We are committed to taking forward a wide agenda to help people with mental health impairments. Last year, the social exclusion unit published its report on mental health and social exclusion and made several very important recommendations that are now being implemented. For example, Jobcentre Plus staff are being provided with improved training on mental health issues so that they can offer a better service to clients with a mental health impairment; and the National Institute of Mental Health in England has been tasked with taking forward recommendations in the social exclusion unit report that will tackle the stigma and discrimination that people face.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Does the hon. Lady not accept that, whereas it is easy to predict that some conditions are likely to recur, the problem with depression is its unpredictability? That is the mischief that the Lords were trying to tackle. Is she really satisfied that what she has said so far would tackle the problem? It does not seem to me that it would.

Maria Eagle: I do not seek to suggest in any way that the current definition is perfection personified and should be defended against any suggested amendment for all time. However, I do not believe that we are in a position to make a sensible amendment that is fair and proper and which achieves what is wanted by those who are trying to do something useful for people with depression. Our difficultly with the subsection is that the arbitrary nature of its drafting means that it is not useable in practical law. I will shortly make a suggestion about a potential future way forward that might satisfy the hon. Gentleman.

We certainly do not have closed minds on this issue, but I do not believe that putting impractical law on to the statute book is a way of dealing with the stigma and difficulty that those with mental ill health face. We are fully committed to improving the lives of people with mental health conditions, but this measure is not right and would go too far. If proposed new sub-paragraph (2A) is allowed to remain, it will seriously undermine one of the Act's basic [illegible]ts and the integrity of the definition of disability.

In moving the amendment, I seek the Committee's agreement on ensuring that the definition meets one of the fundamental policy objectives of the 1995 Act. The Bill is not the end of the road on disability rights. We will consider whether short-term conditions should be covered, but we believe that we should cover them strategically and across the piece, rather than covering just one type of condition. The Disability Rights Commission is reviewing whether the social model of disability can be incorporated into our legislation. We believe that that is the right and proper forum in which to consider the matter further.

Mr. Goodman: I listened to the Minister with care and I note that she said that the Government do not take depression lightly, which I am sure they do not. She also said that the Bill is not the end of the road, which I am sure it is not, and that, were the Government to be re-elected—I must add that that is extremely doubtful—they would consider the social model in detail. However, it is extremely regrettable that they are seeking to remove subsection (3), and I want briefly to explain why.

As the Minister acknowledged and as the shadow Leader of the House, my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), pointed out a moment ago, it is widely recognised that depression can recur. It is also widely recognised that spells of depression often last for not more than six months, which is how the six-month period was arrived at. So someone who had an episode of depression would not be covered under the 1995 Act, which, in essence, stipulates that the effect of an impairment is a long-term one that has lasted, or is likely to last, for at least 12 months. As we all acknowledge, people who have had depression are sometimes discriminated against by employers. Such people are often hesitant to disclose previous episodes of depression when making job applications. Indeed, they may be deterred from applying at all.

The Joint Committee that considered the draft Bill, on which I served, recommended that people who experienced separate periods of depression totalling six months over a two-year period should be considered as meeting the long-term requirement. The Minister's colleague in the other place—Lord Carter, I believe—tabled an amendment to that effect, which the Government rejected. My noble Friend Lord Skelmersdale later tabled an amendment to protect any person with depression who had experienced during the previous five years an episode of depression lasting six months or so. Such a person would have received cover, but the Government opposed it. The other place considered it and passed the amendment.

My colleagues and I feel that the Government have somehow boxed themselves into a corner on this matter. As the Minister acknowledged when I intervened a few moments ago, there are some modifications—very welcome modifications in respect of cancer, HIV or multiple sclerosis—to the definition of disability in the clause. It would have been sensible for the Government to leave the provision in the Bill, not seek to remove it. MIND, an organisation intricately involved in working with people with depression, described the amendment as "a step in the right direction".

The organisation also said:

"The Government's insistence on removing the amendment makes it look like it is ignoring the problem in the vain hope that it will go away. It sullies what is, in most other respects, an excellent piece of legislation."

We agree and we believe that disabled people will be puzzled by the Government's insistence on removing this provision from the Bill. I hope that they will take note of that intention in the next few weeks and beyond. If the Government press ahead and insist on removing the excellent amendment tabled by my noble Friend Lord Skelmersdale, we will divide the Committee on the issue.

Mr. Allan: The amendment tabled in the other place also received the support of my colleagues as we felt that the circumstances of people with depression should be acknowledged more clearly in the Bill. We accept that helpful progress has been made, as the Minister said, in the context of people with mental health conditions. It has been accepted that mental illness no longer needs to be clinically recognised if it is to form the basis of mental impairment, but in a sense, that is a different point. That broadens the scope of the conditions that can be brought within the framework, but depression is clinically well recognised and we are considering whether the Bill would, without the amendment, provide sufficient protection for people who suffer from depression. The hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) referred to the patterns that depression may take and there remain genuine concerns about whether people with depressive illness who suffer discrimination will be sufficiently protected by disability discrimination legislation.

The Minister made helpful reference in her introduction to the fact that further guidance may be necessary. If the Government have their way and the amendment proposed by the other place is removed, we would certainly want further discussions on the matter. That could be an alternative to having binding time limits set out in the Bill. Guidance could be sent out to the relevant public bodies, employers and so forth to inform them about the pattern of depressive illness that falls within the definition of a disability against which discrimination may occur.

That could provide a helpful way forward, but as we stand at the moment, there remains the potential for people with serious depressive illness to be discriminated against. They could find that when they turn to the law, they do not have sufficient protection. That is our motivation for seeking to maintain a provision directly in the Bill. If that falls, I hope that the Minister will be able to advise us of alternative routes to the same objective, perhaps through guidance. As the Minister said, different forms of mental illness have different patterns of recurrence. We do not wish to discriminate between them, but want to ensure that they are all properly covered.

[Mr. Allan]

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): I would like to make a few brief comments. I am sorry that I missed the opening of the debate, but I was delayed and proceedings moved a little quicker than I had expected. This will probably be my last opportunity to make a short contribution to a debate in this place.

I listened carefully to what the Minister said. Her most important comment was when she said that this was not the end of the road. Clearly, the Government's record— and that of the Labour party—on the whole range of disability issues over the years has been excellent.

I have no doubt that the Government will deliver on their proposals, and that they will make further progress. A few years ago, a member of my family suffered from depression. I know that it is a very difficult problem to deal with, because it is impossible to understand what a person suffering from depression is really thinking, or how much it gets on top of them. It is very easy to tell someone that they should snap out of it, but that serves no useful purpose. In fact, it has the opposite effect.

Depression presents a real problem for medical people, as do myalgic encephalomyelitis and chronic fatigue syndrome. We are making progress on those matters, but we still have a long way to go when it comes to understanding how sufferers are affected.

I want the Bill to achieve Royal Assent, and if the amendment is forced to a Division I shall back my hon. Friend the Minister. I believe her 100 per cent. when she said that this is not the end of the road and that further progress will be made in the years ahead, after the Labour Government have been re-elected.

Question put, That the amendment be made.

The House divided: Ayes 214, Noes 98.

Division No. 154] [6.1 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Adams, Irene (Paisley N)
Ainsworth, Bob (Cov'ty NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, rh Donald (Swansea E)
Bailey, Adrian
Baird, Vera
Barnes, Harry
Barron, rh Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beard, Nigel
Bennett, Andrew
Benton, Joe (Bootle)
Berry, Roger
Bradley, rh Keith (Withington)
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Bradshaw, Ben
Brennan, Kevin
Browne, Desmond
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Byers, rh Stephen
Byrne, Liam (B'ham Hodge H)
Cairns, David
Caplin, Ivor
Cason, Martin
Challen, Colin
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Mrs Helen (Peterborough)
Clarke, rh Tom (Coatbridge & Chryston)
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cook, rh Robin (Livingston)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Cranston, Ross
Cruddas, Jon
Cunningham, Jim (Coventry S)
Cunningham, Tony (Workington)
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs Claire
Dalyell, Tam
David, Wayne
Davidson, Ian
Davies, rh Denzil (Llanelli)
Dawson, Hilton
Denham, rh John
Dobbin, Jim (Heywood)
Dobson, rh Frank
Donohoe, Brian H.
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim (Lewisham W)
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff (Barnsley E)
Farrelly, Paul
Field, rh Frank (Birkenhead)
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul (Newport W)
Foster, rh Derek
Foulkes, rh George
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike (Ilford S)
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Bruce (Walsall S)
Gerrard, Neil
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grogan, John
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hamilton, David (Midlothian)
Hanson, David
Harris, Tom (Glasgow Cathcart)
Havard, Dai (Merthyr Tydfil & Rhymney)
Healey, John
Henderson, Doug (Newcastle N)
Hendrick, Mark
Hepburn, Stephen
Heyes, David
Hoey, Kate (Vauxhall)
Hope, Phil (Corby)
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, rh Alan (Newport E)
Howarth, George (Knowsley N & Sefton E)
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hughes, rh Beverley (Stretford & Urmston)
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Eric
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda (Hampstead & Highgate)
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jones, Kevan (N Durham)
Jones, Lynne (Selly Oak)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Joyce, Eric (Falkirk W)
Keen, Alan (Feltham)
Keen, Ann (Brentford)
Khabra, Piara S.
Kilfoyle, Peter
Lammy, David
Laxton, Bob (Derby N)
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom (High Peak)
Love, Andrew
Lucas, Ian (Wrexham)
McAvoy, rh Thomas
McCabe, Stephen
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
MacDougall, John
McFall, rh John
McKechin, Ann
Mackinlay, Andrew
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
McWilliam, John
Mahmood, Khalid
Malleber, Judy
Mann, John (Bassetlaw)
Marshall, David (Glasgow Shettleston)
Meacher, rh Michael
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin (Gt Grimsby)
Mole, Chris
Moonie, Dr. Lewis
Morley, Elliot
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Munn, Ms Meg
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
O'Hara, Edward
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Osborne, Sandra (Ayr)
Owen, Albert
Pearson, Ian
Perham, Linda
Picking, Anne
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter (Burnley)
Pond, Chris (Gravesham)
Pope, Greg (Hyndburn)
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Purchase, Ken
Purnell, James
Quin, rh Joyce
Rapson, Syd (Portsmouth N)
Reed, Andy (Loughborough)
Robertson, John (Glasgow Anniesland)
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Roy, Frank (Motherwell)
Ruddock, Joan
Salter, Martin
Savidge, Malcolm
Sheerman, Barry

Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simon, Siôn (B'ham Erdington)
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Smith, rh Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, rh Chris (Islington S & Finsbury)
Soley, Clive
Speller, rh John
Stewart, Ian (Eccles)
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Tami, Mark (Alyn)
Taylor, rh Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Dr. Richard (Wyre F)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Don (Islwyn)
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Neil (Wigan)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Tynan, Bill (Hamilton S)
Vaz, Keith (Leicester E)
Vis, Dr. Rudi
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N.
Watson, Tom
Watts, David
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, Betty (Conwy)
Winnick, David
Woodward, Shaun
Wright, Anthony D. (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, David (Telford)
Wright, Iain (Hartlepool)
Wright, Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. John Heppell and Margaret Moran

NOES

Allan, Richard
Amess, David
Arbuthnot, rh James
Beith, rh A. J.
Bellingham, Henry
Bercow, John
Blunt, Crispin
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Bottomley, rh Virginia (SW Surrey)
Burnett, John
Burns, Simon
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies (NE Fife)
Carmichael, Alistair
Cash, William
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Chope, Christopher
Clarke, rh Kenneth (Rushcliffe)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davies, Quentin (Grantham & Stamford)
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice & Howden)
Djanogly, Jonathan
Dorrell, rh Stephen
Duncan Smith, rh Iain
Evans, Nigel
Field, Mark (Cities of London & Westminster)
Foster, Don (Bath)
Francois, Mark
Garnier, Edward
George, Andrew (St. Ives)
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Goodman, Paul
Greenway, John
Grieve, Dominic
Hayes, John (S Holland)
Heald, Oliver
Hendry, Charles
Hoban, Mark (Fareham)
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Jack, rh Michael
Jenkin, Bernard
Key, Robert (Salisbury)
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Knight, rh Greg (E Yorkshire)
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lewis, Dr. Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter (M-Worcs)
McIntosh, Miss Anne
Mackay, rh Andrew
McLoughlin, Patrick
Maude, rh Francis
Mawhinney, rh Sir Brian
May, rh Mrs Theresa
Mitchell, Andrew (Sutton Coldfield)
Moss, Malcolm
Norman, Archie
O'Brien, Stephen (Eddisbury)
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, George (Tatton)
Ottaway, Richard
Paterson, Owen
Prisk, Mark (Hertford)
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Hugh (Faversham & M-Kent)
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Rosindell, Andrew
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Sanders, Adrian
Seyeed, Jonathan
Simpson, Keith (M-Norfolk)
Smyth, Rev. Martin (Belfast S)
Stanley, rh Sir John
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Desmond
Swire, Hugo (E Devon)
Syms, Robert
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Thurso, John
Trend, Michael
Trimble, rh David
Tyler, Paul (N Cornwall)
Tyrie, Andrew
Viggers, Peter
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, David
Wilshire, David
Winterton, Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Sir Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Yeo, Tim (S Suffolk)
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Peter Atkinson and Gregory Barker

Question accordingly agreed to.

Question proposed, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Allan: I do not wish to delay the Committee for long this afternoon because we have a lot of other business to deal with, but I simply want to place on record the concerns that remain among Liberal Democrat Members about another aspect of clause 18: the ability to prevent, by regulation, certain types of cancer from falling within the Bill's scope.

I understand that the issue was debated at some length on Second Reading, but our concerns remain about how such things will be achieved, and in particular about how we can respond to the concerns about the possible exclusion of people who should fall within the Bill's scope that have been expressed by a lot of significant cancer charities and other bodies interested in caring for people with cancer. We are not able to do anything about that today, and it is a source of much regret among Liberal Democrat Members that we did not have the normal long Committee stage to achieve a more significant debate about an issue that is very important to people who suffer from cancer.

6.15 pm

As I said in my opening remarks, we do not wish the Bill to fall—we want it to reach the statute book—but we would have preferred such legislation to be introduced a couple of years ago, when we might have had the time to debate such issues at greater length. I do not expect to make progress this afternoon, but I want to ensure that, as the Bill completes its stages, the outstanding concerns about how people with one type of cancer may be excluded remain on the platform for political debate. I hope that the Minister can offer at least an update on her thinking on the issue, although I realise that she would have said something about it on Second Reading and perhaps has nothing to add today, but it would be helpful if she could fill us in on where she has got to with her thinking, as she did with the previous amendment.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 18, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 1 to 17 and 19 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedules 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 20

SHORT TITLE, INTERPRETATION, COMMENCEMENT AND EXTENT

Maria Eagle: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 47, line 23, leave out subsection (12).

This amendment will remove the privilege amendment that was made in another place. As hon. Members will be aware, the financial powers of the other place are restricted by the rights and privileges of the House and by the Parliament Acts. As the Bill originated in another place and contains financial provisions, a privilege amendment was added before its introduction in the House to ensure that the House's financial privilege was not infringed. The privilege amendment provided that nothing in the Bill should impose or vary any charge on the people or public funds. The amendment is technical, but it is necessary to remove the privilege amendment, thereby reinstating the financial provisions.

[Maria Eagle]

Mr. Goodman: I had a number of carefully probing questions about the amendment, but the Minister has assured the Committee that it is purely technical, and I will respond in that spirit.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 20, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, with amendments.

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

6.19 pm

Maria Eagle: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Elsewhere in the Palace of Westminster at this very moment, parliamentarians past and present from both Houses are celebrating the 30th anniversary of the implementation of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970. It was an achievement of Lord Morris of Manchester, who was the first Minister for disabled people, and the first legislative recognition in Britain that disabled people need adjustments to have equality. The passage of this Bill, somewhat more expeditiously than we had all originally expected and perhaps than many of us would have liked, builds on that insight of Lord Morris and is a real and lasting achievement for disabled people in Britain.

The Bill strengthens, deepens and widens the coverage of our anti-discrimination legislation. It extends the law to all functions of public authorities and places a duty on them to promote equality of opportunity for disabled people. It plugs remaining gaps in our existing law by including councillors, political parties and other larger private clubs within its provisions, and it completes the proper coverage of transport by including it under part 3 and setting end dates for existing public transport vehicles to be fully accessible. New vehicles already have to be.

I would like to thank all those who have improved the Bill—in particular, the Disability Rights Commission and organisations of disabled people—by responding to consultations and giving evidence to the Joint Committee. I would like to thank parliamentarians in both Houses who have contributed extensively. Last but not least, I would like to thank very warmly my officials who have worked well and tirelessly for a number of years to get this Bill right.

The House is doing good tonight. This is a Bill of which we can all be proud. It is a stepping stone towards the Labour Members' goal of giving disabled people full opportunities in life to live, work and contribute to our society like anyone else, and to have equal respect and equality. It is also the fulfilment of a manifesto commitment. I commend the Bill to the House.

6.21 pm

Mr. Goodman: We have said before that we think it a pity that the House has not had an opportunity to have full Committee and Report stages, which would have enabled the Minister to respond, for example, to the points that were raised by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan). However, it is an extremely welcome Bill that has had strong all-party support. It builds on our Disability Discrimination Act 1995, and it is part of a journey that Lord Morris was one of the first parliamentarians to set in progress. The Minister was right to refer to him.

It is a much improved Bill as a result of consideration in the other place, and the Disability Rights Commission has correctly paid tribute to my party and other political parties for helping to bring this happy conclusion about. I pay tribute to my colleagues Lord Skelmersdale and Lord Higgins for improving the Bill. If we had had full Committee and Report stages, I am sure that I would at this point have been able to thank the Minister for guiding us through those proceedings skilfully and with good humour. I do not have a chance to do that, but her role on the Bill should not go without a passing comment. She has worked very hard on it and gave strong evidence to the Joint Committee.

This is an extremely important Bill. It will make a real difference to disabled people, and it passes another milestone in the continuing journey to a society of more equal opportunities and social justice.

6.23 pm

Mr. Allan: I have arrived at the Bill late in the day because of the unavoidable absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes) who, like many other Members, is elsewhere because of events that appear to be starting in constituencies. I place on record my thanks to him for the work that he has put into the Bill, and his thanks to the Minister, the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) and everyone else who has worked on the Bill.

The Bill has rightly enjoyed strong cross-party support. It is instructive that the original Bill was introduced in 1995 under a previous Administration, and 10 years later we are amending it with a Bill from an Administration of a different party. Such issues are so important to many of our constituents, irrespective of party, that they rightly achieve cross-party consensus. They perhaps benefit more from consensus than other legislation that is introduced consensually, but does not always have the same positive effect.

We hope that the Bill will become law. As the hon. Member for Wycombe said, it will make a significant difference to many people throughout the country, especially by addressing transport and including people with conditions such as HIV, cancer and multiple sclerosis in the definition of those covered by disability discrimination legislation. We wish it every success on the statute book.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Public Services Ombudsman (Wales) Bill [Lords]

Considered in Committee.

[SIR MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

Clauses 1 to 45 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 46

SHORT TITLE

Amendment proposed: No. 2, in page 26, line 33, leave out subsection (2).—[Mr. Touhig.]

6.26 pm

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): I am surprised that there is a Government amendment to the Bill, although I suspect that it is very technical.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig) indicated assent.

Mr. Wiggin: I am extremely grateful to the Minister for nodding vigorously because I had suspected that we were going to be considering only one amendment today.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 46, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 1

PUBLIC SERVICES OMBUDSMAN FOR WALES: APPOINTMENT ETC.

Mr. Wiggin: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 27, line 18, leave out 'seven years' and insert

'five years, renewable for a further five years'.

There was only one aspect of the Bill that I thought required amendment. To achieve the best for the people of Wales, we still think that the most appropriate length of term for the ombudsman is a renewable five-year term. The length of the ombudsman's term of office is of the utmost importance. A concession was made in the other place to reduce the original suggestion of a 10-year appointment to one of seven years, which was clearly preferable, although far from ideal.

A seven-year term for a single post certainly has advantages over one of 10 years, but we want to keep the post invigorated and keep incentive alive, while ensuring that proper performance is key at all times. The greatest merit would be to have a five-year term that was renewable for a further five years. Of course we do not want the term to be too short because the ombudsman must be able to build up experience and expertise and have the time to bring about real change. However, there must be accountability and such qualities must be able to be refreshed as the priorities of the job change over time.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): Might there not be more sense in having a seven-year appointment initially because the ombudsman in Wales will have a new role and thus might need a little extra time? However, perhaps the appointment could be made for five years, and renewed for a further five, when the office is well bedded down. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will think about what he wants to do with his amendment on that basis.

Mr. Wiggin: The Government will have heard the hon. Gentleman's sensible suggestion. However, if we pass the Bill, I do not think that we will be able to amend it at a later date to change the length of the term. I suspect that that might become a matter for the Assembly. The important thing today is to clarify exactly why the Welsh Affairs Committee suggested a "five plus five" solution.

6.30 pm

The point about an initial seven-year period is valid and helpful. A seven-year term is still too long, but such guaranteed longevity does not provide the ombudsman with the best circumstances in which to operate in the long term. The objections that a five-year term is too short, that it would not attract top-quality candidates and that it could affect the ombudsman's decisions towards the end of his term are particularly cynical. I hope that an ombudsman who is likely to be influenced by the prospect of not having his term renewed will not be appointed to begin with.

If the post does not attract high-quality candidates, what does that say about the people who seek election to this place? Hon. Members are appointed for up to five years. Invariably, some of us are appointed for less time. I can see no reason why five years should not be the time period. Nor do I understand why the difference between a five-year term—in all likelihood to be renewed for a further five years—would make a great deal of difference to the calibre of candidates. That the term of office should be long enough to attract the "right kind of person" to the post, as suggested in the other place, raises the question: what does the "right kind of person" refer to? Surely those deterred by the fact that they may serve only a five-year term instead of seven years might not be the right kind of person in the first place.

The best candidates for the position of ombudsman should be dedicated to the job of being an ombudsman regardless of the length of tenure of office. If he or she is of the highest calibre, in practice they will serve a term of 10 years anyway, which is even better than the seven years. The arguments against that are not sufficient to explain the Government's inflexibility. It is simply a poor argument to suggest that good-quality candidates would be deterred from applying for the office if the term is only five years long.

New Zealand set the precedent for ombudsmen, establishing the first ombudsman in the English-speaking world more than 40 years ago in 1962. Its system is similar to ours and the appointments are made for five-year terms, with the possibility of reappointment. The situation is the same in other Commonwealth countries, and the ombudsman Act in Alberta, Canada states:

"a person appointed as Ombudsman holds office for 5 years . . . until the person is reappointed, or the person's successor is appointed".

Other ombudsman appointments across the UK show a similar pattern. The chief inspector of schools is appointed for five years. No parliamentary and health service ombudsman has served for longer than five years. All appointments to the Independent Police Complaints Commission are for five years, with the possibility of a five-year extension. It does not seem that the length of term of office for such posts has deterred high calibre applicants. Indeed, I wonder why so many other ombudsman schemes would use that pattern if that were the case.

[Mr. Wiggin]

The Scottish public service ombudsman—perhaps the closest model to that proposed for Wales—is an appointment of five years with the opportunity of reappointment. It is clear that the working of the arrangement has been successful as part of the clearly beneficial establishment of a single ombudsman service for Scotland. It achieves what is effectively to be a 10-year term if all goes well, as Mr. Eric Drake, the Scottish deputy public service ombudsman, said in evidence to the Welsh Affairs Committee on 17 January.

Under our proposal, those who consider a 10-year term most appropriate would still achieve that objective, yet the ombudsman would also be accountable at the halfway stage. To achieve the original aim of a 10-year term, while also making the ombudsman accountable and the role reinvigorated, an appointment for five years, with a five-year renewable option, is clearly best. That is by far the most appropriate way to proceed in achieving a balance between an accountable and flexible term of office and the need for stability.

The Welsh Affairs Committee agreed with that, stating that a reduction in the length of the ombudsman's tenure, from 10 years to seven, would not improve the Bill, and it agreed with the renewable five-year appointment. Page 9 of the Select Committee report states:

"we recommend it reconsider appointments on a five year basis with the possibility of reappointment for a further five years."

A recently published report on the Bill by the National Assembly's Local Government and Public Services Committee similarly recommends that "the bill be amended to make the Welsh Ombudsman's term of office five years with the ability to reappoint for a further five years."

The opinions of those who have debated the issue in the other place, in the Select Committee and in the Assembly are clear. Furthermore, it was clear in our debate on Monday that there was widespread support for a renewable five-year term. As the Chairman of the Welsh Affairs Committee, the hon. Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones), said:

"I believe that the five-year plus five-year appointment plan, which is used for the Scottish ombudsman and thus has the benefit of consistency, represents a better balance between the need for stability in post and the need to reinvigorate the office periodically. It also offers opponents of a 10-year appointment a statutory moment for reflection."

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) commented:

"I, like other hon. Members, am disappointed that the Government cannot accept that the term of appointment for the ombudsman should be five years, with the possibility of a five-year reappointment . . . Seven years is a halfway time period, but the Bill does not provide the opportunity for reappointment, so that provision has all the faults and none of the virtues."—[Official Report, 4 April 2005; Vol. 432, c. 1146–47.]

I think that the hon. Gentleman was absolutely right.

The Government must accept that a renewable five-year-term appointment is greatly preferable to the proposed seven-year tenure. Although it is clear that there is general consensus in favour of the Bill becoming an Act, were it amended to provide for a renewable five-year term for the ombudsman, it would be even better.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I support the amendment and the arguments of the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Wiggin). I draw the Committee's attention to the fact that the evidence presented to the Welsh Affairs Committee was, on the whole, in favour of a 10-year term on the ground that that would result in a stable appointment that would be beyond the reach of political or other external influence and would be truly independent. The Committee weighed up that evidence and decided that it wanted a more flexible approach; it recommended a term of five years, which has been proposed again today in the form of the amendment.

I echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams), which the Conservative spokesman quoted a minute or two ago. A seven-year term is neither one thing nor the other: it would provide neither the long-term stability of a 10-year appointment nor the flexibility of a five-year appointment. To pick up the point made by the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) in his intervention, when making an appointment for the first time, one might not want someone who will be in the post for a very long time, because if one has made a mistake or the individual in question finds that the nature of the job is different from the one that he or she undertook, one may well want to revisit the decision in five years rather than wait for seven years, which is a long time to carry on with a mistaken appointment.

It seems to the Liberal Democrats that the right approach would be to follow the recommendation of the Welsh Affairs Committee and adopt the five-year appointment with the possibility of renewal for a further term. The proposal in the Bill as it stands is neither one thing nor the other. I hope that the Minister will try to explain the potential benefits of having a seven-year term, bearing in mind that the evidence received was that a 10-year term would have some benefits, as would a five-year term, whereas a seven-year term offers the benefits of neither. Seven years is an arithmetically neat compromise, but it would achieve the objectives of neither of the other two proposed terms of appointment. I hope that the Minister will think again and decide, by accepting the amendment, to accept the proposals made by the Welsh Affairs Committee and by my noble Friends in the other place.

Mr. Touhig: The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Wiggin) would provide for a fixed-term appointment of five years that could be renewed for a further five years. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that the tenure of the ombudsman's appointment was the subject of extensive debate in the other place. As I said on Second Reading, our priority is to ensure that the ombudsman is, and is seen to be, independent of government and to protect the office from any perception that that is not the case. At the same time, the Government believe that it is important that there should be regular opportunities to inject new blood to reinvigorate the office. That is not an easy balance to strike, as we are mindful of the need to attract candidates of the highest calibre when vacancies arise.

We are not suggesting that an ombudsman who is subject to reappointment would be swayed by the Executive in the performance of their functions, but we are firmly of the view that a renewable appointment creates the risk of a perceived lack of independence for the office. If the amendment were accepted, decisions about the renewal of the appointment would clearly be a matter on which the Secretary of State would advise the Queen after consultation with the Assembly. However, the Assembly is one of the bodies within the ombudsman's jurisdiction, which is not quite right if we are to attach, as surely we must, considerable importance to the independence of his office.

It is not only the Government who are concerned about that. We consulted widely on the question of tenure of office, and the responses that we received were mixed. Some people argued for a single fixed-term appointment, some for a renewable appointment or even an appointment up to the age of 65. However, all the responses impressed on us an overwhelming concern that the office should retain its independence and should not be seen to be influenced by the Executive. A single fixed-term appointment of seven years delivers that objective. The Government believed that their original proposal for a non-renewable fixed-term appointment of 10 years delivered our objective, but on reflection we conceded that seven years more accurately struck the balance that we sought.

It may assist colleagues if I remind them of what happened in the other place and what was said by Opposition spokespersons on Wales. The Government amendment reducing the ombudsman's term of appointment from 10 to seven years followed detailed and extensive debate. On Second Reading, the 10-year appointment was a cause of concern to their Lordships, who felt that it was too long. In Grand Committee on 25 January, Lord Roberts tabled an amendment on behalf of the Conservative Opposition to introduce a five-year term renewable for five years. Baroness Gale with, the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) may be interested to learn, the support of the Liberal Democrat Lord Livsey and others, tabled an amendment to reduce the term of appointment to seven years. It is sometimes important that we speak with the same voice, even though we are in different Houses.

The Government agreed to table an amendment reducing the period of appointment to seven years on Report. That was welcomed by some peers, including Lord Roberts, who said:

> "I am certainly not one to quibble with a compromise. I am very happy to accept the seven-year period."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 January 2005; Vol. 668, c. GC 372.]

Quite properly, Lord Roberts returned to the issue on Report on 10 February, as he still thought that a five-year term was the best option. However, the Government amendment, which reduced the term of appointment to seven years, received support from Lord Livsey among others. After listening to the debate, Lord Roberts did not in fact move his amendment for a five-year renewable term.

During the debate, Lord Roberts acknowledged that a seven-year period was an improvement on the original 10-year period. The hon. Member for Leominster said that an ombudsman who could be influenced by the possibility of the renewal should not be appointed in the first place. I entirely agree, but I am trying to make the point that there could be a perception of influence, so it is important that we tackle that. My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) asked about varying the term of appointment at a later stage, but there is no provision in the Bill to allow that, and we would need another piece of primary legislation to do so.

Mr. Win Griffiths: If, at a later stage, the House of Commons gave the Welsh Assembly law-making powers, surely it could amend the Bill on the Floor of the Assembly at an appropriate time?

Mr. Touhig: I shall not be tempted down that road. I have no crystal ball and I would not like to speculate whether there will be any changes to the government of Wales legislation at some time in the future. What my hon. Friend says would be accurate, but I would not wish to be tempted at this stage.

6.45 pm

Much has been said in the House and in the other place about the virtue of the public service ombudsman in Scotland being a five-year appointment, with an option of a further five years. But Scotland has not yet reached the end of its first five-year term, so we do not know whether it is a better model than the one that we are proposing.

On Second Reading, the hon. Member for Leominster referred to the Welsh Affairs Committee report and its response to the Bill. The Committee recommended:

> "That the Government reconsider its decision to reduce the length of tenure of the Ombudsman in the light of our evidence", but added:

> "Should the Government believe that a balance needed to be made between security of tenure and the opportunity to reinvigorate the office,"

the Committee recommended that the Government

> "reconsider appointments on a five year basis with the possibility of reappointment for a further five years."

I formally responded to that report earlier today, setting out the Government's position.

In view of the comments made by the hon. Members for Leominster and for Hazel Grove, I should draw attention to the fact that when taking evidence the Committee did not, to my knowledge, directly pose the question to all witnesses as to whether the appointment should be for a single fixed term or a fixed term renewable. In most instances witnesses were asked whether they thought a fixed term of 10 years was appropriate. If asked again, those same witnesses may be content with a fixed-term appointment of seven years. We simply do not know.

Finally, it is not entirely clear whether the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Leominster is intended to have the effect that, if renewed, the ombudsman's second term would flow straight after his first term.

[Mr. Touhig]

I think that is probably the intention, but if it is not, the amendment would have an unintended consequence. Paragraph 4(4) of schedule 1 provides that any person who has been appointed as an acting ombudsman is eligible for appointment as the ombudsman, unless he has already held office as the ombudsman. That was drafted on the basis that the ombudsman's appointment would be a single fixed-term appointment.

If the amendment does not have the effect that I described, it would mean that a person who had been the ombudsman for five years and who had stepped down and taken up the post of acting ombudsman could not seek a renewal of appointment as the ombudsman for another five years because of paragraph 4(4) of schedule 1.

I hope that, after that brief explanation, the hon. Gentleman feels reassured that we are trying to strike a difficult balance. I believe we have made the right decision. Time will tell. I hope that, in the light of my comments, he will feel able to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Wiggin: I am grateful for the opportunity to respond.

I notice that the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) is in his place. On Monday, when I was reading Hansard, it appeared that I had said that I had visited his constituency, which I had not. I take the opportunity to set the record straight. I referred to "hon. Members", and the record identified him. That is where the misunderstanding arose, and this is my opportunity to put it right.

I am grateful to the Minister for his clear explanation of the thinking behind the seven-year term. Particularly important is the point that he made about perception, because of the influence of the Assembly and the influence of the ombudsman over the Assembly. I found the Minister's comments helpful.

I pay tribute to my noble Friend Lord Roberts of Conwy, who has been tremendous in his attentiveness and his assiduous appreciation and critique of the Bill. He rightly said that he would not quibble over seven years. Having knocked three years off the period of the appointment, he felt that he had done extremely well, and I am inclined to agree with him. He is a wise man. He had correctly identified the correct term and I should follow his example and not quibble. What helps me further is the point that the Minister made about drafting.

I am not a great draftsman and it is extremely difficult to pen a quick amendment that is perfect in every way. I am sure that the real experts, wherever they may be, are capable of identifying drafting errors, but the point about the ombudsman being able to be reappointed despite his term of office not running concurrently would be singularly unhelpful and undo the purpose of the five-plus-five amendment, as the Minister rightly said. Having made those points and having paid tribute my noble Friend Lord Roberts, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 1 agreed to.

Schedules 2 to 7 agreed to.

Bill reported, with an amendment.

Order for Third Reading read.

6.51 pm

Mr. Touhig: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

At the outset, I pay tribute to Members in the other place and in this place, colleagues in the Assembly and officials who have worked hard in a very short time to bring forward this worthwhile Bill. Our consideration of the matter at an earlier stage means that it has widespread support across the House.

The Bill will bring together the offices of the commission for local administration in Wales, the health service commissioner for Wales, the Welsh Administration ombudsman and, when established later this year, the social housing ombudsman for Wales into a unified jurisdiction led by one person, the public services ombudsman for Wales. It will establish a public services ombudsman for Wales for the first time in a unified situation, providing a modern, flexible and accessible service for members of the public who wish to complain about most public service providers operating in relation to Wales.

The Bill contains a number of new provisions. It gives the ombudsman important powers of investigation in his own right, but it also allows him to seek to resolve disputes between complainants and the relevant public bodies without the need for a formal investigation. It provides for him to issue guidance to all bodies within his jurisdiction on the requirements of good administrative practice—a matter on which we touched on Second Reading—a power that only the local government ombudsman had previously. It provides powers to permit him to work jointly with other ombudsmen, including the parliamentary commissioner and the health service commissioner for England, for the investigation of cross-border complaints.

Finally, the Bill makes express provision to ensure that, in the area of health and social care, the ombudsman can look synoptically at complaints about the consequences of decisions made by social care professionals while working alongside clinical colleagues.

This is an immensely worthwhile Bill, which will give Wales a first-class ombudsman service for the 21st century. I am very pleased that it has had widespread support in the House and in the other place, and with those few remarks I commend it to the House.

6.53 pm

Mr. Wiggin: Not for the first time this evening, I agree with the Minister. I was concerned that should my amendment have been carried, the Bill would not have made it on to the statute book. As the Minister says, this is a worthwhile Bill, and I, too, pay tribute to the Committee in the Assembly as well to my colleagues and my noble Friends in the other place.

As I stated on Second Reading on Monday, this is a helpful Bill with clear potential to improve the standard of public services for the people of Wales. I have previously raised my concerns over the need for us to be certain that Welsh taxpayers' hard-earned money is spent wisely in the implementation of the changes that the Bill outlines, and through my amendment I have also touched on areas where the Bill could have been improved. However, the Bill is helpful in achieving the best for the people of Wales, and while it might have been more constructive had the term of office been a little shorter, it is still acceptable.

We have also seen considerable improvements as a result of the amendments tabled by my Conservative colleagues in the other place. My noble Friend Lord Roberts of Conwy achieved the inclusion of the provision ensuring that the Secretary of State must consult the Assembly before recommending a person for appointment as the ombudsman. That will assist in securing a more accountable and impartial appointment. I am also thankful that the ombudsman will have a level of political independence because of the fact that he can be removed only on grounds of ill health or misbehaviour, and that he can in the last resort seek the view of the High Court. That gives him the legal power that will remove any possibility of his decisions being ignored by the authorities involved.

In seeking to achieve the very best for the people of Wales, we are happy that the Bill will make it on to the statute book. It is a helpful Bill and I am glad that I have been able to play my very small part, along with all those whom I have mentioned.

6.55 pm

Mr. Stunell: I add the support of the Liberal Democrats, who welcome the Bill. When we review the Bill's purpose, we have to say that it is an important tidying-up provision, making it much easier for residents in Wales to understand how they might make a complaint. All of us who serve in this House know that the general public are well aware of the ombudsman service, but are often not well aware of which particular ombudsman they should approach to deal with specific complaints. It is good to see a public service ombudsman Bill before the House, and I hope that it will now complete its passage quickly.

The Bill has been improved in the debates at this end of the building and at the other end. I welcome the fact that the Welsh Assembly will have a role, through consultation, in the appointment of the ombudsman, and I note that it will have the capacity to amend the remit of the ombudsman service, with the social housing provision coming quite soon.

I regret that we have not got exactly what we wanted on length of tenure, but there is no doubt that the Bill as a whole is worth while, deserves the support of the House and will benefit the residents of Wales.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with an amendment.

Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 13

EXERCISE OF COMMISSIONERS' FUNCTIONS BY OFFICERS

Lords amendment: No. 1.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.—[John Healey.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to deal with Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 9.

6.57 pm

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I am disappointed that the Minister did not feel that he had anything to say. Some interesting concessions have been made in the other place, where some valuable work has been done by the Earl of Northesk and Baroness Noakes. I am glad that the Government decided not to ignore that, even if they ignored us when we tried to make pretty much the same points in Committee.

It is important to put the amendments into context. Although we did not oppose the Bill on Second Reading, we had a number of major concerns about it. Merging the departments involved is a major change, and we are not convinced that it was given enough consideration by the Government or that its implementation was properly thought through. We are also worried that the measure might prejudice taxpayer confidentiality. Taken together, all those things might put at risk some of the yield.

7 pm

The Lords amendments go a small way—it is only a very small way—towards assuaging some of those concerns. Lords amendment No. 1 applies to clause 13. It limits the scope for disclosure of information by a Revenue officer. The duty of confidentiality is, of course, extremely important, and it helps to protect the yield. It is why a number of us fought very hard to retain the oath of confidentiality, which the Government had intended to abolish and on which they relented at the last moment in Committee. The amendment provides that Parliament will ensure that commissioners have a measure of control over disclosure, except in very limited circumstances. We will not oppose it, although we would have liked something stronger.

Anybody forming a view on the matter must examine what Lord Goldsmith said about it in another place, where he set out the circumstances in which an officer might feel the need to give specific instructions to disclose information. If that power were to be abused, MPs would hear about it, in which case I hope that they would make a great noise and that we would return to the issue.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): We have had long discussions about taxpayer confidentiality, and the provisions in the Bill contain some useful protections in that regard. We share the desire of the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) and other Conservative Members to see the oath retained.

[Mr. John Burnett]

I have asked Inland Revenue employees about the oath, which not only buttresses taxpayer confidentiality, but strengthens the position of Inland Revenue employees should someone in a superior position ever seek for them to compromise their integrity on taxpayer confidentiality. As the hon. Member for Chichester has said, it is important that we do nothing to erode taxpayer confidence, otherwise the tax yield is surely at risk.

We welcome the limits on disclosure and noted what the Attorney-General said in the House of Lords on 5 April 2005. The case of Pepper v. Hart is instructive, and hon. Members and tax professionals are only too well aware of the protections that the Attorney-General put on the record.

We are happy to welcome the provision, and we hope that the Bill will be a success. We also hope that the Inland Revenue culture will prevail and that Customs, which has been subject to certain criticisms, will become more receptive to taxpayers' interests, fairness and the rule of law, which should be the culture that guides Revenue and Customs once the merger comes into effect.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): The hon. Members for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) and for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) have carefully considered aspects of the duty of confidentiality throughout the passage of the Bill.

The duty of confidentiality is a weighty matter for any Revenue department and the officers who work within it. As they know, my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General and I, as well as my right hon. Friend the Attorney-General, have emphasised and re-emphasised that throughout the passage of the Bill. I welcome the comments that both hon. Gentlemen have made on the amendments made in another place. That is in keeping with what has been a full and productive debate on the Bill at every stage in the other place and in this House.

The changes with which the Bill returns to this House from another place amend the provision for disclosure of information in the public interest. They have been made because my right hon. Friend the Attorney-General listened to the arguments in the other place and compiled a package that proved acceptable to all parties there. These amendments place the details of when public interest disclosures will be made in the Bill instead of in regulations in the first instance. They also tighten the circumstances in which commissioners could delegate instructions to make public interest disclosures.

Those changes, together with commitments on matters such as information sharing and governance and changes made by my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General to include the introduction of the declaration to acknowledge the duty of taxpayer confidentiality, make this truly a Bill that has all-party support. The establishment of the new integrated department is a valuable step forward in enhancing revenue and customs administration in this country. Over time, it will produce real benefits for taxpayers and other customers and will improve the effectiveness of the department.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister is talking about the projected effectiveness of the merged department, although it will be somewhat slimmer than the two existing departments. Is he confident that two or three years down the line that new, merged and—as he would say—more effective department will have done more to bridge the tax and revenue gap of around £35 billion that hon. Members on both sides of this Chamber, and indeed people across the whole finance sector, would acknowledge exists? Should not we be doing more on that front, and will the new department be in a better position to do so?

John Healey: Over the past two or three years, both the existing departments—the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise—have indeed taken steps to close the revenue gaps that my hon. Friend mentions, and as Customs Minister I have been heavily involved in that. The new integrated department will take further steps to close the gaps that he and I wish to see closed, and in so doing protect revenue that should be coming into the public purse but currently is not.

The Bill creates an independent Revenue and Customs prosecution office. That is an important step that is strongly supported by the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon in particular, and has been widely welcomed by the legal profession.

When the amendments were tabled by my right hon. Friend the Attorney-General in the other place, they were welcomed by Baroness Noakes and Lord Newby, who speak for the Conservatives and the Liberals. On that basis I commend them to the House.

Mr. Tyrie: I want to add only one or two comments. I welcome the Minister's opening remarks—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is allowed to speak only once on this particular amendment: it is not his to introduce.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the House's agreement I will put Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 9 together. The Question is that this House agrees with the Lords in their amendments Nos. 2 to 9.

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman want to speak?

Mr. Tyrie: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I asked if the House wanted to take the amendments together. Does the hon. Gentleman want to speak on one of them?

Mr. Tyrie: Yes, amendment No. 2.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Question is that this House agrees with the Lords in their amendment No. 2.

Mr. Tyrie: Anybody who looks at these amendments will see that it is very difficult to speak to amendment No. 2 without examining amendments Nos. 3 to 9 at the same time. Frankly, they look to me as if they were originally intended to be grouped together. With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will not rise to speak to any of the subsequent amendments—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I trust that the hon. Gentleman's comments will be brief. I should explain that we have already dealt with the entire group of amendments. When we first dealt with them, we debated them as Lords amendment No. 1 plus Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 9. So we have debated them, and having completed the debate we should now be putting them formally only. As the hon. Gentleman has started, I shall let him complete his remarks.

Mr. Tyrie: I am very grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to make pertinent remarks on the remaining clauses. Perhaps I can also get in some more general remarks that might reasonably be made in response to the Minister's points.

The most important element of the remaining clauses was the almost untrammelled power given to the Treasury to make regulations under the original Bill. Their lordships have rightly argued that such power should be circumscribed more tightly. The Conservatives in the Lords proposed that any change to the power of disclosure be subject to what is known as the super-affirmative resolution procedure, which was originally laid down for use in respect of the Identity Cards Bill. Under that procedure, regulations can be amended—in other words, more tightly drawn—which is what is desired in this case.

Of course, that proposal has been around for a long time—the royal commission on House of Lords reform came up with it some time ago—but the Government, having flirted with it, decided that they did not like it. They have rejected that approach in this Bill and have included something else instead, and that is what we are debating now and have to examine. They have established in a reasonably detailed way the conditions that have to be satisfied in order for disclosure to be permissible. Those who are following this debate carefully can look at proposed new subsection (8), where they will find a list of those conditions. As I said a moment ago, they cannot be considered independently of the surrounding clauses.

Having listened to the Minister and, more particularly, having read the Hansard account of the Lords debate on this issue, I worry about the differences and misunderstandings that could develop in the merger of these two cultures. Much of the debate in the other place was at cross purposes. Some peers focused all their arguments on trying to protect taxpayer confidentiality, while others tried to ensure that powers were retained to enable the catching of criminals at the border. It was like two cultures passing in the night: one worry was an Inland Revenue worry, and the other was primarily a Customs worry. In addition to the threat to revenue that we briefly alluded to, a major concern remains about the risk associated with merging these cultures. These amendments and our discussion of them reflect that risk. I note that Lord Goldsmith conceded some ground on this very point in the Lords. The amendments are a step forward, but only a very modest one.

A moment ago, the Minister welcomed our comments on confidentiality. That was a great change in tone compared with the beginning of the debate on this Bill, when we had to struggle to convince the Government to keep the oath. I am very pleased that there has been a change of tune in that regard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member seems to be making a Second Reading debate speech. There are specific Lords amendments before us and I have already given him some leeway. He should have dealt with these matters in the initial debate. He must now deal precisely with Lords amendments Nos. 1 to 9—and he must do so briefly.

7.15 pm

Mr. Tyrie: I shall end by making one more point, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you will permit me that. In response to an intervention by the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) a few moments ago, the Minister made a number of assertions about the increased efficiency that will result from the Bill.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I take my hon. Friend's remarks seriously. The merged Departments have picked the name for their building as No. 1 Parliament street, but this House has had a No. 1 Parliament street address on the other side all the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That intervention and any response to it would be quite out of order. I hope that the hon. Member will bring his remarks to a close.

Mr. Tyrie: I obey your ruling in every particular, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I end by referring to the intervention of the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire, who spoke of the need to close the tax gap. The Economic Secretary responded, but the problem is that he adduced no evidence that there will be any reduction of that gap and provided no evidence whatever that savings might come from the merger. There may be costs, which is why the Conservatives have been so concerned to put down markers to register our concern about the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 9 agreed to.

Railways Bill

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Under the Order of the House made earlier today, any message from the Lords in respect of any Bill may be considered forthwith, without Question put. I have received a message from the Lords. The Lords agree to the Railways Bill with amendments, to which they desire the agreement of the House.

Lords amendments accordingly considered.

Clause 13

RAILWAY FUNCTIONS OF PASSENGER TRANSPORT EXECUTIVES

Lords amendment: No. 1.

7.17 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendment No. 2 with Government motion to disagree, Lords amendment No. 3 with Government motion to disagree, Lords amendment No. 4 with Government motion to disagree, Lords amendment No. 5 with Government motion to disagree, Lords amendment No. 6 with Government motion to disagree and Lords amendment No. 7 with Government motion to disagree.

Mr. McNulty: I am sure that the House authorities are entirely in order in putting the provisions together in this way, but it makes it sound as if there was a good deal of disagreement with the other place. I want to put on record the fact that I commend the other place for the way in which it has scrutinised and ultimately dispatched the Bill—and with a good deal of agreement.

There is but one real issue on which we disagree in this set of amendments and it is about passenger transport executives and their ability to have co-signatory status. The existence of seven Lords amendments and seven disagreements with them does not mean that there was untold disruption or disagreement with our noble Friends in the other place.

I have said before and it has been explained clearly in the other place that the Government cannot accept these amendments. As the noble Lord Davies of Oldham said earlier today, they raise a matter of principle about which the Government are clear. There is a new role for the PTEs and it is required because the current system was built for a different time and does not fit in with the new framework set out in the White Paper.

Throughout our deliberations, all sides have made it clear that the context for the debate is the rail White Paper, not all of which has necessarily been picked up in the Bill. Central to the new structure set out in that document is the role of the Secretary of State in setting the strategic direction and the amount of national funding that will be invested in the railways. The system that the PTEs are seeking to retain is totally inconsistent with that principle and more reminiscent of another time.

The Government have listened carefully to the concerns raised here and in another place about PTEs. As I have said, we have moved considerably from our original position. In the original citation in the rail White Paper concerning this aspect of PTE functions, we were minded to remove all their ability to have co-signatory status. We have moved away from that and the PTEs, with the agreement of the Secretary of State, can have a role to play.

We considered the proposal made in another place for a 60-day window for PTEs to delay before the signing of a franchise. We are unconvinced that that would deliver anything other than costly delay and an opportunity for PTEs to seek to reopen negotiations at the eleventh hour. Potentially, each month's delay in completing a franchising process could cost hundreds of thousands of pounds of taxpayers' money. Clearly, that would be inconsistent with our strategy to deliver efficiency and value for money in the rail industry.

I want to make it very clear, to this House and to the other place, that we feel that we cannot compromise on co-signing or co-specification. Basically, the amendment would allow PTEs to dictate to the Secretary of State—who is responsible for rail across the whole country—what services should be provided in their areas. The right to co-sign puts the PTEs on an equal legal footing with the Secretary of State, despite the fact that the Secretary of State provides the overwhelming majority of funding, with PTEs merely contributing at the margins. Such a system would not make sense: it would merely encourage confrontation and retain the adversarial approach that has been prevalent since co-signatory status was introduced in 1993.

I wish to reassure the House that the provisions are not about removing the important influence and input that PTEs have into the rail services in their areas. That is why the Bill, as introduced, means that the Secretary of State will be under a duty to consult with the PTEs before issuing an invitation to tender for any franchise that includes services to, from or within a PTE's area. This will be a full and detailed consultation, giving the PTEs a clear opportunity to set out the needs and ambitions of their areas.

Once the baseline specification for a franchise, including services in PTE areas, has been set, the PTEs will also have the right to amend the services in their areas—that is, buying additional services, or reducing services and retaining the savings. That will give them much greater flexibility to make choices about the balance of transport in their areas than currently prevails and allow them to make rational decisions based on financial accountability.

Equally, our proposals will not change the mechanism by which PTEs can secure certain rights, such as rights to information, or the right to insist on the train company's involvement in concessionary fares or integrated ticketing. Such rights and responsibilities will continue to be included in franchise agreements as long as the Government are confident that they are necessary and add value. That will remain the case whether or not PTEs are co-signatories.

Nor will the Government's approach reduce the PTEs' ability to maintain their constructive and beneficial relationships with the train operating companies. Centro, the West Midlands PTE, did not co-sign the Chiltern franchise, but it has managed to build an excellent, productive relationship with that TOC. The Government's approach does not attempt to limit local decision making as has been suggested but merely places that in its proper context.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Does the Minister accept that the amendment's provisions in respect of bus substitution services also affect clause 29, which deals with station closures?

Mr. McNulty: I accept the inference that there is a relation between the two, but I struggle to see any connection with the Lords amendment or the Government's motion to disagree. However, I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, and suggest that he raise it again at another point in the debate.

The new arrangements for PTEs will create a more efficient, more accountable and less adversarial framework for delivering rail services in key metropolitan areas. I am by common consent a man of consensus who seeks compromise when it is available. To graft on to the post-Railways Bill rail industry a power that prevailed from 1993 only in the immediate wake of privatisation does not make sense and I need to say that as clearly as possible.

We are seeking modernisation of the relationship between the powers, local decision making and so on of PTEs and the train operating companies and others. That is not a denigration of local democracy in any way, shape or form. There is confusion about that. Hon. Members should be clear that we have sought compromise but there is no scope for it because the 1993 powers for co-signatory status simply do not fit in with the post-White Paper world.

This is a matter of principle, as my noble Friend Lord Davies explained clearly in the other place earlier today, on which the Government are unwilling and, indeed, unable to move. In that context, the House should be clear that to lose the Railways Bill because of this matter would be unfortunate, not least because of the level of consensus on the Bill in this and the other place.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): The speed at which my hon. Friend was moving caught me on the other side of the building. As he is a dear little pussy cat, rather like me, and one of the problems has been misunderstanding, could he make it absolutely clear that the Government have no intention of removing the link with local government and local decision making and that they just want the best solution for everyone concerned?

Mr. McNulty: I agree absolutely with my hon. Friend and endorse every word she said. This is not in any way, shape or form about impinging on PTEs' local decision-making process or a secret agenda—that was suggested at least once in the other place—ultimately to get rid of PTEs. It is about how in the commercial realm passenger transport authorities through PTEs relate to train operating companies and local rail services in their areas. Any decisions they make about much of what they already do are more readily contained in agreements with the ability to add to franchises. None of those abilities is taken away.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): This is one of those dangerous questions to which I do not know what the answer will be, so I hope that the Minister can help me, although that may not be helpful to my party. He may know that I am concerned about the impact that the specifications available to the West Midlands PTE can have on services in the peripheral area. The great power of the PTE sometimes means that local authorities such as Worcestershire and Herefordshire do not receive the services they would like to the conurbation because they are outgunned by the PTE. What impact, if any, would the amendment have on that?

Mr. McNulty: The short answer is none in any direct sense, but the wider position to which the hon. Gentleman referred of those parts of the west midlands region that are not part of the West Midlands PTE area would prevail. Nothing that we are doing in seeking to look at the co-signatory, co-specification status of PTEs vis-à-vis franchises would impact on that relationship which, I freely accept, may sometimes be not as satisfactory as those in Hereford, Worcester and areas peripheral to the PTE area would like. I am sorry, but the Bill does not solve that issue.

If we lose the Bill, we will lose the biggest devolution of Executive functions to Scotland since the Scotland Act 1998. We would have continued uncertainty and unnecessary expense in the rail industry for those who depend on it and uncertainty in the financial and commercial markets for investors. The substantial stakeholder involvement throughout the process, from the rail White Paper to the Railways Bill, has been marked by considerable agreement in the rail industry, not only about the direction those documents give us and the certainty it affords, but that there should be a degree of consolidation afterwards, without constant changes to relationships and structures. To have the Bill fall on that item, for it all to come a-crumbling down and start again, would be a matter of regret, not least—if I may return to my opening statement—because this place and the noble Lords have dealt with so much of the Bill in fine order.

I am sure that Members do not want that to happen, so I hope that they will join me in disagreeing with the Lords in this amendment and sending that message back, with thanks for all they have done so far but a gentle disagreement on this issue.

7.30 pm

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): First, may I associate the official Opposition with the Minister's opening remarks? We, too, thank the other place and congratulate the Lords on the way that they dealt with the Bill. The concordat between the Front Benches ends there. I do not agree with the conclusions that the Minister reached about passenger transport executives, as I shall make clear.

Passenger transport executives were created in 1968 by the late Barbara Castle and although they are children of a Labour Government I pay tribute to their work up and down the country over the years. The Lords amendment to which the Minister takes exception seeks only to keep the status quo. I cannot understand why he finds it so objectionable. It seems bizarre that a Government who have been urging us all to embrace regional government and devolved powers want to take away some of the powers and influence of PTEs.

[Mr. Greg Knight]

In the past PTEs may, on occasion, have delayed the decision-making process. We accept that, as did Members of all parties in the other place who supported the amendment, because it contains a 60-day limit during which the concerns must be dealt with. Such a delay is not a long period, but it would allow PTEs to have their say and reflection to take place. PTEs should continue to be co-signatories.

The Minister referred to the history and I can confirm that it was the last Conservative Government who, in 1993, gave PTEs that power, even though I think that every PTE was Labour-controlled. That goes to show that the Conservative party, when in office, is willing to be fair and to give people a platform for dissenting views, even if they are members of a different political party. It is bizarre that a Labour Government are trying to take that power away from mainly Labour PTEs.

Members on both sides of the other place spoke in favour of the amendment to which the Minister is asking us to disagree. I hope that the vast army of Labour MPs who are no doubt watching our proceedings on their office monitors as they enjoy their last week as Members of this place will join us in the Lobby to speak up for, and vote for, local democracy.

Many local people give much of their time and energy in the interests of rail services in their region. That local democracy is worth supporting. Of course, we accept that some PTEs are better than others, but overall we believe that they have been a force for good and that the Minister is not being entirely straight with the House when he uses the threat that agreeing with the Lords would put the future of the Bill at risk. The Minister has got the decision wrong. He should think again, so I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote no to give him the extra thinking time that he so clearly needs.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): May I say at the outset and by way of very short preface that this is a good Bill? It contains a great many things with which I agree, not least the point that the Minister raised of devolution to Scotland. It is an important piece of devolution that will allow my colleague in the Scottish Executive to deliver good transport solutions on railways for the Scottish people. Therefore, I am with the Minister in the statement that he made that the Bill should not be lost.

I am pleased with some of the compromises. Indeed, I also associate myself with the remarks regarding the way in which the other place has worked on the Bill that have been made by the other two Front Benchers. I am pleased that the Government have seen fit to compromise, where sensible, both in the compromises that have already taken place and the one that may be promised later today. As the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) just said, that does not mean that we should roll over and agree to the Government's view on Lords amendment No. 1. The Government have got this wrong and it would be worth their while thinking again.

I am sorry that the Government have chosen to reject Lords amendment No. 1 and its consequential amendments because the proposal made by my noble Friends and supported by Lords on both sides of the House, not least by those on the Government's Back Benches, is reasonable and seeks to address a deficit in the Bill.

I listened with great care to the Minister's comments. He is always reasonable and he dealt with us very reasonably in Committee. I understand his argument, but he has not persuaded me. I do not understand why, when we are seeking to give people the right to consider decisions locally, it was not possible to find a way in which that expression could be put into the Bill.

The arguments have been well rehearsed in the House throughout all the debates on the Bill and pretty well rehearsed in the other place during most of its stages there. The issue is simple: PTEs in England have a responsibility—I would say, a right—to deliver sound transport solutions in their areas. Rail must be a key part of those solutions and, prior to the amendment made in their lordships' House, the Bill removed from PTEs their involvement in the rail process, taking that entirely to the Secretary of State for Transport—apart from an ability to consult—thus removing rail from the responsibility of PTEs.

Lords amendment No. 1 is reasonable, because it seeks to reintroduce into the Bill some way in which PTEs can fulfil that duty and recognises the Government's right desire to ensure that decisions are made timeously and expeditiously. The Lords put into the amendment a 60-day limit, thus permitting a reasonable compromise between no involvement whatsoever and a far too lengthy system, which is precisely what the Government wish to avoid.

The Minister talked of months of delay in the process. All the processes that I have seen for franchise letting tend to take many months and I really do not think that any franchise process would take less than three to five months to undertake. To give at the beginning of that process a notice that there are 60 days in which a PTE can become involved would not necessarily disrupt that process.

The Minister also said that the proposal would not fit in with the post-White Paper world. I do not accept that. As he knows, I support the provisions of the White Paper and am happy that they should be legislated for, but I do not see why the Lords amendment could not be accommodated in some way. I therefore have to say to my right hon. and hon. Friends that we should vote in favour of the Lords amendment or, at the very least, give the Lords an opportunity to make the Government think again.

Mr. Cash: I am interested in the provision because it pertains, among other things, to the question of station services and bus substitution services, which are a direct matter of concern in my constituency. I accept that the Minister has not yet taken over the responsibilities of the Strategic Rail Authority, but we had a constructive meeting last Saturday with the SRA about Stone and Norton Bridge stations, the famous station at Wedgwood and the one at Barlaston that are on the line that is now subject to closure. However, the SRA cannot now make any assumptions about what is in mind for those stations.

The problem is that enormous inconvenience will be caused to my constituents if the stations on that line are closed. There is a petition and strong campaign—with which, as you might imagine, Madam Deputy Speaker, I am fully associated—to keep the stations open. I am glad to say that there was a constructive atmosphere at the meeting last Saturday, but the matter needs to be sorted out.

Bus substitution services would come within the framework of clause 13. If a franchise agreement were issued, the Secretary of State would have to consult the executive about a range of matters including station services. I note that station services are defined in clause 13(9) as "services provided in connection with any such service for the carriage of passengers by railway".

That is an issue of grave concern to my constituents. When the Secretary of State takes over the role, I will want to know for sure that there would be no question, when he consults the executive in that area, about his sticking with what the SRA has clearly indicated at that important meeting: the stations at Stone, Norton Bridge, Wedgwood and Barlaston would be kept open. It is an important matter for my constituents, not least because the service is part of the community in that area.

I looked up this afternoon the private Act that gave rise to the creation of this railway in 1846. It has been pivotal to the community for the whole period since then. In a positive and constructive sense, we would also like to look forward, as I said at the meeting, to cross-country trains—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I have been fairly generous with the hon. Gentleman, but I hope that he will now confine his remarks to the amendments.

Mr. Cash: Yes, indeed, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The amendment says that the statement to the Secretary of State should specify

"any minimum level of quality with respect to the operation of any station within the area in question which may be required by any such franchise agreement."

In that context, a minimum level of quality would include that stations are kept open. I am anxious to ensure that that happens when there is the transfer from the SRA to the Minister. Of course he will then be directly accountable to the House for the exercise of those functions.

7.45 pm

There is a power to close stations in clause 29 and subsequent clauses. If stations were closed, it clearly would not be possible for meaningful consultation to take place under clause 13 between the Secretary of State and the executive of an area, which is why I support Lords amendment No. 1. Proposed new subsection (1A) would specify that there would have to be a statement on the minimum level of quality of the operation of a station in an area that could be required under a franchise agreement.

In a nutshell, I am simply concerned that Stone station and the other stations that I mentioned remain open, that the service of the railway operators to my constituents is maintained and that positive and constructive development of the railway line to Birmingham, Manchester and the locality is continued. I do not in any way resile from the fact that I believe that we will win the general election, but none the less I look to the Minister who has present responsibility for the matter—although not, I hope, for much longer—to maintain the stations for the benefit of my constituents.

Question put, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment:—

The House divided: Ayes 198, Noes 63.

Division No. 155] [7.46 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Adams, Irene (Paisley N)
Ainsworth, Bob (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, rh Donald (Swansea E)
Bailey, Adrian
Baird, Vera
Barnes, Harry
Barron, rh Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Bennett, Andrew
Benton, Joe (Bootle)
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Bradley, rh Keith (Withington)
Bradshaw, Ben
Brennan, Kevin
Browne, Desmond
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Byrne, Liam (B'ham Hodge H)
Cairns, David
Caton, Martin
Challen, Colin
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Mrs Helen (Peterborough)
Clarke, rh Tom (Coatbridge & Chryston)
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cooper, Yvette
Cousins, Jim
Cranston, Ross
Cruddas, Jon
Cunningham, Jim (Coventry S)
Cunningham, Tony (Workington)
Dalyell, Tam
David, Wayne
Davidson, Ian
Davies, rh Denzil (Llanelli)
Dawson, Hilton
Denham, rh John
Dobbin, Jim (Heywood)
Dobson, rh Frank
Donohoe, Brian H.
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim (Lewisham W)
Drew, David (Stroud)
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff (Barnsley E)
Farrelly, Paul
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul (Newport W)
Foster, rh Derek
Foulkes, rh George
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike (Ilford S)
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Bruce (Walsall S)
Gerrard, Neil
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grogan, John
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hamilton, David (Midlothian)
Hanson, David
Harris, Tom (Glasgow Cathcart)
Havard, Dai (Merthyr Tydfil & Rhymney)
Healey, John
Hendrick, Mark
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Heyes, David
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hood, Jimmy (Clydesdale)
Hope, Phil (Corby)
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, rh Alan (Newport E)
Howarth, George (Knowsley N & Sefton E)
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hughes, rh Beverley (Stretford & Urmston)
Hutton, rh John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Eric
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jones, Kevan (N Durham)
Jones, Lynne (Selly Oak)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Joyce, Eric (Falkirk W)
Keen, Ann (Brentford)
Khabra, Piara S.
Kilfoyle, Peter
Kidyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, David
Laxton, Bob (Derby N)
Lazarowicz, Mark

Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom (High Peak)
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Love, Andrew
Lucas, Ian (Wrexham)
McAvoy, rh Thomas
McCabe, Stephen
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
MacDougall, John
McFall, rh John
McKechin, Ann
Mackinlay, Andrew
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
McWilliam, John
Mahmood, Khalid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John (Bassetlaw)
Marsden, Gordon (Blackpool S)
Marshall, David (Glasgow Shettleston)
Marshall-Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miller, Andrew
Mole, Chris
Moonie, Dr. Lewis
Moran, Margaret
Morley, Elliot
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Munn, Ms Meg
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Osborne, Sandra (Ayr)
Owen, Albert
Pearson, Ian
Picking, Anne
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter (Burnley)
Pond, Chris (Gravesham)
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prentice, Gordon (Pendle)
Purchase, Ken
Quin, rh Joyce
Reed, Andy (Loughborough)
Robertson, John (Glasgow Anniesland)
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Roy, Frank (Motherwell)
Ruddock, Joan
Salter, Martin
Sarwar, Mohammad
Savidge, Malcolm
Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simon, Siôn (B'ham Erdington)
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Smith, rh Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, rh Chris (Islington S & Finsbury)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, rh John
Stewart, Ian (Eccles)
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Tami, Mark (Alyn)
Taylor, rh Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Don (Islwyn)
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Neil (Wigan)
Vis, Dr. Rudi
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N.
Watts, David
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, Betty (Conwy)
Winnick, David
Woodward, Shaun
Worthington, Tony
Wright, Anthony D. (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, David (Telford)
Wright, Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Tom Watson and James Purnell

NOES

Allan, Richard
Atkinson, David (Bour'mth E)
Beith, rh A. J.
Bellingham, Henry
Bercow, John
Blunt, Crispin
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Breed, Colin
Browning, Mrs Angela
Burnett, John
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies (NE Fife)
Cash, William
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Chope, Christopher
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davies, Quentin (Grantham & Stamford)
Dorrell, rh Stephen
Field, Mark (Cities of London & Westminster)
Foster, Don (Bath)
Francois, Mark
Garnier, Edward
George, Andrew (St. Ives)
Goodman, Paul
Grieve, Dominic
Gummer, rh John
Hayes, John (S Holland)
Heald, Oliver
Hendry, Charles
Hoban, Mark (Fareham)
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Jack, rh Michael
Jenkin, Bernard
Kirkwood, Sir Archy
Knight, rh Greg (E Yorkshire)
Lewis, Dr. Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Luff, Peter (M-Worcs)
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, Patrick
Mitchell, Andrew (Sutton Coldfield)
O'Brien, Stephen (Eddisbury)
Paterson, Owen
Prisk, Mark (Hertford)
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Rosindell, Andrew
Sanders, Adrian
Smyth, Rev. Martin (Belfast S)
Stanley, rh Sir John
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Desmond
Swire, Hugo (E Devon)
Taylor, Dr. Richard (Wyre F)
Thurso, John
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Tyler, Paul (N Cornwall)
Tyrie, Andrew
Whittingdale, John
Wiggin, Bill
Winterton, Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Sir Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Yeo, Tim (S Suffolk)

Tellers for the Noes:
Gregory Barker and Bob Russell

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendment disagreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 7 disagreed to.

Clause 35

CLOSURES ELIGIBLE TO BE TREATED AS MINOR MODIFICATIONS

Lords amendment: No. 8.

8 pm

Mr. McNulty: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 9 to 13, and 15 to 17.

Mr. McNulty: I do not wish to detain the House. These are either technical amendments that are fully endorsed by the other place or amendments that follow on from the recommendations of the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee and, again, are endorsed by the other place. I commend them to the House.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 9 to 13 agreed to.

Schedule 4

REVIEWS BY ORR OF ACCESS CHARGES AND LICENCE CONDITIONS

Lords amendment: No. 14.

Mr. McNulty: I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments (a) to (e) in lieu.

Mr. McNulty: As with the first group of Lords amendments, in disagreeing with them, we are offering sufficient wording in lieu to meet not just the concerns expressed in the other place but anxieties raised in this Chamber and in Committee.

In the other place and in Committee concerns were highlighted, particularly by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), about adverse effects on train operators' businesses if an access charges review results in the reduced capacity of the rail network. An amendment was tabled to address those concerns. While the operators' contracts provide for mitigation and compensation for any adverse effects arising from a change to the network's capability, there is no explicit requirement for either the Office of Rail Regulation or the Secretary of State to consider those matters during an access charges review. Both the Secretary of State and the ORR have given public undertakings that issues of mitigation and compensation for adverse effects will form part of an access charges review. However, the other place and some hon. Members do not consider those undertakings to be sufficient, and wish such matters to be enshrined in legislation.

The Lords amendment addresses that concern, and would confirm in statute a commitment already given in the written undertakings. It makes it the duty of the ORR to notify the Secretary of State when it appears that such adverse effects are likely, and to advise the Secretary of State of the mitigation and compensation that would be required, and of the costs of those measures. The amendment gives the Secretary of State the opportunity to revise his specification, or budget, or both, to mitigate those adverse effects. It also requires the ORR, in conducting an access charges review, to have regard to any adverse consequences for train operators, and in particular any need for mitigating measures, or compensation, or both. Of course, such adverse consequences may not arise from an access charges review, but the amendment ensures that if they ever do arise, both the ORR and the Secretary of State will be obliged to take full account of the consequential need for mitigation or compensation.

It is not possible to concede everything that is proposed in the Lords amendment, because it would allow legislation to interfere in matters already treated wholly and properly within contracts. Further, it commits the Secretary of State and Scottish Ministers to find additional public money to fund any shortfall in adequate compensation, leaving the determination of what is adequate with the ORR. The amendment from the other place therefore undermines two important points of principle, to which we have adhered during the passage of the Bill: the primacy of the contract, and Ministers' ability to control their own budget.

By offering the words in lieu, we recognise the concerns expressed in the amendment from the other place and raised by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire and the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) in our proceedings, without impinging on the contractual relationship. We think that that is the right and proper approach. I am grateful to their lordships for raising these issues. The words offered in lieu do what they require of us, but in a way that preserves the primacy of the contract. I commend to the House the Government motion to disagree and our words offered in lieu.

Mr. Greg Knight: I am grateful to the Minister for the out-of-Chamber discussions that we were able to have on the matter earlier today. There is an important point at issue which, as the Minister said, we raised twice, once in Committee and once on report, because we were concerned not about the threat to the independence of the Office of Rail Regulation, but about the scope of the powers—the jurisdiction. It seemed to us that that was at risk.

We were deeply concerned that the Bill could undermine the sanctity of contracts entered into voluntarily. That was why my party in the other place tabled the Lords amendment that is before us, in an attempt to protect investors against any Secretary of State putting the network into decline, making changes to access contracts and reducing the value of contractual rights. The amendment would provide protection for existing contractual rights. It was our view that if the Government were indeed acting in good faith, they should not have any difficulty in accepting the Lords amendment. Whatever budget is set for our rail network, it must surely take account of existing legal commitments. The amendment would therefore come into effect only in certain limited circumstances.

We accept that the Minister has been responsive to the concerns that we expressed and, dare I say it without his blighting his career, has shown his reasonable side. The amendment in lieu is not perfect. It is not ideal, but it is a move in the direction that we were urging the Government to take, and it is an acknowledgement of the force of the arguments that we adduced in Committee and on Report. It would be churlish of us to reject the Minister's overtures. We do not reject his welcome hand of compromise. We accept his suggestion that the House should adopt the amendment in lieu. I give him this pledge: next month, when I am sitting on the Treasury Bench with my colleagues, we will think of at least part of his time as Minister with affection.

John Thurso: I concur with the comments of the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight). The amendment in lieu that the Minister proposed in his new reasonable guise gives sufficient assurance and should be accepted. The matter should no longer be a point of conflict between us. I concur that the primacy of the contract is at the heart of the matter. The concern shared by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire and myself was that, as drafted, the Bill could override a previously written contract. We agreed with the principle that the Minister advanced, but had a different interpretation. The words put forward by the Minister are not all that I would have wished to see, but they are certainly acceptable, and therefore I believe that the House should agree to them.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am slightly worried that the Minister might have been altogether too reasonable. Although I do not naturally recognise him in that guise, perhaps he will reassure me that the clause, rewritten as it is, does not underwrite all the financial obligations of the contract holders, and, as usual in the privatisation of British Rail, leave the taxpayer having to underwrite any changes that may come about. Is it not truly absurd to have the situation that has obtained hitherto where the regulator, who has had no responsibility to the taxpayer or anybody else, has been able to agree certain basic charges and changes without any regard to the cost in the long run?

Mr. McNulty: I can certainly give my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) that assurance. As I said, the Lords amendment far more readily offered an open and blank cheque in those terms, and took away from Ministers the ability to control budgets, as ultimately they should, as well as impacting on the primacy of the contract, which is why I am grateful for the agreement of both Front-Bench spokesmen. Without pursuing the point, the words that we have offered in lieu far more readily and in a neater and more efficient way address the concerns raised, with the caveat from my hon. Friend, rather than the existing words, and in that context, I commend them to the House.

[Mr. McNulty]

Lords amendment disagreed to.

Government amendments (a) to (e) in lieu of Lords amendment No. 14 agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 15 to 17 agreed to.

Committee appointed to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to their amendments Nos. 1 to 7: Mr. Greg Knight, Mr. Khalid Mahmood, Gillian Merron, Mr. Tony McNulty and John Thurso; Mr. Tony McNulty to be the Chairman of the Committee; Three to be the quorum of the Committee.—[Gillian Merron.]

To withdraw immediately.

Reasons for disagreeing to certain Lords amendments reported, and agreed to; to be communicated to the Lords.

8.13 pm

Sitting suspended.

On resuming—

Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill

8.45 pm

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Under the Order of the House made earlier today, any message from the Lords in respect of any Bill may be considered forthwith without any Question put. I have received a message from the Lords. The Lords agree to the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, with amendments to which they desire the agreement of the Commons.

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 3

EXPOSING VEHICLES FOR SALE ON A ROAD

Lords amendment: No. 1.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

I shall be brief, because the amendment refers to issues that were raised by right hon. and hon. Members during the latter stages of our discussion in this House and by peers who raised a number of issues in another place.

The amendment delivers the intention that has always existed in the Bill that no one should sell vehicles on a road, but it clarifies the situation at a junction where there might be four roads, or even more at a complicated junction, and ensures that the fact that a provision refers to "a road" cannot be used to avoid the intention of the Bill.

I am grateful to Members of the other place who raised the matter and enabled my noble Friend Lord Whitty to move an amendment. With those few words, I commend the Lords amendment to the House.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I join the Minister in paying tribute to Members of the other place. The amendment seems to be eminently appropriate and recognises a gap in the Bill that we did not have the opportunity to discuss in Committee. We agree with the amendment, which was discussed and analysed in the other place.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): We are keen to see the Bill on the statute book because it includes some important environmental protection measures. Its passage was a little dubious earlier, but it now seems that it will get there tonight. The Minister said that the Government are happy to accept the amendment, and we too support it. My hon. Friends also pointed out the problem, and I am sure that the residents of Seven Dials, Covent Garden and similar places with complex junctions with many roads will be pleased to know that there will be no loophole. The sort of people who sell vehicles from the road look for a loophole, and it is important that we plug it with the amendment.

Alun Michael: I celebrate the agreement on the amendment. This is an important Bill which will play an important part in creating clean neighbourhoods. I am delighted that despite the imminence of an election we can agree.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Clause 20

LITTER CLEARING NOTICES

Lords amendment: No. 2.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Alun Michael.]

Miss McIntosh: The official Opposition welcome the thrust of the amendment, as we debated the issue under the limited scrutiny provision available to us in Committee. We support the provision of guidance on fly-tipping, one of the key aspects of the Bill, but before we give the amendment our formal agreement I would like the Minister to respond to a few questions.

What instruction has been given to relevant Departments on the issuing of guidance relating to clause 20 and what is the time scale for that? What formal consultations will be held on that guidance? What is the time scale for full implementation of the Bill, especially the fly-tipping provisions? Recently, I was delighted to initiate an Adjournment debate on the subject, to which the Solicitor-General replied, but I was alarmed when she revealed that a new offence was to be created whereby the non-occupying landowner will be charged with the physical removal of waste or rubbish illegally tipped on their land.

The information was revealed only during limited discussion during an Adjournment debate, but if there is to be such a new offence, guidance would be appropriate, so will the Minister consider producing guidance on how non-occupying landowners are to be alerted to that provision, as it is not evident in the Bill? Furthermore, will he ensure that the guidance encourages local authorities, wherever possible, to help landowners—whether occupying or non-occupying—to remove fly-tipped waste? If he can address those points, it would be most helpful.

Alun Michael: I hope that I can satisfy the hon. Lady on all those points. Commencement is intended to be April 2006; it will be by order and will be accompanied by guidance, which will be available in good time.

Clause 50 will not apply to the victims of fly-tipping, only to culpable landowners. I am sure that the hon. Lady will agree that that distinction is appropriate. I can confirm that the guidance will alert local authorities to the concerns to which she referred. As in many situations, we need to ensure that the balance is right. Those points were covered by my noble Friend, Lord Whitty, when dealing with the amendment in the other place. He pointed out that section 59 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 enables the enforcement agencies to require an occupier who knowingly allows his land to be used for fly-tipping to remove the fly-tipped waste.

Clause 50 will extend that power to landowners, but only where there is no occupier. In addition, the occupier, and now the landowner, will still have the defence that they did not knowingly cause or permit deposit of the waste. That change will help the enforcing authorities to bring irresponsible landowners within the remit of legislation, without penalising the victims of fly-tipping. I agree with the hon. Lady that we do not want to penalise the victims of such offending.

The amendment will help to deal with the problems that have occurred, especially in urban areas where there is no occupier and an absentee landlord allows his land to be used as an illegal waste dump. I am sure that most Members know of such cases in their constituencies. It has certainly been my experience and that of my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment.

The discussion in the other place and the amendment agreed there have enabled the Government to be slightly more precise about what was always our intention, and to address the issues raised, as the hon. Lady rightly says, during our proceedings and those that took place in the other House. I commend the amendment to the House.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Clause 101

STATUTORY NUISANCE: INSECTS

Lords amendment: No. 3.

Alun Michael: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 4.

Alun Michael: The Lords amendments will exclude most farmland, woodlands, reedbeds, osier beds, market gardens, nursery grounds, orchards, other land on farms designed in regulations by the Secretary of State or, of course, by the National Assembly in relation to Wales, and any land included in a site of special scientific interest, plus most forms of water—rivers, lakes, ponds and so on—from the application of the statutory nuisance regime to insects that emanate from them, thus meeting the concerns that clause 101 would adversely affect biodiversity by incurring action against concentrations of naturally occurring insects on farmland.

I am sure that it is generally agreed by hon. Members on both sides of the House that we want to encourage biodiversity, and it was never the intention that the Bill should apply in those circumstances. Organisations, such as Buglife, expressed some concern that there could be an unintentional misuse of what is generally agreed to be a positive measure in the Bill. I am happy that the Lords amendments improve the Bill and deal with that concern, and I am therefore happy to commend them to the House.

Miss McIntosh: I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on listening to the concerns of what is a very important industry to the UK. As my constituency is probably substantially more rural and agricultural than his, the fact that, without these Lords amendments, set-aside would otherwise have been introduced would not have been very well received, so I congratulate him and those in the other place for taking action. The Lords amendments will be most warmly received by the bugs industry, and indeed its beneficiaries—the producers and growers.

[Miss McIntosh]

Mr. Allan: These Lords amendments were very much welcomed by my colleagues here and in another place. The issue was of concern to us, so the fact that the Government have accepted its substance is important. I have come late to the Bill, so I have been given briefings on what has gone on before, and they tell me that the statement that I need to make is that we are very grateful on behalf of all rare invertebrates to the Government for agreeing to amend the clause. Given the forthcoming election, we are electioneering and the next bit is the best bit of all: few people have time to think about insects, but for our six-legged friends, we are the effective Opposition. We believe that a success has been achieved on behalf of our six-legged and, I assume—to classify spiders as insects—our eight-legged friends as well. These Lords amendments are useful and helpful, and we are glad that the clause has been adjusted to take account of some very genuine concerns that were expressed.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 4 agreed to.

8.59 pm

Sitting suspended.

Drugs Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 3

DRUG OFFENCE SEARCHES: ENGLAND AND WALES

Lords amendment: No. 1

9.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2 and 3.

Caroline Flint: I should like the House to consider a group of three technical Government amendments, which remedy the fact that by error the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill and the Drugs Bill were drafted to insert new paragraph 35B into schedule 4 of the Police Reform Act 2002. The amendments ensure that the Drugs Bill inserts new paragraph 35C after paragraph 35B inserted by the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill and no longer inserts a second paragraph 35B.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I thank the Minister for her constructive amendments. In due course, on another occasion, we will want to return to the subject of drugs in order to press for tougher sentences for those dealing drugs to schoolchildren and to look again at the reclassification of cannabis to category B. However, we accept that the Bill takes matters a step forward, and on that basis I am happy to thank the Minister for the amendments.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): It would not make sense to oppose amendments that seek to correct an error that unfortunately crept into the Bill. Like the Conservatives, Liberal Democrats have not sought to oppose the Bill. We believe that it helps to take the law forward in respect of drugs, although we may have some disagreements about where we should go with drugs policy thereafter. However, the amendments make perfect sense, and I hope that the Bill is able to proceed on to the statute book.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): This Bill was conceived in prejudice, written in ignorance and is being enacted with incompetence. Those who are supporting it will come to rue the day when this piece of legislative garbage went through the House. It is the worst Bill in my parliamentary experience since the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991. As parliamentarians, we should at least ensure that our decisions do not do harm, but this Bill will do harm. It will ensure that a legal trade that causes no problems and is conducted by many businesses will end and be replaced by an illegal trade. We are banning psilocybin—a natural product that will disappear from the market possibly to be replaced by drugs such as fly agaric, which we are not banning but which is a far more dangerous drug.

This sorry Bill is the latest in a series of Bills since 1971 supported by Governments and Oppositions. It has even been supported by the Liberal Democrats, who should know better, do not have anything to gain by it and should oppose it. Every organisation of people who are knowledgeable about the drugs world has opposed the Bill. The Government have had no support for it. They did not even go to their advisory counsel to ask him for an opinion.

The Bill will go down as one of the worst Bills enacted in Parliament in recent times. It will come back to haunt us, because it will do a great deal of harm. Part of its populist, tabloid nonsense is the attempt to restrict people who are selling drugs near schools. That is a laudable aim—of course we want drugs to be kept out of the reach of children—but the Bill has developed that as it has gone on. Starting with the idea of trying to cure a problem that does not exist, it has built up the absurdity by putting in special penalties against those who sell drugs not only near schools but in other areas where children might be—youth clubs and so on. Then it moved on to routes to schools, and then even short-cuts on those routes. Our urban areas will be cobwebbed with a series of places in which restrictions will apply throughout, when in fact only special restrictions should apply.

The Bill was considered in the other place on Monday and today, and all the very knowledgeable Lords opposed it; indeed, I know of no one who has taken an interest in these issues over the years who supports it. It will close down the "magic mushroom" business, which has carried on with very few problems and pays, so I understand, about £1 million a year in VAT. We are repeating the same old mistake in believing—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman very gently that we have before us three very technical amendments and he is ranging rather wide of the mark.

Paul Flynn: You have been very generous to me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I should point out that the three amendments were presented to us at three minutes' notice, when the bells started to go.

My observations are general ones. We know that a deal has been done between the Government and the Opposition parties. It is deal made between people who were afraid to take an intelligent view on this issue. Again, we have a so-called tough policy. Oh, that we as a legislature could one day have an intelligent policy on drugs.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 and 3 agreed to.

PETITIONS

Supermarket Site

9.53 pm

Mr. Liam Byrne (Birmingham, Hodge Hill) (Lab): For many years now, the residents of Hodge Hill have campaigned against Tesco concreting over local playing fields while the city council takes the money to spend elsewhere in the city. So, following my recent Adjournment debate and questions to Ministers, I am now pleased to present this petition.

The petition states:

The Petition of the residents of Hodge Hill and the surrounding area

Declares their opposition to the proposed development of a Tesco supermarket on the site of the Brockhurst road playing fields.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to strengthen the planning laws relating to the sale of non-school playing fields to enable the development to be stopped.

The Petitioners further request that if the development cannot be stopped, the House of Commons urge the Government to ensure that 100 per cent. of the proceeds of the sale of this development be spent on upgrading facilities for young people in Hodge Hill.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mobile Phone Mast

9.54 pm

Mr. Kerry Pollard (St. Albans) (Lab): I present a petition from my St. Albans constituents, which, I am proud to say, is, I believe, the last of this Parliament.

The petition states:

The Petition of the St. Albans residents

Declares that Vodafone has breached the mobile phone industry's code of best practice in its application to construct a phone mast in London road, St. Albans.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to introduce legislation ensuring that local residents are consulted, and that the needs of children living in residential areas are taken into account before masts are constructed in such areas.

The Petitioners further request that the Government introduce legislation to force mobile phone network providers to use existing masts where such masts already exist.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

101 Bus Service

9.54 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): I am sorry to disabuse the hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. Pollard), but this is the last petition of this Parliament. The petition is urged by more than 700 of my constituents and it represents their protest about the removal of the 101 bus service from Walton corner along the A34 to Aston island.

The petition states:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The Humble Petition of the residents and bus passengers of Walton, Stone, in the Staffordshire sheweth

That the Petitioners are against the removal of the 101 Bus from Walton Corner along the A34 to Aston Island.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will urge the Government to use their influence to persuade First PMT to reconsider, and to restore the 101 bus service to local residents.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Acute Hospitals (Funding)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

9.56 pm

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I am delighted to have secured what may well be the last Adjournment debate of this Parliament, particularly on such an important issue as acute hospital funding. It is a serious issue for many MPs, but I want to speak about particular concerns in my own constituency in the far west of Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly.

At the outset, I declare an interest in that my wife is a nurse working in the NHS—unfortunately, only in a nursing bank at the moment. She has worked all her working life in the NHS. A second declaration of interest is that I was a patient last week at one of the hospitals that I shall mention in the debate. I was there for day surgery just over a week ago, and I must say that an excellent service was provided.

I also want to say at the outset—the Minister will be pleased to hear me say it—that I appreciate the dedication and professionalism of NHS staff. I say that not because my wife works in the NHS, but because I genuinely appreciate those characteristics of the NHS. The Liberal Democrats campaigned at the last general election for increased taxation and investment in the NHS, so I am also pleased to welcome the additional resources that the Government have invested in the NHS in recent years. The funding is much needed and much appreciated.

The title of the debate is "Acute Hospitals (Funding)", but I recognise that such funding does not come in a separate silo from other funding going via primary care trusts into primary and general health care. The Minister will no doubt refer in his response to the extra funding going into Cornwall's three PCTs and health trusts. Certainly, substantial additional amounts of money are going into Cornwall PCTs, but my first main point is about how that money compares with funding in other parts of the country.

The Minister will know that the three Cornwall PCTs are in significant deficit and have been over the past three or four years. They are working hard to achieve a recurring balance, but the Minister will also be aware that the National Audit Office produced a report on 28 April last year that identified the fact that only three PCTs in the UK had overspends of more than £5 million in 2002–03. All three were, of course, the Cornish PCTs.

That raises the question not of management failure in Cornwall, but of whether the funding formula properly reflects the challenges presented to those who have to manage the budgets and meet national targets for NHS spending and care in an area such as Cornwall.

The task of providing health care in Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly is especially challenging, and the formula does not take full account of what I call the geographical challenges that the area faces. Some people ascribe those difficulties to peripherality, rurality or peninsularity but, unlike other parts of the country, Cornwall cannot call on emergency services to the north, west or south. The ambulance funding formula takes account of geography to a small extent, but PCT funding does not do so at all.

Another challenge to the provision of health care in the area is posed by demography. Cornwall's population tends to be much older than is the case with other areas, and the county also has more tourists than elsewhere. I understand that the Department cannot write off the debts incurred by the local PCTs, which are trying incredibly hard to achieve recurring balances in their budgets, but perhaps we should look at the appropriateness of the levels of funding made available to them.

For example, the West Cornwall PCT anticipates a deficit of only £5.9 million this year, a significant reduction from last year. Ultimately, that debt must be recovered and paid off, but the market forces factor is already critical and will become even more important in the future. That factor involves an assessment of external labour market costs, but wage levels in Cornwall have been the lowest in the country since records began. This year, the market forces factor will kick in much harder than has been the case since its introduction in 1976, and it will come as no surprise that the impact will be very significant. In fact, funding for West Cornwall PCT will be the lowest in the country as a result.

Is the Minister satisfied that it is right that the market forces factor should have such a substantial impact on available funding, given that it will leave Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly seriously short of money, in comparison with the rest of the country? That will happen even though the area faces obvious additional costs—as a result of the geographic, demographic and other challenges that I have set out—that are not reflected in the formula. Moreover, as I said, the PCTs must also tackle the requirement to balance the crippling deficits that they face. In addition, will the Minister say which Departments funding locally delivered services—such as social services, police and education, whose staff are primarily paid according to national pay scales—use the same market forces factor in their funding formula?

I come now to the impact of funding on acute services. Cornwall's main district general hospital is the Royal Cornwall at Treliske. It serves some 400,000 of the county's population of a little over half a million people, and it has just over 1,000 acute beds and 174 consultants. The two other acute hospitals in the county are St. Michael's in Hayle, and the West Cornwall hospital in Penzance, which deal primarily with elective and day care work. In the past, the Penzance facility has taken a lot of blue light and emergency admissions, although that happens less nowadays.

The lowering of the protocols mean that more blue light incidents and emergencies pass West Cornwall hospital's front door on their way to Treliske, and that the emergency services are under increasing pressure. I shall return to that matter, but before this debate I sent the Minister some information about the services available in the county. As I said earlier, it is not possible for us to seek additional services in areas to the north, west or south, and the situation in the area covered by the Royal Cornwall Hospitals Trust contrasts with what happens in Northumbria and Calderdale. Those areas have three and two DGHs, respectively, and their populations are roughly the same as Cornwall's. There should be a serious review of whether putting all the eggs—emergency and acute services—into one basket is appropriate. That can be dangerous. On 9 March, less than a month ago, there were 30 patients on trolleys and on the days before and afterwards ambulances were queuing outside unable to offload patients into the hospital. The bed managers were trying desperately to discharge 95 patients to community hospitals only a year after 100 beds in those community hospitals were closed.

The desperate situation has been caused by a funding crisis and because most acute emergencies are brought into one hospital. It is unacceptable that beds in the primary sector have been removed when there are layers of chief executives and boards. Thirteen chief executives run services in Cornwall and it is impossible to have a strategic view when there are three primary care trusts, two delivery trusts, two social services departments—one in Cornwall and one on the Isles of Scilly—an ambulance trust, the strategic health authority and replication on the south-east and north-east borders of Cornwall. Instead of all that bureaucracy, we need a clear strategic view and a focus on the care provided in the acute sector.

The proposal for West Cornwall hospital—I have been working for it with the strategic health authority and others—is for a rebuild with perhaps a doubling of the number of beds. The strategic health authority, the acute trust and the PCT agree that that is a desirable objective and we will work together to try to achieve that new build so that the hospital can take more patients and emergencies. But how can the money be found for new build when capital building programmes require the money to be repaid from revenue and the revenue is insufficient?

I am encouraged that after my hard work and that of many others in the local community, the Labour prospective parliamentary candidate—none of us has heard of him—has issued a leaflet saying that we need a 24-hour accident and emergency unit based in Penzance. That is encouraging—I presume that he was given permission to say that by the Minister—because we have campaigned for that for a long time. I hope that the Minister will confirm that the Government support that.

I had a helpful meeting with the Minister's colleague in June last year when those proposals received broad support and recognition that they need to be taken forward. I have an easy question for the Minister. Can he assure me that if the strategic health authority, the PCT and the Royal Cornwall Hospitals NHS Trust want that his Department will provide all the assistance it can?

My third and final point concerns the impact of Government proposals for independent sector procurement. I understand that the intention for wave 2 funding under the NHS improvement plan published in June 2004 is to set a target of about 15 per cent. elective activity from private sector providers. I also understand that a number of targets will be set to lead to that overall target during the forthcoming years, but as well as elective procurement, additional announcements have been made for targets for budgets for diagnostic and pathology procurement from the private sector.

The problem is that in a place like Cornwall it is not appropriate to seek elective work from the private sector because of the challenges of our geography. Furthermore, if we have to plan for obtaining diagnostic services from the private sector, it will undermine our attempts to build up the critical resources and capacity of the small hospital in west Cornwall; for example, by installing a CT scanner. It would be helpful if the Minister will reassure me that the Government will step back from those targets, especially in places such as Cornwall. The Department seems to be indicating that previous intentions and targets may not be pursued with the vigour that was suggested last year. Will private sector procurement plans be pursued according to the targets set in the NHS improvement plan?

These issues are important to many of my constituents, who are concerned about the difficulties relating to the funding formula in Cornwall and the impact on NHS services, especially the acute sector. I am sure the Minister accepts that the area presents some significant challenges. The geography is challenging and a high number of tourists visit the area. We must ensure that we have the capacity to cope.

10.11 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I congratulate the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on securing the debate. I know that he feels strongly about the national health service and he is right to congratulate NHS staff throughout the country and in Cornwall on their excellent work—his wife included, no doubt. I am pleased that he acknowledges the funding that is going into the NHS. I reply to many Adjournment debates and usually—certainly when Conservative Members are raising these issues—one would think that we were spending less than in 1997 rather than about double.

The latest round of revenue allocations to primary care trusts, covering 2006–07 to 2007–08, represents further investment in the NHS of no less than £135 billion: £64 billion to PCTs in 2006–07 and £70 billion in 2007–08. That is equivalent to an average increase of 9.2 per cent. for 2006–07 and 9.4 per cent. for 2007–08, and an average of 19.5 per cent. over the two years.

The hon. Gentleman said that I would give him lots of figures and he is quite right. With an election under way, I am not likely to let anybody forget that the Labour Government are responsible for a huge reinvestment in the NHS. His constituency has benefited, too. PCTs in Devon and Cornwall will receive cash increases of more than £368 million for the two-year period. The West of Cornwall PCT, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, will receive an increase of £37.4 million or 19.9 per cent. for the two years. Those are considerable increases in funding, however we cut it.

The hon. Gentleman raised issues about the funding formula specific to his constituency. I have been a Health Minister for two years and have thoroughly enjoyed it. Electorate and Prime Minister willing, I shall be delighted to carry on for another years. In that time, I have answered an awful lot of Adjournment debates and have heard reasons from every Member of the House as to why his or her constituency is a special case and needs special additional funding. The hon. Gentleman's argument is the first that I have had real sympathy with, because my constituency, too—albeit in east Kent—has land to only one side and it had never occurred me to use that as an excuse for trying to wheedle some more money for the health service. Now that the hon. Gentleman has done that, I shall bear it in mind, but I fear that I cannot be too helpful to him tonight.

[Dr. Stephen Ladyman]

The formula that the Government inherited was not getting health services to the areas of greatest health need, so we undertook a wide-ranging review of it before the allocation rounds. The new formula provides a better measure of health need in all areas. In calculating health needs in rural areas, it takes account of the effects of access, transport and poverty. It uses better measures of deprivation that are capable of being updated regularly.

The market forces factor of the allocations formula is not a new concept. In fact, all versions of the allocations formula for the past 20 years have included a market forces factor weighting to recognise the different costs of labour and land across the country. I hope that the hon. Gentleman would agree that it is right and proper that the different costs of land and labour are reflected in the allocations formula to ensure that funds are allocated fairly, but we did not just pluck the formula from the air. It is not an invention of Ministers or politicians. Its development has been overseen by the Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation, and it is the result of many years of analysis by academics.

We recognise that this is a complex issue, which is why we have sought the advice of experts to ensure that the model used to calculate these costs is fair. To the best of my knowledge, the hon. Gentleman has not made any objective criticism of that factor or challenged the opinions of those experts, other than to say that, because he does not like the result that the formula gives us, the formula must be wrong. It is my view that the market forces factor is the best mechanism available to reflect unavoidable differences in the cost of providing services.

For the latest round of allocations—as I say, those for 2006–07 and 2007–08—changes have been made to that factor also to support the implementation of payment by results: the number of zones has been increased from 119 to 303, and they will match the geography of PCTs. An adjustment has also been made to the weights for multi-site trusts in the land and buildings indices.

Andrew George: I am not trying to wheedle out money, but the fact is that the Minister has not answered the question about why other Departments do not use a market forces factor, or something similar, in circumstances where national pay scales apply. In fact, people on local pay scales cannot undertake operations, for example, or provide the kind of service that those in hospitals provide on their national pay scales. That is why the funding formula does not properly reflect the true costs of providing the service.

Dr. Ladyman: I note the hon. Gentleman's opinion. I cannot tell him why other Departments have not used such a factor. I suspect that Ministers from other Departments answer Adjournment debates on other evenings of the week in which they are asked why they do not implement the same formula as the Department of Health. The fact is that an expert advisory panel works out the allocation formula that we use. We believe that it takes account of such factors in as fair a way as we can come up with, but if he can provide objective reasons to that expert panel that would lead us to believe that we have got it wrong—that is why the panel exists—that would help us to refine the formula and to get it right in future years.

Andrew George rose—

Dr. Ladyman: Let me deal with some of the issues that relate to payment by results. In fact, I suspect that payment by results will help the hon. Gentleman a little bit, and I shall explain why.

Under the new system, instead of funding based on historical patterns, hospitals and other providers of care will be paid a fixed price for each patient treated. The prices are based on health care resource groups—groupings of treatment episodes that are similar in resource use and in clinical response—thus reflecting the complexity and cost of providing care. The incentives within the system will help to increase the number of treatments provided by rewarding providers for the work done.

The current figures provided to the Department by the Royal Cornwall hospital suggest that, once payment by results is fully rolled out, the hospital would gain about £13 million. For 2005–06, payment by results will cover only elective activity, and to create a smooth transition, a cap of 2 per cent. has been placed on organisations' gains or losses under the system for this year. The Royal Cornwall hospital consequently stands to gain about £1 million on its baseline activity, as a result of the introduction of payment by results. If the trust performs more activity, it will do even better under the new system. So the financial gains that the trust stands to make will be available to it to invest in quality-enhanced local services and facilities.

For primary care trusts, payment by results will support the development of a more effective approach to commissioning. In place of block contracts or service level agreements, primary care trusts will commission the volume and mix of activity needed by their communities. The introduction of a national tariff will remove the need for price negotiation and focus discussion on the quality of care.

As the organisations that control more than 80 per cent. of the NHS budget, primary care trusts will have an incentive to provide as much care as possible in the most appropriate settings and to avoid any inappropriate admissions to hospitals. In this way, the new system will help to support the development of care closer to home, and the emphasis will be on improving the quality of care for people with long-term conditions. I strongly believe that that will help the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Another factor in his constituency is out-of-area treatments. Central Cornwall primary care trust has received an extra £4.2 million to cover the costs of the out-of-area treatments that it performs. Under payment by results, the system for funding treatment given to people who fall ill away from home will change and hospitals in Cornwall will be able to invoice the home primary care trusts of their visitor patients directly. This will ensure that the funding is received directly by the hospital within reasonable time scales and, by using the national tariff, there will be no need for home commissioners to engage in discussion about costs.

That brings me to the issue of the inherited debts that the hon. Gentleman raised. As for the challenges of achieving financial balance, I am sure that he will agree that the annual expenditure of the NHS must remain within the resources allocated by Parliament. NHS organisations, including those in Cornwall, receive a fair share of resources and have a corresponding responsibility to manage them effectively without relying on financial support from the centre or from other parts of the NHS. There is a finite amount of resources available to the NHS each year. Where an individual NHS body has a deficit, the overspend has to be matched by underspends elsewhere. This debt must be repaid. We cannot just wipe the slate clean as it would send the wrong messages about responsible financial management to others who balance the books year on year.

Achieving financial balance is a key requirement for all strategic health authorities and the Department's recovery and support unit meets every SHA on a monthly basis to discuss their progress against key requirements and performance targets. For the south-west peninsula, the task of achieving financial balance is particularly challenging. Therefore, we advised the South West Peninsula SHA last year that we would allow it two years to repay the debt and return to recurrent financial balance. This means that the SHA as a whole is working to a maximum deficit control of £15 million for 2004–05, but must deliver recurrent balance by the end of next year. The latest information from the SHA shows that it is working towards delivery of this control total.

The Department, in conjunction with the SHA and the local health economy, is committed to delivering an affordable and sustainable financial position, while delivering the necessary and appropriate levels of service delivery to the local population. The PCTs in Cornwall have developed recovery plans, and the director of finance at the SHA meets monthly the local NHS organisations to discuss financial performance, the risks to delivery and the measures being taken to meet the recovery plans. I am assured that the local health community, with the support of the SHA, believes that it can achieve financial balance while delivering key targets.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the role of the independent sector. As he said, we are committed to working with the independent sector to provide the best possible services to NHS patients. The independent sector treatment centre programme has already benefited more than 17,000 people. ISTCs have helped us to cut waiting times for NHS patients.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that there will be no target for independent sector usage. That is made clear by Sir Nigel Crisp, the chief executive of the NHS, in his recent publication "Creating a Patient Led NHS: Delivering the NHS Improvement Plan". We are committed to delivering a further national procurement valued at £500 million. The Department of Health is working with the NHS to develop proposals that provide the capacity needed to deliver 18-week waiting times, promote innovation and offer more choice to patients across the country.

The independent sector programme is enabling us to offer new and innovative services to patients in more rural communities. In the south-west peninsula, mobile treatment centres performing cataract operations have visited Plymouth, Tiverton, Hayle and Barnstaple and performed more than 1,700 operations. That means patients coming off waiting lists to have their cataract surgery quickly.

In Plymouth, we will be opening a treatment centre in May 2005 to perform the nearly 3,000 operations annually that the NHS has indicated it needs. The majority are much needed orthopaedic operations. In east Cornwall, a new treatment centre will open in October 2005 to deliver more than 4,000 operations annually, again largely ophthalmic and general surgery. Expanding access to independent sectors providers will give NHS patients greater choice, and ensure more contestability for the NHS, driving up standards for all. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that, even in the circumstances that he has described, it is possible for his constituents to benefit from the independent service providers.

The hon. Gentleman also raised issues relating to the configuration of services, and I hear the points that he makes. It is important, however, to recognise that the decisions are not made in Whitehall by Ministers; they are made locally. There are different opinions about the configuration of acute services everywhere, including in Cornwall. I think that it is right and proper that decisions are made in Cornwall, because I do not know the position there. I cannot make the decision in my office in Whitehall that he and his constituents could make. That is why responsibility for commissioning decisions is devolved to the local area.

Cornwall is already served by three district general hospitals at Truro, Plymouth and Barnstaple. Approximately 120,000 people from Cornwall live in the catchment area of the hospitals in Plymouth and Barnstaple, and there are smaller acute hospitals in Penzance and Hayle, as well as an extensive network of community services throughout Cornwall. The local NHS is trying to make services as locally accessible as possible when it is clinically safe to do so. To achieve that, it has increased the number of operations undertaken and clinics run at the two smaller acute hospitals, as well as the number of clinics and minor injury units.

I am pleased to say that the hon. Gentleman engages with his local NHS. That is not true of all hon. Members who secure Adjournment debates to which I respond, because they sometimes seem to debate such matters before even raising them with their local PCT. I congratulate him on being prepared to engage in the matter, but the debate must take place in Cornwall. I am sure that there will be an opportunity for people to engage in that debate over the next few weeks.

Andrew George: Does the Minister accept that the three PCTs in Cornwall have an exceptional deficit in comparison with those in the rest of the country? Is he saying that that is a result of financial mismanagement and incompetence, or is he prepared to accept that it is worth reviewing whether the funding formula in the past, and the proposals for the future, are adequate for the circumstances, which, as he admits, he does not properly comprehend?

[Andrew George]

Dr. Ladyman: There are all sorts of reasons why some PCTs have built up deficits, such as structural reasons. I would hesitate to suggest that incompetence is ever such a reason because if incompetence is suspected, the chief executive usually gets fired and someone who knows what they are doing is brought in. PCTs are relatively new organisations, so they are going through a learning curve. They are learning how to balance budgets and achieve the financial stability that they need. The deficits that are constantly reported in the newspapers represent a tiny proportion of PCTs' budgets. Indeed, most private companies would give their right arm to have the sort of financial management of most PCTs by ending up with a balanced budget at the end of the year.

I am certainly not accusing the hon. Gentleman's local PCTs of incompetence, but neither am I going to leap immediately to the conclusion that the formula allocation is wrong. The fact is that prior to 1997, the health service was dramatically under-funded, so a huge range of pressures subsequently had to be addressed. It is rather like the pothole in the road syndrome: one cannot start to invest in new roads until the potholes caused by a lack of maintenance for years have been fixed. That is the situation in the national health service. The new investment that we have been putting in has met the ever-building pressure in the system. Of course the situation has been difficult, but as more money goes in during the coming years, it will become easier to manage the budgets.

Andrew George: The formula is changing over the next few years, so if the difficulties persist in Cornwall, does the Minister agree that the situation could be reviewed?

Dr. Ladyman: Labour Members are reasonable men and women, so if it is clear that the formula allocation is not working for some reason, it will be reviewed. The Secretary of State has already demonstrated a great degree of flexibility through the way in which he has been prepared to examine such issues and the way in which the recent PCT allocations have been made—

The motion having been made after Seven o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at half-past Ten o'clock.

House of Commons

Thursday 7 April 2005

The House met at half-past Eleven o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

STANDING ORDERS

Ordered,

That the Amendments to Standing Orders set out in the Schedule be made at the beginning of the new session of Parliament:—

SCHEDULE

1

Standing Order 1, line 76, at end insert—

'the term "unitary district" means a non-metropolitan district which is not included in the area of a county council;'.

After Standing Order 1

2

Insert—

New Standing Order 1A

'Deposit of documents etc at offices of government departments and public bodies

1A.—(1) Any reference in a provision of these orders to a document, or to a copy or copies of a document, being deposited in accordance with this order is a reference to the document, or to a copy or copies of the document, being deposited—

(a) at the offices of such government departments and public bodies as may be specified in the list, and

(b) if the context so admits, in such quantities as may be so specified.

(2) In paragraph (1) above—

'document' includes any bill, plan, section, book of reference, ordnance map, environmental or other statement or estimate;

'the list' means the list which, for the purposes of this order, is compiled and maintained by the Private Bill Office under the direction of the Chairman of Ways and Means.

(3) The provisions of these orders which contain such references as are mentioned in paragraph (1) above are—

(a) Standing Order 27(5),

(b) Standing Order 27A(1),

(c) Standing Order 29,

(d) Standing Order 30,

(e) Standing Order 30A(1),

(f) Standing Order 31,

(g) Standing Order 32,

(h) Standing Order 34,

(i) Standing Order 37,

(j) Standing Order 39,

(k) Standing Order 45(3), and

(l) Standing Order 47(1).'.

3

Standing Order 2A, line 5, after 'November', insert '(or if that day is a Saturday or a Sunday, the first Monday following that day)'.

4

Standing Order 4A, line 17, after 'district,' insert 'unitary district,'.

5

Standing Order 4A, line 28, after 'districts,' insert 'unitary districts,'.

6

Standing Order 4A, line 44, after 'district,' insert 'unitary district,'.

7

Standing Order 4A, line 49, after 'district,' insert 'unitary district,'.

8

Standing Order 5, line 33, leave out 'and'.

9

Standing Order 5, line 36, at end insert '; and

(f) where it is proposed by the bill to confer powers authorising any alteration or disturbance of the surface of any street or road in connection with the construction of a tramway, tram road, trolley vehicle system or an underground railway, a general description of the roads or streets which may be affected by the exercise of the power and of the circumstances in which, and the extent to which, it is envisaged that the power may be exercised.'.

10

Standing Order 10, line 13, after 'district,' insert 'unitary district,'.

11

Standing Order 10, line 24, after 'districts,' insert 'unitary districts,'.

12

Standing Order 10, line 36, after 'district,' insert 'unitary district,'.

13

Standing Order 10, line 40, after 'county', insert ', metropolitan district, unitary district or London borough'.

After Standing Order 10

Insert—

New Standing Order 10A

'Publication of notice relating to works bills

14

10A. (1) If the bill—

(a) authorises the construction of works to which Standing Order 27 (Deposit of plan, book of reference, and section, etc.) applies, or the compulsory acquisition of lands or of rights to use lands, or

(b) extends the time limited by a former Act for any of those purposes, the notice shall be displayed for two consecutive weeks ending not later than 11 December at a place of public resort in each of the counties, metropolitan districts, unitary authorities, or London boroughs or (in Wales) the counties or county boroughs or (in Scotland) the local government areas in which the works are to be, or the lands are, situated.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1), 'place of public resort' includes a public library and a local government office.'.

15

Standing Order 12, line 4, leave out 'confer powers authorising any alteration or disturbance of' and insert 'alter or disturb'.

16

Standing Order 12, line 8, leave out 'such street or road' and insert 'street or road the surface of which it is proposed to alter or disturb'.

17

Standing Order 12, line 10, leave out 'powers' and insert 'alteration or disturbance'.

18

Standing Order 12, line 12, leave out 'powers' and insert 'alteration or disturbance'.

19

Standing Order 12, line 21, leave out 'the said powers are proposed to be conferred' and insert 'it is proposed to alter or disturb the surface of any street or road'.

20

Standing Order 12, line 24, leave out 'any' and insert 'the'.

21

Standing Order 16, line 24, leave out 'county councils, metropolitan districts or London boroughs, as the case may be' and insert 'councils of counties, metropolitan districts, unitary districts or London boroughs or (in Wales) counties or county boroughs'.

22

Standing Order 27, line 12, after 'district,' insert 'unitary district,'.

23

Standing Order 27, line 23, after 'district' insert ', unitary district'.

24

Standing Order 27, line 28, after 'district,' insert 'unitary district,'.

25

Standing Order 27, line 54, after 'district,' insert 'unitary district,'.

26

Standing Order 27, line 69, leave out from 'and' to end of line 73 and insert 'copies of the same shall be deposited in accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

27

Standing Order 27A, line 30, leave out paragraph (2) and insert—

'(2) Copies shall be deposited in accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

28

Standing Order 29, line 7, leave out from 'deposited' to end of line 9 and insert 'in the Private Bill Office and in accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

29

Standing Order 30, line 5, leave out from 'deposited' to end and insert 'in accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

30

Standing Order 30A, line 4, leave out from 'deposit' to 'and' in line 5, and insert 'in accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

31

Standing Order 31, line 6, leave out from 'deposited' to 'marked' in line 8, and insert 'in accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

32

Standing Order 32, line 8, leave out from 'deposited' to end of line 9, and insert 'in accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

33

Standing Order 34, line 9, leave out from 'deposited' to end and insert 'in accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

34

Standing Order 36, line 12, after 'district', insert 'or unitary district,'.

35

Standing Order 37 is hereby repealed.

New Standing Order 37

'Deposit of copy of plan, etc. in certain circumstances

36

37. In the case of a bill by which it is proposed to authorise the compulsory acquisition—

(a) of any churchyard, burial ground or cemetery, or any part thereof, or

(b) of rights to use any churchyard, burial ground or cemetery, or any part thereof, or

(c) of any other land, or of rights to use any other land, copies of so much of the deposited plan, section (if any) and book of references as relates to the land shall, on or before 20th November, be deposited in accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

37

Standing Order 38, line 3, after 'November', insert '(or when 27th November is a Saturday or a Sunday, on the first Monday following that day)'.

38

Standing Order 39 is hereby repealed.

New Standing Order 39

'Deposit of copies of bills

39

39. On or before 4th December, printed copies of every bill shall be deposited in accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

40

Standing Order 45, line 19, leave out from 'deposited' to end and insert accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

41

Standing Order 47, line 9, leave out from 'and' to 'on' in line 11 and insert 'in accordance with Standing Order 1A.'.

42

Standing Order 55, line 17, leave out from 'datum' to 'shall', and insert 'of Newlyn.'.

43

Standing Order 61, line 16, after 'district,' insert 'unitary district,'.

44

Standing Order 61, line 33, after 'county' insert ', metropolitan district, unitary district or London borough'.

45

Standing Order 62, line 15, after 'county' insert ', metropolitan district, unitary district or London borough'.

46

Standing Order 65, line 28, after 'county,' insert 'metropolitan district, unitary district or London borough'.

47

Standing Order 98, line 8, after 'district' insert ', unitary district'.

48

Standing Order 131A, line 3, leave out from 'be' to end of line 4 and insert 'reproduced at the expense of the parties and the cost of reproduction shall be divided among the several parties in such proportions as may be specified by the Private Bill Office.'.

49

Standing Order 145, line 3, leave out second 'the' and insert 'any'.

After Standing Order 145

Insert—

New Standing Order 145A

'Minutes of evidence to be laid upon the Table

50

145A. The minutes of the evidence taken before a committee on a private bill shall be laid on the Table of the House and ordered to be published.'.

51

Standing Order 147, line 7, leave out 'for Transport' and insert 'responsible for the time being for transport matters'.

52

Standing Order 147, line 11, leave out 'for Transport' and insert 'responsible for the time being for transport matters'.

53

Standing Order 154, line 12, leave out 'for Transport' and insert 'responsible for the time being for transport matters'.

54

Standing Order 154, line 27, leave out 'for Transport' and insert 'responsible for the time being for transport matters'.

55

Standing Order 174, line 3, leave out '2.45 p.m.' and insert 'a quarter of an hour after the House sits'.

56

Standing Order 174, line 28, leave out 'for 7 p.m.' and insert 'at a time three hours before the moment of interruption'.

57

Standing Order 174, line 39, leave out '7 p.m.' and insert 'a time three hours before the moment of interruption'.

New Standing Orders 188A and 188B

58

'After Standing Order 188A

Insert—

"SUSPENSION AND REVIVAL OF BILLS

Suspension of bill:

188A.—(1) Paragraph (2) applies where—

(a) this House resolves that the promoters of a bill originating in this House should have leave to suspend any further proceedings on the bill in order to proceed with it, if they think fit, in the next session of Parliament, and any conditions attached to the leave have been met; and

(b) the House of Lords concur with the resolution, or have previously passed a resolution to the like effect as the resolution of this House.

(2) The bill shall be deposited in the Private Bill Office on the fifth sitting day in the next session together with a declaration, signed by the agent, stating that the bill is the same in every respect as the bill at the last stage of the proceedings on it in this House in the current session.

(3) Paragraph (4) applies where

(a) this House resolves that the promoters of a bill originating in the House of Lords should have leave to suspend any further proceedings on the bill in order to proceed with it, if they think fit, in the next session of Parliament, and any conditions attached to the leave have been met; and

(b) the House of Lords subsequently pass a resolution to the like effect as the resolution of this House.

(4) If the bill is brought from the House of Lords in the next session, the agent for the bill shall deposit in the office of the Clerk of the Parliaments a declaration, signed by the agent, stating that the bill is the same in every respect as the bill which was brought from the House of Commons in the current session.

(5) The following provisions of this Order apply in either case.

(6) The bill shall be deemed to have passed through every stage through which it has passed in the current session, and shall be recorded in the Journal of the House as having passed those stages, and no new fees shall be charged to those stages.

(7) These Standing Orders shall apply to the bill in the next session only in regard to any stage through which the bill has not passed in the current session.

(8) If there is any petition outstanding—

(a) any such petition which has been presented (if not withdrawn) shall stand referred to any committee on the bill in the next session;

(b) any minutes of evidence taken before a committee on the bill in the current session shall stand referred to any committee on the bill in the next session;

(c) no petitioners shall be heard before any committee on the bill in the next session unless their petition has been presented within the time stipulated for the deposit of petitions in the current session or deposited pursuant to Standing Order 126(b);

(d) Standing Order 127 shall have effect as if the words 'under Standing Order 126 (Reference to committee of petitions against bill)' were omitted.

(9) In this order 'the current session' means the session in which the resolution of this House is passed and 'the next session' shall be construed accordingly."

After Order 188A

Insert—

'Revival of bills

188B.—(1) Paragraphs (2) and (3) apply where—

(a) this House resolves that the promoters of a bill which—

(i) originated in this House in an earlier session of this Parliament or in the last Parliament; and

(ii) had not received the Royal Assent,

should, notwithstanding anything in the Standing Orders or practice of this House, have leave to proceed with the bill in the current session; and

(b) the House of Lords concur with the resolution, or have previously passed a resolution to the like effect as the resolution of this House.

(2) The petition for the bill shall be deemed to have been deposited and all Standing Orders applicable to it shall be deemed to have been complied with.

(3) The bill shall be deposited in the Private Bill Office not later than the fifth day on which the House sits after the passing of the resolution, and a declaration, signed by the agent, shall be annexed to the bill stating that it is the same in every respect as the bill at the last stage of the proceedings on it in this House in the last session or the last Parliament or, as the case may be, the bill passed by this House.

(4) Paragraph (5) applies where—

(a) this House resolves that the promoters of a bill which—

(i) originated in the House of Lords in an earlier session of this Parliament or in the last Parliament; and

(ii) had not received the Royal Assent,

should, notwithstanding anything in the Standing Orders or practice of this House, have leave to proceed with the bill in the current session; and

(b) the House of Lords subsequently pass a resolution to the like effect as the resolution of this House.

(5) If the bill is brought from the House of Lords in the current session, the agent for the bill shall deposit in the Private Bill Office a declaration, signed by the agent, stating that the bill is the same in every respect as the bill which was brought from the Commons in the last session or the last Parliament.

(6) The following provisions of this Order apply in either case.

(7) The bill shall be deemed to have passed through every stage through which it has passed in the last session or last Parliament, and shall be recorded in the Journal of the House as having passed those stages, and no new fees shall be charged to those stages.

(8) If there is any petition outstanding—

(a) any such petition which has been presented (if not withdrawn) shall stand referred to any committee on the bill in the current session;

(b) any minutes of evidence taken before a committee on the bill in the last session or last Parliament shall stand referred to any committee on the bill in the current session;

(c) no petitioners shall be heard before any committee on the bill in the current session unless their petition has been presented within the time stipulated for the deposit of petitions in the last session or last Parliament or deposited pursuant to Standing Order 126(b);

(d) Standing Order 127 shall have effect as if the words "under Standing Order 126 (Reference to committee of petitions against bill)" were omitted.

(9) In this Order "current session" means the session of Parliament in which the resolution of this House is passed and "this Parliament" means the Parliament in which the resolution of this House is passed; "the last Parliament" and "the last session" shall be construed accordingly.'.".

59

Standing Order 200, line 6, leave out 'two' and insert 'five'.

60

Standing Order 204A, line 4, leave out '7 p.m.' and insert 'a time three hours before the moment of interruption'.

61

Standing Order 208A, line 4, leave out '7 p.m.' and insert 'a time three hours before the moment of interruption'.—[The Chairman of Ways and Means.]

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Coal Health Claims

1. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): How much was paid in coal health claims up to 31 March; how many claimants have benefited; and if she will make a statement on plans to increase the speed at which claims are processed. [224748]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): We have paid £2.6 billion to nearly 420,000 claimants. Some £64.5 million of that was spread between 13,094 claimants in my hon. Friend's constituency. I pay tribute to his work in that regard. On 28 February, the Department began to make fast-track offers to claimants. We aim to ensure that remaining claims are dealt with as speedily as possible.

Paddy Tipping: The sum of £2.6 billion for coal health claims is very significant. Will the Minister remind us that the last Conservative Government refused the claim, and will he make it his policy to put more money into more miners' pockets more quickly?

Nigel Griffiths: Indeed. I pay tribute to all hon. Members who have striven to ensure that they get justice for sick miners and their widows and families.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): I welcome the Minister's statement. In Barnsley, £166 million has been received in the community; in my constituency the figure was £39 million. I draw his attention to yesterday's report by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry which recommends that the 3,500 to 5,000 surface workers who have less than five years' service should be admitted to the scheme. Will he examine that recommendation seriously and consider either implementing a new scheme for such workers or bringing them into the current scheme?

Nigel Griffiths: I gave evidence to the Select Committee and I understand that its report was produced this week. I have not yet had a chance to study it, but I think that my hon. Friend knows that we give every sympathetic consideration to helping sick miners and their families. The surface workers issue is difficult, and he knows that I have taken a keen interest in it. I have not yet found evidence that would allow us to extend the scheme, but I will obviously read the Select Committee's deliberations with great care.

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): Obviously, the announcement by the Minister is fantastic news. My constituency has benefited from almost £79 million in compensation.

I wonder whether the Minister will take this opportunity to update the House about the negotiations to establish a minimum compensation level of £500 for chronic bronchitis? This week, I encountered yet another example of a former miner suffering from it in Hemingfield in my constituency who was receiving a full and final settlement of just £53.01. It is important that we examine the issue and establish the minimum fee as quickly as possible.

Nigel Griffiths: I agree with my hon. Friend. Indeed, on Monday I had a meeting with the head of the National Union of Mineworkers in Scotland to discuss how we could progress with the minimum fee. The solicitors made a proposal, and said that, as their average fee including VAT is about £2,300, they might sacrifice some of that to make up any payment offers under £500 up to that sum. We are now working on the mechanism that would allow that to be delivered.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is the Minister aware that those who worked for other employers as well as the National Coal Board and British Coal have some difficulty? As he knows, there is a problem with multi-claims. Some private employers are refusing to pay their whack out of the total payment. Therefore, we must jump on them severely to try to get the claims settled. Such claims form the bulk of the outstanding claims. If we can get that show on the road and deal with the fast-tracking of £1,000, we will make much more progress for the next Parliament and get a lot more money.

Nigel Griffiths: We certainly will. Indeed, we have already honoured our part of that bargain. I am certainly the Minister to jump on such people.

Investment

2. Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): If she will make a statement on Government policies to promote investment in the private sector. [224749]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The Government have put in place a stable macro-economic environment. We also support business investment through research and development tax credits, grants, regional selective assistance and the technology programme. Business investment rose by 5.5 per cent in 2004.

Mr. Viggers: Is it not the most damning indictment of this Government that over the past eight years two public sector jobs have been created for every private sector job lost?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman is, not surprisingly, completely ignoring the fact that since 1997 over 2 million more people are in work than when we were elected, that more people are in work than ever before in our country and that unemployment is at its lowest level for more than 30 years. All of that record of economic stability and employment would be put at risk by the policies that he supports: £35 billion of cuts in public spending and a return to the policies that gave us 15 per cent. interest rates and boom and bust.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that on the subject of investment, the proposed joint venture between the Shanghai Automotive Industry Corporation and MG Rover is not only vital for the west midlands but offers long-term benefits to both companies and both countries? I express my appreciation for the work that she and all Ministers are doing to bring the matter to a successful conclusion. I thank her for the Department's statement that bridging finance could be made available within the rules. I ask her to confirm the comments of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday that the Government will continue to do all that they can to bring the negotiations to a successful conclusion to the benefit of both companies.

Ms Hewitt: I thank my hon. Friend for his support and for his active involvement on behalf of his constituents. I can confirm what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said yesterday. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor, other Ministers and I are doing everything possible to bring this matter to a successful conclusion, and that remains the case.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): The Secretary of State will be aware that I share the location of the Longbridge factory with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden). Probably like him, I have been receiving many distress calls this week from workers at the factory. As I understand it, one of the principal stumbling blocks with the Chinese is whether or not the factory can be made solvent during the two years that it will take to get the new cars into production. To that end, can the right hon. Lady tell us what efforts her Department is making to sell off the MG sports car, one of the pinnacles of British manufacturing success, which might help to keep the plant afloat? Will she give us some of the details of the financial offering that has been made by the directors of Phoenix Venture Holdings? There are many people in the midlands who believe that they have lined their own pockets with the assets of the plant, which should now be available to keep the plant afloat.

Ms Hewitt: I completely understand the anxiety that the present situation is causing to the 6,000 outstanding Rover workers and their families, and others who are potentially affected in the west midlands. The hon. Lady asked what efforts the Government are making to sell the MG Rover sports car. It is not for us to sell any company, and I am sure that she will understand that. I hope that she will also understand that I cannot comment on the details of the commercial discussions that have been taking place between MG Rover and the Shanghai Automotive Industry Corporation. I have to point out to her that the cuts that she and her party are proposing of £500 million—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say to the right hon. Lady that we must not make mention of the policies of the Conservative party. [Interruption.] I shall tell right hon. and hon. Members why not. From Monday onwards those policies can be mentioned, even by myself, if I wish, but not now.

Ms Hewitt: I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you are looking forward to your liberation.

I shall make an important point. It is only because there is a Department of Trade and Industry, a Department with a significant budget, that we can undertake the efforts to which I have referred, and provide the sort of support that we have made available to companies throughout the country—manufacturing companies that have benefited from regional selective assistance in particular. This has safeguarded thousands of jobs that would be directly threatened if any future Government were either to abolish the Department or to reduce its budget by £500 million. Jobs and manufacturing in Britain would all be jeopardised.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre) (Lab): I am extremely grateful to my right hon. Friend for opening Infolab at Lancaster university recently. It represents a major £10 million public investment in world-class university research which will bring and is bringing huge private sector investment in its wake, bringing many hundreds of jobs to the area and establishing Lancaster as the centre of information technology-led business for the north-west for the future. I assure her that the city of Lancaster was glorious before the Labour Government but has been made even more glorious, and does she realise—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have given the hon. Gentleman too much licence.

Ms Hewitt: I congratulate my hon. Friend not only on the achievements of the wonderful city of Lancaster but on the enormous work that he has done on behalf of his constituents. I am sure the whole House will join me in offering him every good wish for the future. I was hugely impressed and excited by the opening of Infolab at Lancaster university. It is a striking example of exactly the kind of partnership we need between our great universities and the business community. We are facilitating that through our investment in science, our technology programme and our investment in innovation. That is how we will ensure that Britain remains one of the world leaders in high-technology manufacturing. It is essential to the future of our economy that we make those investments and create those partnerships. All of them would be put at risk if that investment were not available.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): We all want to see the 6,100 jobs at MG Rover, the skills at Longbridge and the wider supply chain saved, so will the Secretary of State take the opportunity to say on the Floor of the House, in relation to her policy of promoting investment—we are in live time, as we speak—and without hiding behind commercial confidentiality, given that taxpayers' money is being offered, whether the Government are definitely making the £100 million bridging loan to MG Rover to draw down now, to see the company through its financial crisis to the point when the deal with the Shanghai Automotive Industry Corporation and the consent of the Chinese Government can be secured?

Ms Hewitt: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I ensured that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and the Regions briefed him and the appropriate spokesperson for the Liberal Democrats on the progress that had been made at the end of last week. I propose to brief both of them again at an appropriate point as matters develop, and to make a statement, but I am not in a position to comment at this point on commercially confidential negotiations. He will understand, because we have discussed the matter before, that a bridging loan has been offered in order to provide a bridge to a commercial deal. That remains the case, but commercial discussions are taking place and at this point there is nothing more that I can say publicly. The Prime Minister made the Government's position clear yesterday, and that remains the case.

Mr. O'Brien: This, being my second question, is the last opportunity for the Secretary of State to make a statement on the Floor of the House, so notwithstanding the constraints under which she claims to be operating, will she tell us, in the context of the concern over a million jobs having been lost in UK manufacturing since Labour came to power eight years ago, what she and the Chancellor are doing to arrest the demise of our only volume car producer in the west midlands? If it did unfortunately suffer a demise, that would lead to the haemorrhaging of the wider supply chain across the west midlands, which is so important to the jobs and the skills base of one of the centres of excellence in our economy.

Ms Hewitt: My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor and I have been doing everything possible to bring the Rover partnership's discussions with SAIC to a successful conclusion, and I really am not prepared to take lectures on manufacturing from the hon. Gentleman, who is a member of a party that presided over not one but two recessions, that destroyed hundreds of thousands of good manufacturing companies in the west midlands and throughout the rest of the country, that destroyed manufacturing jobs, that said the country did not need manufacturing, and that has now promised to scrap the regional selective assistance that has supported—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call Mr. O'Neill.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the efforts that she and her colleagues are making in this matter. [Interruption.] It is a pretty sad day, albeit just before a general election, when the Opposition try to dress up cheap political points on such a serious matter as this, and rediscover the manufacturing industry which they wanted to abandon for so long, not least because this country still has the most successful automotive assembly industry in Europe, in which foreign businesses are more than willing to put their money, rather than just the mouthings of the Opposition. [Interruption.]

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The 6,000 workers at Rover deserve a great deal better than the laughter and the jeering that we have just heard from Opposition Members. We, including the Prime Minister and the Chancellor, have been giving Rover every possible support, and we have done our best to deal with this on a bipartisan basis. I regret very much, as my hon. Friend does, the way in which the Opposition have acted on this, but I thank him for the support that he has given, not only in the matter of Rover but for the investments that we have made in firms such as Nissan, LDV, Vauxhall in Ellesmere Port and Ford in Dagenham, all of which underline the success of our vehicle manufacturing and other advanced manufacturing in Britain. The best of British manufacturing is among the best in the world, and we are determined to keep it that way.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that when taxpayers' money goes into investing in the private sector in the UK, the headline jobs that are created there are often replicated by jobs destroyed elsewhere? Does she not recognise that Sean Quinn's 500 jobs have been put on hold because 1,000 jobs in existing manufacturing plants are likely to be lost, and in my constituency, jobs at R. B. Farquhar of Huntly have been lost as a direct result of public money being put into a Danish competitor to steal business from it?

I appreciate the courtesy of having been included in the discussions on MG Rover, but does my right hon. Friend agree that it is predictably ironic that the directors of MG Rover have put us in this position at the start of a general election campaign, and will she ensure that if public money is to be invested in that company it will be only on the assurance that there is a long-term solution, and that the directors put everything that they have at their disposal into that guarantee, because, after all, they have led the situation to the point where we are now in crisis and up against a deadline that the Government are struggling to meet?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman has raised the issue of Quinn Glass. In that case, as in every case in which we consider investment support, we examine whether the company is willing to invest in new products and processes, which are essential for success in manufacturing today. We carefully examine additional investment, and the record on regional selective assistance is that for every pound of public money—we have put in more than £2 billion since 1998—we get more than £9 of private sector investment. As I understand it, the Quinn Glass production facility is on hold for planning reasons, which is a matter for the planning system. We will continue to support private sector investment in this country. Thanks in part to the stable macro-economic conditions that we have created, business investment has risen for the past seven quarters. The record on investment is outstanding, and it is a vote of confidence in the British economy.

Iraq (Reconstruction Contracts)

3. Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): What support her Department provides to British companies bidding for contracts for reconstruction work in Iraq. [224751]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): My Department provides a range of support services through UK Trade and Investment for British firms interested in reconstruction work in Iraq. That includes providing commercially relevant information and advising on tender procedures for the main reconstruction agencies. Our advice takes full account of the security situation in Iraq and the terms of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office travel advice.

Mr. Dalyell: I am told that I have received more oral parliamentary answers than anybody else in the history of Parliament, so I should thank Ministers of all parties, going back to Harold Macmillan.

At Nuremberg in 1945, some very wicked men were put on trial. Does the former secretary of the National Council for Civil Liberties think that she, as a senior member of the Cabinet, should be pressing, for trade and other reasons, for Tariq Aziz, Saddam Hussein and others at least to get a trial? I have given her the names and numbers of Emile Ludot and Mathieu Faupin, lawyers who are trying to represent a client whom they have not been allowed to see for more than a year. If Hermann Goering and Josef Goebbels could get a trial, is it not about time that the Iraqis did?

Ms Hewitt: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his record of asking parliamentary questions and on his last question in the House.

I have checked the position of Tariq Aziz and other war criminals awaiting trial in Iraq. Tariq Aziz has a named counsel of record registered with the Iraq special tribunal, and I understand that he has seen him twice already. Mr. Ludot and Mr. Faupin, the other lawyers in question, are not registered as co-counsel with the Iraq special tribunal. Furthermore, my understanding is that although they claim Mr. Aziz as their client, they have not requested the tribunal's permission to visit him. Both Tariq Aziz and Saddam Hussein have seen their lawyers.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): Because of the security situation in Iraq, one of the biggest trade fairs had to take place in Jordan. Will the Secretary of State tell the House how many officials from her Department attended and what support they gave to British companies?

Ms Hewitt: We have been supporting British companies and helping British companies to work with Iraqi companies since the end of the conflict. Although I cannot give the hon. Gentleman detailed information about the Jordan trade fair, perhaps I can write to him this afternoon. In 2003, we set up a business facility in Baghdad. We are working with the chamber of commerce, and we have helped a number of British firms in their successful efforts to obtain contracts to help with the reconstruction process. A number of British companies and their trade associations have thanked my officials and ministerial colleagues for our support. I hope that all hon. Members welcome the creation of a democratic Iraqi Government and the fact that the reconstruction process, difficult though it is, is well under way. The British Government and British companies will continue to support the reconstruction process.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley) (Lab): May I remind my right hon. Friend that we used to support the Baghdad trade fairs—at least, the Conservatives did—throughout the time when Saddam Hussein was killing the Shi'a and the Kurds?

Continuing the process of the reconstruction of Iraq, the inauguration of the new President of Iraq is taking place at this moment. He is Jalal Talabani, who for 60 years struggled against various regimes in Iraq, fought Saddam Hussein, and fled to the mountains in 1991 when helicopter gunships were being used against the Kurds and others. I think that we will all want to send congratulations to him today. He is not only a democrat but from a minority group in Iraq, which shows that minorities can become as important even in that country as they can in this country.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I hope that the whole House will want to join me in sending our congratulations to President Talabani, who assumes office today. I also congratulate my hon. Friend on her stalwart efforts over a very long period to support the oppressed people of Iraq during Saddam Hussein's regime and since the end of the conflict. I very much hope that despite the divisions within this House on the conflict itself we can all now unite in supporting the people of Iraq, who showed enormous courage in defying the terrorists to come out and vote, in their work to reconstruct their own country on peaceful and democratic lines.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): As a somewhat younger retiring Member than the distinguished Father of the House, may I, on a suitably non-partisan note, echo what the Secretary of State just said? May I also to ask her to join me in commending the bravery of those who work for British companies, and indeed for companies throughout the western world, who are prepared, at great personal risk, to go to take part in the reconstruction work in Iraq?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman makes a correct and important point. It is, if I may say so, a very good note on which to end his parliamentary career. The courage of many such people—not only the staff working directly for British and other western firms, but many of my own officials who voluntarily went out to Iraq to help in the aftermath of the conflict, and above all the Iraqi people, particularly when working with western firms and therefore likely to be a target for terrorist attack—is to be admired unreservedly on both sides of the House.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): Is the Secretary of State prepared to agree that one of the key elements of a successful bidding process is a ready access to high standards, and that BSI—formerly known as the British Standards

Institution—and the International Organisation for Standardisation, or ISO, are brand leaders in this field and should give European companies a competitive edge? Is she aware, though, that the Americans have been playing a very hard-sell game with standards since the beginning of the conflict in Iraq, and have stepped up their efforts since then, in trying to impose American standards on all work across the whole country? Will she assure the House that she will stand foursquare with BSI in ensuring that we resist the Americanisation of components and construction work in Iraq?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right and I am delighted to say that we have been doing exactly what he asks since the end of the conflict. Indeed, the American Administration made an early attempt to impose American standards for mobile telephone technology even though European standards had been in use throughout the middle east for a long time. I am delighted to say that that proposal did not get any further.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): How many contracts have been awarded to British companies up to now? What is their total value? What are the Secretary of State and the Department doing to ensure that all possible contracts are drawn to the attention of British companies?

Ms Hewitt: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the information that he requests for the simple reason that there is no obligation on British companies to tell us when they win a contract. However, as I said earlier, we have helped many companies to win contracts, including AMEC. They have expressed their appreciation for the help that we have given them. By ensuring that we remain close to the tendering process—initially with the coalition provisional authority and now the Iraqi Government—we can make the information directly available to contractors here. We have supported them through contractors' conferences, trade fairs and the work that I mentioned earlier.

India/China

4. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What progress the Government are making in opening markets for UK companies to sell financial services in India and China. [224752]

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Douglas Alexander): The UK Government fully support the efforts of the European Union to negotiate commitments on opening financial services markets in World Trade Organisation countries, including India and China, as part of the Doha development agenda. The recent visits of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to India and of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to China have stressed the message from industry that a liberalised and transparent financial services sector brings huge benefits, including increased foreign direct investment and the transfer of skills.

Hugh Bayley: I am glad to hear my hon. Friend's comments. The insurance company Aviva is an important employer in York. It has a subsidiary in India that sells life assurance policies and that helps to safeguard jobs in the UK. However, Aviva's general insurance business cannot sell policies in India because the Government of India will not allow foreign companies to compete with Indian insurers. Will my hon. Friend ensure that our Government continue to press the Indian and Chinese Governments to allow UK companies to compete on a level playing field in their countries, where there is a growing middle class that wants insurance because of the security that it brings them?

Mr. Alexander: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the subject, on which he has worked tirelessly. I understand that, in India, foreign underwriters have set an equity cap of 26 per cent. Of course, that is a matter of concern to us and it is why officials of UK Trade and Investment and our high commissioner in Delhi have already raised the matter with the Indian Government. I assure hon. Members that that work will continue to ensure that we can give the best opportunities to the British companies that my hon. Friend described.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): The Minister claims to support exports and opportunities for our companies abroad, but why is the Department reducing support under the support for exhibitions and seminars abroad—SESA—scheme for companies that want to attend trade fairs and open up markets abroad? Why has the Department resisted the representations that have been made to improve the conditions under that scheme and not restrict them, as the Government are doing?

Mr. Alexander: I am intrigued by the hon. Gentleman's brass neck in raising SESA funding given the Conservative party's approach to funding support for UK exports. On his substantive point, there is a genuine challenge to ensure that resources are used effectively. We believe that the best use of public money is, especially where market failure has occurred, to help those companies that are new to export. That is why we established the passport to export scheme. In the past, several companies secured public support and subsidy sequentially for some years. Labour Members believe that the best use of public money is to use it for those companies that have never previously exported, thus giving them the opportunity to export to new markets for the first time. I am sure that many people in industry agree with us.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister knows that, in the past few weeks, the Treasury Committee visited Beijing and Shanghai, where we witnessed one of the most rapid changes in global trading patterns, with China exporting more than Britain, France and Italy combined. We were pleased to note the presence of insurance companies such as Prudential and Standard Life Assurance. However, in a weak and immature banking system, there was an absence of the large retail banks in the market. What encouragement can the Minister and the Government give to such companies to embed themselves in a rapidly growing market?

Mr. Alexander: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for raising this issue, which draws on the point that I was making earlier. There is a great deal of work being done by UKTI in China and about 100 missions supported by UKTI will take place there in 2005 and 2006. On the specific issue of access to British financial services—an area in which we have a great deal of expertise—I can assure the House that lobbying by UKTI has helped to secure operating licences for Prudential, Standard Life and Aviva. The China-Britain Business Council is working with UKTI to secure a further 220 licences, targeted for the years 2005 and 2006.

Emissions Trading Scheme

5. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If she will make a statement on the impact of the European Union emissions trading scheme on UK business. [224753]

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): The emissions trading scheme affects 12,000 installations across the EU and aims to tackle the problem of global warning and climate change by reducing emissions. To protect our competitive position in the world, the UK Government have allocated allowances to industry in a way that recognises their projected needs. One sector that has a below business-as-usual allocation is the electricity supply sector, but it is not subject to substantial international competition.

Miss McIntosh: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, but I am sure that he is aware that his Government are in danger of speaking with forked tongue. His Department has agreed to negotiate with Europe on this matter, but the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is the lead Department. Under the national allocation plan, a number of high-energy industrial companies have reached a climate change agreement that will be subject to a decision—taken behind closed doors and with no politicians present—of a comitology committee of national officials in the European Commission on whether the climate change agreements will be exempt from the Commission's trading plan. The Minister was kind enough to meet me to discuss this point. Will he assure me that progress has been made and that those companies will not face the double whammy of being subjected to a national allocation plan and a European Union emissions trading scheme?

Mr. O'Brien: The Government believe that the provisions of the climate change agreements satisfy the temporary exclusion criteria that allow installations to opt out of phase 1 of the EU emissions trading scheme. We are working with companies to reach agreement on how to put forward various proposals to the EU to allow certain exclusions. Obviously, the final allocations cannot be made until the Commission and the comitology committee have made a decision. We have, however, informed operators that they should monitor emissions from 1 January 2005, in case approval is not given. I take the hon. Lady's point, however, and when we return to Government in due course, I shall be happy to discuss with her the problems in her constituency.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): May I reinforce that last point on climate change agreements and emissions controls by referring to the glass industry? I urge my hon. Friend to consider the precarious competitive position of that industry, which is subject to emissions limits under the climate change agreement. Will he ensure that he takes no action on emissions agreements that will dent the industry's competitiveness any further?

Mr. O'Brien: If we are to deal with global warming and climate change, there will be implications for industry. Those implications will, however, stretch right across the EU and, we hope, across the wider world as well in due course. All of those areas will have to take steps to deal with emissions. We are watching with great care to see how the ETS and the climate change agreements will operate, to ensure that the UK maintains its competitiveness. That will apply to the glass industry as well.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): Will the Minister confirm that Britain was unable to take part in the EU emissions trading scheme when it began operating on 1 January 2005 because his Government got the national allocation plan wrong? Will he also confirm that the Government have had to go to the Commission on bended knee to try to change the allocation to make it less damaging to British industry and that the Commission has said no? Who is going to take responsibility for this mistake?

Mr. O'Brien: I will not confirm the nonsense that the hon. Gentleman has just spouted. The Government propose to issue the allocation of 736 million allowances—which has already been approved by the Commission—as soon as possible to allow the operators of UK installations covered by the scheme to start participating fully, as they wish to do.

There is an argument over 20 million of the allocations. Those relate to one specific sector—energy generation—because we have allocated the rest of industry on the basis of its projected needs. Therefore, although one sector will be affected, it is not subject to substantial international competition and we believe that it will be able to deal with that. We also believe that we have a strong case and we are prepared to take it to the European Court of Justice if that should prove necessary.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): Is the Minister aware that even people who have been around as long as I have can change their mind? When I was on the energy review committee, as a former nuclear sceptic, I came to the view that we can achieve our emissions targets and a balanced energy policy only if we replace our existing nuclear capacity. When will the Government grasp the nettle and take a decision on that?

Mr. O'Brien: We wait for those companies that want to make a viable economic proposition to build a nuclear reactor. If they came forward, we would have an open mind on the issue. We have been very clear about that. We have said that we would publish a White Paper and hold a widespread consultation, but I have to tell my right hon. Friend and the many supporters of nuclear power generation in the House that at this point there is not an economic case that is causing companies to come forward and volunteer to build a nuclear reactor. If that should change, we would have an open mind.

Small Business

6. Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): What steps she is taking to promote small business growth. [224754]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): Many small businesses are the economic dynamos of our economy and to promote small business growth, among other things, we raised the VAT threshold to the highest in Europe, abolished automatic fines for late payment for 200,000 small businesses, introduced a flat-rate VAT scheme to cut red tape for up to 700,000 small and medium-sized enterprises, and abolished corporation tax for 150,000 businesses. Our Phoenix fund has helped more than 89,000 people from disadvantaged areas to start and grow SMEs, and our nine regional venture capital funds have made 199 investments, totalling £37 million.

Mr. Norman: Since this is the last chance that I will have to do so, may I gently remind the Minister that the biggest gift that this Government can give to small business is to reduce the burden of regulation that has increased so much under them? Has he noticed that the Chancellor has committed to implement in full the Arculus report, which includes the principle of regulatory budgets and a one in, one out principle for new regulation, yet the Secretary of State has already committed, if re-elected, to new regulations that will cost small business up to £200 million to £300 million in additional regulatory burdens, according to her own Department's impact assessments? Which equivalent regulations do the Government plan to withdraw?

Nigel Griffiths: The hon. Member is leaving the House, and the House will be the poorer for losing somebody with business experience. We all wish him well.

Yes, of course, we have read the Arculus report. As the Secretary of State and the Chancellor have made clear, elements of it are being examined and are being implemented—in fact, the bulk of the recommendations—but I do not take lessons from the party that introduced 51,599 regulations. The important thing is that the way we have tackled regulations means that a record number of small businesses started in Britain last year, and the survival rates are the best for a decade. Last year, 445,000 businesses were started. That is more than 1,000 businesses for every working day. We are the party of business growth.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that the Northwest Development Agency, and indeed development agencies generally, have an important role to play? Are not business growth and small businesses encouraged by actions that they are taking in many places in the country, including the former Michelin site in Burnley, which is being brought back into use for small businesses?

Nigel Griffiths: My hon. Friend has been a powerful advocate for his area and for business and jobs growth as well. We will certainly be sorry to lose him and wish him well. He is right about the important role played by the regional development agencies and the importance of the support they receive from the DTI, which, under the Conservative party, would be abolished, with all the threat to jobs and growth that that would bring about.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Our plan is not to abolish the DTI but to set up a department for business that will focus on entrepreneurship and on really helping small businesses.

As this is the last DTI questions before the election, may I say what a pleasure it has been to shadow the hon. Gentleman? Although we disagree on regulation and despite the fact that he has not answered the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman), he has been a doughty champion of small businesses and we admire his energy.

What has happened to the National Audit Office value-for-money report on the Small Business Service, which the NAO assures me has been finished and is awaiting clearance by the Secretary of State? Will it be cleared before the election?

Nigel Griffiths: The NAO is a much respected organisation. It spends a great deal of time on its reports and makes many thoughtful points, and it would be wrong of any Minister to jump to hasty conclusions. The report is being studied in detail and I am sure that it will inform Government policy when we come back after the election.

Balance of Trade

7. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What the latest estimate is of the UK balance of trade for 2004–05; and what the balance of trade with the EU was in the same period. [224756]

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Jacqui Smith): The Government do not produce forecasts on a geographical basis. The latest official figures, published at the time of the Budget, for the UK's total balance of trade in goods and services in 2004 show a deficit representing 3.3 per cent. of GDP. The Treasury forecasts that that will fall to between 3 and 3.1 per cent. of GDP by 2007.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is the Minister aware that, in the 34 years that have passed since I resigned from the Government—before she was born—over the decision to join the EU, which we were told would improve trade dramatically, I have been watching for that improvement? I was horrified when I phoned up the House of Commons Library this morning and was told that, in 2004, our deficit in trade in goods and services with the rest of the world was £6.4 billion, but with the European Union it was £32.5 billion, which means that the European part accounts for 84 per cent. of our deficit. Is not that an horrific figure and should not the Government think carefully before getting more involved in an enterprise that has brought us an horrendous trade deficit?

Jacqui Smith: I offer the hon. Gentleman my best wishes for what comes next. I have happy memories of our time together on the Treasury Committee and I have always been impressed by his independence of mind and his diligence in representing his constituents. He is, of course, famous—even notorious—for his views on Europe, but perhaps I can give him a little reassurance today. One of the reasons for the figures he cites is that the beneficial levels of growth that we in the UK have experienced compared with other parts of the EU mean that opportunities for UK exporters in Europe are somewhat reduced. In addition, I hope that he will be reassured to learn that, although the EU trade deficit in December last year was £2.4 billion, in January this year it had decreased to £2.2 billion.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

The Minister for Women was asked—

Work-Life Balance

10. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What her policy is on work-life balance and opportunities for employment for women. [224757]

The Minister for Women and Equality (Ms Patricia Hewitt): Through the measures that the Government have introduced, women—and men—now have more choice and support than ever before to balance work and home life in ways that benefit employees, their families and employers. The UK now has the highest levels of employment ever, with women making up more than 45 per cent. of the work force.

Michael Fabricant: I have heard that the right hon. Lady is a great fan of Lauren Bacall and has seen every single one of her movies. Has she read the article in the Daily Mail headlined, "You can't have a husband and a career, says Bacall"? Does she agree with Lauren Bacall, will she continue to watch her movies and what does her husband have to say about it?

Ms Hewitt: I have seen the headline as well as the movies. It reminds me of my first job interview many years ago, when the interviewer, who was a woman, asked me whether my husband minded my working. I said, "No, and I don't mind him working either."

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend will be aware that many women choose to achieve work-life balance by setting up their own enterprises. However, there is still an insufficient number of women doing so, despite good examples such as diva, an enterprise run by women in my city. What can the Department do to ensure that more women take that step and have the confidence to run businesses, because they often prove to be excellent at doing so?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right. I am pleased that the number of women who have taken the step of setting up their own businesses has grown significantly in the past few years. It remains the case that fewer women in Britain are starting up businesses compared with the proportion of women doing so in the United States. Indeed, if we could close that entrepreneurship gap 100,000 more new businesses would start up in Britain every year. Through the Phoenix fund, the Business Link network and women's business clubs we are making that investment and giving support so that more women will take the step into self-employment by setting up and growing their own business.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I should celebrate the last women's questions of this Parliament by sticking up for men, because their work-life balance is important too. The reality for many families is that men work full-time and that women often choose to work part-time. The pay gap is 46 per cent., so it make financial sense for the men in such families to go out to work rather than the women. The Government have signally failed to tackle that aspect of the pay gap, which is extremely disappointing. Can the Minister tell us what she has done to address the problem?

Ms Hewitt: The first thing that we did was introduce the national minimum wage, which has almost eliminated the pay gap for low-paid workers. With tax credits on top, that has made an enormous difference to women, particularly lone mothers, who work part-time, as they can now secure a living wage for themselves and their children. We have ensured that part-time workers receive full-time rights—a hugely important step that was opposed, I seem to recall, by the Conservative Opposition—and through our new laws on flexible working rights we are seeking to make sure that part-time working is not confined to low-paid, low-skilled, undervalued jobs but is available all the way up to the most senior, well-paid jobs. By making sure that men as well as women have more choice and control over their working hours, not only will we make it easier for both fathers and mothers to balance work and family but we will reduce, then eliminate the pay gap.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is to be congratulated on setting up the women and work commission. I pay great tribute to her and the Prime Minister for appreciating the complexity of the pay gap and setting up Baroness Prosser's commission to try to get to the root of a very difficult problem. Can she confirm that the next Labour Government will act on the recommendations of Baroness Prosser's report so that female talents can be properly used and rewarded?

Ms Hewitt: I am delighted with the progress of the women and work commission, which will report to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister before the end of the year. I have no doubt at all that we will want to act on its recommendations, The commission is looking at the underlying causes of the pay gap, particularly the different choices that girls and young women make about the subjects that they study and the training that they undertake. Well over 90 per cent. of hairdressing apprenticeships, for instance, are taken by women, but well over 90 per cent. of engineering apprenticeships are taken by men. Those young women do not have any information at all about the pay consequences of their choices. We must tackle those underlying problems if we are going to make the progress that we all want to make to eliminate the pay gap.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): May I first thank you, Mr. Speaker, for defending the rights of Back Benchers in minority parties?

I wish to press the Minister on single women who have carried a load through life and have often been forgotten about in carrying responsibility for aged parents and others. Does she share my concern about job sharing, particularly in Departments where there does not seem to be a working arrangement for sharing knowledge, so that people who are looking for information find it difficult to get it?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman raises an extremely important point. Across government, we have been doing a great deal more to support the single women and others who have a caring responsibility for elderly parents or adult disabled children. That includes the introduction of the state second pension, for instance, which will protect the pensions of women in that position for periods when they have had such family responsibilities. We have ensured that job sharing and other part-time work opportunities are available, certainly in my own Department and across government. As he will know, we are consulting on the possible extension of our very successful flexible working laws beyond parents of young children to people caring for older relatives.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend is to be congratulated on the fact that evidence is emerging that women in middle management are now out-performing and out-earning many men. Surely, that is partly down to the pioneering work done by her and the DTI. Is she also aware, however, that when the Institute for Fiscal Studies was assessing how much money students pay back, it pointed out that female students would pay back very little over the period involved because they would be earning such low wages over their lifetime? While there are signs of very good things happening, we still face some problems and the battle goes on.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right that the battle goes on. Women in middle management are doing exceedingly well, which is a tribute to their efforts. Women students at school—and we are beginning to see the same thing at university—are out-performing their male counterparts. The reality is that when the majority of graduates in law, medicine, accountancy and many other subjects are women, we need to ensure that those women can make the full contribution that their skills will allow, for the sake not only of them and their families, but of our economy as a whole. I assure him that we on the Labour Benches at least will continue to do everything in our power to ensure that equal opportunities are available to women and men throughout the country.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I congratulate the Minister on her original answer to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant). Does she agree that there is one profession in which women and men are not represented in equal numbers—our very own profession as Members of Parliament? Since this might well be the very last question of this Parliament, does she share with me the happy anticipation that, when my party occupies the Government Benches in only a few weeks' time, there will be more than 40 women on our side, while on the Labour Opposition side there will be fewer than 60 women and the Liberal Democrats will be lucky if they have just one? Does she agree that we must all keep working to ensure that we have more and more women as Members of Parliament?

Ms Hewitt: I congratulate the hon. Lady. Indeed, I commiserate with her on the efforts that she and the very small number of women on the Opposition Benches have been making to try to persuade their party to select more women candidates. I am sure that she agrees that it is a great pity that her party has already—indeed, it did so before the election campaign started—deselected three of its feisty women candidates. Apparently, they were too feisty for the men in their constituency associations. We were the Government who introduced the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 to enable any political party that so chose to take positive action to ensure proper representation of the women of our country in Parliament and other elected offices. I am proud of the fact that our party took advantage of that Act to take such positive action. I regret that the Opposition parties did not do so.

Since this is the final question of the Session, may I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your unfailing courtesy in presiding over our proceedings, and may I ask you whether we will now get a chance to sing "Jerusalem"?

Mr. Speaker: I can think of better songs.

Points of Order

12.35 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Many Members on both sides of the House have been worried by a challenge to what we think are fundamental rights of parliamentarians. I refer to the predicament of the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight). I have raised this as a point of order as it has seemed impossible to raise the matter in the House. I have spoken to your office and others have tried to raise the issue, as this is a matter that goes to the heart of parliamentarians' independence, representation and what we do in the House, yet it seems that it cannot be raised under the Orders and rules of the House. Surely there is something wrong when a matter that goes to the core of representation and the independence of parliamentarians cannot be raised in this manner?

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Opposition will probably not believe me, but had this happened to one of my Labour colleagues, I would raise the matter at a meeting of the parliamentary Labour party and, if necessary, even though my own party was involved, with you. What concerns my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and me, and surely many people, is that as a result of a speech made outside the House—so it is clearly not a matter of privilege—a Member of Parliament has been denied the opportunity of standing for his party in the general election—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

David Winnick: Although I must concede, I suppose, that, as Speaker of the House of Commons, you cannot do anything about it, it seems to me that this is a threat to Members of Parliament. If it can happen to one Member, it can happen to other Members of Parliament. Although Opposition Members were heckling, I accept that it could even happen on this side. It is a fundamental element of parliamentary democracy that a Member of Parliament should be able to speak his mind without such action being taken, which has deprived the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight)—with whose views, obviously, I totally disagree—of the opportunity of being in the House unless he stands as an independent, which, as a loyal Conservative, he does not wish to do. Can you make any comment that would help parliamentary democracy in this respect?

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether you have had an opportunity to consider the report of the Joint Committee on Parliamentary Privilege, which examined the whole issue of complaints of privilege. We understand that the precise circumstances in question might not come within the remit of the work done by that Committee, on which I served on the House's behalf, but anything that prevents a Member of Parliament from doing his duty to his constituents—which seems to be the case, setting aside the precise circumstances at the moment—reduces the validity of the position that the Member of Parliament holds. I wonder whether you have been able to take legal advice, or whether that might apply to this situation and the points already made?

Mr. Speaker: Let me try to answer those points of order. May I say that I have the highest regard for the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight)? Ever since he came into the House, I have found him most courteous and a very good parliamentarian. May I say to the hon. Members for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and for Walsall, North (David Winnick) that I well remember the black days when there was mandatory reselection, and at that time I was a member of the parliamentary Labour party. It was very cruel that Members of Parliament had to leave their constituency and cease to be candidates for no good reason other than vindictiveness. I am not saying that that is the case with the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs, but that was the case in the 1980s.

What I can say, as Speaker of the House, is that there is no question of privilege, and that this is not a matter that can be raised in the House. It must be raised with the individual parliamentary parties involved—with the 1922 Committee, and with the Conservative or Labour party. It is not a matter for the Chair. I am sorry that I can say no more than that.

Mr. Sheerman: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I really must ask you for clarification. I know that you have been taking legal advice on this. Why can we not talk about such a fundamental issue in Parliament? It seems to us to bring the House into ridicule when we cannot discuss an attack on the fundamental right of a parliamentarian to speak his mind—in this case, someone with a proven record of being a loyal member of a party, who has done nothing wrong as far as any of us can see, although we may disagree with his views. Yet, because of some obscure, ancient rule, we in this House with 659 Members cannot discuss this matter.

Mr. Speaker: That is not the case. The hon. Gentleman raised the matter on a point of order, and what I told him was that it could not be discussed on a point of order. There are ways of raising the matter, however, and it can be debated in the House. The hon. Gentleman asked me to make a ruling. I am the custodian of the rules of the House, and there is nothing that I can do under the rules of the House; but to say that the matter cannot be discussed in Parliament is inaccurate.

The hon. Gentleman said that I had taken advice on the matter. Obviously I have taken advice, and it is good advice. The best advice that I myself can give now is that we should move on to the next business.

BILLS PRESENTED

Climate Change

Mr. Michael Meacher, supported by Mr John Gummer and Norman Baker, presented a Bill to combat climate change by setting annual targets for the reduction of carbon dioxide emissions until 2050; to place duties on the Prime Minister regarding the reporting on and achievement of those targets; to specify procedures to be followed if the targets are not met; to specify certain functions of and provide certain powers to Members of Parliament with regard to ensuring carbon dioxide emissions are reduced; to set sectoral reduction targets and targets for energy efficiency, the generation of energy from renewable sources, combined heat and power and microgeneration; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Monday 11 April, and to be printed [Bill 112].

ELECTRICITY (MICROGENERATION)

Alan Simpson, supported by Mr. Andrew Stunell, Mr. Peter Ainsworth, Dr. Desmond Turner, Sue Doughty, Joan Walley, Mr. David Drew, Norman Baker, Mr. Simon Thomas, Vera Baird, Mr. Kerry Pollard and Peter Bottomley, presented a Bill to promote microgeneration of electricity and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 113].

Orders of the Day

Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Mr. Speaker: I must draw the House's attention to the fact that privilege is involved in Lords amendments Nos. 5, 7, 8 and 57. If the House agrees to those amendments, I shall ensure that the appropriate entry is made in the Journal.

Clause 4

ESTABLISHMENT OF SERIOUS ORGANISED CRIME AGENCY

Lords amendment: No. 1.

12.42 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 12, 41, 42 and 48 to 56.

Caroline Flint: It may help our deliberations if I say immediately that I shall be advising the House to accept all the amendments made in the other place. In most cases I shall urge the House to accept the amendments with alacrity, given that they were Government amendments. In one instance, however—the provisions on incitement to religious hatred—I shall, with heavy heart, invite the House to agree with the Lords amendments. We shall come to that in a while; suffice it to say that we agreed to remove the incitement provisions only in the interest of securing the passage of the rest of this important legislation.

All the amendments in this group relate to part 1. Clause 10 would have given the Home Secretary a power to direct the Serious Organised Crime Agency to set itself targets to measure how well its performance fulfilled any strategic priorities determined by the Home Secretary under clause 9. That would have added to SOCA's accountability. Nevertheless, both here and in the other place the Conservative party expressed concern about the perceived political influence of the Home Secretary over SOCA. In the interests of securing consensus on the SOCA measures, we agreed that clause 10 need not stand part of the Bill. After all, the SOCA board would itself want to establish a robust performance management and assessment regime.

12.45 pm

In the same vein, I commend the amendments to clauses 18 and 19. The amendments would also have the effect of reducing any alleged political interference in the affairs of SOCA. They remove the Home Secretary's ability to attach conditions to the payments of grants to SOCA, thereby giving the agency greater flexibility in apportioning its funds to meet the unique challenges of tackling serious organised crime in the 21st century. On the other hand, the amendment to clause 17 will ensure, reasonably, that were the Home Secretary to request Her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary to inspect SOCA wholly or partly in Scotland, he must consult Scottish Ministers before doing so.

Amendments Nos. 8 to 10 and 52 deal with the prosecution of offences investigated by SOCA and ensure that SOCA has access to the best possible legal advice during a criminal investigation and that the most appropriate prosecutor can be assigned to take a case to court. The new clauses inserted by the amendments extend the functions of the Revenue and Customs Prosecution Office, the new prosecution body that is to replace the Customs and Excise Prosecution Office, so that it may also institute and conduct criminal proceedings that arise out of a criminal investigation by SOCA. That will ensure, in line with the Attorney-General's wishes, that the skills and experience that have been built both within the Crown Prosecution Service and CEPO in prosecuting serious organised crime are available to SOCA. The new clauses also provide for the issue of joint directions by the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Director of Revenue and Customs Prosecutions, setting down criteria for determining which prosecutor will take responsibility for any given case initiated by SOCA. Amendments Nos. 10 and 52 make technical, consequential amendments.

Amendments Nos. 12, 48 to 50 and 53 to 56 are straightforward and deal with the area of discrimination legislation as applied to persons seconded to SOCA. The sentiments behind the amendments were brought to our attention by the Police Federation, to which we are grateful. The amendments bring into one place under a single clause the discrimination legislation to provide that SOCA is liable for any act done by it in relation to persons seconded to the agency, as well as anything done by such persons in the performance or purported performance of their functions. They also expressly provide that SOCA is liable for any discriminatory acts committed by any of its secondees, be they constables or other persons.

Amendments Nos. 41 and 42 give effect to the one recommendation in the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee report on part 1, namely, that the order-making power in clause 50 should be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure.

Amendment No. 51, which was necessary in light of the Road Safety Bill's not securing Royal Assent this Session, will allow SOCA to be included in the provisions that exempt emergency vehicles from speed limits where it is necessary in the pursuit of their functions. Section 87 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, which makes that exemption, will not automatically extend to SOCA, as the agency will not be a police body pursuing police purposes. The provision includes safeguards limiting the exemption to SOCA staff who are carrying out the purposes of the agency and to those who are undergoing training to do so and covering only those vehicles driven by someone who has had training to drive at high speeds.

I hope that I have outlined the Government's thinking and given an explanation of the deliberations in the other place.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): May I, in the spirit of the words of the Minister, say that the Opposition agree with these amendments and therefore we will not vote against any of them? I do not think that that will come as much of a surprise to her. She is aware from the words of the shadow Home Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), that we largely agree with the Bill. Our reservations were on the issue of religious hatred. As she says, we will come to that issue shortly.

We largely support the Bill. The Minister will confirm that it has been constructively debated in Committee and in both Houses. I believe that it has been improved. It has not had added to it the constructive approach that we took on intercept evidence. That has been debated in both Houses and there have been differences of view across the political parties. We regret the fact that that provision has not been included. We also regret that the provision for 24-hour fully manned surveillance and embarkation controls at our ports, which would have brought a big improvement to immigration and customs, has not been added to the Bill, although, as the Minister will be aware, that is a Conservative pledge in the forthcoming election. Had it been included in the Bill, it would have greatly improved it.

I am grateful to the Under-Secretary for outlining what the amendments will achieve. In Committee, Opposition Members were keen that the agency should have operational independence and that the Home Secretary should not be able to set performance targets. We fully accepted that the Home Secretary should be able to set targets in respect of strategic performance, but not performance targets. These amendments accept our arguments.

Amendment No. 12 concerns an important issue that touches on the role of constables. The Under-Secretary knows that there was disagreement in Committee and on the Floor of the House and we remain concerned that the Bill could undermine the role of the constable. She will have heard the words of the Police Federation and we are disappointed that the words of the Conservative party and of the federation appear to have fallen on deaf ministerial ears.

The Under-Secretary has explained what the new clause is designed to do. I am grateful to her for that and, on that basis, we accept the amendments.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 12 agreed to.

Clause 58

OFFENCES TO WHICH THIS CHAPTER APPLIES

Lords amendment: No. 13.

Caroline Flint: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this we may consider Lords amendments Nos. 14 to 26, 46 and 57.

Caroline Flint: Again, these are mostly minor and technical amendments that relate to parts 3 and 4 of the Bill. However, I should like to bring the following amendments to the attention of the House. On powers of arrest, the amendments to schedule 7 and 18 simply make further consequential amendments and repeals in respect of existing powers of arrest made redundant by the new framework in clause 106. In relation to the identification of the British tsunami casualties, dealt with in amendments Nos. 27 and 44, the House will be aware—[Interruption.]

[Caroline Flint]

In terms of compulsory investigative powers, in clause 58, amendments Nos. 13 to 21 create a threshold of £5,000 for certain financial offences that must be met before disclosure notices may be used. These offences include those listed under the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979, the Value Added Tax Act 1994 and the Theft Act 1968. This will ensure that the powers introduced by chapter 1 of part 2 of the Bill will be used proportionately to tackle only the most serious offences.

In relation to Queen's evidence, in clause 71, amendment No. 25 inserts a new clause that ensures that any hearing to vary a sentence following an agreement by the defendant to turn Queen's evidence can be held in camera, or subject to reporting restrictions, where the court considers it necessary to protect any person from harm and it is in the interests of justice. The issue was helpfully brought to our attention by the Lord Chief Justice.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): The House will understand what the Under-Secretary has just said, but can she give an assurance that any defendant will know that the scales may be turned against him? For example, if two people are accused and one turns Queen's evidence and has a session with the judge in private, will that be unnecessarily prejudicial to the other defendant, although clearly the evidence will be given properly in court?

Caroline Flint: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the measure, requested by the Lord Chief Justice, was aimed at certain situations where it might be prejudicial to the person giving evidence if that were in open court. I hope to reassure the hon. Gentleman that we are trying to make Queen's evidence more transparent than ever before so that, for prosecution and defence purposes, justice can be seen to be served. If he requires any detail on that point, I would be happy to write to him, but having a transparent system takes us a long way forward.

Clause 75 originally provided that the reports made by an offender under a financial reporting order must be at fixed intervals throughout the course of the order. The Lord Chief Justice was helpful in his suggestion and, as a consequence, amendment No. 26 would provide the sentencer with the flexibility to set different levels between reports. The change builds in a helpful degree of flexibility in the operation of these orders.

I apologise to the House for losing my place at the start of this section.

Peter Bottomley: Is the Under-Secretary capable of understanding why the periods of punishment in clause 75(10) are different in different parts of the UK?

Caroline Flint: My understanding is that the amendment was aimed at giving some flexibility. For example, financial reporting orders can operate when someone is in prison and the time between reporting orders may be different depending on when someone is released from prison. I am happy to look at that particular issue for the hon. Gentleman and get back to him.

Peter Bottomley: For the sake of clarity for those who may read our proceedings, which may not amount to a very large number, imprisonment on summary conviction is liable to a term of 51 weeks in England and Wales, 12 months in Scotland—a difference of a week—and six months in Northern Ireland. That is an odd consequence of devolution. I do not necessarily expect the Under-Secretary to be able to answer in detail now, but I think that the inconsistency will look rather peculiar.

Caroline Flint: As the hon. Gentleman says, devolution creates different systems. We discussed this in Committee at some length and we must recognise and live with it.

I have nothing more to add on this subject. As I said, at one point I lost my place, but apparently not many Members realised. [Laughter.]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Let me reassure the Under-Secretary that we on this side of the House were very much aware that she had lost her place and, indeed, were rather concerned that we might have been focusing on the wrong amendment ourselves, which is very easily done at this level of detail.

As the Under-Secretary said, these amendments follow the debates in another place yesterday. We very much agree that, in respect of qualifying offences, the relevant offence must be of a value of £5,000 or above. That is the right level before a disclosure notice can kick in and was argued for eloquently in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve). We accept the amendments.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 14 to 26 agreed to.

Clause 113

FINGERPRINTS

Lords amendment: No. 27.

Caroline Flint: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to deal with Lords amendments Nos. 29 to 35, 43, 44, 58 to 78 and 87 to 101.

1 pm

Caroline Flint: I have already said that the amendments to schedules 7 and 18 simply make further consequential amendments and repeals in respect of existing powers of arrest made redundant by the new framework in clause 106. Amendments Nos. 27 and 44 are intended to deal with a particular problem that we faced in the aftermath of the Asian tsunami with the identification of British casualties. As hon. Members are aware, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said on 22 March that we currently estimate that there were 169 British casualties of the tsunami who were either killed in the disaster or who remain unaccounted for. We believe that it may be possible to identify a small number of those victims by cross-checking DNA samples and fingerprints taken from the deceased against the national DNA and fingerprint databases. These amendments would enable such checks to take place.

I am sure that the House would agree that we should do all that we can to help the relatives and friends of the victims of this terrible natural disaster by speeding up the identification of those victims by whatever means possible. I make it clear to the House that the amendments are not specific to the tsunami and would enable samples from any unidentified body to be checked against the national DNA and fingerprint databases for identification purposes.

The amendments to schedule 8 are designed to ensure that chief officers have greater flexibility when conferring powers on community support officers. As the provisions of the Police Reform Act 2002 are currently constructed, where a chief officer confers a power on a CSO to require a person's name and address, he must also confer on that CSO a power to detain for up to 30 minutes pending the arrival of a constable. We believe that chief officers should be able to confer the power to require name and address without the power to detain. These amendments provide such flexibility so that CSO powers can be tailored to meet local needs under the direction of chief officers.

The other matter that I bring to the attention of the House relates to Parliament square. It was evident on Second Reading, in Committee and on Report that there was passionate feeling on the issue on both sides of the House. [Interruption] Yes, there was passion from you as well, Mr. Speaker. Whether hon. Members are for or against what we are proposing to do, they cannot deny that there has been a great deal of discussion about it.

We have tried to listen to concerns. We still believe that, for the reasons that we have outlined in numerous debates, we have to move forward to deal with the area appropriately. I reiterate what I have said on many occasions: we are not trying to prevent people from protesting, and we are certainly not trying to stop them doing it in Parliament square, but we think that there should be a framework of conditions. We are aware of the concerns about notification and those about Trafalgar square.

As Baroness Scotland assured those in the other place, in exercising the order-making power in clause 135 we will ensure that Trafalgar square is excluded. As a result, demonstrations could continue there without the need for prior notification of the Commissioner.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Why will this matter be left to ministerial discretion? Why cannot the Bill firmly state that the distance to Trafalgar square is specific, and the square will always be available for the sort of traditional demonstrations we have all experienced over the years? I am sure that the Minister has taken part in important demonstrations there, and certainly many of her colleagues have done so. Why cannot we make the provision specific, instead of leaving the question to the discretion of future Ministers? One day there may be a Minister from another party who is less open-minded on the issue than the hon. Lady and her colleagues.

Caroline Flint: There is an order-making power, so the matter will return to the House. The hon. Gentleman is right: I have taken part in numerous demonstrations over the years. However, I also remember only too well when I was not allowed to demonstrate in Parliament square but was stuck on the other side of Westminster bridge and not allowed to go any further. We should acknowledge that the opportunity to demonstrate in Parliament square is not particularly old, and that we are trying to ensure that that right still exists. The commissioner will not be able to refuse anyone the right to demonstrate in Parliament square, but conditions will be attached. That has been made clear both in correspondence and discussion, in Committee and in the other place.

Amendment No. 30 responds to the concerns expressed by hon. Members on Report in February about the requirement to give at least six days' notice of any demonstration. We recognise that there should be provision for a shorter notice period in exceptional circumstances. The amendment therefore provides that where it is impracticable to give six days' notice, notification may be given not less than 24 hours before the start time of the demonstration.

Amendment No. 35 allows the Metropolitan police to give authorisation for a demonstration by fax or e-mail if organisers agree. This is particularly relevant if an organiser is unable to give six days' notice for the demonstration.

The other amendments in this group are minor technical amendments. I hope that what I have said at least demonstrates that, on a hotly debated issue, we have listened and suggested amendments. The fact that the House of Lords, where there was also strong feeling about this issue, accepted them shows what progress we have made on this issue of concern.

Mr. Mitchell: This is a sensible group of amendments and I need not detain the House for long. I just want to pick up on two points that the Minister made. The first is about amendment No. 30, which deals with Parliament square. Although there are passionate views on both sides of the argument on both sides of the House, the debate was informed by a Select Committee report. There was a unanimous view in the Committee that something needed to be done about the situation—if I may describe it in that neutral way—outside the Carriage Gates in Parliament square.

We support the thrust of amendment No. 30 and accept that in normal circumstances six days' notice is not unreasonable, but where it is unreasonable, 24 hours is the right period. We are grateful to the Government for accepting that argument, which we put clearly in Committee.

I turn now to amendment No. 64. We have some doubts about the drafting, but we are inevitably concerned, as we said in Committee, about what I would call function creep for police community support officers. We want to emphasise that while we do not oppose the amendments, we think it essential that proper detailed independent analysis be done on the work that CSOs carry out; any form of function creep without that proper evaluation is unwise, and in that case the Government should think again. With that small reservation, we are happy to support the amendments.

[Mr. Mitchell]

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab):I welcome the amendments, but in doing so I still find it dispiriting that on the last day of this parliamentary Session we are restricting our constituents' rights to demonstrate in Parliament square. I accept that the amendments will make demonstrating easier than the Government originally intended. We look forward to the details of the order that will ensure that Trafalgar square is not included in this legislation in a way that would allow future Governments, perhaps capriciously advised by the police, to restrict demonstrations there.

In most of the debates, people have detailed their experiences of demonstrating in Parliament square and Trafalgar square, but I have not yet done so. We all have a bit of form on these matters. I have been arrested on demonstrations in both Trafalgar square and Parliament square, and on both occasions I was not prosecuted. In fact, on one occasion I was represented by my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), and I received compensation from the Metropolitan police for wrongful arrest. I just wanted to get my form on the record as well. [Interruption.] I heard from the Whips some form of expression of regret that I was not detained for longer, and I can appreciate that.

In interpreting this legislation we must be clear that the proposals may in some way limit the right to demonstrate in Parliament square. As the Minister said—it needs reiterating—no police officer or Metropolitan Police Commissioner can refuse authority to demonstrate in Parliament square.

Secondly, there is nothing in the Bill that provides that there is to be a restriction on the number of applications from an individual, or a group of individuals, to demonstrate in Parliament square. The amendments make it reasonably practicable, therefore, for an individual to submit applications on a regular basis, even by fax or e-mail, to demonstrate in Parliament square, so I hope that Brian Haw has obtained a fax machine and has access to e-mail. The amendments enable him or others to submit a series of applications, almost on a daily basis, to enable them to return to Parliament square to demonstrate in a way set out in the proposed legislation, which takes into account the issue of noise.

I welcome the amendments. I think that they assist the process in which we can say that Brian Haw and others are not going away, and will not be deterred from enabling themselves to demonstrate in Parliament square in future on issues of critical importance, such as Iraq and other matters.

Peter Bottomley: I start where the Minister started, which was with DNA and fingerprint identification of those who may have died. It is worth making the point that under other legislation we should make provision for people voluntarily to provide samples for DNA testing or fingerprints for later identification, for those who are not on the national register. It seems that we are restricting the usefulness to those whose fingerprints or DNA may be held on the national register—but that register will not contain everyone in the country. I am not saying that that should be compulsory, but we should make provision so that for whatever purpose may be useful in future, people can say, "I would like my samples and my fingerprints to be available where necessary." It is a point for the future. I welcome the provision made so far. The House will note that the Minister said that this is not only for the tsunami disaster but for other occasions—we cannot anticipate what they would be.

The ability to demonstrate is important. Indeed, it is vital, but I am a traditionalist in that I was brought up with the idea that there could not be placards too close to the Houses of Parliament, and that demonstrations would break off when they came past Parliament. It would be better if we returned to that situation. There is the question of transition. The noisy encampment that we have had outside Parliament has not been a blessing. The fact is that it has happened. The sooner we can ensure that people can protest in a way that does not cause health and safety problems for those who service this place, and the general public, the better. If it is goodbye Mr. Haw, then goodbye.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Clause 124

HATRED AGAINST PERSONS ON RACIAL OR RELIGIOUS GROUNDS

Lords amendment: No. 28.

Caroline Flint: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to deal with Lords amendment No. 79.

Caroline Flint: Clause 124 and schedule 10 are fundamentally about protecting vulnerable communities and closing an inequality in law that is exploited by those who seek to cause damage to those communities. By introducing incitement to religious hatred, we sought to deliver justice and fairness to members of all faiths, and I am sorely disappointed that the Opposition parties in the other place have chosen not to support the provision.

There is no ulterior motive for introducing the proposed offence. We have been committed to doing so for some time. In fact, it was considered as early as 1986, when it was rejected because there was not felt to be a problem to address at the time. We introduced an almost identical offence in 2001, shortly after 11 September and the disturbances in Bradford and Burnley. That was rejected because it was felt that the provision should not be included in an anti-terrorism Bill.

We have, however, remained committed to providing the protection needed since 2001. We listened carefully to the consideration of evidence by the House of Lords Select Committee, when the police informed the Committee that the offence could have helped to prevent the disturbances in Bradford and Burnley. We listened carefully when a wide range of faith communities twice asked us to extend the protection now available only to Jews and Sikhs, to ensure equity of protection in law. We tried to respond to that call. Other support has come from the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Commission for Racial Equality, Justice, the Law Society and many other organisations.

1.15 pm

To move forward on this issue, we replicated the offence of incitement to racial hatred, which for nearly 20 years has provided protection for Jews and Sikhs, without being misused or placing unnecessary restrictions on free speech. I am baffled by those who oppose the offence on the ground of its so-called loose wording. Clause 124 uses exactly the same wording as the provision that protects Jews and Sikhs already. I am equally baffled by those who would argue that Jews and Sikhs should have greater protection in law than Muslims, Hindus, Christians or Buddhists, despite the evidence from the police and the faith communities.

The only restrictions that we have seen as a result of the incitement to racial hatred offence are those that have helped to change our culture for the better. The offence has helped to set boundaries around what is acceptable behaviour and language in our society.

Clause 124 and schedule 10 are a crucial test of the society that we want to create. By supporting the Government's proposals, the Opposition parties would have sent a clear message about society's disapproval of those who abuse the loophole in the law to promote hatred of others because of their faith. Such behaviour has no place in modern Britain.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): For reasons that I stated at the time, I supported the clause to which my hon. Friend is referring. Does she agree that in practice it would not have meant that one could not criticise a religion or criticise religious practices? Like a number of Members, I have no faith, but I have recalled on a number of occasions the fact that we can affirm, because of Charles Bradlaugh, who was four times refused the right to take his seat because he had no religion. As what has been proposed would in no way ban criticism of religion—which I do not want to engage in, but which I would not challenge the right of others to express—it is difficult to understand why there should be such criticism of trying to protect people who do not have the protection that Jews and Sikhs have now.

Caroline Flint: My hon. Friend puts the case eloquently. The clause in no way attacks the right of free speech. In no way does it attack the rights of comedians, academics, politicians or anyone else to criticise individual religions. We are trying to protect individuals against whom hatred is incited because of their religious faith. As I have said, we lifted the wording from that in the current law on incitement to racial hatred. That raises the question of how Members of this place, and those in the other place, can support the law on incitement to racial hatred yet not support clause 124. As with incitement to racial hatred, a high threshold is set. There is also the Attorney-General's involvement. That would have applied in this instance, too.

It is with acute disappointment that we are having to ask the House to agree to remove the provision from the Bill. The unelected House has chosen not to rise to the challenge of what I believe is a fundamental aspect of creating a decent society. The parliamentary timetable means that it will not be possible to insist on the inclusion of the clause without jeopardising the creation of the Serious Organised Crime Agency, and other important provisions to tackle crime. I do not believe that that is in anyone's interest.

Peter Bottomley: The Minister is doing what other Ministers do when they are not desperately happy, and chooses to talk about the unelected other place. Will she remind the House of the proportion of the Members of the other place who have been appointed by the Prime Minister?

Caroline Flint: Discussion about the other place and how it should be constituted is not for this afternoon. I say again that Opposition parties in the House and the other place have contributed to the removal of the clause from the Bill. They will to answer for that. However, I reassure my hon. Friends that it remains the Government's firm and clear intention to give people of all faiths the same protection against incitement to hatred on the basis of their religion. We will make sure that that is part of our manifesto in the forthcoming general election.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: We come to one of the most hotly contested aspects of the Bill, but it is not a central aspect, which is why the Minister has moved that we agree with the amendment to remove the clause and schedule dealing with religious hatred. The debate has gone on in the other place and in Committee, and I shall not rehash the arguments that divide us across the House. I shall make just three or four points.

Let there be no doubt in the mind of the Minister or anyone else that there is agreement in all parts of the House that we need to prevent religious hatred. The issue that divides us is how best to achieve that. My party has consistently supported the anti-discrimination legislation to protect people from being discriminated against in respect of their religion. Our fear is that the Government have not thought through the effect of the measure that they are putting before the House. We made it clear on Second Reading that although we largely supported the Bill, this was one aspect that we could not support.

The measure would curb free speech. It is outside the fine British traditions of religious tolerance and fierce religious debate, which have characterised the history of our country. We believe that the existing law deals with incitement to violence and words designed to cause alarm, distress or harassment. We remain convinced that the Government are wrong in their contention, and right in the amendments withdrawing the provisions. The best way to deal with evil and intolerant ideas is to confront and defeat them in open debate, not as the Government originally envisaged in the Bill. We support the amendments to remove the misguided provisions from the Bill.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): I am delighted to have the opportunity at this late stage in the proceedings on the Bill to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) and his colleagues in our home affairs team on having secured a victory for freedom of expression. I am disappointed to hear the Minister say that if returned to office on 5 May, the Labour party would introduce similar legislation in the next Parliament. That seems an extremely good reason to vote Conservative on 5 May, in addition to all the other reasons.

[Mr. Gerald Howarth]

I did not have a chance to participate in earlier debates on this matter and I shall not rehearse the arguments, but let me say at the outset that it is important that all of us should recognise the sensitivities of others, and that we should not go out of our way to be gratuitously offensive to others. I frequently take offence at things that are said, but I have to bite my lip and move on. The price that one must pay in a free society is that people will occasionally take offence. I am no exception to that.

I have had quite a few letters from constituents. My mailbag on the issue has been atypical. I have had more letters on this subject than on other issues, from constituents who have been extremely concerned about the implications of the Government's proposal. They will undoubtedly welcome the fact that their lordships were prepared to take a stand and strike the right balance between protecting individual faiths and individual views, and the need to preserve freedom of expression.

The coalition of people against the measure was pretty wide. The Minister referred to some of them. Rowan Atkinson the comedian, who enjoys enormous support throughout the country, was famously in the forefront of the campaign against it. Academics, journalists, authors, human rights campaigners and many on the Labour Benches expressed concern about the implications of the proposal and the threat that it posed to freedom of expression. It is important to bear in mind that those fears were shared by more than just a narrow group of people.

Christian groups were certainly concerned. Talking to people, I have found a general view—this is anecdotal evidence and I would not claim that it is backed up by some weighty study—that one can insult Christians with complete impunity, but if one insults those of the Muslim faith in particular, the whole world comes down around one. Let me give the Minister an example—the case of the Sikh play, to which the Sikhs understandably took great exception. There was a fracas in Birmingham when the play was put on, and the play was taken off.

By contrast, 60,000 people—I was one of them—complained to the BBC about the Jerry Springer programme, and what happened? Absolutely nothing. They were effectively dismissed. I am writing to Michael Grade to say that if the BBC has taken the view that its commitment to taste and decency was not infringed by the Jerry Springer programme, what is the point of the BBC having a taste and decency requirement in its charter? People feel that there is one rule for one group and another rule for others.

I am sorry that the Minister has accepted the verdict of the country and of the other place slightly less than graciously.

Caroline Flint: I have been listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman. I do not want to discuss the issues raised by the play in Birmingham or the Jerry Springer programme, but I wish to correct the hon. Gentleman. The clause deals not with satire or with taking a view against a religion, but with incitement to hatred against someone on the basis of their religious belief. That would include those of the Christian faith. That is the point. Following the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument, does he believe we should repeal the legislation on incitement to racial hatred?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Lady makes a fair point. It has been the Government's position that those who make genuine criticisms of different faiths have nothing to fear from the measure. Unfortunately, the assurances given by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick) are assurances that he is in no position to deliver. Ministers are in no position to deliver them, either. Once we have enacted the provision, we are in the hands of the authorities.

The Minister says that there is a defence, in so far as the fiat of the Attorney-General is required. We know that the Attorney-General is a political appointee—I am not making a partisan point—and he is subject to the political climate of the day. There are genuine fears, which I share, that freedom of expression could be challenged. My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield was right to point to the fact that there is already legislation that could cover the kind of incitement that none of us would support, and against which we all want action to be taken.

Many people have written to the newspapers and expressed the view that some of the statements from some of the mosques took an awfully long time for the authorities to get to grips with, whereas there was plenty of legislation that could have been invoked to deal with the matter.

1.30 pm

Caroline Flint: Following the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument, I ask him again whether he believes that a future Conservative Government should repeal the legislation on incitement to racial hatred? The same issue applies to that. The wording of this clause is exactly the same as the wording of that legislation. Can he give me one example of the legislation on incitement to racial hatred leading to a clampdown on free speech and discussion about race, or having an adverse effect on comedy or television viewing? My question stands: following the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument, does he believe that the Conservative party should be committed to repealing the legislation on incitement to racial hatred?

Mr. Howarth: Of course we have no intention of repealing the legislation on incitement to racial hatred. The Minister has missed the point. The opposition to her proposals stems from the belief that the Government are using flawed logic. Religion is significantly different from race. The Barnabas Fund, which has written to me—and, I am sure, many other Members—on this point, notes that religion is a choice that affects attitude and behaviour, while race is not and does not. On that note, I rest my case.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: I will not, because other Members wish to make a contribution. I am happy to support the Government in supporting the amendments that were successfully moved in another place.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): This one and a half hour debate is not the time to rehearse the various arguments on the issue. Those arguments have been made many times. I simply make a few remarks on this controversial issue, which has got passions running on all sides.

I have a great deal of sympathy with what the Government have been trying to achieve in these parts of the Bill. Our objections have not been about the end game—what they are trying to achieve—we simply believe that there are better ways to achieve that. We recognise the seriousness of the issue and we recognise that, for many groups, there is a real sensitivity about what are clear attempts to make racial remarks under the cover of religious remarks. There is a gap that needs to be resolved urgently because it is creating tensions in the community. It is an important issue that needs to be addressed, and we welcome the fact that the Government have sought to do so.

Our disagreement with the Government has been that this important set of principles and piece of legislation has been tagged on to a big Bill that considers the way in which we organise police forces in this country. We felt that that was an inappropriate way in which to tackle the issue. Our proposal has always been for an equalities Bill, which would tackle many of these issues with a well thought through piece of legislation that dealt with discrimination, harassment and victimisation.

I hope that in the next three or four weeks we do not have any nonsense from the Government suggesting in certain parts of the country that the Liberal Democrats or the Conservatives have been trying to wreck the Bill and do not want to do anything to tackle the problem of religious hatred. That is not the case. We believe that it is a serious issue that needs addressing. However, it should be done properly and robustly via an equalities Bill, which is a way of addressing the issue more effectively. That is what we will argue in the next four weeks.

Legitimate concerns have been put forward by a number of Members from all parts of the House, and not just by the Rowan Atkinsons of this world, but by organisations such as Liberty and PEN, the writer's organisation. They have raised concerns about the difficult balance between legitimate criticism of a religion and freedom of speech. The issue needs to be addressed, but the way to deal with it, and all the other issues, is not to tag it on to the back of a police Bill but to have a proper, well thought out equalities Bill. That is what we will argue in the next four weeks. The communities that want protection in this area should support an equalities Bill. It would give them the protections that they seek.

Peter Bottomley: I will also upset the Minister by supporting the Government's invitation to us to support the amendment that takes out the clause. She has made some serious points. The Leader of the House and others on the Labour Front Bench ought not to give the impression that they intend to exploit the issue for party political reasons during the next four weeks. Given the list of serious organisations that have doubts about the Bill, whoever is in Government after 5 May should hold an open forum with those groups, and with religious groups, to reach agreement on what is useful and acceptable. I would support what the Minister might have said, which is that the clause does not refer to "Muslims" but treats all religions in the same way. I praise her for that, because it is sensible.

I end my remarks by saying that I welcome the opposition of the community in Worthing to the recent arson attack on the local Islamic centre. I will not say any more because people may be charged. I support the Islamic centre's open evenings that bring people together about once a month. To those Christians who go there to say that they do not agree with us, I say that it is one of the things about having different religions and even different denominations. It is only a few hundred years since we burnt people at the stake for different interpretations of the same book.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 29 to 35 agreed to.

Clause 142

INTERFERENCE WITH CONTRACTUAL RELATIONSHIPS SO AS TO HARM ANIMAL RESEARCH ORGANISATION

Lords amendment: No. 36.

Caroline Flint: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to deal with Lords amendments Nos. 37 to 40, 45, 47 and 80 to 86.

Caroline Flint: The amendments cover three matters. The first is protection of the activities of animal research organisations. Amendments Nos. 36 to 38 relate to the economic damage clauses that we inserted in the Bill on Report in this House.

Amendment No. 36 responds to comments made by the Joint Committee on Human Rights. The amendment narrows the scope of clause 142 by stating specifically that peaceful advocacy of economic actions against companies that are connected to animal research organisations will not trigger an offence. The amendment ensures that an offence can be triggered only by methods of persuasion that are themselves unlawful. That has always been our intention.

Amendments Nos. 37 and 38 extend the list of persons connected to animal research organisations contained in clause 143 to include funders of research. Funding bodies have been targeted for unlawful actions by animal rights extremists, just as have employees, suppliers and customers of animal research organisations. It is right that funders should have the same protection as other persons connected to animal research organisations.

[Caroline Flint]

I now come to the amendments concerned with road traffic offences. The new clauses inserted by amendments Nos. 39 and 40 are imports from the Road Safety Bill, which will sadly not now be enacted in this Session. The new clauses deal with two matters. The new clause inserted by amendment No. 39 enables the police to have access to insurance industry data relating to vehicles whose use is no longer insured. The second new clause permits police to carry out an evidential breath test not only at a police station but at a hospital or at or near a place such as the roadside where a preliminary breath test has been administered. I think that we can all agree that both measures will contribute to road safety. They were welcomed by all parts of the other place.

Finally, amendments Nos. 80 to 86 would allow Scottish Ministers to exercise certain delegated powers in the Private Security Industry Act 2001, following its extension to Scotland. In particular, Scottish Ministers will, after consultation with the Home Secretary, have the power to commence the provisions as they apply to Scotland. Additionally, Scottish Ministers will have the power to designate by order which specific sectors of the private security industry in Scotland are to be licensed and when.

As this is the last group of amendments, I thank my right hon. and hon. Friends and the Front-Bench Conservative spokesmen for their constructive working relationships with us on the Bill. It is an important piece of legislation. It has covered a huge area—serious organised crimes, community support officers, custody officers, money laundering and, importantly, tackling animal rights extremists, an area for which I have had personal responsibility in the Home Office.

As I said, I am disappointed that the measures on incitement to religious hatred are not going forward. I say to the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), who represents the Liberal Democrats, that it is a cop-out to say that we need another piece of legislation to deal with something that, as I said before, uses exactly the same wording and has the same intent as did the legislation on incitement to racial hatred. That said, I commend the amendments to the House and hope that the Bill will be enacted as soon as possible.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: We have reached the final group of amendments, and I am grateful to the Minister for outlining what the amendments seek to do.

We agree that two key clauses have fallen away from the Road Safety Bill, which will not be enacted in this Parliament. The measures to allow the police to secure relevant information from insurance companies and, in particular, to conduct roadside breath tests are important, and they command support on both sides of the House. We are grateful for the assurances in the other place that the police will be properly trained and supported in administering the evidential burdens test.

The provisions on animal rights campaigners were tweaked in Committee, where the Government listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly), who has led for the Conservative party on that issue. Again, we are grateful that the sensible change outlined by the Minister has been made.

Finally, the Minister referred to the extension of the provisions of the Private Security Industry Act 2001 into Scottish legislation, which is an unexceptional measure. I thought that she and I had had our last outing together on the 2001 Act in Westminster Hall on Tuesday, when we debated bouncers and doorkeepers, but we have returned to it right at the end of this Bill.

I agree with the Minister that the provisions setting up SOCA are important. As I said earlier, although the Bill was a bit of a Christmas tree Bill, it has been improved significantly, and its central thrust certainly commands my party's support. SOCA will undoubtedly help to tackle the soaring levels of crime in Britain. However, we need far more than SOCA: we need 40,000 extra policemen and women to police our streets; we need less micro-management from the centre; and we need more local accountability. The Bill does not address those issues, but they will no doubt inform the debate over the next four weeks. I believe that those issues are a compelling argument to vote Conservative on 5 May.

Peter Bottomley: I shall confine my remarks to amendments Nos. 39 and 40, and I am pleased that Viscount Simon took the opportunity to add two welcome measures to the Bill giving powers to the police.

Amendment No. 39 concerns the disclosure of information about the insurance status of vehicles and, by implication, whether a driver is insured to use a particular vehicle. It is a technical change to remove an inhibition, and it is welcome.

There is a problem with insurance companies that we must face and, again, an open discussion is required. The loadings on insurance premiums for young drivers are now so great that I suspect that a number of parents do not add their children to their insurance policies. Both the additional risk, as calculated by the underwriters, and the fact that it is a good idea for young drivers to be nominated to policies are important, but some insurance companies make it so difficult that some young people and some people who have had trouble with the law—I admit to having experienced such trouble—find themselves making the wrong choice of not being covered. People should be covered, but the level of cover is a matter for debate, and we should return to that issue.

Amendment No. 40 concerns the power to require specimens of breath at the roadside or in hospital. It is not vital to know whether this point is covered by this clause or some other provision, or whether the Government are minded to introduce a relevant provision. When I was a junior Minister in the Department for Transport, if a blood sample was taken in hospital from someone who had been injured in a crash for blood matching, and if there were grounds for suspecting that that person had been driving while above the legal limit for alcohol, it was not possible to analyse the blood without the patient's consent—I am not sure whether it was possible to analyse it with the patient's consent—to see whether there was prima facie evidence of an offence having been committed. I hope that the Home Office, the Department for Transport and the Department of Health will examine that issue. Failing to give consent in those circumstances should become an automatic offence, like failing to give a blood sample. Clearly, unconscious patients cannot be asked to give their consent.

1.45 pm

Amendment No. 40 provides for less bureaucracy and less movement of people from the roadside to the police station. It contains sufficient protections to prevent the police from using the power to harass people. I am not saying that the police would often do that, but I know of one case in my constituency in which that happened. Amendment No. 40 will not make the situation worse, and it may make things better. It is good for drivers and good for suspects.

During my three-and-a-half years at the Department for Transport, no motorist ever complained about giving an alcohol or breath test. Some of those motorists were not drinking drivers, in which case the legislation was in their favour. Some were drinking drivers who were below the limit, in which case they had a lucky escape—it was not lucky for us that they were drink-driving. Others were above the limit, in which case there were caught bang to rights.

Amendment No. 40 is not controversial. The measure is welcome, and I am glad that the Government have accepted it.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 37 to 101 agreed to.

Education Bill [Lords]

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

Order for Third Reading read.

1.47 pm

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Twigg): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am delighted to open this afternoon's Third Reading debate on this fourth Session Education Bill. I apologise that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State cannot be with us today. On Second Reading, she set out that improving outcomes for children and learners should be at the heart of everything that our Department does, and that is also at the heart of this Bill. I am pleased that the Bill has met with widespread cross-party support and that it appears likely that it will make it on to the statute book in its entirety.

It was clear from the rate of progress in Committee that the Bill has created a lot of consensus. I thank those Members of this House and the other place who have contributed to the debates on the Bill and parliamentary counsel for the hard work that has gone into bringing the Bill to fruition. I also thank the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) for his excellent chairmanship of the Committee and extend my thanks to the other members of the Committee.

We can look back with pride on the impressive progress by learners, teachers and others working in education in every community. The Bill establishes the framework that we need to take education forward and to continue to improve standards and extend opportunities for every child.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for generously giving way so soon. The Bill misses the point. The real problems with standards generally in education include the bizarre ways of teaching reading that have crept into our schools over the decades and the fact that 60 per cent. of lessons in our comprehensive schools, including core subjects, involve mixed-ability teaching. Politicians from all parties must start to address those kinds of issues if we are to tackle standards in our state schools in this country.

Mr. Twigg: The hon. Gentleman makes the reasonable point that legislation is only one of the ways in which we can raise standards. The role of legislation is important in providing the framework, and Parliament and Government clearly have an important role in providing the resources for schools, but what really makes the difference, as he rightly reminds us, is what actually happens in the classroom. He raised today, as he has on other occasions, the importance of setting. He has also raised the importance of high quality teaching in respect of English in general and reading in particular.

I am pleased to put on the record in the House what I have said elsewhere today—that we welcome today's report by the Select Committee on Education and Skills. The hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) has played an active role in that Committee, particularly in respect of that report, which sets out some challenges for our national literacy strategy. I take those challenges very seriously. If I am in this position in a month's time, I will be very pleased to take them forward, but I am sure that any Minister would try to do the same because they are so important.

[Mr. Twigg]

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): The Minister may have noticed that the national media has given a lot of publicity to the Clackmannanshire experiment. Is he aware that the lady who presents the television clip is my sister-in-law, Ann Doran? She is very enthusiastic about the technique, which is not just a one-off—it has been around for some time and merits investigation by the Department.

Mr. Twigg: I apologise to my hon. Friend because I was not aware that the lady is his sister-in-law. I have looked at some of the work that has been done in respect of Clackmannanshire. The commitment that I gave today is that in responding to the Select Committee report we shall do exactly what my hon. Friend suggests by fully investigating the lessons from Clackmannanshire, particularly to assess any differences between what is happening there and our own literacy strategy, and whether any appropriate revisions and improvements might be required as a consequence.

The Bill is the cornerstone of the new relationship with schools and furthers the ambitions that we set out last year in our five-year strategy for education. Through its provisions, we want to ensure that inspection is not a burden but a positive exercise in raising standards and identifying best practice; that there is greater emphasis on quality and accountability, both of schools to their parents and communities and of the chief inspector of schools to all those involved in education; that a skilled and valued professional work force are given the development and support that they need to achieve improved outcomes for all pupils; that schools should have stability and certainty about the resources available to them through three-year budgets that help them to plan strategically and give them the scope to make better and more flexible use of the record levels of investment in education; that schools are freed from unnecessary burdens, for example through the removal of the statutory annual parents' meeting and governors' annual report, alongside the streamlining of data collection on the school work force; that we promote a more mature relationship between schools, parents and communities; and for Wales, that the National Assembly can take forward its programme for high quality education and learning as set out in its 10-year strategy, "The Learning Country".

Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): While I am very sympathetic to what my hon. Friend is trying to achieve, can he assure me that the increased autonomy of schools will not cut across the necessary co-ordination that we have highlighted in previous legislation such as the Children Act 2004, whereby local authorities, schools and other authorities all have to work together?

Mr. Twigg: I thank my right hon. Friend, who refers to an issue that was very much part of the debate in the other place and in Committee. We want to ensure that while we promote the autonomy of schools we also encourage them not only to work with each other but, as she rightly says, to work with other agencies that are concerned with the needs of children and young people. It is vital that we as a Department, local government, schools themselves and Ofsted—about which the Bill talks a great deal—ensure that there is coherence between the emphasis on autonomy and the emphasis on high standards, collaboration and real accountability.

The Bill builds on the improvements across our schools system since 1997. It sets the stage for a mature new relationship between the Government and schools whereby schools have the freedom to drive their own improvement, and looks forward to a new era in which we can realise our shared ambition to secure high quality learning and opportunity for all learners. I am very pleased to commend it to the House.

1.54 pm

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): We did not oppose the Bill on Second Reading and we do not propose to do so today. In fact, it is difficult to oppose a Bill that re-enacts so much of the legislation on school inspections that the last Conservative Government introduced in the first place. We support the move to a lighter-touch inspection regime that the Minister outlined; he is right to reduce the burden of inspection visits on schools as well as to increase their frequency where required. Several head teachers to whom I have spoken have welcomed those changes, as well the move to a shorter notice period heralding the start of an inspection.

As I said, we will not oppose the Bill. I suspect, however, that the Liberal Democrats will do so, as they have expressed only recently their commitment to abolishing Ofsted and being soft on school standards—a retrograde step that would let down many of the parents who want to see standards raised.

We support the move to three-year budgeting, which gives welcome stability to schools. Many head teachers are looking forward to the consistency that it will provide. We also support measures to improve the training of school staff. The fact that more and more schools are using teaching assistants to provide support in classrooms means that the role of the Teacher Training Agency should be reviewed and widened to include that.

I commend the work that my noble Friends Lord Hanningfield and Baroness Morris did in the other place to strengthen protection for rural schools faced with the threat of closure and to enhance the consultation process surrounding the closure of special schools, too many of which have been closed, putting at risk, in the eyes of parents, the choice that they have for their children with special educational needs. Conservative Members are committed to introducing a moratorium on the closure of special schools after the general election to give parents of children with special educational needs a real choice when it comes to the education of their children.

There are gaps in the Bill. We would have liked more action to increase parental choice of schools, and more action to restore school discipline—an important issue for teachers, pupils and parents alike. There is nothing in the Bill to tackle the problems identified in today's highly critical Select Committee report on the teaching of reading. That was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), who has consistently championed the use of phonics; indeed, he has raised it in the House twice this week. When the Government respond to the report it will be interesting to see how they embrace that. Having looked at the research from the Clackmannanshire study, I understand that phonics can make a huge contribution to the teaching of reading in our schools. It is not right to say that the national literacy strategy places as much emphasis on phonics as the Clackmannanshire approach, and we need to ensure that the strategy reflects best practice so that all children can benefit from methods such as synthetics phonics. We must tackle the fact that one in five children leaves primary school without being able to read to the required level of ability. That impairs and hinders their progress in secondary school and throughout the rest of their lives.

As I said, there are big gaps in the Bill. The Secretary of State for Education and Skills, who is now in her place, leaves a full in-tray, and there will be much for her successor to tackle on 6 May.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I apologise to the House for arriving a little late and missing the first couple of minutes of the debate. I am unfamiliar with the hectic pace of legislation at this stage of parliamentary proceedings, being more used to the sedentary pace that we normally have.

Having said that, speed has characterised the passage of the Bill. I was appointed to the Standing Committee expecting to take over after its first sitting, but when I arrived at the end to get my orders for the second day I found that the Bill had gone through in a single day. That reflects the fact that if legislation is sometimes revolutionary, this Bill certainly could not be so characterised—indeed, it is rather more evolutionary.

We shall decline the invitation of the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) to vote against the Bill, on the ground that he explained: it creates a lighter-touch inspection regime for Ofsted. It would be illogical for a party that is genuinely concerned about bureaucratic burdens on schools and the potential intrusiveness of the inspection system to vote against a measure that makes it slightly less burdensome. We therefore do not intend to vote against the Bill.

I want to put down a marker about schools' organisation, with which the Bill deals. We do not know how it will work in practice but, at this time of year, when allocations to individual schools begin to arrive on parents' doormats, I am sure that all hon. Members receive letters expressing concerns. There is a fundamental problem with the rhetoric that all the parties have been using in recent years, whereby they promote the notion of parental choice while regimes to remove surplus places continue to exist. There is a fundamental inconsistency in those positions because choice requires the availability of a certain amount of capacity to satisfy it. In the Bill, the Government take on centrally more of the burden of determining some of those difficult issues. They will remain difficult, and the regulations and subsequent detail that are relevant to the problem that I outlined will be important in the forthcoming Parliament and to Ministers, from whichever party they come.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Crossrail Bill (Carry Over)

2.1 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): I beg to move,

That further proceedings on the Crossrail Bill shall be suspended until the next Session of Parliament.

That if a Bill is presented in the next Session in the same terms as the Crossrail Bill when it was presented in this Session—

(a) the Bill shall be ordered to be printed and shall be deemed to have been read the first time; and

(b) the Standing Orders of the House applicable to the Bill, so far as complied with or dispensed with in this Session, shall be deemed to have been complied with or (as the case may be) dispensed with in the next Session;

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.

I believe that people realise that Crossrail is a project of national, not only regional, significance. The strategic transport improvements that it brings will be experienced across the country and the scheme will be a catalyst for safeguarding a national economy that is strongly related to the performance of our capital city.

Today, I simply wish to dwell on the parliamentary procedures of the carry-over motion rather than the detail and substance of the Bill. However, I shall say a few more introductory words. In transport benefits, Crossrail will enable better access to the capital for the hundreds of thousands of workers who commute into London every day. It will provide strategic interchanges for local, national and international business and leisure travellers. In economic benefits, London plays a major role in supporting regional economies and jobs, through commuting, product and service purchases, fiscal transfer and economic activity.

The Bill was introduced on 22 February, and has subsequently been through several essentially procedural steps. When the Bill was deposited, it was supported by a regulatory impact assessment, a race equality impact assessment, a book of reference, an estimate of costs, an environmental statement and a non-technical summary of that statement, parliamentary plans and sections, a European Court of Human Rights statement, a housing statement and explanatory notes. Some 4,600 landowners notices were served and approximately 400 street and footpath notices were put up. The environmental statement comprises some 3,700 pages and nine volumes and is supported by a further 14,000 pages of specialist technical reports. The book of reference contains more than 5,000 entries, which would need to be re-checked if the Bill had to be deposited again because the book of reference must be no more than 28 days old at the time of deposit.

The scheme as defined by the Bill, including the parliamentary plans and sections, a schedule of works and so on, represents the culmination of the best part of four years of work by Cross London Rail Links, which employs around 100 staff and 90 consultants. For those who are interested in such data, around 14 tonnes of material were distributed to 140 different locations to meet the requirements of Standing Orders, which include ensuring that documents are available for public inspection locally. Notices were also published to advertise the introduction of the Bill twice in the weeks of 21 February and 28 February in The Times, Evening Standard and 18 local newspapers along the route.

[Mr. Tony McNulty]

The Bill was deposited and secured its First Reading, during which the whole route was safeguarded. Subsequently, because it had already been consulted on but was not part of the final declared route, the Abbeywood to Ebbsfleet route was also safeguarded. On 10 March, examiners—Clerks of the House who check compliance with Standing Orders—looked at the Bill, took evidence that notices had been served, documents deposited and advertisements made. They received no objections but they reported that the Bill had failed to meet Standing Orders relating to the time of deposit and notices.

On 17 March, the Commons Standing Orders Committee met to consider the examiners' report and hear from the Government's agent why it was desirable, especially to minimise the period of uncertainty for those affected by the works, for the Bill to proceed as soon as possible despite the fact that it had not fulfilled the Standing Orders. The Committee decided to dispense with Standing Orders on timing, thus allowing the Bill to proceed. A similar procedure was undertaken in the other place by its Standing Orders Committee on 22 March.

The purpose of the motion is simply to ensure that the Bill can be carried over for consideration in the next Parliament and that all the work that I have described and that has been done thus far is not wasted. Carrying a Bill over an election is feasible and, indeed, precedented for a hybrid Bill. There will be no curtailing of appropriate scrutiny. There will be the usual opportunities for hon. Members to debate the principle of the Bill on Second Reading, and for their constituents to be heard in front of a Select Committee composed of hon. Members of this House, and subsequently in a Select Committee of the other place. The Select Committee will sit in a quasi-judicial capacity and have the opportunity to hear a range of submissions in considering petitions against the Bill.

If the Bill is not carried over, despite the cross-party support and that of the overwhelming majority of the business community in London, which has been vocal and forthcoming in its backing for the project, we would have to redo all that I described—for example, serving approximately 5,000 landowners with notices, advertising in the press and updating all the documents required at the time of deposit, thus doing again all the referencing to check everything that is entailed. Whatever people feel about the merits of the project, I do not believe that anyone is especially wedded to the notion that, purely because of the interruption—for want of a better word—of an election, the Bill should not be carried over and presented for Second Reading at the earliest opportunity. Several people are directly affected by the Bill and it would not be good public policy to make them undergo all those processes again and suffer the subsequent uncertainty.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): The Minister knows that I support the Bill and the carry-over motion. Can he offer us some hope that the Bill will be introduced quickly in the new Parliament?

Mr. McNulty: That point is central to carrying over a Bill. It will be reintroduced at the earliest opportunity after the interruption of an election. I hope that I can say that with confidence, given the support throughout the House for the measure. I shall be candid and say that, of course, there is the little matter of the £10 billion price tag that comes with it, and a good deal of continuing work needs to be done to ascertain how the costs will be apportioned, but I assure my hon. Friend that we fully intend to present the Bill for its Second Reading and subsequent stages at the earliest opportunity. Given all the momentum and the widespread support that the project commands in London and beyond, in both Houses and the business community, and, not least, the impact on those who could be affected by the process, the sooner we move, post election, to Second Reading, the better.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend mentioned those who will be affected. Three stations and the loop will be affected in my constituency. Clearly, I have many constituents who will be subjected to some uncertainties if there are undue delays. I therefore urge my hon. Friend not only to press for Second Reading as soon as possible, but to expedite the whole process so that there is no undue delay and uncertainty for my constituents.

Mr. McNulty: I can give my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) the same assurance that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn): we fully intend to bring the Bill back as early as possible, should the interruption to which I referred have the outcome that we anticipate. Even if it does not, however, I am confident that whichever party forms the next Government will seek to bring these measures forward, because everyone has said that they understand the importance of the project for the capital and for the capital's contribution to the wider national economy. So, for the reasons that I have outlined, I commend the order to the House.

2.10 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for introducing the motion in the way he has. He used rose-tinted language designed to give the impression that the Government were engaged in frenetic activity on the Crossrail project. He even used the expression "secure the First Reading", as though that were a really burdensome hurdle to overcome, when we all know that it is the most formal part of parliamentary procedure.

The reality of the Bill and the carry-over motion before us is best encapsulated in a short piece in today's Evening Standard under the by-line of Ross Lydall, its local government correspondent. It says:

"One of the scheme's main backers has revealed growing frustration with the lack of progress and Government cash. Bob Kiley, London's transport commissioner, said: 'We are where we have always been from the beginning, which is nowhere.' Crossrail dates from 1989 and would involve digging a twin-bore tunnel between Paddington and Whitechapel, with new stations along Oxford Street. It remains a project that everybody wants but no government will pay for. Mr. Kiley said Crossrail was costed at £10.2 billion in 2002"— which the Minister mentioned again today—

"but since then construction costs had risen two-and-a-half times faster than inflation."

It is salutary to remind ourselves that the last time the House carried over a hybrid Bill from one Parliament to another was when we were dealing with the Channel Tunnel Bill, another project that was not exactly renowned for its sound financial footing.

Jeremy Corbyn: I think that the Member has been misled. The last Bill to be carried over was the obnoxious City of London (Ward Elections) Bill, which we did so much to try to defeat. Will he give us some idea of his proposals for Crossrail? If we do not carry over the Bill, we shall have no project. The Bill is the basis of the project. I was hoping that he was going to say that he supported the carry-over and the expenditure on the development of Crossrail. Perhaps he could get to the point.

Mr. Chope: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, he is right to say that the last Bill to be carried over was the City of London (Ward Elections) Bill, but that was a private Bill, not a hybrid Bill. The point that I was making was that this would the first hybrid Bill to be carried over since the Channel Tunnel Bill. The hon. Gentleman also asked me to make a commitment to the Crossrail project, but no serious prospective Government—such as we are—would be prepared to write a blank cheque for any project, however desirable people might think it is. If the hon. Gentleman is seeking a blank cheque from me today for the Crossrail project, I am afraid that he is going to be disappointed, just as he will have been disappointed by the failure of his own Government to provide one. The Minister talked about this being a £10 billion project, but we know that it is already projected to be much more expensive.

We are not against the principle of a carry-over, because the whole essence of Conservative party policy is to ensure that we get good value for money. After all the work that has been done on the technical documentation, there would be no point in having to get it all replicated just for the sake of it. However, we must face up to the reality that the Bill has not yet been debated in the House. It was brought in at the tail end of this Government's term of office, and what the Minister has said cannot be regarded as a substitute for activity. There has been a notorious lack of activity by the Government in relation to this issue.

2.14 pm

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): I was a candidate for parliamentary election in 1996. As a resident of Reading, I was angry and upset when a Bill dealing with the previous version of Crossrail failed. It fell for procedural reasons that we all understand. As a candidate, however, I was quite joyful at the opportunity that that presented. I would suggest to hon. Members who will be seeking re-election in the coming weeks—not including myself—that matters that cause them grief could also cause them joy as a candidate.

Since my election in 1997, I have spoken up for Crossrail, and for Reading to be its western terminus, at every opportunity. So the publication and First Reading of the Crossrail Bill in February were very welcome, and I strongly support this motion, which would allow it to be carried over into the next Parliament. Of course I am sorry that I will not be here to carry on the fight for Crossrail, and for it to come to Reading, but I hope that the people of Reading and Woodley, in my constituency, will keep up the pressure to make sure that whichever man replaces me continues to work for Crossrail, and that it comes to Reading.

I would like to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North (Linda Perham) for her persistence in fighting for Crossrail, and for her work towards making the scheme happen, and to other hon. Members who represent constituencies on the fringe of London and just beyond.

While I am happy to support this motion to allow the scheme to go forward, I remain unhappy that Maidenhead is Crossrail's proposed western terminus. Since that decision was announced, I have talked to numerous people, organisations and industry bodies, and no one can understand it. One argument is that it would cost £300 million to electrify the stretch of track between Maidenhead and Reading, but that would be negligible given the estimated cost of £10 billion for the scheme. It has also been said that Cross London Rail Links Ltd was worried that it would be left with the cost of re-signalling Reading station, yet talks with representatives of Network Rail reveal that the scheme is in the budget for before the date of completion of Crossrail. The money is there, and the only money that Crossrail would be expected to pay would be for anything extra needed solely for Crossrail.

It has also been said that Crossrail is not coming to Reading because the company is worried about being left with the cost of upgrading Reading station. Yet a recent answer from the Minister of State, Department for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty), stated:

> "The Strategic Rail Authority has considered possible upgrade options for Reading station, but is not in a position to undertake further development of this scheme within its currently funded investment programme."—[Official Report, 12 January 2005; Vol. 429, c. 575W.]

So there is nothing for Crossrail to worry about on that score.

I am bewildered as to the real reason for Crossrail not going to Reading. I fail to understand why it is not in the interest of the scheme to gain access to the interchange at Reading, feeding into services to the midlands, Wales and the south-west. Why does Crossrail not want to gain all the revenue from commuters travelling from Reading to the City of London, for whom this would still be a better service than going into Paddington and changing, either to the underground or to Crossrail itself? It is well known in transport circles that the fewer changes people have to make, the more likely they are to use public transport. Why make the journey more difficult for people than is necessary?

I recognise that people who have travelled long distances from areas significantly to the west of London are more likely to carry on into Paddington and transfer there, as they do now. I am sure, however, that there are many more in between who would come to Reading and transfer to Crossrail for the direct route into London and across to the Eurostar services that we shall soon have at Stratford. That will not happen if Maidenhead is Crossrail's western terminus.

It is even more disappointing because Reading people will lose out if the scheme does not come to Reading. Slots currently available to trains from Reading to the stations between Reading and Paddington will be lost, so as to provide services for Crossrail. Even more worrying are the recent reports in Rail Freight Group News—a well respected publication—that the Bill will allow Crossrail exclusive use of the two slow lines from Maidenhead to Paddington, leaving the InterCity 125, Virgin Rail, other slower passenger services and freight to operate on the fast lines—

[Jane Griffiths]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. What is worrying me is that the hon. Lady is now going a little too deeply into the contents of the Bill. We are debating a carry-over motion. I acknowledge that there can be some reference to the Bill in connection with the arguments for carry over or otherwise, but we cannot have a pseudo-Second Reading speech.

Jane Griffiths: I stand corrected, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall conclude my remarks. I support the carry-over motion and I hope that whoever succeeds me in this Chamber in the next Parliament works as hard as I have tried to do, and as my hon. Friends and other hon. Members have done, for Crossrail.

This is my last contribution in the House and I would like to thank Members on both sides of the Chamber for their friendship and support.

2.20 pm

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): May I confirm the support for the motion of those on the Liberal Democrat Benches? The Minister mentioned the widespread support throughout London for the Crossrail project, particularly in the business community and elsewhere. This is an important scheme for the economic development of London, but it has already suffered from too many delays, not least under the last Government. Its progress should not be impeded at this stage; it is important that it should be carried forward.

In the House and elsewhere, particularly in the Greater London assembly, the Liberal Democrats have supported the principle for Crossrail. We are committed to it and we are pleased, therefore, that the Government intend to go ahead in the next Parliament. I hope they do so expeditiously.

Notwithstanding our support, there are areas of concern, although today is not the day for that debate, as you have rightly said, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should highlight one or two key issues, such as the funding package, getting an early start to the core section, whether Crossrail should be a discrete railway and the need for serious consideration of links between Stansted and Heathrow, as well as links further west, which the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) mentioned. We should also examine the problem of trains coming up from the west country sharing the railway.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I strongly support the procedure of carry over. As the Minister will know, there was all-party support in the Modernisation Committee for it, in precisely the circumstances that are before the House this afternoon.

Can my hon. Friend give any indication, or has the Minister given him any indication, as to whether the capacity problem at Paddington will be addressed? One advantage of the carry over is that we will have more time to consider the issue. As things stand, there is already a capacity problem for lines and platforms, and, as my hon. Friend has already said, this could dramatically affect the mainline services from Cornwall and the far west.

John Thurso: My hon. Friend raises one of the problems that I hope will be discussed in detail during the passage of the Bill. I am sure the Minister has noted those concerns, which I share. All those issues need to be dealt with during consideration of the Bill, but today it is important that the carry-over motion be passed. I shall certainly support it.

2.24 pm

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I support the carry-over motion, very straightforwardly, because if it is not passed a number of companies in my constituency will face further prolongation of the blight on the development of their operations. To name just two, Leemark Engineering and HG Timber have been told that Crossrail will be taking some of their land, which will prevent them from implementing their expansion plans, and therefore prevent them from increasing employment among my constituents. Any further delay will not only prevent the future planning of their businesses, but have an overall impact on the confidence in my constituency in relation to future investment by businesses.

The carry-over motion is important and I support it, but it is more important that we bring the Bill forward very quickly after the election. In addition, we must bring it forward with guaranteed security of funding. We cannot allow this to remain as speculation. In that case, many of us will campaign during the general election to secure that commitment from the Government. After getting on for 20 years of discussion of Crossrail, we cannot again allow the issue to continue to blight the lives of many of our constituents.

2.25 pm

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): May I first say a few words about the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths)? She said that this is her swansong in the House. I am a Reading boy, and I narrowly missed the Conservative nomination for Reading, East in 1997. I would have ended up being the losing candidate against her, so it is probably just as well that things worked out as they did. She has been a fine servant to the House.

May I also say a few words about the hon. Member for Ilford, North (Linda Perham), who may or may not return to the House? That may apply to me; I am taking nothing for granted in this election. She has played a tremendous role in the all-party group on Crossrail, but I want to pay a personal tribute to her. I am a London Member of Parliament and we have worked and spoken together on a number of issues. We are in the middle of an election campaign, but I know that her Conservative opponent, Lee Scott, is an extremely strong admirer of all the work she does. The people of Ilford, North have been well served over the last eight years, and I hope they continue to be well served—perhaps under different colours—in the years ahead.

Like other Members, I support the carry-over motion, and I support Crossrail very firmly. There is little doubt that it is essential to London's future competitiveness and growth. In many ways, the biggest threat to the competitiveness of the capital is our transport system. All business regards this as the single most important issue that faces London and it is important that we have proper investment of the £10 billion, and rising, across London's transport system over the next few years. Obviously, Crossrail should be part and parcel of that.

I endorse the words of the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell), who is absolutely right that we need to get the funding together, but we must ask, "Where is the money?" On one level, one might say that it is the height of political cynicism for the Government to have talked the project up in the way that they have in the last year or so. They have talked about the green light being given to Crossrail when little more than a flickering amber light has been given.

I accept that my party pulled the plug on the project over a decade ago when we were in government, but equally, here we are just before a general election, desperately in need of this investment. It is of national, and indeed international, importance that London and the London region have that investment. The Government must lead the way with their financing, because we cannot carry on taking London's continued economic success for granted.

If I may, I shall finish with a few words on some local concerns over the route. In Mayfair, for example, there is a grave concern that, although three routes were proposed, the Government seem to be running with a consortium with a single route only. I would like to know why other routes were not considered in more detail. I hope that we will have an opportunity on Second Reading, after the election, to explore this a great deal further. There is little doubt, particularly without the finance being in place, that there is a blight on many tens of thousands of my constituents in Westminster, and I suspect on hundreds of thousands of constituents in London and beyond. The same applies to parts of Bayswater and the City of London.

I support the carry-over motion, not least, as the Minister rightly pointed out, owing to the fact that the cost of petitions and all the preliminary work would be wasted if we had to revisit all this. I hope that on Second Reading we shall have a robust debate about the management of the issue and of the route, because the uncertainty is the worst thing for the ongoing blight that affects not only the residential population, but the businesses on which we rely in this country.

2.28 pm

Linda Perham (Ilford, North) (Lab): Today's carry-over motion is vital, because it will allow the Crossrail Bill to be suspended until the new Parliament commences. I cannot overemphasise the importance of ensuring that this momentum is maintained and that Second Reading take place as soon as possible in the new Session.

I commend the support that the Crossrail project has throughout the country and throughout the House, as well as in the business community, which is also anxious that the project go ahead and that the motion allow us not to lose any time with the project going forward.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) for her support for the project and her kind words. I also thank the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) for his kind words about my role as chair of the all-party Crossrail group. We have worked hard to support the project, and all the group's members support the carry-over motion.

Everyone knows about Crossrail's benefits for London—they have been well rehearsed. It is essential that the project go forward because of the contribution it will make to the economy, adding £19 billion to the UK's GDP and creating 120,000 jobs in London alone. In addition, the 13 construction contracts are worth about £300 million each. The benefits to east London are also well known. Those of us who represent that part of London believe that the area needs more investment and regeneration.

Hon. Members have asked about funding and the Minister mentioned the £10 billion price tag. Finance and funding are matters that carrying over the Bill will allow us to address in the new Parliament, and I am sure that those issues will be discussed and ironed out come the summer. However, questions about funding should not take priority over passing the carry-over motion.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) said, we hope that Second Reading will be scheduled to take place as soon as possible after in the new Parliament. I am sure that the Minister supports our aim of getting the usual channels to allow that to happen.

2.31 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): It will not have escaped your attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I am the only Member seeking to catch your eye who does not represent a London or south-east constituency. I have a confession to make: I woke up to Crossrail a bit too late, although I have always supported the project in principle. I remind the House that there is nothing new about Crossrail: the first such services operated in about 1850, when trains on the Great Western main line went through to Farringdon on what are now the Metropolitan and Circle lines. Sadly we lost the service at some point in the late 19th century—

Mr. McNulty: Liberal cuts.

Mr. Luff: I think it predates that. However, there is nothing new about Crossrail, which is a thoroughly good idea in principle. The trouble is that the proposal is not only about London. That is why the carry-over motion must be carefully considered. Is this the right Bill to carry over?

In principle, I entirely buy into improving London transport services. As one who spends most of his working life in London, I can see the need to do that.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): My hon. Friend says that he buys into that, but no one else has.

Mr. Luff: My right hon. Friend takes me to task for my characteristically lax use of language—something of which he is never guilty—and makes a powerful point about the problems that have been highlighted during this debate. I concur with him on that point.

The Bill as drafted has several drawbacks and I am not at all sure that it is the right Bill to carry over. The first drawback is that it appears to give a lot of power to the Mayor of London. I understand that, earlier today, as part of the deal done on the Railways Bill, some of the powers that that Bill would have given the Mayor were removed. I am not sure that services running to the west of London, which will have a serious impact on the Great Western main line, should be handed into the power of the Mayor of London.

Secondly, I am concerned about the Bill's long title, which states that the Bill is to "Make provision for a railway transport system running from Maidenhead".

I like Maidenhead a lot. My family has strong links with the town and my great-great-great-great uncle was mayor of Maidenhead in the 18th century, so I am delighted that it is to have a wonderful new railway service—but that service should go to Reading, as the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) said. At this point, may I say that I agree with everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) said about the hon. Lady? I wish her every happiness in the future. She has been a fine Member of Parliament and has made a fine contribution to our proceedings. She will be sorely missed.

Jeremy Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Luff: Yes, but not on that point, I hope.

Jeremy Corbyn: The Worcester-Maidenhead axis is interesting, but does the hon. Gentleman accept that even the people of Worcester would benefit from a Crossrail connection, which would mean that trains could go under London and people would not have to change services? Everyone would be helped if there were a new railway line that everyone could use.

Mr. Luff: Sadly, the hon. Gentleman is absolutely wrong. He draws me on to the constituency point I wish to raise in connection with the Bill and the reason why I have reservations about carrying it over. It was alluded to by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) in what will probably be his last intervention as a Member of Parliament. He is an old friend of mine—I was his boss once and he mine, and we go back a long way. It therefore grieves me to have to draw the House's attention to the fact that he was slightly wrong. In fact, although the Bill as drafted will increase track and platform capacity at Paddington station, it will reduce capacity on the lines into Paddington. That is the crucial point.

I am working hard to improve services from my constituency to London on the Great Western and Cotswold lines. I want an hourly Adelante service instead of the present rather patchy service. I think that the Bill that we are being invited to carry over will result in the two relief lines—those on the left going to London—being devoted exclusively to Crossrail services, leaving only the two existing main lines to and from Paddington for all the other railway services out of Paddington. I am therefore seriously concerned that, if we carry it over, the Bill will frustrate the ambitions of my constituents—and those of the Clerk at the Table, who is a Hereford man and would therefore benefit from improved services through to Herefordshire. I think he missed that observation, but I am sure he will read it in Hansard tomorrow.

The regulatory impact assessment for the Bill—I am grateful to the official who e-mailed it to me this morning—is focused entirely on the benefits to London. Yes, there are benefits to London, but the document contains no assessment of the impact on services beyond London. That worries me greatly.

Mr. Tyler: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Linda Perham: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Luff: I was hoping to draw my remarks to a conclusion, but I shall give way first to my—for the present purposes—hon. Friend.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to make another intervention. Does he not agree that carrying over the Bill creates the opportunity for the concerns that he and I have expressed this afternoon to be properly examined, unlike the alternative of pushing it though at speed today?

Mr. Luff: That is a very good point. My concern about that suggestion is that the Bill refers specifically to Maidenhead and those who know the workings of the railway services between London, Reading and the west know that Maidenhead is a very odd place to terminate services and that making it the terminus could have serious implications for the management of the railways. Although I support Crossrail in principle, I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure me that the Bill, even as drafted, does not preclude an extension of Crossrail services to Reading, which is what one of the consortiums—Superlink, I believe—proposes.

Linda Perham: I know that the hon. Gentleman is focusing on constituency concerns, but does he accept that if the Bill is not carried over, we lose the opportunity to make progress on the project, which has already been delayed? In addition, will he consider London's position as an international financial centre and the benefits that flow from it? If Crossrail is not implemented, the future of London and the UK economy will be seriously threatened.

Mr. Luff: I am extremely conscious, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that if I respond fully to the interventions, I shall be in danger of making a Second Reading speech, whereas I wanted to explain briefly why I had reservations about the Bill being carried over. To be honest, I think it should be carried over—

Mr. Forth: Why?

Mr. Luff: Because I am a reasonable man. If I receive the reassurances I seek, I think that, for the reasons just given by the hon. Member for Ilford, North (Linda Perham), we should accede to the motion.

Mr. McNulty: Bearing in mind that I might not have a chance to respond to the debate, let me say that Cross London Rail Links, which came up with the original business case, suggested Maidenhead and all the consultation was done on that basis. Not least because of the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths), we looked at the virtues of a Maidenhead-Reading route, but we were unable to do that because by that time the route had almost been locked down to the existing one. However, we have said since the Bill was published that we will consult on safeguarding the Maidenhead-Reading route, perhaps as a prelude to including it when the Bill has passed. The issue therefore remains live, not least because of my hon. Friend's endeavours.

Mr. Luff: That is a genuinely helpful intervention, and I shall conclude very shortly, as I appreciate what the Minister has said. However, if the carry-over is agreed today—that will obviously happen—the Committee that considers the Bill must look carefully at capacity issues for the west country, Wales, Oxfordshire, Wales, Worcestershire and Herefordshire. I fear that trying to fit all the freight and passenger services into those two railway lines could have serious consequences. The significant sums that the railway would cost would be better spent on other enhancements to the rail network, such as upgrading the entire line to the west country and Cornwall, a sadly neglected corner in the economic development of our nation. That is certainly the view of the west London branch of Friends of the Earth.

In conclusion, if the Bill is carried over, we must be careful not to carry over a measure that could undermine significantly the transport interests of my constituents and many other people to the west of London.

2.40 pm

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): I support Crossrail and the carry-over of the Bill. We in the east end of London have long looked forward to the completion of Crossrail, which will do an enormous amount for regeneration and job creation in our area. We have had to wait 15 years or more, and we do not want any more undue delay. Even today, we can read on the front pages of London's local papers news of a serious drive-by shooting that affected the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy). The jobs and regeneration that Crossrail will bring will be important in the fight against crime and social alienation.

I congratulate my colleague, the Mayor of London, on fighting a hard campaign to bring Crossrail into existence. I join hon. Members who have urged us to support the carry-over motion and to introduce the Bill early in the next Parliament along with concrete proposals for funding the line. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) on her last speech in this Parliament. She entered the House in the great landslide of 1997 and, although she is stepping down at the election, she has played her part in ensuring that we will win an historic third term. Finally, I would like the Bill to be carried over and speedy progress to be made on Crossrail because the next step is Crossrail 2, which will enable people to travel in splendour from the historic delights of Dalston all the way to Chelsea.

2.41 pm

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Like other hon. Members, I shall be brief in my support for the carry-over motion, which is essential if we are to make rapid progress in the next Parliament on securing funding for the scheme. To some extent, I agree with hon. Members that, while the Bill is important in putting such provisions into law, we also need an agreement on funding and the cost of the project. Costs are already high. If Mr. Kiley's figure are correct, they are already £14 billion to £15 billion. By the time Crossrail is built, they will be considerably more, because inflation will have increased. We therefore need an agreement on funding and, like many other candidates in the election, I support the scheme and the funding that it requires.

May I draw the Minister's attention to the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) about blight compensation? The line does not go through my constituency, and impinges only on the southern part of my borough but, because it is a massive scheme, it has an impact on everyone in London and could lead to incredible improvements in transport infrastructure. However, blight is a huge factor in long-term planning issues. Businesses and landowners around Heathrow terminal 5 have been given blight compensation from the beginning of that scheme. Unfortunately, people in the path of the Crossrail development, even if they support it, will not have their land purchased under compulsory purchase orders and will not receive compensation in the period in which it fails to go ahead. The planning process would be encouraged if blight compensation were paid from the beginning of such schemes, as that would provide an incentive for promoters, whether in the public or private sector, to develop them as quickly as possible.

John McDonnell: To clarify the point about the development of the third runway at Heathrow and other airport expansion schemes, the proposals for the blight compensation scheme are currently subject to consultation and discussion. However, my hon. Friend is correct that there is a legal duty on the British Airports Authority, working with the Government, to offer blight compensation, which could readily be transferred to other schemes to provide security for long-term planning processes.

Jeremy Corbyn: I endorse my hon. Friend's clarification, and thank him for it. I hope that the Minister has heard what we are saying and recognises that, while supporters of Crossrail want it to proceed to completion, we also want to ensure that the blight problem does not go on forever.

I have no concerns about the involvement of the Greater London authority and the Mayor and London. Quite the opposite—I have every confidence in them, because the devolution of planning and transport matters means that they should have that involvement and planning power. Without the effective voice for London that is projected by the Mayor and the Assembly, schemes such as Crossrail would be a lot further behind.

[Jeremy Corbyn]

Ms Abbott: Does my hon. Friend agree that far from being concerned about the Mayor's involvement in the scheme, we should accept that that involvement gives rise to confidence? People should not quibble about his involvement, as he should have greater powers, particularly over transport in the south-east of England.

Jeremy Corbyn: I could not agree more. If people had listened to the Mayor of London about the regeneration of the tube, we would have a bond issue rather than a public-private partnership and a great deal of public money would have been saved. I think that everybody now accepts that, and I hope that Crossrail can be similarly funded, as that will turn out to be a great deal cheaper.

The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) made some legitimate points about the rail network beyond London and the impact of Crossrail. Clearly, the constrictions on the Paddington line require a great deal of examination—that is a perfectly fair and reasonable point. He will accept, however, that by developing Crossrail we encourage overall rail traffic usage, which has a knock-on effect on the rest of the system. I am sure that he will join me in wanting to secure both the reopening of the line between Worcester and Cheltenham and the twin-tracking of the Honeybourne line through the Cotswolds.

Mr. Luff: I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of my constituency. The line between Worcester and Cheltenham is already open, but he is right about the twin tracking. I agree that Crossrail will make travel in the south-east more attractive, and even more people will travel from the areas served at present by Paddington beyond Reading. We must therefore make sure that capacity issues are thoroughly addressed on the Great Western main line.

Jeremy Corbyn: It is only the one-hour limit on our debate and the imminent dissolution of Parliament that prevents me from talking at greater length about the number of disused lines around the country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not only the imminent dissolution of Parliament. The Chair has a certain interest in applying the Standing Orders.

Jeremy Corbyn: I am tempted to discuss disused lines in a wider sense, but I accept the point that you are making, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The subject will have to wait for another day.

I strongly support the carry-over motion. I hope that it is agreed—I am sure that it will be—and that we secure the money for the line, leading to the continued regeneration and renaissance of the rail network.

In conclusion, it is only fitting that I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North (Linda Perham) for her effective lobbying on Crossrail in the House, the Labour party and many other groups, including the trade union network, in which she and I are both active. I thank, too, my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths), who has just made her last speech in the House. She has been a great campaigner for improvements to public transport and rail connections to Reading, and we should acknowledge that.

2.48 pm

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): May I begin by paying tribute to Members who have campaigned for many years for Crossrail, particularly my colleague, friend and neighbour, the hon. Member for Ilford, North (Linda Perham)? I first came to the House in 1992, and as a prospective candidate I remember producing leaflets in 1990 calling for the introduction of Crossrail. I put questions to a succession of Ministers from different Governments from 1992 onwards, but I did not get very far.

I am therefore delighted by the opportunity now afforded us. There was an exhibition in the centre of Ilford a few weeks ago allowing my constituents to look at maps and designs as well as the detail of the proposals. They could see that in my constituency more stations are affected by Crossrail than in any other constituency. The platforms at Ilford station will have to be extended, and Seven Kings and Goodmayes stations will also be affected. Just outside my constituency, Chadwell Heath station will be affected. There is also the loop allowing freight trains to pass passenger trains. There is only one loop on the Crossrail route, and it is in my constituency.

Many of my constituents will therefore be very concerned about the engineering work that will be done from 2006 onwards if the timetable is met, as many people will be affected by a lot of noise, lorries and other vehicles, and by waste being taken away. That will directly affect my constituents in Fenman Gardens in Goodmayes just a few yards away from where the works will be. This is a question not only of commercial blight, but of blight on people's homes and the areas where they live. That is why we cannot have a delay. We must carry over the Bill, bring it forward in the new Parliament as quickly possible and give the reassurance that there will not be further delay, uncertainty and difficulty for many thousands of people, including hundreds of my constituents.

I welcome the fact that we are carrying the Bill over, and I conclude by again paying tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North, the chair of the Crossrail group. I look forward to working with her in the coming Parliament, when she is re-elected to her seat.

2.51 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): This is one of those bizarre, virtual reality occasions on which the Minister tells us that the matter has been worked on for so long and that we now have such great detail that we can do nothing other than carry things forward, as wasting all that work would be a tragedy. That is how the Minister set out the matter to us, making the case for this very dubious procedure of carry-over. Immediately afterwards, Member after Member said "Hold on a minute" and suggested that the route should go in a different direction, referred to a capacity problem at Paddington, said that the line should or should not go through their constituency or asked about funding.

All the careful work that has been done by the thousands of dedicated people to whom the Minister so lovingly referred appears to be not only incomplete, but pathetically misdirected and inconclusive. Why is he trying to con the House into carrying over an incomplete piece of work that has already been in gestation for many years, as we have repeatedly been told, in the expectation that after an election, perhaps regardless of who is returned to Government, it will all suddenly be resolved quickly and expeditiously—something for which Member after Member has pleaded to the House?

I cannot see any reality in that argument at all. That is not unusual for this place—this is a palace of dreams and wishes, as we know—but this is a particularly egregious example of such a debate and occasion. We are all congratulating one another and saying what a wonderful project is involved, but saying almost in the same breath that it is misconstrued and incomplete, and that we have no idea where the funding will come from. On that basis, I should have thought that it would be beneficial if we started all over again. If we did not carry forward this incomplete and rather pathetic piece of work, we could ask the new Parliament—it will, after all, be full of thrusting new Members with exciting new ideas and hopefully many new Ministers as well—to do the job properly. It could take into consideration the points made by the Members present today and perhaps come up with something much more viable and useful. In other words, carry-over would probably be the worst thing to do in this case. A fresh outlook with fresh minds and initiatives would be by far the best.

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Forth: I shall give way to the newly arrived Member, who has heard nothing of the debate so far.

Mr. Salter: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. I have spent an awful lot of time working on the Crossrail issue. Is he proposing to divide the House on carrying over the Bill, because it would be very convenient for us if he was?

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman may have put in a lot of work, but not today. We have all been here working for almost an hour, but he has just wandered into the Chamber.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): As somebody who was born and brought up in Reading, may I ask my right hon. Friend to join me in recognising that it is the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths), who has been present throughout the debate and who has done a great deal on this issue?

Mr. Forth: Sadly, I have no connections with Reading whatever, and absolutely none with the hon. Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter), I am very pleased to say.

Rushing into a carry-over on this Bill would probably be completely the wrong thing to do, but I will not be surprised if the House does it anyway.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That further proceedings on the Crossrail Bill shall be suspended until the next Session of Parliament.

That if a Bill is presented in the next Session in the same terms as the Crossrail Bill when it was presented in this Session—

(a) the Bill shall be ordered to be printed and shall be deemed to have been read the first time; and

(b) the Standing Orders of the House applicable to the Bill, so far as complied with or dispensed with in this Session, shall be deemed to have been complied with or (as the case may be) dispensed with in the next Session;

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.

Points of Order

2.55 pm

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your advice about the contents of an e-mail sent by Nick Barrett, chief executive of the Ramblers Association, to other staff members, describing the arrangements for leave for the Labour candidate in the Congleton constituency, who is himself an employee of the Ramblers Association. I have just received a copy of the e-mail, in which Nick Barrett, the chief executive, states that Nick Milton, the candidate,

"is aware that the RA—as a charity—cannot be involved in supporting his candidacy."

That is all well and good, but the chief executive concludes his e-mail with the following remarks:

"Nick is running against one of the foulest MPs in the current Parliament—Anne Winterton. I am sure you all join me in wishing him success in his campaign."

While members of the Ramblers Association throughout the United Kingdom, but perhaps particularly in the Congleton constituency, may be interested to hear the views of the chief executive, I believe that two points need to be raised—first, the unwarranted slur on my name, and secondly, the fact that the chief executive of a charity has expressed a political and partisan view in a communication that has been widely circulated.

While it is my intention to refer this matter to the charity commissioners, I seek your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on what action can be taken, even in the dying hours of this Parliament, to prevent such unsavoury communications—in this case from the chief executive of the Ramblers Association, acting in violation of the rules applying to charities.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I thank the hon. Lady for giving me notice that she wished to raise that matter. I am sure that the whole House has heard what she has had to say. She will realise, however, that there is no way in which the Chair has a ruling to make on those matters. She has indicated that there may be possible lines of action open to her. I can only observe that we all have to have very broad shoulders with regard to the names that we are called. No doubt, more will be said during the course of a heated election campaign, but I am sure that she will pursue her own fight with her characteristic vigour.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can you confirm that there may be a number of procedural avenues that my hon. Friend can pursue even at this stage? It may well be possible for an early-day motion to be tabled, for example, even if it is not possible for such a thing as an Adjournment debate to be sought. It is particularly unfortunate that this wicked move by someone who is apparently employed by a charity, of all things, should happen at this very moment, probably taking advantage of the fact that little or no parliamentary time is left. My hon. Friend could be urged to see whether any further parliamentary opportunity can be taken even now so that we can put a stop to such wickedness and nonsense.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) is well versed as to what parliamentary procedures may be open to her, but she has received advice from her right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who I am sure has equal knowledge of these matters. There are certainly opportunities that she may like to consider taking, even at this late stage of the Session.

Gambling Bill

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Under the Order of the House made on 6 April, any message from the Lords may be considered forthwith without Question put. I have received a message from the Lords. The Lords agree to the Gambling Bill with amendments, to which the Lords desire the agreement of the House.

Lords amendments accordingly considered.

Clause 5

FACILITIES FOR GAMBLING

Lords amendment: No. 1.

3.10 pm

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2, 9 to 11, 13 to 15, 20, 25 to 27, 36, 37, 40 to 46, 48, 58 to 80, 91, 92, 95 to 99, 104, 106, 108 to 111, 113, 115 to 167, 169 to 187, 189 and 191 to 193.

Tessa Jowell: I intend to propose that the House accept all but two of the 193 amendments made by the Lords to this Bill. I ask the House to reject two Lords amendments only because they confuse the drafting of the Bill.

This group of amendments is necessarily large because it encompasses all the technical and drafting alterations necessary for the efficient working of the Bill.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 2 agreed to.

Clause 7

CASINO

Lords amendment: No. 3.

Tessa Jowell: I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Lords amendment No. 4 with the Government motion to disagree thereto, Lords amendment No. 21, Lords amendments Nos. 28 to 31, Lords amendment No. 39, Lords amendment No. 47, Lords amendments Nos. 50 to 55, Lords amendment No. 188 and Lords amendment No. 190.

Tessa Jowell: This group of Lords amendments deals with casinos, and I propose that the House accept all the amendments in the group except Lords amendments Nos. 3 and 4, with which we disagree.

I will briefly summarise the Government's position. I recommend that the House accept the amendments for the simple reason that securing the Bill is important for public protection. I very much regret that the Opposition have made a reduction in the number of proposed regional casinos in the first stage a condition of their support for this Bill. The conventions and circumstances of the time, however, require agreement. The Opposition had previously supported eight such casinos, then reduced the number to four, and now insist on one. On the basis of the Government's original proposition agreed in Committee, some seven local authorities will miss out on the potential benefits for regeneration in the first stage.

We believe that regional casinos should be tested, primarily for any impact that they might have, because of the different nature of the regime, on problem gambling, but also for their power to regenerate run-down towns and cities. As the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) is aware, we reserve the right to ask Parliament again what number of regional casinos is necessary to test their impact.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for setting out the purpose of the Lords amendments. The Bill is very different from that which received its Second Reading on 1 November. I want to pay tribute particularly to the work of my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) and Baroness Buscombe in another place. We support all the amendments, each of which improves the Bill, but because amendment No. 50 represents by far the biggest shift, I shall comment on that, as it has allowed us to reach agreement on the passage of the Bill.

We very much welcome the fact that we have been able to reach an agreement. We have always recognised that much in the Bill is important and necessary, and failure to update the law would leave the public with inadequate protection, especially in relation to remote gambling, which is already a huge business and likely to increase further. Responsible operators, such as those in the Interactive Gaming, Gambling and Betting Association, and providers of remote gambling such as BSkyB, have made a strong case that it is in their interests to be able to reassure their customers that they are subject to regulation, unlike their competitors from wilder shores.

The area of greatest controversy in the Bill remains the introduction of regional casinos. Originally, the Government argued that there could be up to 40 casinos, each of which would have 1,250 machines. That could have led to the introduction of something like 50,000 category A machines, which have been identified as carrying the highest risk of creating gambling addiction. Throughout the process, we have sought to increase safeguards against problem gambling and other concerns such as organised crime. For that reason, my colleague in another place, Baroness Buscombe, successfully persuaded their lordships to insert an amendment to increase the identification requirements, particularly to protect children who might otherwise be able to gain access to the gaming area. We accept that the Government have addressed that concern in a different way. For that reason, we will not press the two Lords amendments that Baroness Buscombe introduced, and we will accept the Government's alternative.

Even though the Government were forced in Committee to restrict the number of regional casinos to just eight, many organisations, such as the Royal College of Psychiatrists and the Salvation Army, have continued to argue that there is a significant risk of vastly increasing problem gambling. In our view, it was unthinkable that a measure that remains so controversial should have been rubber-stamped in the wash-up after just five hours of debate in Committee in the other place. Indeed, their lordships managed to consider just 11 out of 353 clauses. In recognition of that, we considered that it would be far better to have just one regional casino as a pilot. Although the advisory panel will need to give proper consideration to possible locations, we are convinced that it should be located in a leisure resort, away from city centres. From the beginning, Members on both sides of the House have recognised that Blackpool has a strong case.

[Mr. John Whittingdale]

Therefore, on the basis that the Government have been willing to accede to our proposals, I am happy to give the Opposition's support to amendment No. 50 and to the Bill.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) referred in passing to the concerns that many have expressed about the short period allowed in another place for debate on a very large number of amendments, which we have an opportunity to discuss today. I was delighted that last night, in another place, my noble Friend Lord Clement-Jones sought assurances from the Minister that if the various measures that we are debating are agreed to, and if the Bill receives Royal Assent, urgent consideration will be given to them by both the newly established gambling commission and the Government. I was delighted that the Minister in another place gave that assurance and I hope that the Secretary of State will repeat that today.

The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford also rightly referred to the most controversial part of the legislation in relation to casinos. What he did not say—although I suspect that he would agree with me—is that there is all-party support for large elements of the Bill, such as measures to introduce a much tougher regulator in the form of the gambling commission, regulation of internet gambling for the first time, and other measures that have been supported for a long time. Greatest concern, however, has centred on the issue of casinos.

It is worth recalling that when the Bill was first brought to the House, the Secretary of State said clearly that if the Bill, in the form in which she introduced it at that time, led to any increase in problem gambling, it would be a bad Bill and would have failed. Despite her assurances, considerable concern existed on both sides of the House, not least about the proposal to introduce new super-casinos, as they have been described. It is worth reflecting that those casinos will not only be much larger than we have seen previously in this country but will contain up to 1,250 category A machines that would have allowed unlimited stakes and prizes, about which a great deal of concern has been expressed.

We, too, sought to persuade the Government to reduce the number of super-casinos and to introduce a pilot period to test two things: first, whether it would add to regeneration in the area in which it is located, as the Government claim would happen; and secondly, to be assured that it did not lead to any increase in problem gambling. We were keen for the number to be reduced, and we were given an assurance. Now, following further deliberations, another reduction is being proposed. We are more than happy to support the trial of just one super-casino.

The Secretary of State said that the Government reserved the right to increase the number later. I hope that the Secretary of State will reassure us that that is not a hint that as soon as we return after the election there will be any such move.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): It could be us!

Mr. Foster: The issue might have to be considered by me, indeed—but whoever is in a position to produce secondary legislation, I hope that we shall at least hear from the current Secretary of State that it will happen only after a suitable opportunity is provided for a trial of the one super-casino that we currently propose. I will make that pledge on my party's behalf, and I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford will do the same. I note that the proposal for a reduction to just one super-casino initially came from my noble Friend Lord Greaves, but be that as it may, it now appears to have all-party support.

I end with one more plea, which echoes the words of the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford. Whatever location the commission recommends to the Secretary of State for the new super-casino—and, as others have said, there is a strong case for Blackpool—I hope that we will take on board the recommendations of the Joint Committee that carried out the pre-legislative scrutiny, and make it a destination casino. People should have to make an effort to visit it, rather than simply finding it on the high street. I hope that the Secretary of State will assure us that that is what she has in mind.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): I apologise for not being present for the Secretary of State's speech. The lottery of the London traffic and the timing of the debate are the only excuses that I can proffer.

Having chaired the pre-legislative scrutiny Committee, I want to make three points that I consider important. First, the issue of mega-casinos has dogged the Bill from the start. It was the most contentious aspect of the Committee's work. We were introducing a new concept to the gambling environment, on which there are many different views. The Secretary of State and I might have preferred there to be more than one pilot, but it was argued in the Committee that we should recommend the trial of just one regional or destination casino. We did not do so, because at the time the concept was not in the Government's mind, but Committee members who have observed the reaching of this conclusion over the past 48 hours have expressed to me their satisfaction that we can both test the argument that a destination casino could regenerate a town such as Blackpool—which I sincerely hope will be the preferred destination, given all the time and effort that has been put in—and prove that access to machines with unlimited stakes and prizes would not lead to a rise in problem gambling. Although I believe that to be true, I know that many people are not convinced. We need this pilot, and also the pilots involving large and small casinos with significantly more machines than have hitherto been available in gambling destinations.

3.15 pm

I think that it would have been a grave error to allow this issue to thwart the Bill's progress. I believe that the most important recommendation made by my Committee to both Houses was that without the Bill, there would have been an increase in gambling of doubtful legality. We have seen an explosion of gambling opportunities—not just via the internet but by means of mobile telephony, often involving young people—and that is likely to increase during the next three to five years.

It is inconceivable that Parliament could allow the Bill to fall, given the pressing need to regulate all that gambling. It is not regulated at present, and—as the Secretary of State knows, for I have said it forcefully on many occasions and in many forums over the past few months—I consider the vital point to be not how many casinos there are or how big they are, but the explosion of gambling on the internet, on websites and on mobile telephones.

I know that visible gambling—people going into a mega-casino and playing on rank upon rank of gaming machines—offends some, but they must not ignore what I consider to be the far greater problem of unseen gambling. People may lose their homes, all their money and their whole way of life through internet gambling that is not regulated. I believe our United Kingdom industry shares my view that this must be a regulated and respected part of the gambling industry, which is why I am so glad that we are to pass a Bill that has occupied the time of so many people for so long.

That was, in fact, my third point. I thank and pay tribute to all the many people who have been involved in the process, not just Ministers and their officials but my hon. Friends the Members for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) and for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss), the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) and my noble Friend Baroness Buscombe. They have devoted much time and effort to arriving at this point.

This is a hugely challenging Bill, and I feel strongly that this is a good day for our country. We are recognising that gambling is part of the leisure industry—part of our way of life. Some people may not like it, but we must face reality, and I fervently believe that the Bill tries to do that. This is not the end of the argument, by any stretch of the imagination. The Bill sets out what is virtually a whole Parliament's work after the election: the establishing of the commission, codes of practice, regulations and the framework that will govern gambling for many years to come. I pay tribute to all who have been involved in the process.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I, too, welcome the amendment, but I am sad about one aspect. I supported the Bill at the outset, partly because it would liberalise the industry but also because—as the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) said—it would regulate the parts that needed regulation. I was a member of the Standing Committee, and I found it frustrating that the Bill kept changing. If there is anything to be learned from the process and the point that we have reached today, it concerns the Government's thinking before they produce complex Bills such as this, and what they want to end up with.

I thought that the Committee chaired by the hon. Member for Ryedale did some very good work. I am a big fan of pre-legislative scrutiny. Much of that work, sadly, was ignored, although it should have constituted the foundation of the Bill.

The Bill was pulled in different directions. I have a lot of respect for the Minister who piloted it through Committee. He also felt on occasions that one week he was being pulled one way, and another week, the other way. He did a fantastic job in trying to pilot it through.

On the issues around super-casinos, or regional casinos, I would have liked more than one. I agree that it will be difficult to have a true test with just one area. We got carried away with the fact that the super-casinos were going to be a panacea, bringing redevelopment and regeneration in all types of areas. That is why we saw a feeding frenzy of various potential applications throughout the country. Newcastle city council, a Liberal Democrat council, is trying to support an application locally. A lot of time and effort have been wasted in local government and in the gambling industry, which have not only lobbied but put forward plans. That could have been avoided if at the first stage we had been a little clearer about where we wanted to end up.

I strongly support the proposal that the regional casino should be in a place such as Blackpool, which in its lobbying made a clear and coherent case as to why that area should be chosen. I hope that if that goes ahead, we do not wait too long before we have experiments elsewhere to judge the effects.

On the industry as a whole, I agree with the hon. Member for Ryedale when he says that, overall, we have had a clean industry in this country. It has provided some good quality jobs and is well run. The Bill will add to that in introducing better regulation of parts of the industry. I have only one concern as regards where we are at now, with one super-casino proposed: the potential damage that has been done to the existing industry's confidence. Whichever lead Ministry after the election deals with gambling, it needs to build up relationships again with the industry and ensure that that industry, which has been well run for many years, is given the confidence to expand. It would be a mistake to think that casino gambling or another area of gambling can be predicated on one super-casino. We should not take away from the fact that some of the smaller, existing casinos do a lot of good work, not only employing people locally but ensuring the high standards to which the hon. Member for Ryedale referred.

The Bill has had a long gestation period. It would have been a mistake if it had fallen today for the reasons that were outlined by the hon. Gentleman. Whole areas of gambling are not regulated at the moment, but they need to be regulated. That is what was sad about some of the discussion in the popular press. I understand why certain sections had the discussions concerning the super-casinos, but they did not recognise that today people can go out and gamble freely without any regulation. We need some publicity about the fact that the Bill will bring in regulation.

In welcoming the fact that this period is coming to a close, I support the proposals, but let us hope that, post the election, we not only get the super-casinos in place but ensure that regulation under the Bill can be bedded in. Whichever Government Department deals with it after the election, it must ensure that it has good relationships with the gaming and betting industry.

[Mr. Kevan Jones]

Tessa Jowell: I rise to put one or two points on the record. I do not think any legislation in this Parliament has undergone the scrutiny that this legislation has. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) and to his colleagues on the pre-legislative scrutiny Committee. A total of 160 recommendations were made by the Committee, 130 of which were adopted and incorporated in the Bill, so it is about as far from rubber-stamped legislation as it is possible to imagine.

Once we have passed the Bill, we will have arguably the most protective gambling legislation in the world. That will safeguard our record as a country with one of the lowest rates of problem gambling, obviously excepting those countries where gambling is banned.

The final point is in relation to the comments by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones). There has been a process of parliamentary debate—just that—about a tricky issue and the debate has focused essentially on the role of regional casinos and the number of regional casinos. It developed from the position on Second Reading, where the Government's view was that the number of regional casinos should be determined by the market, but within the context of a very clear regulatory framework, with a veto being available to local people as to whether they wanted casinos. Therefore, the debate to which he refers is a debate about numbers. It is not a debate about substance.

It is important that the industry remains supportive of this Bill and has confidence in it. The decision to reduce from eight to one the number of regional casinos in the first stage means probably the loss of £600 million of inward investment to some of those parts of the country where that inward investment is most needed, and the loss of probably in excess of 40,000 jobs. No Government can bind the next Parliament, but it will be for the next Parliament to decide whether, in the light of demand and consistent with the precautionary principle, that number should be increased.

Lords amendment disagreed to.

Lords amendment No. 4 disagreed to.

Clause 14

LOTTERY

Lords amendment: No. 5.

Tessa Jowell: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 6 to 8, 93, 94 and 168.

Tessa Jowell: This group improves the protection for charity lotteries and I ask the House to approve them.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments 6 to 11 agreed to.

Clause 26

DUTY TO ADVISE SECRETARY OF STATE

Lords amendment: No. 12.

Tessa Jowell: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 23, 24, 107, 112 and 114.

Tessa Jowell: These amendments deal with the protection of children, the Government's overriding concern in bringing forward the Bill, and I propose that the House accept them.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 13 to 15 agreed to.

Clause 35

TERRITORIAL APPLICATION

Lords amendment: No. 16.

Tessa Jowell: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

3.30 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may consider Lords amendments Nos. 17 to 19, 33, 34 and 38.

Tessa Jowell: I propose that the House accept each of the amendments in the group, which ensure the effective regulation of remote gambling.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 17 to 21 agreed to.

Clause 58

AGE LIMIT FOR CATEGORY D GAMING MACHINES

Lords amendment: No. 22.

Tessa Jowell: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may consider Lords amendments Nos. 32, 35, 49, 81 to 90, 100 to103 and 105.

Tessa Jowell: I propose that the House agrees to the amendments in this group, which concern the regulation of gaming machines and deliver on the Government's pledge to consult on any proposals for an age limit for gaming machines that children can use.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 23 to 55 agreed to.

New Clause

Lords amendment: No. 56, after clause 175, to insert the following new clause—Pool betting on dog races.

Tessa Jowell: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Again, I propose that the House accept the amendment, which addresses concerns raised with the Government by the greyhound industry, which has confirmed that it is happy with the amendment.

Lords amendment agreed to.

New Clause

Lords amendment: No. 57, after clause 177, to insert the following new clause—Christmas day.

Tessa Jowell: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

This is also known as the Santa clause. I propose that the House agree to the amendment, which prohibits licensed gambling premises from offering gambling on Christmas day.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 58 to 193 agreed to.

Committee appointed to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to certain of their amendments to the Bill: Mr. Don. Foster, Tessa Jowell, Mr. Gordon Marsden, Mr. Mark Prisk, Mr. Tom Watson to be members of the Committee; Tessa Jowell to be the Chairman of the Committee; Three to be the quorum of the Committee.—[Mr. Watson.]

To withdraw immediately.

Reasons for disagreeing to certain Lords amendments reported, and agreed to; to be communicated to the Lords.

Supreme Court of England and Wales

Ordered.

That the Civil Procedure (Amendment No. 2) Rules 2005 (S.I., 2005, No. 656), dated 11th March 2005, a copy of which was laid before this House on 14th March, be approved.—[Mr. Watson.]

International Organisations Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

3.33 pm

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The International Organisations Bill is designed to ensure the effective functioning of international organisations and bodies. The measures are required to enable Her Majesty's Government to meet outstanding international commitments to confer legal capacity and privileges and immunities on a number of international organisations and bodies and certain categories of individuals connected to them, or to ensure parity of treatment between organisations where appropriate.

Under existing legislation, we are unable to confer privileges and immunities on these organisations, even though we have signed international agreements committing us to do so. Some of the agreements are of long standing, dating back more than a decade.

For most of the organisations concerned, the privileges and immunities will be conferred by Orders in Council, which will be subject to the affirmative procedure. Consequently, Parliament will have ample opportunity to scrutinise and debate the specific privileges and immunities that will be conferred on these organisations.

Let me now turn to why we grant privileges and immunities to international organisations and bodies. Privileges and immunities are conferred on organisations and bodies so that they can carry out their functions without being impeded. The long-standing policy of HMG is that privileges and immunities should be granted primarily on the basis of functional need, to ensure that only those privileges and immunities necessary for the organisation to function effectively are granted. All cases are separately negotiated and it is rare that two organisations benefit from identical privileges and immunities.

Immunities granted to the staff of international organisations are generally very restricted. Of the 3,000 staff of international organisations based, or with offices, in the UK, only 80 senior officers enjoy the equivalent of full diplomatic privileges and immunities. The remainder have no entitlement beyond immunity for acts performed in the course of their official duties.

As regards privileges, the Government's policy adheres to the internationally accepted principle that states should not financially benefit from the presence of an organisation on their soil, and that one member state should not tax another through the medium of an international organisation. Immunity from the jurisdiction of the courts of the host state is justified by the need for independence of the international organisation and the necessity of precluding any undue interference by the host state with the activities of the international organisation. That ensures that the organisation can then work in an environment of independence and security without fear of legal reprisals. That is an established principle of international relations.

I turn to the details of the Bill. Clauses 1 to 3 concern the Commonwealth Secretariat and the Commonwealth Secretariat Arbitral Tribunal. The Commonwealth

[Mr. Denis MacShane]

Secretariat is the primary intergovernmental organisation of the Commonwealth. The CSAT is an internal arbitral body established to resolve contractual disputes between the Secretariat and its staff, or any other person who enters into a written contract with it.

The Bill will change the following three aspects of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by the Commonwealth Secretariat. At present, the Secretariat has immunity from the jurisdiction of the courts in the UK, except in cases where the immunity is waived by the Secretary-General, in cases concerning motor accidents or motor traffic offences, and where arbitration proceedings are undertaken in respect of a written contract with the Secretariat.

That last exception, concerning arbitration proceedings, has been interpreted by the courts in the UK as allowing the courts to exercise supervisory jurisdiction over CSAT arbitration proceedings under the Arbitration Act 1996. That particular exception to immunity will be removed by clause 1 of the Bill, which will bring the Secretariat's immunity provisions into line with those enjoyed by many other international organisations based in the UK.

The extended immunity will not apply to written contracts entered into by, or on behalf of, the Secretariat before clause 1 enters into force. For those contracts courts will continue to have supervisory jurisdiction under the Arbitration Act 1996.

The Bill will also change the privileges and immunities of the Commonwealth Secretariat staff. Clause 2 will accord the president and members of CSAT the same immunity from legal process in relation to their official acts that is conferred on the Commonwealth Secretariat staff under the Commonwealth Secretariat Act 1966. The Bill provides that if the CSAT is replaced by an equivalent successor body, an order may be made by the Secretary of State to amend the 1966 Act for the purposes of conferring privileges and immunities on the successor body equivalent to those enjoyed by the CSAT.

Clause 3 confers exemption from UK income tax on all staff of the Secretariat in respect of salaries and emoluments that they receive as its staff. That new exemption will not apply to pensions, annuities payments or to income received by staff from other sources. It is conditional on the Secretariat establishing an internal tax system for its own benefit, as is currently the case with a number of other international organisations.

I turn to the other organisations affected. Clause 4 concerns the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe. The Bill will bring it within the scope of the International Organisations Act 1968, enabling the United Kingdom to implement the political commitments it made when it endorsed the 1993 Rome Council decision to confer on the OSCE domestic legal capacity and privileges and immunities. That will confirm our support for its work.

Clause 5 deals with EU bodies established under title V—Provisions on a Common Foreign and Security Policy—or title VI—Provisions on Police and Judicial Cooperation in Criminal Matters—of the treaty on the European Union. To ensure there is no misunderstanding, I should emphasise here that we are not talking about bodies or institutions set up under the treaty establishing the European Community.

Under existing obligations, the Government are committed to conferring legal capacity and privileges and immunities on title V and title VI bodies of the treaty on the EU, and certain categories of individuals connected to them. At present there is no legislation which allows us to do this. The Bill will add a further section to the International Organisations Act 1968 to enable the UK to confer the necessary legal capacity and privileges and immunities, by Order in Council, on those bodies and individuals.

At present there are three EU bodies on which privileges and immunities will be conferred under this Bill. They are: ATHENA, the EU Satellite Centre and the Institute for Security Studies. ATHENA is a financing mechanism set up to enable member states to contribute towards the financing of EU military peacekeeping missions, as the EU budget cannot be used for military operations. The satellite centre provides valuable satellite imagery analysis which helps the EU monitor crises across the world, and the Institute for Security Studies adds academic analysis and strategic thinking to the development of common foreign and security policy as a whole.

Clause 6 concerns the International Criminal Court. The ICC is a permanent court, based in The Hague, established by the Rome statute of the ICC. The purpose of the ICC is to try individuals for some of the most serious crimes known to mankind: genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes.

The court is now taking its first operational steps. It has opened two investigations, in northern Uganda and in the Democratic Republic of Congo. Most recently, on 31 March, the Security Council passed a UK-sponsored resolution to refer the situation in Darfur to the court. The court will have to operate in some of the world's most difficult environments, so safety is paramount. In order to ensure its staff can work effectively, they need to be granted the added security provided by the ICC privileges and immunities agreement, which the United Kingdom signed in 2002. The Bill will amend the International Criminal Court Act 2001 to allow the UK to confer all the privileges and immunities necessary to fulfil its obligations under the ICC privileges and immunities agreement.

Clause 7 applies to the European Court of Human Rights. The court forms part of the Council of Europe. It enforces the Council of Europe's convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, also known as the European convention on human rights.

The sixth protocol to the general agreement on the privileges and immunities of the Council of Europe confers privileges and immunities on members of the court. The UK has signed and ratified the sixth protocol subject to a reservation on article 1, which requires the conferral of privileges and immunities on family members of judges. The Bill will amend the International Organisations Act 1968 to allow the UK to implement article 1 of the sixth protocol fully and withdraw its reservation.

Clause 8 concerns the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, ITLOS, which was established by the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea, to which the UK is a state party. The agreement on the privileges and immunities of ITLOS provides that the tribunal, and various categories of individuals connected with it, shall enjoy privileges and immunities. The UK signed the agreement but cannot ratify it as existing legislation does not permit its implementation. The Bill will bring ITLOS within the scope of the 1968 Act, enabling the UK to confer privileges and immunities on the tribunal and so ratify the agreement.

The financial implications of the Bill are minimal. The only loss of revenue that might occur would be by way of refunds of VAT on travel and incidental costs for visiting officials. We estimate that this would be under £1,000 per annum. The Bill will not impose any additional regulation on the business, charities or voluntary sectors. By enabling us to confer privileges and immunities on them, the Bill will confirm our support for the work of these organisations and will be a clear demonstration that the UK is meeting its international commitments. I commend the Bill to the House.

3.44 pm

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): I thank the Minister for Europe for giving us an attempted explanation of what I could otherwise only describe as a triumph of bureaucratese. It is always a peculiar pleasure to follow the hon. Gentleman. He is one of those people who, even if they cannot make friends, certainly influence people. His comments on what he referred to as "les néo-cons" in France the other day gave an enormous boost to the no campaign in the run-up to the constitutional referendum on 29 May.

May I say, with no offence to the Minister, that I am disappointed that the Foreign Secretary is not in his place today? He wrote to me about the Bill and told me about the importance that he attached to it. I thought that that importance might be sufficient to bring him to the House for what would be his last performance at the Dispatch Box on the Government side of the House.

In today's interconnected world, single nations often cannot deal with the challenges that face them individually. We must co-operate where possible through mutual recognition of diverse standards, and that in the end requires international organisations. The servants of the international organisations that enable such co-operation to take place have customarily been granted certain immunities from local laws and from taxes. Such privileges are essential to ensuring that those organisations run smoothly, but they cannot come at the cost of the organisations and their members being made accountable for their actions.

Although we broadly support the Bill, we have some questions which we hope the Minister will be able to answer. First—he has dealt with this, but I am not wholly convinced by his explanation—the Bill confers certain privileges on EU bodies to which it gives legal status. What is the legal basis for this, when the European Union itself does not enjoy a legal personality? The question was raised in the House of Lords European Union Committee and the House of Commons European Scrutiny Committee. Surely the Bill cannot assume that the constitution will in due course be ratified? It would be very dangerous if it did so.

The Bill also extends privileges and immunities to family members and the households of officials. I hope there is no possibility of British taxpayers subsidising shopping trips for members of those organisations and their spouses. I raise the matter because there have been recent examples and articles in the media concerning what has become known as the UN gravy train and the so-called abuses by the children of UN staff. I know that there are planned reforms to the UN and I wish the Secretary-General every success in implementing them. With regard to today's business, will the Minister give a categorical assurance to Parliament that that cannot and will not happen under the provisions of the Bill?

We have a further serious concern. Clause 4 deals with the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe, which includes among its members some states such as Belarus, whose record on human rights is on a par with Zimbabwe's. Does the Minister agree that we must be very careful about giving immunities and privileges to the ruling elite of such countries, particularly in view of the signal that that sends to those struggling against undemocratic regimes in other parts of the world?

In the light of article 1 of the sixth protocol, I understand that we signed a reservation when we agreed the European convention on human rights overall. Can the Minister confirm that this reservation was included in the instrument of ratification deposited in November 2001 and reaffirmed in 2003 in respect of the Isle of Man? Will he please explain to the House what has happened to that reservation?

Some of the immunities in the Bill concern monetary immunities. Why, when we have already waited so long to implement these changes to monetary immunities and privileges, have the Government chosen to implement them now, regardless of how low the cost is said to be? The country is already highly taxed. As the Minister knows, we have already seen 66 stealth tax rises under the Government.

We must take care to protect the rights of employees of international organisations. Concerns have been expressed for the human rights of employees who work in the Commonwealth Secretariat as regards transparency and their ability to air grievances, and about the accountability of the organisation, should employees be made immune from the British court system. Will the Minister please comment on that and reassure the House that what is provided in the Bill is compatible with the European convention on human rights?

Finally, my colleague in the other place, the noble Baroness Rawlings, introduced an amendment concerning the immunities granted to employees of the European Union. The amendment would have meant that clause 5, which covers the various privileges and immunities accorded to EU personnel, could not come into force until the Government of those privileges and immunities and of whom they ought to be extended to. Given the forthcoming British presidency of the Council, initiating such a review would be straightforward. Although the Bill does not compel the Government to do so, an incoming Conservative Government would want to initiate such a review. I hope the Minister can give the same undertaking.

"have initiated a review within the Council of the European Union"

[Mr. Michael Ancram]

I thank the hon. Gentleman for his explanation. We will in general support the Bill, but I should be grateful for an answer to the important questions that I have raised.

3.49 pm

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh) (LD): The Minister will be aware that the Bill has had far more extensive debate in the other place. He will know from that debate that the Liberal Democrats support the Bill's intentions but have some reservations regarding, in particular, the first three clauses. We have always been concerned that the Bill should not impair the right to a fair hearing. Those who are affected by the immunities given must have recourse to adequate alternative avenues of dispute resolution, a point raised by the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). Fully independent alternative mechanisms must be in place.

We have had concerns that extending the Commonwealth Secretariat's immunity, beyond that required by existing international obligations, to exclude the limited judicial oversight available under the Arbitration Act 1996 may risk disproportionate interference with the rights of access to court. There have also been concerns about recourse for employers of the Commonwealth Secretariat, in particular concern that the internal dispute-resolution mechanisms set out in the Bill on recourse for employees of the Commonwealth Secretariat might not be fully independent.

The Minister will be aware that my noble Friend Lord Wallace took a particular interest in the Bill and debated it at length. He expressed strong concerns about the emergence of a growing class of international officials in Britain, Europe and elsewhere which is immune from domestic taxation and beyond the obligations and protections of domestic law. He added that > "The justification of extending immunities to families again seems to be questionable."

Lord Wallace also raised the question of how far international immunity should be maintained and extended. He felt that the powers, privileges and status of the European Commission and many of its agencies were questionable—in particular

> "the salaries of those involved, their access to duty-free sales and the extent to which the Commission and the various agencies are outside the remit of the employment law and regulations which the Commission itself imposes on member states and candidate countries."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 16 December 2004; Vol. 667, c. 1471.]

We want a commitment that the Government will not just let the Bill slip by but will, in future negotiations in the European Union and other international organisations, take the opportunity to ask how many diplomatic immunities are needed by how many people, for what purposes and how far.

The Minister mentioned the number of officials affected, but—if I can catch his attention for a moment—will he clarify a point for me when he responds? He said that only 80 senior officials, of the 3,000 officials of intergovernmental organisations based in the United Kingdom, are likely to be affected by the measures. In addition to those 3,000 officials, there are probably the same number—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman is addressing a point to the Minister, and as it is an important point, perhaps the Minister should take note of it.

Mr. Chidgey: I am most grateful to you for making that point on my behalf, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As I am not allowed to address the Minister directly, I was hardly able to point out that he did not seem to catch the comments that I was making.

I repeat my point for the benefit of the House and, in particular, of the Minister. The Minister said that only 80 chief officers were likely to be affected by the measures, and I should be grateful if he clarified that when he replies to the debate. Although he said that there were 3,000 officials, of whom only 80 were affected, I am uncertain whether he meant that. From debates in the other place, my understanding was that there is some concern that the 3,000 officials, plus their families and dependents, could easily number 6,000 people, and that that figure is likely to grow. As the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes has said, we are concerned that the measure may become a gravy train.

In my closing remarks, I shall address the human rights aspect of the Bill in more detail. I serve on the Joint Committee on Human Rights, so I am familiar with its report about the issues raised by the Bill, and I am particular concerned about the Government's response to that report.

The Minister will be familiar with the Joint Committee's remarks about article 6 rights:

> "Any restriction of Article 6 rights arising from the immunities from suit requires justification on the basis that it pursues a legitimate aim and is proportionate, and must be assessed in light of the particular circumstances of the case."

The Joint Committee argued that in respect of the Commonwealth Secretariat, the Commonwealth Secretariat Arbitral Tribunal and the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe, there is no international legal obligation to confer immunity from suit. I would particularly like the Minister to respond to that point, because he knows that the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell), assured members of the Committee that their concerns were unfounded.

The letter that the Under-Secretary, or perhaps one of his officials, wrote to the Committee on 25 February is a salutary lesson in the unfathomable use of our language. It stated that the Committee's concerns

> "that extending the Commonwealth Secretariat's immunity under Clause 1 of the Bill in the absence of an international obligation to do so risks disproportionate interference with the Article 6 right of access to court"

were unfounded. It continued:

> "It would be improper and a breach of the UK's duties under international law for the Government to undertake to be bound by an international obligation before the legislation necessary to implement that obligation was in place. To do otherwise would mean that the UK would not be in a position to fulfil its obligation and this could result in a breach by the UK of its international obligation. If Parliament decided not to pass relevant legislation, the UK would continue to be in breach of the obligation."

In spite of that obfuscation, we are generally in favour of the Bill.

3.57 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I want to make one point to the Minister and, in a sense, my own Front Benchers. The Bill may well be desirable and necessary, and it may well be required to fulfil this or that obligation, but I hope that our agreement to this Bill will not in any sense imply that we completely underwrite all the organisations involved or expect them to continue indefinitely and without question. Once such bodies are established, they expand their activities and assume a sort of permanence, regardless of changes in the international context.

I hope that the Bill is being presented in a focused and limited way. Perhaps properly, it provides certain immunities under established international obligations. I hope that people here or anywhere else do not believe that hon. Members think that such organisations are completely wonderful and beyond criticism and that they should exist from now to eternity without challenge. That point is important, and I hope that the Minister or perhaps a Conservative Front Bencher, will nod in its direction.

3.58 pm

The Minister for Europe: I am grateful for hon. Members' comments, which are important. I will not rise to the remarks made by the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), who was sorely missed at Tuesday's final Foreign Affairs questions. [Interruption.] We look forward to his successor sitting on the Opposition Front Bench after the election on 5 May.

The points raised by hon. Members have been thoroughly discussed in the other place. In its 15th report of the current Session, the Joint Committee on Human Rights—the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) is a member of that Committee, and we are sorry that he is retiring—concluded that the Bill did not need to be brought to the attention of either House on human rights grounds.

Hon. Members have expressed concern about the general principle of conferring immunities and privileges, but it is simply the old injunction, "Do unto others as you would have done unto yourself." If we want British officials serving in international organisations in many different parts of the world to have appropriate immunities and privileges, it is rather arrogant of us not to be willing to find a small amount of parliamentary time—this Bill has been waiting for some years to be brought before Parliament—to put our own house in order in this regard.

Let me stress that privileges and immunities are there to protect officials, not Governments. I completely agree with the points raised about Belarus and other dictatorial countries, but citizens of any of those countries can serve honestly and openly on international bodies, and those gentlemen and, where appropriate, their families, should be thus protected.

Let me stress again that the House is not conferring such immunities and privileges on any single individual in any single organisation. They will all have to be brought before the House by way of affirmative motion under the Order-in-Council procedure. That will allow genuine concerns, which I fully accept, to be raised and debated.

I am not entirely surprised that the European Union was brought up. However, this is about existing treaty agreements—we are not talking about the constitutional treaty in any way. Some EU bodies need legal capacity and privileges and immunities to operate. Once one has agreed to European Council decisions—that is where Ministers of national Governments decide, not the Commission or a bureaucracy—or to other measures to establish them, the UK is under an obligation to confer them under international law. The fact that the EU does not have a legal personality except to the extent that it concludes agreements pursuant to articles 24 or 38 of the treaty on the European Union is immaterial.

Some powerful and important points were made by Members of the other place, and I am sure that those arguments can be discussed when we return with a statutory instrument. The entire House is conscious that we should not be creating new categories of privileged ladies and gentlemen in the UK who are not under the same laws of the land as we all have to abide by. However, international organisations are important. Many British citizens serve in them with great distinction, sometimes under some hardship, and as we applaud their work and insist that the countries in which they serve confer such immunities and privileges, we should not refuse them in the United Kingdom.

With that, I hope that the House can move forward into Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 63 (Committal of Bills),

That the Bill be committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

Question agreed to.

Bill immediately considered in Committee.

[MR. MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

Clauses 1 to 10 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 11

SHORT TITLE, INTERPRETATION, COMMENCEMENT AND EXTENT

4.3 pm

Mr. MacShane: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 4, line 38, leave out subsection (6).

The amendment, which stands in the name of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, removes the privileged amendment made in another place.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 11, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported, with an amendment.

Order for Third Reading read.

4.4 pm

The Minister for Europe: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I thank hon. Members for helping the Government to put the Bill on the statute book. I hope that Third Reading will be agreed and I wish all hon. Members, colleagues and friends Godspeed and an enjoyable four weeks.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with an amendment.

4.5 pm

Sitting suspended.

ROYAL ASSENT

5.5 pm

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners:

The House went:—and, having returned:

Mr. Speaker (in the Clerk's place at the Table): I have to acquaint the House that the House has been to the House of Peers, where a Commission under the Great Seal was read, authorising the Royal Assent of the following Acts:

Finance Act 2005
Appropriation (No. 2) Act 2005
Mental Capacity Act 2005
Public Services Ombudsman (Wales) Act 2005
Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Act 2005
Disability Discrimination Act 2005
Education Act 2005
Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005
Inquiries Act 2005
Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act 2005
Drugs Act 2005
International Organisations Act 2005
Railways Act 2005
Gambling Act 2005

Prorogation

Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech

Mr. Speaker: I have further to acquaint the House that the Lord High Chancellor, one of the Lords Commissioners, delivered Her Majesty's most Gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament, in pursuance of Her Majesty's Command. For greater accuracy I have obtained a copy, and also directed that the terms of the Speech be printed in the Journal of this House. Copies are being made available in the Vote Office:

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

My Government has pursued economic policies which have brought about sustained growth and prosperity.

My Government has continued to take action to secure high levels of employment as it reforms the welfare state.

An Act has been passed that allows for the extension of the circumstances in which a family can be eligible for Child Benefit for 16–19 year olds who are in learning.

Legislation has been enacted to support the continuing fight against terrorism in the United Kingdom.

An Act has been passed to reform the office of Lord Chancellor, and to establish a Supreme Court for the United Kingdom and a Judicial Appointments Commission for England and Wales.

An Act has been passed as an interim measure to make the electoral register in Northern Ireland both accurate and comprehensive until more permanent measures can be put in place.

Legislation has been passed to provide a statutory framework for dealing with the financial, health and welfare decisions of those people who might lack capacity through mental illness or disability.

My Government has continued to work towards the reduction of bureaucracy and the costs of Government, and towards promoting efficiency. An Act has been passed to integrate the Inland Revenue and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

An Act has been passed to establish the Serious Organised Crime Agency and to strengthen the fight against crime.

An Act has been passed to improve local environmental quality by tackling the antisocial behaviour that blights our communities.

Legislation has been enacted to streamline the school inspection regime and to bring in three-year budgets for schools, which will help raise standards for every child in every school.

An Act has been passed to unify and simplify the Ombudsman service in Wales.

An Act has been passed to tackle the problem of drug abuse and the crime that flows from it.

Legislation has been enacted to enable the United Kingdom to fulfil international commitments to confer privileges and immunities on a number of international organisations and bodies.

Measures to reform the law on mental health have undergone pre-legislative scrutiny.

Draft legislation has been published to safeguard the welfare of children in circumstances of parental separation and inter-country adoption from countries where there are concerns about child welfare.

A draft Bill has been published to introduce a new offence of corporate manslaughter.

Draft legislation has been published to ensure the better management and protection of our natural environment and rural communities.

A Bill has been introduced to authorise the construction of Crossrail.

Other important measures have been enacted.

Members of the House of Commons

I thank you for the provision you have made for the work and dignity of the Crown and for the public service.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

The Duke of Edinburgh and I were pleased to receive the State Visit of His Excellency the President of the Republic of Korea and the State Visit of His Excellency the President of Italy.

My Government currently holds the G8 Presidency, and is placing high priority on the important issues of Africa and climate change.

My Government has continued to work with partners around the world to prevent terrorism and the proliferation of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, and the problems of drug smuggling and international crime.

My Government has worked to strengthen commitment on both sides of the Atlantic to the transatlantic relationship and to the continued effectiveness of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation, and has worked with the international community to strengthen the United Nations.

My Government continues to support the Government of Iraq to provide security and stability following the elections held in January.

My Government has continued to support efforts to build peace in the Middle East, to promote democratic reform and reduce conflict and extremism.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

I pray that the blessing of Almighty God may rest upon your counsels.

The Commission was also for proroguing this present Parliament and the Lord Chancellor said:

"My Lords and Members of the House of Commons: By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission which has now been read, we do, in Her Majesty's name, and in obedience to Her Majesty's commands, prorogue this Parliament to Thursday, the Fourteenth day of April to be then here holden, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Thursday, the Fourteenth day of April."

End of the Fourth Session (opened on 23 November 2004) of the Fifty-Third Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in the Fifty-Fourth Year of the Reign of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 15 March 2005

[SIR NICHOLAS WINTERTON in the Chair]

Trust Ports

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. McNulty.]

9.30 am

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): I welcome the opportunity to debate the future of trust ports. I am grateful for the interest shown by my hon. Friends the Members for Harwich (Mr. Henderson), for Dover (Mr. Prosser) and for Tynemouth (Mr. Campbell) and by those who represent other port constituencies. Unfortunately, others cannot be here, including my hon. Friend the Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire (Mr. Ainger) and the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke). Many hon. Members who noted the subject of today's debate but who were not too well versed on trust ports wondered what was of such great interest. I shall therefore start by sketching out briefly what the debate is about.

Five years ago, in 2000, the Office for National Statistics ruled that trust ports with a turnover above a threshold of £6.6 million, or those with a majority of members appointed by the Government, should be regarded as public bodies and subject to public sector borrowing requirements. Uncertainty over borrowing created various problems for those ports, as a result of which harbour revision orders were issued last year.

Those orders would have resolved the matter but for objections, made most notably by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope)—I am pleased to see him in his place—and the Major Ports Group. Those objections were raised in order to leave open the option to privatise those ports. Worries about privatisation were reinforced last week by the official Opposition's announcement that they would certainly want to privatise Dover in order to release money for road schemes.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): The hon. Gentleman mentioned the years 2000 and 2004 and spoke of uncertainty. Can he tell us what was done between those two years to try to remove that uncertainty? He has rather condensed that.

Jim Knight: I would like to go back beyond 2000, as I sketch out how we arrived at the present situation under the Ports Act 1991, the governing legislation in respect of trust ports.

The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that the ruling of the Office for National Statistics was initially resisted by the Department for Transport; there was some negotiation as to whether the ruling was correct, but it has been accepted. It took a little time, but the harbour revision orders of 2004 were the outcome of those negotiations; the aim was to resolve the situation and provide some certainty. The uncertainty over the future of ports has certainly resulted in some difficulties. Most recently, the delay of a £6.6 million investment caused problems for the port of Poole, but I gather through conversations this morning that that difficulty might be resolved for now.

It is worth saying what a trust port is. It is a convenient shorthand term used to describe ports that are not owned and run by a company, a local authority or a nationalised industry. Many have operated for a long time. Poole's trust port was formed in 1895—this is pertinent to our debate—when port users rebelled against the neglect and profiteering of the private owners of the port; care of the port was entrusted to commissioners who were charged under an Act of Parliament to conserve, regulate and improve the port and harbour of Poole.

That status quo continued happily until the 1980s, when the then Conservative Government were pursuing their dogmatic desire to privatise. In 1988, the Secretary of State of the day, Paul Channon, expressed his disappointment that ports had not yet been privatised and declared all ports as candidates for privatisation. His frustration that ports did not want to privatise led to the Ports Act, which gave him the power to force privatisation on ports and allowed the Exchequer to take 50 per cent. of the proceeds. That love—that dogmatic desire—for privatisation is alive and well in the Opposition today.

Happily, the general election in 1997 ended that particular episode, but the decision of the Office for National Statistics in 2000 decreed that trust ports should be classified as public sector corporations, reopening the debate. The way in which such ports are classified means that London, Dover, Shoreham, Tyne, Harwich, Milford Haven and Poole all have their borrowings set against the public sector borrowing requirement, which, in turn, restricts their freedom. They all want to return to the status quo that they enjoyed before the debate on this issue began.

Others would like the ports to be privatised, but the chairmen and chief executives, including those at Dover, oppose privatisation. Unfortunately, the power to impose it on them still remains, although the harbour revision orders sought to remove it. This is only a guess, and it will be interesting to hear the comments of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), but the Conservative party appears to be pursuing this issue to plug the £35 billion hole in its public finance plans. I put it to Conservative Members that if they cannot persuade authorities to privatise, they should not impose privatisation.

I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would make it clear whether he agrees with or opposes privatisation. I say that particularly in respect of Poole, because I represent 75 per cent. of the harbour area. If he wants to state his intent clearly, it would be helpful if he withdrew his formal objection to the Poole harbour revision order. On 3 November 2004, he wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, saying:

> "The effect of the Harbour Revision Order would be to deprive the taxpayer of resources and will undermine the will of Parliament clearly expressed in the Ports Act 1991."

[Jim Knight]

I do not deny that the will of Parliament, as expressed in 1991, was clearly in favour of privatisation; happily, the composition of Parliament has changed since then, and the will of this Parliament would be somewhat different. However, the key phrase in the letter is "to deprive the taxpayer of resources".

The letter, which is specifically about the proposed Poole harbour revision No. 2 order, is the clearest indication that we have of the official Opposition's desire to privatise Poole harbour.

That would be a disaster for Poole. The harbour area extends across 10,000 acres of an exceptional environment. I am pleased to see the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) in his place, and I am sure that he would vouch for the fact that it is one of the south coast's jewels. Poole is one of the world's largest natural harbours, and its extensive waters provide what the website calls

"a magnificent haven for recreational sailing and water sports".

It is home to all manner of leisure craft and to a fishing fleet of about 100 vessels. Walkers, bird-watchers, sailors and fishermen all enjoy the wonders of Poole harbour, an area that I am privileged to represent so much of.

For more than 100 years, the Poole harbour commissioners have been entrusted with conserving, regulating and improving that environment. They bring together stakeholders such as Poole borough council, Purbeck district council and Dorset county council. In addition to those statutory bodies, English Nature, the Southern Sea Fisheries Committee, the Environment Agency, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the harbour yacht clubs all have a strong and close working relationship with the commissioners.

This morning, I met the chairman of the Poole harbour commissioners, Captain Malcolm Shakesby, who also happens to be a Conservative county councillor. I asked him whether he opposed privatisation, and he was very clear that he does not allow party labels to get in the way of his good judgment. His judgment is that privatisation would be bad for Poole because stakeholders would not have the same voice or the surpluses currently generated by the commercial port, which takes up just 60 acres of the 10,000 acres of the harbour area. Those surpluses are reinvested in looking after the interests of all the stakeholders who sit round the table when the commissioners meet. In Poole people's real fear of privatisation is that the surpluses will go to shareholders and that we will return to the days when a few rich traders and the corporation of Poole owned the port in the 19th century and before, and there was profiteering and neglect of the harbour. It is in order to preserve the harbour and its environment and to protect the interests of all its users that I strongly oppose its privatisation.

The commissioners' objective is "to maintain the balance in the harbour between commercial, recreational and environmental interests, at the same time maintaining a sustainable and commercially viable medium-sized trust port."

That is a commendable objective for the commissioners to pursue. Realistically, a private company cannot balance those interests in the same way.

Several Members want to speak, and although I secured the debate, I want to hear voices from all over the country who are concerned about the issue. As I said, I am strongly opposed to imposing privatisation on trust ports. It is good to see Members from all parties in the Chamber, and I invite them to make a clear statement of their intent. Are they for or against the port's privatisation? For the sake of my constituents who are concerned about the port and the harbour of Poole, I ask the hon. Member for Christchurch to be very clear about whether he is in favour of, or against, its privatisation.

9.41 am

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole) (Con): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) on securing the debate. The House does not discuss enough such issues as our ports in general and trust ports in particular. It is to the great credit of the hon. Gentleman that he has raised such an important issue.

The issue of trust ports affects several Members of Parliament and their constituencies, including, as the hon. Gentleman said, Poole. Poole is a good example of a trust port. It is well managed and successful, and the quality of the people who run it is very good. It is generally popular because all its stakeholders in the greater area of Poole have their say. It is a traditional British compromise in that it brings together various interests, so it works.

The hon. Gentleman became upset when he talked about privatisation, but I do not see that on the agenda for Poole, simply because there is no local demand for it. Since 1895, which is about 110 years ago, the Conservative party has been in office for two thirds of that time, and was in office with a substantial majority for 18 years—a very long time—under Mrs. T. If we had been dedicated to privatising the port, and if there was any time when the port was, to use the hon. Gentleman's phrase, at risk of privatisation, it would have happened then.

My predecessor, John Ward, talked to most of the local stakeholders in the port and took the view that trust status was an appropriate solution for Poole, which is why the trust has remained and has kept being successful.

Jim Knight: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify whether he would support or oppose the privatisation of the port if the question was put?

Mr. Syms: The issue is whether I support the trust status of the port, and I do. If, in 20 years, the commissioners believed that a different relationship or organisation was necessary, one would have to consider that. At the moment, however, and for the foreseeable future—and, I suspect, for the next 110 years—Poole will remain a trust port because it works well. We are the second largest port in the south-west and are very successful.

As the hon. Member for South Dorset pointed out, there is a good balance between the commercial activities of the port, which is profitable, although it is always a struggle to keep ferry companies interested in coming in—a vital component of the port's success—and its recreational and environmental activities.

Indeed, the port's profitability is used to manage the harbour, to ensure that it is properly dredged and that the sites of special scientific interest are protected. Poole is well known for its leisure activities, such as sailing and yachting. They depend on the success of the port.

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): I am listening to the hon. Gentleman's arguments with great interest. He is painting a rosy picture of the future of Poole as a trust port. That could be extended to all the other trust ports. On that basis, would he support moves to remove Poole from the 1991 orders that provide the Secretary of State with redress to privatise it?

Mr. Syms: That is a different issue. As the hon. Member for South Dorset said, the Office for National Statistics has changed the way in which these ports are considered. The Government have some form in the way in which they finance some of their public corporations. Network Rail is a perfect example. It has about £10 billion of debt, which the Government have kept off the public balance sheet. With my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), I think that it is legitimate to consider how we determine and count the amount of money that is used by various public corporations. That is a legitimate area for some political argument and no doubt that will be resolved in due course.

Returning to trust ports, Poole is certainly a successful port. The Government have not done us any great favours over the years. The road network into Poole is not particularly good. In the roads programme under the Conservative Government, there were proposals to build a bridge over Holes bay to the A350 and to build a link road to the A31, which were cancelled. Fortunately, through the hard work of the harbour commissioners and the borough, we managed to persuade the Government to put a scheme back into the local transport plan, with the support of our neighbours in Bournemouth and Dorset county council. It has been a little delayed because the Government were pushing for a private finance initiative, which was not appropriate. However, the prospects for Poole are pretty good and getting the second bridge in place should help the port.

If I were to make a plea, the greatest difference to be made to the port of Poole would be by focusing on improving the road network so that people could easily get out of the port. When I run into friends and individuals who have used the ferry port, it is noticeable that quite a lot of them have got lost coming out of Poole. I therefore think that, if we are to maintain Poole as a successful port, when we are in Government we will have to consider very seriously how to improve transport links.

As I have said, Poole is a successful port. There is a legitimate area of disagreement over the harbour revision orders and the question of money and finance. I know that that will irritate some local people in Poole, who are getting caught up in a political argument, but I hope that that can be resolved. On trust ports, we have to consider each example and decide whether it is fit for purpose. In the previous Parliament, the Government made reforms to corporate governance. Poole has always done extremely well in terms of how it has run its affairs. It has been open and transparent. I know that some trust ports were run in rather bizarre and undemocratic ways and that there were necessary reforms. However, we must all examine the trust ports in our constituencies to assess appropriateness and fitness for purpose in terms of what is being provided.

I am happy with how Poole is run. I understand that we are a few months from a general election, and it is easy to make various allegations across the Chamber. I am sure that my party is as capable of doing that as your party—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have no party when I am in the Chair.

Mr. Syms: My apologies, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I understand that the forthcoming election has added a little fizz. However, since the article in the Daily Echo the other week, which contained allegations made by the hon. Member for South Dorset and which quoted my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, I have not had a single phone call or letter one way or the other. I think that that is because people support the status quo and would be surprised if that changed.

Jim Knight: To clarify, in respect of any speculation that this issue might be related to the election, I would be delighted if, as a result of today's debate, there were clarification from all parties in the Chamber that we all agree that the current status of the trust port of Poole should continue, and that the objection from the official Opposition should be withdrawn. Then we can carry on with any campaigning that we want to pursue on the subjects that we choose, such as the successful economy, the health service and schools, and leave this issue to one side.

Mr. Syms: The hon. Gentleman makes his own point.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend referred to the article in the Daily Echo on 10 March. Does he recall that in that article the hon. Member for South Dorset was quoted as saying:

"Objecting to this order is holding up £6 million of investment"?

Today, just a few days later, he admitted that that is not the impact of the order. Has my hon. Friend taken note of that disparity?

Mr. Syms: I always listen carefully to what the hon. Member for South Dorset says, as he is my parliamentary neighbour.

I would like to return to the general view that Poole trust port is a successful port; long may it remain so. It has broad support and I am sure that my party will support its current status. There is a knotty issue in relation to the harbour revision orders and money. If what the hon. Gentleman has said is true, I hope that it will not hold up any investment plans.

Clearly, there have been changes to ferry traffic across the channel. There are concerns that other ports may poach our business and one always has to think of the future, which is why we need a deeper channel to enable a wider range of ships to come into the harbour. Ferry traffic, or any sort of traffic in the harbour, is the basic seed corn that provides money for the port, from which all other things flow. I am pleased that the hon.

[Mr. Syms]

Gentleman has initiated the debate. I am happy that other hon. Members should be able to talk, glowingly or otherwise, about ports in their constituencies.

9.52 am

Mr. Alan Campbell (Tynemouth) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to the debate, and I begin by commending my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) for raising this important subject.

I intend to speak glowingly about my local port. I shall spend my time commenting on the port of Tyne, the future of which is of great concern to my constituents, some of whom are employed by the Port of Tyne authority, river users in general and the whole region, whether we are talking about commercial interests, leisure interests or environmental interests.

The port of Tyne is one of more than 100 trust ports, and one of the largest. It was affected by the decision of the Office for National Statistics to reclassify ports as corporations, and therefore applied for a harbour revision order to keep its trust port status. That order was not challenged by anyone locally, but was challenged by the official Opposition and by the Major Ports Group, and that may yet lead to a public inquiry, which in turn may lead to the sort of uncertainty that my hon. Friend spoke about earlier.

The debate has been moved on to some extent by the announcement last week by the Conservative party that—in the unlikely event that it returns to office—it plans to privatise the port of Dover, and that it will consider other ports. We await the comments of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) to learn whether it has missed Poole off that list, or whether that has come as a surprise to the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms).

Mr. Prosser: Is my hon. Friend aware that when the Tory shadow Secretary of State came to Dover and made his announcement, without the courtesy of notice, he said that he would consider these matters on a port-by-port basis? It might be Dover today, but it will be Poole and Tyneside tomorrow.

Mr. Campbell: Indeed. None of that surprises me, and it helps me to make my next point. In 1995, the then Conservative Secretary of State for Transport planned to privatise three ports: Ipswich, which was privatised, Dover and Tyne. Dover and Tyne were saved only because of the 1997 general election and, as my hon. Friend has clearly indicated, that not only puts his port in the picture, but the port of Tyne as well. That is a cause of deep concern to port users and stakeholders.

In Transport questions last week, the hon. Member for Christchurch described privatised ports as "thriving". That is interesting, because it is exactly the same word that has been used again and again to describe the port of Tyne. It is thriving because profits increased by 49 per cent. last year. Turnover is £27 million and rising. That allows investment on an unprecedented scale—£72 million in the last decade and £10 million in the past year. The Port of Tyne authority now employs 430 people directly, of whom 80 have been employed in the past 12 months. It plans to employ more people.

One NorthEast, the regional development agency, has assessed that as many as 10,000 jobs depend on activity in the area covered by the Port of Tyne authority. The port deals with 3 million tonnes of cargo. The number of cruise ships entering the Tyne is doubling year on year. The number of passengers, most of whom are going to northern Europe and Scandinavia, has grown to almost 1 million.

One of the most significant developments of the port is as a car terminal. The port allows the export of about 400,000 Nissan vehicles from the nearby factory in Washington and the import of 60,000 Volkswagen into the country. That makes the port of Tyne the ninth largest car terminal in the world. Having made that happen is a great commendation of the Port of Tyne authority. As a throwaway point, it is interesting that a port that made its name on the export of coal is—sad to say—importing coal. That is a sign of the times. It means that income is generated that allows investment in new and upgraded deep-river berths and in the transport infrastructure.

So, the port is a success story. That is a credit to its management. It is a credit also to the work force and a credit to the decision not to go down the route of privatisation that the Government made when they came into office in 1997. I therefore ask my hon. Friend the Minister for two assurances. The first is that the uncertainty that resulted from the ONS reclassification will not be used as an excuse to introduce privatisation by the back door and that the Government's position on privatisation has not changed. The second is that, if the objections remain in place and we go to a potentially lengthy public inquiry, the Government and, in particular, the Treasury will make it absolutely clear that none of the investment plans will be held back during the period of uncertainty.

Jim Knight: It will be useful for me to clarify the inconsistency between what was reported in the Daily Echo and what I said today. My understanding is that, as a result of representations that have been made by Labour Members, the Treasury has—at least in the case of Poole—given an assurance that will allow the borrowing necessary for its £6 million dredging programme to go ahead.

Mr. Campbell: I am delighted to hear that, because we need reassurance, particularly if we are entering a new period of uncertainty for trust ports, including the port of Tyne. There is a strong sense that the port of Tyne is improving, that it is, to use the phrase of the hon. Member for Poole, "fit for purpose" and that, therefore, privatisation, particularly if imposed by a future Government, would be a retrograde step. I am certain that it would be regarded as a retrograde step by fishermen in my constituency, who struggle to make a living, if light dues suddenly increased. It would be a retrograde step for shipbuilders and ship repairers if they had to pay more for dredging. It would be a retrograde step also if ferries, cargo ships and cruise ships had to pay more for pilotage.

So, we are left with the question of whether that concern is justified or is simply a result of the imminence of a general election. I think that it is justified, because the objection put forward by the UK Major Ports Group and by the official Opposition—that trust status gives an advantage over privatised ports—sends out a clear message about what would happen to charges and to the assets of those ports should they fall into entirely private hands. The concern is also justified, considering that shareholders would expect a return on their investment. The short-term thinking that could come into play would be intensely damaging to an industry that relies on long-term investment and judgments about the future. The concern is further justified, considering what could well happen not only to levels of employment, which I am pleased to say are increasing at the port of Tyne, but pay and conditions.

Mr. Chope: Would the hon. Gentleman like to comment on the undoubted success of Tees port as a privatised port?

Mr. Campbell: I am not making the point that privatised ports may not be successful; the point that I am trying to make to the hon. Gentleman is that the port of Tyne is successful. We should judge the port on its growing success. If one considers it in terms of income, employment and investment, it is a success. The phrase that has been used by people employed by the port is, "If it is not broke, why fix it?" A policy that may well be imposed for ideological reasons, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset has alluded, will not do anything other than damage the long-term future of the port of Tyne.

The Port of Tyne authority owns 580 acres, and along the banks of the river Tyne we have seen not only impressive new housing developments, but the loss of land that ought to be retained for industrial and commercial use. It has been turned over to housing, and in many ways that restricts what adjoining commercial land can be used for. In a rush to privatisation, I would not want to see a land sale of large proportions that jeopardised the long-term future of the port and the people who depend upon it. Long-term investment is important—not the short-termism that could well come in through the back door with privatisation.

My constituents will be listening with great interest to what my hon. Friend the Minister says when he replies to this important debate, but they will be listening with even greater interest to the reply from the official Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Christchurch.

The port of Tyne was set up in 1850—two years before the borough of Tynemouth was set up. I do not want to make a party political point, but for most of the time the borough was under the control of the Conservative party, because it seemed that the major parties had an agreement about the need for politics to be pragmatic. They did not have a problem with local governance, nor public provision sitting alongside private provision. Unfortunately, if we have a proposal that means privatisation for ideological reasons, it tells us something about how the Conservative party has arrived at its current position.

The port of Tyne had to survive the push for privatisation in the 1990s. When this Government came to power, they subjected trust ports to a root-and-branch review, and ensured the highest standards of government and accountability. The port not only met those standards, but it is now held up as a model for other ports. It would therefore be beyond comprehension to myself and many of my constituents if the port and the jobs connected to it were to be put at risk by privatisation for its own purpose.

10.4 am

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): At the outset I should declare some interests. As well as being a former merchant navy officer, I spent the last 12 years of my sea-going career sailing in and out of the grand port of Dover under the white cliffs. It is the busiest ferry port in the world, and certainly the busiest premier port in the UK. It is an area for which I have great affection and to which I have a great connection, having lived in it for more than 25 years.

I know a little bit about Dover harbour board, including its successes and some of its weaknesses. I know about the people who use the port to run the ships, sail on the ferries, cross as passengers or run the port. The port is our largest employer bar none, and the port-related industries stretch far and wide. We rehearsed all those arguments during the long and exhaustive channel tunnel debates that took place in this very Room when it was the Grand Committee Room.

Let us come back to the present. My hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) accurately set the scene in respect of harbour revision orders. The matter is not being discussed in the back room of the Dog and Duck, people have not been knocking on our surgery doors about it, and it takes quite some time to explain it. My hon. Friend's explanation was succinct.

My summary is that the harbour revision orders are seen as a method that has been agreed between the Government and the trust ports sector of avoiding the negative impacts of reclassification on trust ports and of minimising the damage that reclassification would have on their present good governance, which emerged mainly from work done by the Labour Government between 1997 and 2001 and the publication, "Modernising Trust Ports—a Guide to Good Governance". To put the matter into context, one of the main conclusions of the review was that trust port status was a highly effective system of port management that successfully combined commercial and statutory objectives, and that trust status offered an accountable and open system of port management whose financial and strategic independence should be protected. We are here today to protect that good governance and not to look for solutions to a problem that clearly does not exist.

The report went on to state that reclassification would result in the need for financial reporting to the Department, that it would bring trust ports into the scope of Government public borrowing limits, that it would require scrutiny and approval of port borrowing requirements and that it would possibly even require the return of an annual dividend to the Government. It would be interesting to explore that possibility, especially as the would-be Conservative Government would cut £35 billion out of the general public spending budget and take £2 billion or £3 billion out of transport, which is what we are discussing today.

Frankly, no one would have been particularly surprised—I would not have been—if the harbour revision orders had gone through without any objection, debate or rebellion in the streets. The only reason that that did not happen was because politics raised its ugly head. The objections about the port in my constituency—I believe that this is common to all the other trust ports—came from the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and also, in my neck of the woods, from the Conservative leader of Dover district council and the Conservative regeneration spokesman at Kent county council, although those two people have allowed wiser counsel to prevail and have withdrawn their objections to the orders.

[Mr. Gwyn Prosser]

The objections were lodged so close to a possible general election that I thought and suggested to colleagues that they offered an ideal campaigning opportunity for the Labour party to link them with the spectre of an incoming Conservative Government—moreover, a Government who would privatise and sell off all the trust ports to the highest bidder. I recoiled from that, because I questioned whether my wise and worldly constituents would swallow such a mouthful. They saw what happened in 1995, 1996 and 1997, when the Tories tried to sell the port of Dover.

While I was still pondering whether we could make that link and take on board that great campaign, events intervened and the Conservative shadow Secretary of State—God bless him—came to my constituency and announced to us all that the port of Dover would be privatised and that all the money would be ploughed back into the local community. The Conservatives would build new railways, roads and huge car parks in the middle of Kent, and all the transport problems would dissolve because of changes at the port. He also said that a dividend would be paid to the port to give it some capital growth. How they would do all that is another question, but perhaps one for another debate.

We do not have to consult the crystal ball, however, to discover whether the Conservatives would put money back into the local community after selling a public asset. All we have to do is read the record. Their very first privatisation was of Sealink. I declare another interest: I was a chief engineer with Sealink when it was sold, as though from beneath our feet, almost a pilot scheme. Sealink was a Dover-based company, although we had vessels all around the coast. Not a penny piece of the proceeds from that privatisation came down to Dover or to any of the ferry ports. Sealink was sold for a song to an American gentleman who cut conditions and crews, and sacked half the work force. That is the nature of privatisations under the Tories, including any future privatisations.

That was the first privatisation, so let us consider the last privatisation, of British Rail—at least I think that it was the last. We have rehearsed time and time again what a huge botch-up that was. Indeed, we are still struggling and paying taxpayers' money to correct the difficulties and injustices caused by that privatisation. In east Kent, where I live, Connex has been taken back into Network Rail, which is a publicly-owned company, to redress the balance and get things, shall we say, back on the rails again. Again, what did we see in that privatisation? We saw loss of jobs and futures for many people. That is the reality of privatisation.

My hon. Friends the Members for Tynemouth (Mr. Campbell) and for South Dorset talked about the 1997 election intervening on the Conservatives' plans to sell trust ports. However, it was not only the 1997 election that intervened, but the good people of Dover and the trade unions. I should like to remind people of the marvellous campaign that was fought then. I anticipate that a similar campaign will be fought this time, although we shall have to concentrate it all into the next eight or nine weeks, or between now and whenever the general election comes.

At that time, we enjoyed the support of the Dover Harbour Board. The chairman and the directors of the board said what they say now: that privatisation of the port of Dover would not be in the interest of the port—or, they added then, the community. The Dover Harbour Board has always worked well in parallel with the local community, although the two, of course, argue—it is almost second nature for people to complain about the council, the Government or, in this case, the harbour board. However, in the background the community knows that Dover Harbour Board is the biggest employer in Dover bar none and wants it to stay that way. Although the new management has launched efficiency drives, it is trusted to manage the port not only commercially, but fairly and equitably.

In 1995, we enjoyed the support of the local community, with petitions in the street. I cannot remember how many thousands of people queued to oppose the privatisation—after all, they had not been consulted one iota. The change was being imposed on them and delivered from on high, which was just not the way to do things. Our objections enjoyed the support of Dover district council, Kent county council and the town council. Notably, we had the support of the mayor, Councillor Jimmy Hood, my good friend and comrade, who was also then the Speaker of the Cinque Ports. The Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports was the late Queen Mother, and even she thought it appropriate to write to us with words of encouragement in our struggle against privatisation. That is how high the campaign went.

Not to put people in any order or category, Dame Vera Lynn turned out for us in Parliament square, to sing "The White Cliffs Of Dover".

The issue is not something that will be discussed between, perhaps, an incoming Conservative Government, a few transport officials and the port of Dover; rather, it is a massive community concern, which people feel strongly about. People are resistant to change, but it is not just that; as well as feeling that, at the very least, it is better the devil they know, at another level they know that the port of Dover has worked alongside the community since the 1600s and they do not want that situation upset.

Who would buy the port of Dover? Who showed an interest back in 1995? First, the ferry companies, which had initially resisted the sale, started to ask what it would cost and what they would get out of it—what would be the advantages? As soon as the private ferry companies showed an interest, the port of Dover smelled a rat. Did it want one private operator to run the busiest ferry port in the world, one that Calais totally relied upon? Of course it did not. Therefore, the port of Calais became the main interested party. In the port of Dover, there is already a French company, SITA, collecting the refuse and sweeping the streets. It is one thing for the French—some of my best friends come from the other side of the channel—to sweep the streets of Dover; it is another for them to own and run the busiest ferry port in the world. That is why local people were so concerned and why the campaign reached such great heights. That is what happened in 1995 and it could well happen again.

In our local newspapers, people are recalling those dark days, remembering the great campaign that was fought and taking a stand against any movement towards privatisation.

Lastly, I look back again at 1995 and at the vested interests. Given their experience of mergers, reconstructions and privatisations, the trade unions in Dover, not unexpectedly, lined up in opposition, along with the local Labour party and my local campaign. They included what is now the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers, the GMB, the Public and Commercial Services Union and every union that had any connection with the disparate activities that go on in a busy port such as Dover. I have not sounded them all out, but in the past 24 hours I have spoken to all the trade unions at local and regional level, and they are looking forward to the campaign. At last we have what amounts to a recruitment sergeant for the Labour party in Dover. It will be interesting to hear what the hon. Member for Christchurch has to say. If the speeches that we have heard so far in this small gathering are anything to go by, the word isolation enters one's consciousness.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, let me remind hon. Members that I allow a great deal of discretion in debates such as this. However, we are discussing the future of the trust ports. I accept that history has a bearing, but I hope that emphasis will be placed upon the future.

10.18 am

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich) (Lab): I shall talk about my trust port, Harwich Haven Authority. I have worked with it for a number of years, not only as an MP but as a parish councillor, and I know what an excellent job that port authority does for the shipping industry, for the protection of the environment, and for the regulation and safety of the area. We should all be aware that UK ports are responsible for 95 per cent. of the UK trade that goes through them—that is a big contributor to the economy of the United Kingdom. Any proposal that might destabilise the economy, or the shipping industry, should be closely scrutinised.

We in Harwich are a bit puzzled by the objection made by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope). Harwich Haven Authority is responsible solely for pilotage and conservancy and it gets its charges from that. It does not own the port, or any port; it is responsible only for the harbour and for stakeholders within its area. It provides services for shipping using the commercial ports of Felixstowe, Ipswich, Harwich International, Harwich Navyard and Mistley, and boarding and landing services for the rivers Thames, Medway, Blackwater, Colne and Crouch. It does not own any parts of any port, but is purely there for the safety of pilotage and use of the area.

We cannot understand why the Conservatives would want to privatise this trust port. The Opposition are the only people who object to the harbour revision order for the Harwich Haven Authority trust port. The UK major ports industry has not objected to the port's applying for that order. We find it interesting that the Tories have an interest in Harwich Haven.

Jim Knight: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. The hon. Member for Christchurch is the only objector to the harbour revision order for Harwich. All the others have received an objection from the UK Major Ports Group, including Milford Haven, which the hon. Member for Christchurch has inexplicably not objected to. It almost looks as if he has made a mistake and objected to the wrong one.

Mr. Henderson: I agree with my hon. Friend. The puzzle goes even further, because the trust port takes no money from the public purse. It raises all its charges on pilotage, conservancy and commercial shipping, so it is not a burden on the public finances of this country. Every penny of the money raised from commercial shipping goes back into enabling the trust port to fulfil its responsibilities, including environmental protection.

The authority is also responsible to its stakeholders. The chief executive's team is represented on all the major stakeholder groups—liaison groups, leisure users' committees, the Stour and Orwell estuary management group and the Haven ports and pilotage committee. Its big interest is supporting its stakeholders. We saw the rush to find funding from the Tories over the years when they privatised the infrastructure of the railways, and we saw the decay of that infrastructure because the money went purely to shareholders and not where it should have been going—into safety. My fear is that we will go down the same road—or shipping lane—if ports such as Harwich Haven Authority are privatised. The shareholders would be more interested in what they might get in their pockets than in port emergency plans or environmental aspects of the running of the harbour.

Harwich Haven Authority owns only pilots, some piers, oil spill vessels and various other things such as offices. It does not gain any commercial benefits that could possibly go to a privatised company, but only the rights to the estuaries that it serves. It makes sure that those estuaries are served safely and are environmentally protected for the future. The fishermen and leisure craft that use the port work closely with the Harwich Haven Authority. I do not believe that a private commercial operator would want even to discuss the benefits to those users rather than the interests of its shareholders.

I ask the hon. Member for Christchurch to consider his objection to the Harwich Haven Authority trust port and to withdraw it. Harwich Haven Authority can then get on with doing the job that it has done so well over many years and provide a good service not only for commercial shipping but for the fishermen and leisure craft in my area, so that they can get on with the job that they are good at. There is no other objection, and no public borrowing requirement. Harwich Haven Authority is a non-profit making organisation and any profits that it does make go back into the infrastructure. I ask him to withdraw his objection so that it can apply for the harbour revision order and get on with the job.

[Mr. Henderson]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister would like up to a quarter of an hour to reply to the debate, so if the Opposition spokesmen can divide the time that remains between them, I am sure that will be a happy situation.

10.25 am

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I shall keep my comments fairly brief. I congratulate the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) on securing the debate. He has today represented the best interests of his constituents—as he always does—in bringing this matter forward. He has highlighted concerns that many of us have about the future of the trust ports—and certainly about their future should the Conservative party ever return to power—not, thankfully, that that is very likely at the moment.

The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser) referred to the Cinque ports. We all, of course, remember from our school history that those were at one time important for the future of England. However, the Cinque ports are still important to Britain. They are important to our imports and it is important to ensure that they are well managed and properly run.

I mention those ports because I think that the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) sees himself, given all the objections that he raised, as the hon. Member for the Cinque ports. The only trouble is that he does not spell the term as we would; he spells it "sink", because, clearly, his policies would entail the sinking of the trust ports, which are important to the future of shipping in this country.

I have the honour to represent a port, the port of Teignmouth—not Tynemouth, although the two are often confused and mispronounced. We will not go into the pronunciation of Devon terms. The port has just had two harbour revision orders. One was made at the request of the Government. It was necessary to re-establish the management of the harbour commission to make it more accountable to the local public.

The Government moves have been much appreciated, because south Devon now has a consultative body for Teignmouth, on which all the other people who have an interest are represented, so that they can put their views to the harbour commissioners. That is a way forward and shows the trust ports that it is not necessary to go down the privatisation route to get the best out of something. It can be done by involving local people.

That does not mean that everyone in Teignmouth, Shaldon and the surrounding villages is 100 per cent. ecstatic with everything that the harbour commission wants to do. I wish that it were so. Having listened to other hon. Members I am glad that everyone is so happy with their harbour commissioners and what they do. That is not necessarily so in Teignmouth.

At least the advantage of harbour commissioners is that they are local people with an interest in the local area, not shareholders in London or, as was alluded to earlier, a foreign company. We can disagree with them and what they say and do. I am the honorary president of the Teignmouth fisherman and waterman association and there are times when that body has arguments with the harbour commissioners.

Even amid those arguments—and I speak to those on both sides—there is an understanding that all involved are seeking the best for the town. I seriously question the future of ports if they are to be privatised. I do not see the need to seek private ownership for Dover or other trust ports. The debate is important in providing an opportunity to set that out clearly in the run-up to a general election.

I hope, given what has been said, that what would happen under Labour representation would be similar to what would happen under Liberal Democrat representation, although in the past the Labour party has sought to privatise some sectors, wrongly, in my party's view. I hope that the Minister will, in the 15 minutes that he will have for his response, state clearly that the future of the ports is safe and that the Labour party will not allow, but will resist and campaign against, the privatisation proposed by the Conservative party.

10.30 am

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) on securing the debate. Indeed, I am delighted that he has done so, because it allows us to demonstrate the growing interest in the policies of the Conservative party as we prepare for government. There have been desperate sideswipes against fictional Conservative policies on public expenditure, but I remind everybody that we are not only committed to matching the spending plans of the Government on transport, but want to go further and encourage the recycling of under-utilised public sector assets into transport infrastructure replacement and regeneration. That lies behind the imaginative policy proposals that my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) announced last week in Dover.

Mr. Ivan Henderson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chope: I will not at the moment, because I want to develop my argument, but if the hon. Gentleman wants me to respond to his concerns about his constituency, he should know that I am in correspondence with Mr. Bracewell, who I think is the chief executive of the port, and am considering issues relating to the value of the port and of borrowings. I have had a reply to a question suggesting that the borrowing requirements last year were £35 million; there is also a suggestion that the port is worth £30-odd million. As with all the trust ports in the public sector, there is an issue as to whether it should be properly publicly accountable. That is what the debate is about.

Mr. Henderson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chope: I will not give way at the moment, but I think that I have answered that point to begin with.

Lloyd's List, which is a highly respected journal dealing with ports and shipping said in an editorial on 9 March:

"Dover, it will be recalled, was one of the few large ports left unprivatised by the last Conservative government, which has been able to point to the undoubted success of many of the trust ports it moved into the private sector during the years before 1997."

The words "undoubted success" are used. That is what we are interested in: developing successful ports in the UK, and that includes the port of Dover.

Mr. Prosser: Does the hon. Gentleman accept the undoubted success of trust ports such as Dover?

Mr. Chope: The information that I have is that most people in Dover think that the port could do rather better than it has been. I understand from a recent survey on the Dover forum website that well over 50 per cent. of the people in Dover and thereabouts are enthusiastic supporters of our proposals, and that just over 20 per cent. are hotly opposed to them; that was the information last night. That probably reflects the balance of political power in that area—

Mr. Prosser: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chope: Not at the moment.

That is why the leader of Dover district council, who expects to be the next Member of Parliament for Dover—as I expect him to be—has so much support for our proposals on the port of Dover. That is because we propose that the money raised from the enormous number of assets that would be released if the port were sold could be used to improve transport infrastructure in and around the port. Even the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser) would recognise that that is vital. Indeed, I understand that it has been recognised, because the hon. Gentleman has tried to seek assurances from Ministers that they will do that work, which has not been started in eight years of Labour Government, without the need to offer the port the chance of a sale.

As for the future of the A20 and the desperate need to improve that road, the hon. Gentleman has been given some assurance by the transport Minister that he could put in a bid to the regional assembly to try to get it prioritised. If I may say so, that is a recipe for further delay and uncertainty. The people of Dover need quick decisions in order to make dramatic improvements to the infrastructure in and around the port of Dover. That is why so much support is being given to the proposals announced by my hon. Friend last week under the heading "A Better Future for Dover and Deal".

Mr. Prosser: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chope: I will not give way again at the moment. I have only a limited amount of time—[Interruption.] I will not give way again, as I have to deal with a large number of issues. Almost every Labour Member who has spoken said that they were eager to hear what I had to say.

I find it perplexing that at a meeting in Dover on 28 February of the Port Users Group—incidentally, that was the first meeting of that group since the previous March; it is another cause for concern that there is almost one year between meetings, and port users feel that they are not being consulted or involved by the Dover Harbour Board in the port's affairs—a statement was made to the effect that a public inquiry would be held into the harbour revision orders. In the sixth item of business in the minutes of the meeting, it was said that a national public inquiry in June would address the objections made by the UK Major Ports Group and myself to the harbour revision orders for all the major trust ports.

That is the only firm indication that I have received that the Government wish to proceed to a public inquiry. I would welcome an inquiry, but the letter that I received from the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), dated 15 February, in response to a parliamentary question about the Dover harbour revision order, referred to the public inquiry in the following terms:

"The applications for the orders have now all been advertised, and objections have been made in respect of all the ports. Where there is an objection to an application for an order which is not withdrawn there must by law be a public inquiry. Unless these could be combined, this might lead to seven inquiries given that there are objections lodged against each Order.

Even if the inquiries might be combined the issues raised by yourself and the UK Major Ports Group are fundamentally points of principle of the type not normally the subject of such inquiries. There must be some doubt on how an inquiry would help resolve matters and thereby justify the costs of setting up and participating in it."

That statement is totally inconsistent, one might think, with what was announced at the meeting of the Dover Harbour Board users' group on 28 February.

One of the grounds for objecting to the Government's fiddling with the definition of trust ports is that it is a means of trying to circumvent section 10 of the Ports Act 1991. Our view is that if the Government wish to amend or repeal section 10, they should do so by means of primary legislation. They have chosen not to do that in their eight years in office, and if they want to change their policy, they should not try to do so by encouraging the ports in an underhand way to submit harbour revision orders, which could result in a fraud being committed against the national taxpayer. Whether the ports like it or not, the Office for National Statistics defines them as public corporations. In that respect, they are like the Post Office, which must make a return on capital. The Government's policy, however, is that these bodies should not make a return on capital, despite their being public corporations.

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): I ask the hon. Gentleman to reflect on his use of the word "fraud". Changing the composition of the board, and the decision to privatise, are by agreement with the ONS. It is certainly not fraud, and I seriously ask him to reflect on his comment and to withdraw it.

Mr. Chope: I am talking about what I would describe as the potential for fraud. At the moment, the national taxpayer has a possible interest in the value of the ports if they are sold voluntarily. I have sought assurance in parliamentary questions that it would be the Government's policy to revert half the proceeds to the national taxpayer in the event of the harbour revision orders being put into effect and the ports making a voluntary privatisational sale. I have not yet had a clear and unequivocal statement from the Minister. Perhaps he will give such a statement today.

[Mr. Chope]

The Minister should also understand, which I am sure he does, that for as long as these ports are public corporations, they should be making a return on capital to the Department for Transport, which is strapped for cash under this Government. That would give the Department more income. I do not understand why the Department does not expect the ports to provide a return on capital.

Mr. Ivan Henderson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chope: I will not give way again because time is very limited. When the Conservative party is in Government, we will continue our policy and keep existing legislation. We will invite proposals and allow ports to become private sector ports if they so wish. I cite the example of Dover, where the local people, to whom the port should be accountable, clearly believe that the port is not performing to its full potential.

Mr. Prosser: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that it is a point of order.

Mr. Prosser: I hope so too, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it customary for a Front-Bench spokesman to focus his speech so closely on another Member's constituency and to talk so intimately about the issues that affect that Member and his constituency, and not have the courtesy and good grace to give way after he said that he would do so?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is, of course, up to the speaker who has the Floor to decide whether or not to give way. The hon. Gentleman is quite right that the shadow spokesman had said that he would give way, but it is not a matter for the Chair if the Member chooses not to do so.

Mr. Chope: I had already given way to the hon. Member for Harwich (Mr. Henderson). I am trying, in the space of about 15 minutes, to address arguments that have been advanced on several ports.

Mr. Ivan Henderson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Surely if the hon. Gentleman is saying that the money should now go to the Department for Transport, he should say what that would mean.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern, but the content of a Member's speech is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Chope: That last spurious point of order reflects the concerns of the UK Major Ports Group about a level playing field and fair competition, in that a public sector body, such as a trust port, that is not required to make a return on capital and is given privileges without corresponding responsibilities, can compete unfairly against ports already in the private sector. That is the major issue raised by the UK Major Ports Group. It has not yet been answered by the Government, but it may be dealt with in the public inquiries.

10.45 am

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) on securing this debate on the important topic of the future of trust ports, the specifics of future investment plans and the various harbour revision orders. He and our hon. Friends have set out eloquently the benefits that their ports bring to their constituents and the importance of maintaining those activities. We have heard about how the investment programmes, including the infrastructure investment at the port of Tyne, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Campbell) referred, and the important channel dredging at Poole, to quote but two examples, are potentially at risk if we do not progress the harbour orders.

It is clear that others see trust ports not as assets for the community, but as potential assets for their friends to plunder. The hon. Member for Poole (Mr. [illegible]ns) said—entirely uncharacteristically—that the Government had form on fiddling figures, and by implication he deprecated the role and independence of the Office for National Statistics. I am sure that he will reflect on that and write to the ONS accordingly. The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) of course has form on traducing every public body under the sun, so we expect it from him, but we cannot have grown-up and mature Members calling into question the integrity of independent bodies simply to pray in aid rather convoluted political positions.

To be fair to the hon. Member for Poole, I have no idea about where he stands in substance on the particular issues, because his was a confused contribution. I think he said that he would like to see Poole remain a trust port for 110 years if the commissioners want it to. That is fine; I understand that much. When I asked for his opinion on the position of his hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch on the order, as the order will disapply privatisation so that he can obtain the future he wants, he waffled and offered no equivocal point either way. I am sure that that will be reflected on back at the ranch.

I am grateful in part for the element of clarity offered by the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross), because it goes slightly further than an inquiry from a member of the merchant fleet who simply sought in all honesty from another Liberal Democrat Member their position on a range of merchant navy issues. The response that he received from the Member was that he had discussed with the party's policy department—it has a policy department—the various merchant navy issues, but that since there was a lack of up-to-date policy, there was no real detailed information to send to him. The hon. Member for Teignbridge has at least added substance to that. According to the letter, his party needs to debate that area, but it is dependent on local parties putting forward relevant motions. On merchant navy issues, the Member concerned suspects that some people involved with the merchant navy should raise them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser) must exhort some of his colleagues in the merchant fleet to pop along to a Liberal Democrat conference, because that is the only way that they will ever hear Liberal Democrat policy on merchant navy ports or any other issue to do with the merchant fleet. The hon. Member for Teignbridge went further than that, and I am enormously grateful.

These are the issues of substance. In 2001—rather than 2000, to correct gently my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset—the ONS in its wisdom decided that trust ports are public sector corporations. There has been ongoing discussion about that, because we do not agree with it. The essential point made by the ONS is that the ports are public sector corporations, because through my Department or local governance we control appointments to the board, and through the application of the compulsory privatisation order we control their destiny and future. In discussion with ONS, we have arrived at a position where, if the public sector membership of a board is in the minority and the application of compulsory privatisation is disapplied, it will no longer be a public sector corporation. Everyone knows that we have sought to do that through harbour revision orders, which are an entirely appropriate legislative form, by the way. The notion of those bypassing Parliament is not a sustainable charge; they are not irrevocable orders. Harbour revision orders and the future of the ports can be considered by any Government subsequently. They simply show what is in front of us at the moment.

Jim Knight: If the harbour revision orders were to go through, would they prevent what I understood the hon. Member for Christchurch to mean—although it is difficult, because he would not take an intervention—when he said that if trust ports were to continue, a Conservative Government would raid them for cash for the Exchequer because they want to even things out with private operators and get a return on capital?

Mr. McNulty: Essentially, subsequent to the ONS definition, we revert to the status quo, which, overwhelmingly, is what is desired by those who have spoken. There has to be a statutory public inquiry if the objections prevail. The letter the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), sent to the hon. Member for Christchurch does not contradict that in any way. My hon. Friend made his points precisely to exhort the hon. Gentleman and others to withdraw their objections.

We have heard how farcical it is that there is even an objection in the context of Harwich. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman will offer Milford Haven as the way forward. Perhaps he just missed that port and made a minor mistake, or perhaps there is something magical about Milford Haven that means it has not attracted the hon. Gentleman's attention. If the objections prevail, there will have to a public inquiry. That, of course, leads to a degree of uncertainty and time, when we would far rather the ports got on with what they want to get on with.

It is not a question of fiddling or the Government having form in the readjustment of figures, but simply a clash between the ONS defining things in one way, and our disagreement with that. The other point that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State made was this: we feel that these are points of substantial principle that are not normally dealt with at a public inquiry, given that ONS told us what would happen if we go one way in terms of composition and disapplying the privatisation element. A public inquiry usually concerns the detail and substance of the way forward in relation to a trust board.

In truth, my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Campbell) started to move in the right direction in revealing what really lies behind the position of the hon. Member for Christchurch on Dover. I do not doubt that that will be the position on all trust ports. It must be. Why else would the hon. Gentleman object to the disapplication of privatisation compulsion in the cases of the other ports we are considering in relation to harbour revision orders?

Mr. Ivan Henderson: The other point that the hon. Member for Christchurch made concerned ensuring that more money was available for the Department for Transport from the port authorities. I say to him that the only way it could do that is by cutting back on investment. If it cut back on investment, the ports would not be deepening channels in order to take the largest ships, which would drive those ships to other European ports. If they did not do that they would have to increase the commercial charges on that shipping. The hon. Gentleman should be straight about his party's policy in what he says today.

Mr. McNulty: The hon. Member for Christchurch got more and more confused and he sounded more and more—if this is offensive, it is meant to be—like a Liberal Democrat, spending the proverbial penny of taxation last time round. Listening to the hon. Gentleman, proceeds from Dover were going to do everything but build a bridge between Dover and Calais, while at the same time they would keep investment going into the port. We have heard time after time from assorted Opposition Members how any surplus should be reinvested. The dredging at Poole happened only because of that investment and because of what borrowing can accrue subsequent to that reinvestment and that record of reinvestment. Unless we hear otherwise—I am not encouraging anyone to go to Dorset to annoy my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset—every port is up for grabs.

As I suggested, my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth got to the heart of the issue. The trust port on the port of Tyne has some nice waterfront land, in addition to the 10,000 acres surrounding the trust port in Poole of my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset. Surely that is where Conservative Members will come looking for privatisation. They will not do that to improve the trust ports, or substantially to improve the contribution that the ports make to the assorted communities, which we heard about at length, but to take away the ports and not reinvest the money. If it were otherwise, why are they considering that? Why are assorted Conservative policies being developed in that way?

Richard Younger-Ross: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McNulty: No, I will not.

[Mr. McNulty]

Substantial areas of the James report have not yet been seen publicly. Perhaps it says that the Conservatives will privatise all of the trust ports. I do not know. However, let us talk about the harbour revision orders and the wider context of transport finance.

Jim Knight: Will my hon. Friend the Minister clarify that he remains committed to opposing the privatisation of Poole? The hon. Member for Christchurch failed to do that.

Mr. McNulty: We have said clearly that, with the harbour revision orders, we are trying to get back to the status quo where the Government and the trust ports can work together and be confident about the future. We seek to work with trust ports to disapply compulsory privatisations, and seek to recalibrate the balance of public sector figures on the board, so that we can return to the status quo that prevailed before. I say that with certainty. We have no intention of inhibiting investment plans should things go to public inquiries. It is not our role or intention to interfere with or inhibit those investment plans.

What I cannot do is give the House an assurance that those investment plans are safe or secure in the event—God help us—of a Conservative Government. Given what the hon. Member for Christchurch said about Dover and his actions in putting up objections to the disapplying of compulsory privatisation, I cannot give any such assurance. It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman did not either.

The Conservatives are supposedly going to match our transport plans. They cannot, by their own lights, do that. They are planning at least £2 billion worth of cuts à la famous James report. Of that, £800 million or £900 million is already being dealt with through efficiencies, so there is a hole of £900 million straight away. The hon. Member for Christchurch and his colleagues are travelling throughout the country. Every time they are in a hole on transport, they promise something. We have clocked them at about £3.5 billion worth of promises beyond what the transport party is doing. Throw in the £900 million hole and, before the hon. Gentleman has done anything, there is a black hole of nearly £5 billion in transport commitments, let alone anything else.

Mr. Chope: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McNulty: It is fifty-eight minutes past the hour, so of course I will not. In transport and every other area, nothing that a Conservative spokesperson says on finance can be trusted one iota unless the party comes clean on every aspect of every area of transport spend. Conservative promises are worthless on paper, but if one wants a promise on a road, a bridge or anything else in the coming weeks, ask a Tory spokesman to come. They will promise the earth, the moon and the stars, but they will do absolutely nothing for the future of the trust ports. Trust ports have worked so well. Under a continuing Labour Government, trust ports will continue to work and to contribute to their communities well into the future.

Public Transport (Leigh)

11 am

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): It is a welcome, if somewhat rare, pleasure to have the chance to focus the attention of the House on the needs of my constituency and, in particular, its appalling public transport provision. I note that the Minister has already been present for one debate and I feel somewhat guilty about detaining him further—he may consider it a kind of detention. He is welcome to write out 100 times, "I must do more for public transport in Leigh," but I will leave that up to him.

Now is perhaps not the best time in the parliamentary cycle to highlight areas of failure, but as the growing debate about transport priorities in the north-west has gone live, I have felt increasing frustration about the raw deal that my constituents are getting. It cannot be allowed to continue. Last year, a major transport scheme in my constituency, the Leigh-Salford-Manchester guided busway, was one of a number of schemes placed on hold pending a review of transport priorities by the North West regional assembly. In the region, that was seen as a consequence of ongoing negotiations about the Metrolink scheme.

Metrolink does not affect my constituency directly, but I have supported colleagues in the call to get it back on track because I recognise its huge strategic importance to the economic regeneration of our city region. Of course, all the towns in Greater Manchester, Leigh included, have a stake in the continuing success story of city centre Manchester. That is why it is right that my constituents should contribute to Metrolink via their council tax. However, there is a real danger that Greater Manchester's transport needs will become defined by Metrolink. If the lobbying campaign pays off and the scheme goes ahead—as I have said, I hope that it does—transport officials may feel that Manchester has had its lot and should not come knocking for some time. I hope that the Minister understands and appreciates how unfair we would feel that was.

The Greater Manchester passenger transport authority has long recognised that links west from Manchester are poor and that there is no immediate prospect of the towns along the East Lancashire road leading to Leigh benefiting from Metrolink. For precisely that reason, the £26 million guided busway was long in the planning to compensate Leigh for not being part of Metrolink, not phase 3 but phase 2. The guided busway was expected to be fully operational by this year.

I sought this debate because I believe that Leigh's transport needs are becoming lost in the debate about Metrolink. It would seem that the guided busway has been thrown back into the pot of medium to low-priority public transport schemes in the north-west, even though it was given provisional planning and funding approval by the Department for Transport a couple of years ago. There are many things in its favour. It is an innovative use of bus transport, which seems to fit well with current priorities in the Department, and it would cut congestion on one of the north-west's main arterial routes, the East Lancashire road, which is a severe and growing problem.

I know the Minister well and I appreciate that he may be subject to more constituency special pleading than most Ministers, but, if he will allow me, I would like to issue something of a challenge to him—he is not normally one to back down from a challenge. I ask him to see whether he can find a town similar in size to Leigh, with a population of roughly 43,000 people, in a metropolitan borough, which has poorer public transport provision than we do. I hope that he will take me up on that challenge, because I genuinely do not believe that he can find such a town. My constituents are getting the rawest deal of any in the country.

There are some facts to back up the rhetoric. First, Leigh is the largest town in the country without a rail station. In addition, there is no tram station. We do not benefit from Metrolink, as I have said. Buses are the only option. Secondly, as I will show in the course of my remarks, new research from the House of Commons Library shows that, for public transport, Leigh is by a long margin the worst-served town in Greater Manchester.

I understand the need to balance priorities and to focus scarce public transport resources on areas of strategic transport importance, but it is not as though Leigh is a backwater. We are located at the crossroads of the north-west, halfway between Liverpool and Manchester, and we are flanked on one side by the M6, with the East Lancashire road to the south. We are a matter of miles from overdeveloped Warrington. I do not say that to antagonise my Warrington colleagues, but the town has experienced significant development in the past 20 years, and Leigh is well placed to take up some of the extra development that the north-west is experiencing.

Public transport resources should go towards easing congestion on strategic routes, but they should also pick out the areas of greatest social deprivation. Leigh provides a perfect case study of the importance of quality transport links in preserving a town's economic, social and cultural well-being and of what happens when those links are lost.

In the '50s and '60s—perhaps you will remember this, Mr. Deputy Speaker—Leigh was a thriving industrial town, with high employment in coal mining, the textile industry and engineering of many kinds; big employers such as BICC and David Brown Tractors were based there. However, the 1963 White Paper "The Reshaping of British Railways" dealt the town a savage blow, the proportions of which could not have been imagined at the time. As a result of the Beeching cuts, railway lines passing through Leigh were closed and all the town's stations were lost. Since then, the area has suffered huge social and economic decline. The Beeching cuts were the catalyst for the loss of thousands of jobs in traditional industries and at major public facilities, such as our accident and emergency department.

That act of savagery towards Leigh by Howard Macmillan's Conservative Government was compounded by Margaret Thatcher—our town was left cut off and isolated when the worst of the Thatcher Government's cuts took effect. Following the large job losses that came with the closure of the coal mines and other heavy industries, people were simply unable to find alternative employment; indeed, they really would have had to get on their bikes to do so, because no other transport was available. A double whammy was landed on our town.

The combination of the lack of transport and the loss of employment knocked the stuffing out of Leigh, and the lack of quality transport links has held back our recovery ever since. We are now beginning to see signs of that recovery—the Wigan borough has its lowest unemployment rate for a generation—but the travel-to-work survey in the 2000 census shows that public transport has played little or no part in that. People's only option is to use buses, which simply cannot be relied on to get them to work on time in the main areas of employment: Manchester, Warrington and Bolton.

I should say at this point that in Jim Stones Coaches, Leigh has the best local bus operator in the whole of Greater Manchester, if not the north-west. Jim and his team have provided a first-class service since deregulation and they are thoroughly committed to serving the people of the town. I do not know where we would be without the service that they have provided.

To return to the main issue, however, the 2000 census shows that Leigh residents must rely on cars far more than the residents of any of the other 16 towns in Greater Manchester, with all the extra costs that that puts on people in low to medium-paid work. Only 7.9 per cent. of people aged between 16 and 74 in employment in Leigh use public transport to get to work, which is an appallingly low figure. If the Minister doubted my rhetoric earlier, that figure tells its own story about the quality of public transport in Leigh. Those cars jam the East Lancashire road, the M62 and the A49 junction at Winwick every morning.

As I said, I have independent verification of my argument from the House of Commons Library. I commissioned from it a survey of public transport provision in the 16 biggest towns of Greater Manchester. It confirmed what many people knew: Leigh is the only town without an overground train station or a Metrolink tram service. To add insult to injury, even I was shocked to find that Leigh came bottom in the list of towns ranked according to quality of bus links to central Manchester, with only three frequent services. The Library report states:

"It is clear that Leigh's bus services do not make up for its lack of tram and train services. Leigh has the smallest number of frequent public transport services with the city centre on each mode".

The report concludes that "it is difficult to argue against the assertion that the public transport service between Manchester and Leigh is poorer than with any other similar sized town".

With the exception of Atherleigh way, opened in the mid-1980s and funded by the old Greater Manchester council, Leigh has not had any major transport investment since Beeching did his damage.

The Minister will probably be pleased that I am coming to the end of what he may regard as a long whinge, but I make no apology for it. What I have said needs to be said, and the voice of my constituents needs to be heard, because the current state of affairs is not acceptable. In conclusion then, what am I asking from the Minister and from transport officials, both in our region and in Whitehall? Longer term, Leigh needs access to rail or tram services to the east and west—to Liverpool and to Manchester. We are strategically well located, on the main crossroads between the two great towns of the north-west. In the interim, however, I hope that my hon. Friend will consider a number of specific requests.

[Andy Burnham]

First, I hope that my hon. Friend and his officials will reflect on what I have said and let me know whether they think Leigh is fairly served. I would appreciate a response to the challenge of finding an equivalent-sized town that is more poorly served by transport. As an aside, I also ask the North West regional assembly, which has been instructed by the Department to review transport priorities in the region, to consider what I have said as a contribution to its consultation.

Secondly, I hope that the Minister will clear up the outstanding planning issues affecting the Leigh guided busway as soon as possible, or at least give a commitment to do so. The problem is holding things up, and resolving a number of what I understand to be minor issues would help us to make progress. The Minister may recall that the Secretary of State gave the scheme planning approval in principle some time ago, pending work on other issues, which required further evidence. I am afraid that there is a blight on Leigh and our area in the north-west in that we have, it seems, a large number of great-crested newts, which hold back human progress in the area. I hope that the Minister can say that the issues surrounding the protection of the newts have been satisfactorily dealt with.

Thirdly, there is a genuinely unanswerable case for the Department, working with the Greater Manchester passenger transport executive, to find an immediate funding solution for the busway. Given that provisional funding approval has already been given and that it was part of the deal for Metrolink phase 2, it is not fair that the busway is now pitched back into the pot with the other schemes in the north-west competing for funding. The busway had already been picked out as a priority for progress.

Fourthly, I hope that the Minister will take an urgent look at our proposal for a rail station in the former mining village of Golborne. My right hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) and I are utterly convinced that a rail station there would be a well used feature of strategic importance in the region. Such a station would be our best hope of bringing a rail service to the Leigh and Lowton areas in the not-too-distant future. However, we have experienced great frustration in getting the component parts of the rail industry to engage positively with the case that we have made.

Such a station would be right on the edge of a major sporting facility, Haydock race course, which attracts thousands of visitors every year—I know, because my house is literally next door and they queue up at the end of my drive. I do not call for a station there because of my nimby considerations. The place in question is nestled in the corner between the M6 and the East Lancs road, and there is a huge sporting facility on our doorstep, so it would make great sense to have a station there. Will the Minister see whether he can get more positive engagement from transport officials on that issue?

Ironically, Merseytravel has shown more interest in the Golborne station proposal. It will soon launch a Golborne rail link bus service between the potential site at Golborne and Newton-le-Willows station in Merseyside, in the hope of building a market for rail travel in the Golborne area. Merseytravel deserves help and encouragement from other parties, not least the GMPTE, to approach the proposal with a will to make it succeed.

As I acknowledged, my speech has been something of a whinge, but I ask hon. Members to imagine sitting where I am and having to talk about public transport in Leigh; I would be laughed out of court if I claimed there had been all kinds of positive progress. The situation is not good enough and it needs to improve. I am raising the stakes today and saying that for the next few years I will keep on banging the drum until there have been real improvements.

Until my constituents have real alternatives to the car to enable them to get to their place of work I shall fight tooth and nail any proposal for a congestion charge in Greater Manchester.

11.16 am

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) on securing the debate. When he puts his comments so eloquently and passionately, to reflect what he sees as the reality in his constituency, I do not see it as a whinge-fest. I see it as the duty of a committed constituency MP.

I can answer part of my hon. Friend's query about whether there are people in a worse position by comparing Leigh, with its population of 43,000, with Corby, which has a population of some 50,000 and does not have a railway station. I will leave to one side the rest of the question. The Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Phil Hope), has let me know a few times in recent years that Corby is probably the largest town with no station.

I agree with the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh about the geography of Leigh and Wigan metropolitan borough council, by which Leigh is covered. I accept his points about the town's being on the western fringe of Greater Manchester. As to Metrolink, broadly speaking, everyone certainly accepted that it would be a long time before Metrolink or trams came to either Bolton or Wigan on the western side of the conurbation.

One of the key ways in which we shall deal with public transport is through investment—sustained investment. Over the next three years we shall invest about £870 million in the north-west. That is a major investment. The investment that we are allocating to each region will, it is to be hoped, reflect their economic and environmental objectives. By the bye, over the past three years local authorities in the north-west received more investment than those in any other region, through the local plan process.

In December we announced funding of more than £620 million over the next three years for north-west local authorities. Of the £225 million allocated for 2005–06, £92 million was for Greater Manchester, including about £43 million for small-scale integrated transport schemes of less than £5 million, for transport improvements to ease congestion, increase safety and create a better environment. Wigan council, the local authority responsible for my hon. Friend's area, was given an allocation of £4.109 million.

As I said, Manchester recognises that Metrolink is perhaps not as inextricably linked to all transport spend throughout the authority's area as my hon. Friend suggests, but I understand why he said what he did. The Department has helped Wigan to invest a total of £4.1 million in schemes funded from the Greater Manchester transport infrastructure fund. That fund was set aside by the Government and Greater Manchester in recognition of the fact that Bolton and Wigan would wait a long time for links to be provided by Metrolink. My hon. Friend will know that in February the Department agreed to provide £3.5 million for the fund in 2005–06 and a further £3.5 million in 2006–07. We shall discuss with the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority, which will match that funding, how the money should be spent in Bolton and Wigan. I know that they will not get the large-scale investments that my hon. Friend thinks are needed for Leigh and the borough of Wigan to secure more public transport, but the sums are, in part, recognition of the fact that Metrolink will not come soon to Bolton or the borough of Wigan.

My hon. Friend needs to recognise that there have been some advances, albeit limited in his terms. In 2003–04, Greater Manchester spent nearly £6 million on bus priority schemes and £1.6 million on bus infrastructure schemes, implementing both the south-east Manchester multi-modal study quality bus corridor and the Leigh-Bolton QBC. Apparently I went on the A6 QBC on one of my recent visits to Manchester. I am trying to remember when and in what context, but I cannot. The Leigh-Bolton QBC was completed in 2003 at a cost of some £4.8 million, and has increased passenger reach by 16 per cent., earning time savings of between 10 and 13 per cent.—typically six to nine minutes—and the corridor has brought improved facilities and environmental improvements to Atherton town centre.

My hon. Friend will know of the night bus initiative that connects Manchester city centre to Leigh. Many of those late night journeys are now being run on a commercial basis. Some 1,700 passengers a week use the night bus. He will know, too, of the yellow school bus scheme, in which Wigan has participated, which has introduced American-style yellow school buses to serve Standish high school, among others. I understand that there are plans to purchase additional buses to serve St. Mary's Roman Catholic high school in the constituency.

I know that the biggest disappointment for my hon. Friend is the Leigh guided busway. That was one of the major schemes submitted as part of this year's local transport annual performance round. The proposal by Greater Manchester passenger transport executive to build a new guided busway between Leigh and Ellenbrook is the subject of a planning application to the Secretary of State for an order under the Transport and Works Act 1992. The order, if made, will give GMPTE the statutory powers that it requires to implement the scheme, entirely separately, as my hon. Friend suggests, from the funding process. My hon. Friend is aware that the Department had to defer consideration of that application until GMPTE had provided some important additional information on the environmental impact of the scheme, in particular more detailed survey work on the great-crested newt, which is a protected species.

Last October, GMPTE provided a substantial amount of further information, which, as part of the planning process, had to be sent to other interested parties for comment. The process of exchanging written representations on the new information concluded last month. Because the case is still awaiting statutory determination, I am unable to discuss its merits, as my hon. Friend will appreciate. However, I can assure him that every effort will be made to bring the matter to a conclusion as soon as possible. I hope to be able to make a decision once all the evidence presented for and against the proposals has been carefully considered, all the necessary work has been done by GMPTE on the great-crested newt and other elements, and all the exchange and representation between assorted parties as part of that process has taken place.

The report is now, in its entirety, with the Department for Transport, and I shall ensure that, having weighed the evidence carefully, we make a decision at the earliest possible opportunity. The other half of the equation, as my hon. Friend suggests, is the funding of the scheme.

Andy Burnham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that commitment. As I understand it, the information was submitted some time ago. He probably does not know the date of any Dissolution of this place any more than I do, but I hope that I can prevail on him to say that it would make sense to make the decision sooner, rather than later, given that there may be some interruption.

Mr. McNulty: Given that it is a statutory, or quasi-statutory, process, I cannot give any fixed assurances about a timetable. Suffice it to say that when I go back to the Department, I will try informally to elicit what stage we are at and when we can anticipate a decision.

Although I will bear in mind my hon. Friend's points about alacrity, I have no idea about Prorogation, Dissolution or anything else. I will not promise to do or not do something in the light of a date about which I, my hon. Friend and even the enlightened Deputy Speaker know nothing except what we read in the papers and idly speculate about with colleagues over cups of tea.

My hon. Friend will know that as part of the spending review 2004, and bearing in mind the Government's desire for greater regional involvement in privatisation, we have had to review the relative priority of major local transport schemes. I would not say as abruptly as my hon. Friend that the Leigh guided busway has been lost in the fog and smoke of the debates about Metrolink, but clearly as we move to greater regional devolution there will be finite pots of funding for each region. Perhaps there will be some additional strategic elements but, as ever, politics is the language of priorities, whether decisions are made regionally or at the centre. I unpick my hon. Friend's argument a little bit, none the less I understand the points that he made.

Difficult decisions have had to be made about the priorities of investment proposals. Let me make it very clear: we certainly recognise the merits of the Leigh guided busway scheme. That is precisely why it was given provisional approval in the first place. There is no question about the merits of the project, but since then the cost of the total quality bus contract scheme has gone up significantly, with Government contributions increasing by £17 million to £42.3 million. Given the other funding pressures in the north-west, it has not been possible to prioritise the scheme for funding in the current spending review period. That decision can, and should, be regularly revisited. The scheme has not been cancelled and we will consider it again in the light of advice on priorities received from the region.

[Mr. McNulty]

It is important to say that in the three-year spending review and the last local transport plan settlement, an image was formed—I understand why—that if projects were not set running this year, they would somehow be put to the back of the queue, with no consideration until post 2008 and the next round of the comprehensive spending review. That is not accurate, as there will be any amount of to-ing and fro-ing, slippages and other changes in the regional pot and the projects that have been prioritised as we look at the world in 2005. It is incumbent on us and the region to review the regional prioritisation list on a year-by-year basis, even within the curtilage of the three-year spending programme. That is not to say in any coded way, "The money's there, don't worry about it", but things are not as stark as has often been suggested since the 1 December regionally focused settlement. They are not as stark as my saying, "Leigh guided busway has no chance until the next spending review." The position is far more fluid than that.

I accept much of what my hon. Friend says about Leigh and Wigan borough council being a poorer relation in transport provision for Greater Manchester. I accept his point about the peculiarities of Leigh and Wigan, given that they are on the western periphery of Greater Manchester and sit almost squashed between Merseyside, Warrington and Manchester—the crossroads to everywhere but with contacts to nowhere. I accept those points broadly, and I will look further into the points that he raises.

11.30 am

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

Analogue Television Switch-off

2 pm

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I wanted to secure a debate on something about which I know nothing, for a change, and I thought that I would start by lowering expectations.

I am concerned about the welfare of pensioners and their pensions, which is how I became interested in this subject. I got to thinking about how there are many pensioners, particularly the older ones and those who are housebound, whose televisions are a very important part of their lives. In a few years, their telly will not work, and they might have to find the money to sort out the problem. Switching off the analogue signal might cause considerable distress if it is not handled well.

I started to become more parochial about the issue when I discovered that we in the west of England are not the first round of guinea pigs, but are in year two of Ofcom's four to five-year planned roll-out of the switch-off or switchover—call it what you will—from analogue to digital. My first move is to make a special plea on behalf of the west of England. I should say that not only do I not know anything about this subject, but I do not know my party's policy on it, either, so I have been doing some free thinking.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Webb: No. I have come up with one or two ideas that I have not come across in any of the literature on the subject, so I thought that I would float them now, as this is the time in the electoral cycle for free thinking and radical ideas, and see where we go from there.

Let me start with a special plea for the west of England. The latest regional figures for those who have digital television and those who have not suggest that the south-west, which incorporates the west of England, where I live and which I represent, as does my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), had the lowest take-up of digital television. That was true a year or so ago, and I imagine that that pattern has not changed greatly.

I understand that technical considerations have dictated the sequence of analogue switch-off, or digital switch-on, to some extent, but I wonder how that could have been modified to reflect the fact that switching off the analogue signal in part of the country where digital take-up is low is more of an upheaval and causes more of a problem than it would in an area in which most people already have digital television.

Does the Minister plan to modify the sequence of switching off the analogue signal and moving to digital, or does he plan to advise Ofcom that there should be a modification of the sequence, so that parts of the country in which digital is more widespread would switch off the analogue signal first, giving the rest of us in the west a chance to catch up, which I imagine would be a less painful experience for everyone?

What about the position of pensioners and, more generally, people who are isolated? Ofcom's document, "Driving Digital Switchover", states that in other words, buying a set-top box, and sorting out the aerial or the VCR—

"the transitional cost of conversion"—

"may remain a significant barrier for some households and risks excluding them from TV after switchover."

That is my concern. I would be interested to hear the Government's response.

The consumer expert group states in the executive summary of its report to, I presume, the Minister, in October 2004:

"Although these issues are now well-known and well-understood, the Government's existing policy does not ensure that they are addressed as part of the switchover timetable."

In a sense, this is four years too early for the west, but in another sense we need to get moving now, and any indications that the Minister can give of how he plans to tackle these obvious problems would be appreciated.

What is the nature of the problem for elderly and isolated people? As I say, television might be an integral part of their lives. They might have no real interest in CBeebies or other digital channels, and might be perfectly happy with what they have. They want to know why they will have to pay what will, by then, be £20 or £30 for a set-top box, and get someone to fix the aerial and sort out the VCR, if they have one—charges for which might run into several hundred pounds. Although it is difficult to get reliable estimates of how many people would need, say, a rooftop aerial, I know from first-hand experience that when my family went digital not so long ago, we had to have a man up on the roof because our aerial was not good enough. With the basic state pension at £80 a week, the cost of a box, a VCR and an aerial could amount to two or three weeks' pension in a bad case, and perhaps even more. I would therefore be interested to hear from the Minister how far the Government have got in their thinking.

Some of the documents that I have read refer to the groups covered by the free TV licence, and the suggestion is that the over-75s and the registered blind might be the main group. Are those the parameters that the Minister is considering? Clearly, that would cover a lot of the people I am concerned about, but there are other vulnerable groups, as the Minister will well know.

In its November 2004 report, the independent consumer panel came up with a couple of suggestions, as I am sure the Minister is well aware. The panel suggested a couple of schemes to ease the switchover to digital, and they would cost between £250 million and £400 million.

This, I guess, is where I do my radical free thinking, although it might be boring and hackneyed for all I know; however, I have never read anything along these lines before. Obviously, the spectrum freed up by the switch-off of the analogue signal is of some value, although I have no idea what the figure is. One can speculate about it, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bath may share it with us if he should catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Clearly, it would be helpful to have the Government's latest thinking on the valuation of that spectrum and some indication of whether the first claim on it might not go to the very people who have, effectively, suffered to make it available. If the elderly and the vulnerable cannot go on watching their old telly without spending some money, and the Government benefit to the tune of, perhaps, billions of pounds, the first claim should go to those who made that possible. If people have to pay, and the Government take all the proceeds, it will almost be taxation by the back door.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend out of his misery. He will no doubt not be surprised to hear that there are huge variations in the estimates, but the most recent estimate is that about £460 million per annum could be achieved.

Mr. Webb: I am grateful, as ever, to my hon. Friend. That suggests that the schemes proposed by the independent consumer panel would swallow a substantial proportion of that money in the first year, so it would be helpful to get the Minister's thoughts on that.

The second set of issues relates to people making buying decisions about equipment now. I am still struck by the fact that the vast bulk of television equipment that people are buying is non-digital. Some of those who understand these things far better than I do have suggested to me that people should not do that and that it is not necessarily such a bright idea, because the digital technology will evolve. I am open to that suggestion, but I wonder how many people are buying cheap sets from the bottom end of the market, which will become obsolete unless they pay almost as much as they did for the telly to get them sorted out. The Government now have a sticker system to give people a bit of a clue when they buy a telly, but I still think that awareness out there is very low.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab): One problem with the wider debate is that people have talked about digital televisions, rather than digital access to homes. It is not the television that causes the problem, but the access mechanism. If the hon. Gentleman were to focus on that, we might resolve a number of the problems that he is highlighting.

Mr. Webb: I accept that distinction. However, householders who buy a cheap portable television to be used in a teenager's bedroom are buying equipment that, as it stands, will not receive a digital input. Then, a few years down the line, because they had not really caught on to it, they will have to go back to the shop to buy a box, or to get the set connected to a box elsewhere in the house. Consumers need to be made aware of such things now, so that they can make a more informed choice. I am aware, as a consumer, that I do not begin to understand it, and I have some interest in the subject. I wonder how many people will be similarly affected.

I have seen estimates—perhaps the Minister can clarify the matter—that as many as 2 million set-top boxes will be of no use when the new regime comes in, but I am not sure exactly why. That raises questions about the decisions that people are making now and how informed they are, and about how much warning they will get and whether the Government's publicity is being regionally focused.

[Mr. Webb]

I turn to some of the other issues. My constituency is not particularly rural, but because of the contours of the land parts of it cannot currently receive a digital signal. I understand that about 25 per cent. of Great Britain cannot do so. Again, I hope that the Minister will explain a little more about the transition process, as people from Thornbury and Charfield in my constituency have written letters to me, angry because they are having to pay for the BBC's digital output but cannot receive it. I understand that the digital signal cannot be boosted until the analogue signal is out of the way, so I could write back to them saying that things will be fine once the analogue signal has gone—but we cannot guarantee it. I know that I can visit a Freeview website and enter my postcode to get information on that, but I wonder how certain it will be. In other words, what will be the sequence of events for my constituents in Thornbury, who cannot receive digital? Will they buy a box once they know that BBC 2 and the other channels are to be switched off, not knowing for sure until D-day whether it was worth buying? It is possible that some will buy the equipment—they will have been told that the chances are that it will be fine—who, when the moment comes, will be among the 0.5 per cent. or whatever percentage it is who still cannot receive a digital signal after the change.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): The hon. Gentleman says that a proportion of his constituents cannot get digital, but that is not true. They may not be able to get a digital terrestrial television signal, but they can receive a satellite transmission. Although they may not wish to subscribe and pay a monthly fee, it is possible to get Freesat—although one has to look rather hard to discover how to go about getting it. Digital is available now.

Mr. Webb: Indeed. It is one of those occasions when one uses language loosely because one is not used to the field of expertise. As the hon. Gentleman said, people could take up the satellite option—it costs in the region of £150 to install—but under existing planning regulations, people in some parts of my constituency would not be allowed to erect a dish. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point; people have a choice, but they have decided not to exercise it, and will thus be at a disadvantage when compared with those who can get digital terrestrial television.

Clearly a number of groups are affected. I have already mentioned the elderly, people with poor English and those with particular disabilities. The work done on the position of disabled people and other vulnerable people by the Ofcom consumer panel is fascinating and thorough. I am used to a social security system in which one takes fairly large categories of people and passports benefits to the entire group. The most interesting conclusion of the consumer panel is that such a blanket approach is not the way forward. Instead, it talks of a more community-based, bottom-up approach, using local organisations. Although I have much philosophical sympathy for that sort of approach, there is always a danger of its being piecemeal and patchy, with people being missed out.

Again, I would be interested to hear the Minister's thoughts. Should we have a blanket approach for the over-75s, with local initiatives to pick up other vulnerable groups? What does he have in mind? The digital take-up is very poor among the over-75s. The 2003 figures show that only 16 per cent. of them had taken it up. More significant is its poor take-up among low-income households. I had assumed that the converse might be true. I assumed, for instance, that lone parents needed television, perhaps to keep the children quiet. Indeed, it is an integral part of life for many lone-parent families. I therefore imagined that digital would have a high penetration among low-income families, but the statistical evidence is to the contrary, showing that poorer households tend not to have taken up digital.

I want to mention a couple of other bits and pieces that concern me. I see that a number of hon. Members are in the Chamber, because it is an important issue for us all. Clearly, multiple-dwelling units, and the implications for people living in those, whether public sector or private sector—I strongly suspect that the latter will be more of a problem—present an issue for consideration. We can, in a sense, probably sort out the public authorities with a bit of kick up the backside, but getting private landlords to sort things out might be more difficult. I should be interested to hear the Minister's thoughts on that.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): Has the hon. Gentleman seen the briefing from Astra GB, which states that a substantial number of local authorities and social landlords will not allow a dish on their dwellings? He made a point about receiving the changeover via disk, but that will be denied to the relevant tenants unless there is a change in the planning procedures and the attitudes of some social landlords. Does he perceive any such change in the process, along the way?

Mr. Webb: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. My officials have just passed me a note, which enables me to tell hon. Members that so far only 14 per cent. of local authorities—but that is one in seven—and nearly one in three registered social landlords do not allow their tenants to install satellites. I suspect that we can deal with the public sector, but we need to get on with that, because such things will take a long time. Many local authorities may ask, "Is this a top priority for us this year? We will put it back a year." Their tenants will be at a disadvantage.

I want to do a further bit of special pleading. The documents that I have read focus on the first television in the household. I understand that, but I think that they dismiss slightly too glibly the point about the second or third telly, in the teenager's bedroom, with a portable aerial; if the Government are to obtain political consensus, and the electorate's acceptance, for the change, they need to reach out to a much larger group of people who may already have digital on the main television but will still see it as a serious inconvenience and be resistant to it.

I gather that work on televisions with portable aerials and so on is continuing, but my political sense leads me not to dismiss that aspect of the matter by saying, "Well, frankly, who cares? If they have two televisions they are probably well enough off and that does not really matter." If we are trying to overcome resistance on the matter—and I suspect that the Secretary of State, or her successor, whoever that will be, will have to do that—we shall need to deal with that issue, to avoid some of the obstacles that might arise.

My priority is the elderly, the vulnerable and the isolated. According to a horrific statistic in research funded by the Economic and Social Research Council, one in nine people aged over 65 see family or neighbours less than once a month. Someone living in such isolation is not likely to have a friendly son-in-law who will say, "You plug this in here, and sort out that." There will be no substitute for people going into people's houses in significant numbers and just sorting things out. I hope that the Minister will reassure us that that is what is planned.

I think that this debate will run and run, but I wanted to put down a marker; to clarify whether there will be a resolution of the problems of the parts of my constituency and my hon. Friends' constituencies that do not at present have digital or terrestrial digital; and to ask about the present low digital penetration in the west of England, and why that is in the earlier batch, when that makes life more difficult; but primarily to ask about isolated, elderly and vulnerable people and to seek assurances that they do not have anything to worry about and that the Government plan to tackle those important problems.

2.19 pm

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on raising this important subject and coming at it from a different angle, which does not repeat the tired old arguments that we have heard before. I had intended only to contribute to the debate in an intervention about a constituency issue, but in the light of the hon. Gentleman's comments I shall make a few more remarks.

My constituency problem is that the cable provider there, NTL, has an analogue cable and refuses to switch to digital cable, thereby denying my constituents access to digital television. NTL inherited that from British Telecom, but a range of my constituents will not be able to switch to digital except—as the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) says, and as I have done—by using satellite digital. That is our only option. We cannot use Freeview because the Sandy Heath transmitter does not reach us, so our only option is satellite. How are we to stop the monopolistic practice that denies my constituents their switchover to digital if NTL, which has a monopoly in the area, will not provide a switchover to digital and the Government's policy is about competition between platforms—although I would argue that it needs to be within platforms as well?

Mr. Whittingdale: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in Westminster, where I am—no doubt many hon. Members have this experience—NTL has taken over the old Westminster cable franchise, which does not offer television at all? Every week, I receive fliers through my letter-box inviting me to subscribe to NTL's cable television services, only to be told when I try to do so that I cannot, and that there is no prospect of my being able to do so in the near future.

Brian White: When the previous Conservative Government brought cable television into this country, the sweetener was the use of telephones, which took telephone customers away from British Telecom. Cable TV was not the money-spinner; that was the telephones. That did not apply to the two cable networks that remained with BT—Westminster and Milton Keynes—because BT was not going to nick phones from itself. Therefore, there was no incentive in those two areas for the cable companies to invest. That is part of the problem that I have identified through my constituents. It goes back to the way in which the Conservative Government set up cable companies as monopolies in local areas, and it is a fundamental problem. If one believes in competition, one should not create local monopolies. I am not surprised that the Conservative Government did that, but I shall leave the issue aside for now.

That was the history, and the hon. Gentleman is right that there is a similar problem in Westminster. So how do we move forward if the cable company will not do so? To be fair to NTL, it had a financial problem, but even so, how are we to achieve digital switchover? That is an issue for the Government. I ask in relation to the cable company, but the principle could apply to others as well: if it refuses, will we force it?

Consider the history of ONdigital, and the collapse of ITV's digital service. One of the assumptions that was made was that the aerial problem was manageable. It is not. Many aerials in the country need a massive upgrade. The technology boost to the signal has improved matters, as has the restriction on the number of channels on Freeview, but there is still a fundamental problem with the quality of the aerials and how we are to ensure that cowboys do not move into the market and cause more problems. The real issue for the Department is how it will regulate the switchover. I know that that has been identified in the programmes, but it is a key issue that should be highlighted.

There are new technologies. For example, in Finland, Nokia is experimenting with TV on mobiles. When we talk about digital TV, we tend to talk about the television box. That causes a lot of the problems, which is why I have said that we should be talking about digital access. Then wireless networks within the home to cover the remaining televisions, whether via the computer or via the analogue television, would not matter as long as the digital access point was correctly installed.

There is a problem in the United States, where the regulatory authority is mandating certain television companies in relation to the way in which the televisions are designed and manufactured. I hope that the Minister will avoid the type of problem that the film industry has forced on American TV with the copying restrictions on high-definition digital TV.

Astra has been referred to. One of the items in its letter was covenants. In my city, every new home that was built had a covenant that did not allow an aerial. It now turns out that that covenant is unenforceable. Anybody who has challenged it can get away with things, because English Partnerships and the Government cannot legally enforce the covenant that prevents satellite aerials. So, there is hope for some of my constituents yet.

[Brian White]

It is also interesting to note the way in which television viewing is changing. Children are watching less TV and using broadband and other technologies more. One of the dangers is that, when we set out on the programme of digital switchover, the patterns of TV usage were completely different from today's. The changing nature of TV watching needs to be brought into the plan more. That change will accelerate in the coming years.

Why did colour TV come in so quickly and so well? It was because of Radio Rentals. People rented their TV and could get the upgrades without worrying about having to spend money on the TV. It was part of the rental contract. Where are the rentals for broadband and digital TV? It is a market that an entrepreneur could step into and fill. We need to recognise why things worked well in the past, because we could apply that to the future.

There is also an issue about the speed of change and technological developments. The UK is ahead of the game on the issue and has a good news story to tell. The digital plan that the Department and Ofcom have put forward identifies most of the problems and identifies ways forward. Issues such as the one that the hon. Member for Northavon raised, of pensioners, need to be addressed. They can be addressed. There is time to do so. He is right that we will get there if we start planning now.

The Government programme is right, but there is one small danger, which is that if Ofcom and the Government disagree, Ofcom, as an independent regulator, has the power to ignore Government policy. That is an important point, which the Department needs to bear in mind. Overall, we are ahead of the game and what is happening in Europe.

Mr. Don Foster: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way just before he ends his speech. I do not want to introduce a sour note into the debate, but he said clearly that he thought the plans of both Ofcom and the Government were, largely, to be welcomed. What does he think the Government's plans are? One of my real concerns is a lack of leadership from the Government on the issue. They seem to be being driven largely by Ofcom, the BBC and others and do not seem to have a clear line themselves.

Brian White: Given that we set Ofcom up to deal with such matters, I think it is perfectly reasonable to rely on its expertise. The purpose of Ofcom was to deal with convergence. We have spent a large amount of time in this Parliament talking about issues of convergence, for example introducing the Ofcom Bill and the Communications Bill. Much of the discussion of those Bills was about how to achieve digital switch-off. The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford and I had a few battles in Committee, a large number of which were about this issue. When setting up Ofcom, one of the key objectives was to give it the task to achieve that. The Government should be criticised for setting up a body such as Ofcom, telling it to get on with it and then not doing the job themselves.

The Department has given an overall strategic direction by setting the dates for digital switchover, which was the key task that many of us were pushing it to do. It is the right way forward for Ofcom to be considering those detailed issues. I am sure that we will debate the issue again and again.

In summary, there are a number of issues. I fear that the speed of change in this area is not being recognised. If we do not recognise the speed of change of technology, the way in which people are viewing TV and the way in which the industry is changing but instead think in the old ways, we will suffer from the problems that have been identified. We need to recognise the speed of change.

2.29 pm

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on securing the debate. It is on a subject that I, like him, am coming to for the first time and that, clearly, will be of enormous importance to all our constituents in a few years. In my area, Scottish Television is not due for conversion until 2009. That is two years after the guinea pigs in the borders. However, because of the vast empty spaces in the constituency, plenty of problems still arise in the highlands that do not arise in other parts of the country. For example, large swathes of the constituency—I suspect more than half of the population of Argyll and Bute—cannot receive Freeview via their set-top boxes at the moment.

One of the Government's guidelines says that, before switchover can happen, digital television should be affordable for the vast majority of households. The Government have defined the indicator of affordability as being 95 per cent. of households having access to digital equipment before switchover is completed. I went to the Ofcom presentation and I was quite concerned about some of the things that we learned there. I shall be quoting from Ofcom's report to the Secretary of State, "Driving Digital Switchover". Its projection suggests that penetration rates of digital are unlikely to rise above 85 per cent. without a decision being taken to implement the switchover.

Ofcom reports that a "substantial" number of households will need to convert their primary TV to be compatible with digital signals and "many more" households—so that is many more than "substantial"—will need to convert secondary TVs and video recorders if they want to continue using them. Ofcom goes on to report that "Some disruption will be inevitable".

However, I am concerned that the disruption, particularly in scattered rural areas, could be much more than "substantial". Ofcom accepts that a small proportion of existing rooftop aerials and many more existing portable aerials will be unlikely to be able to receive an acceptable digital terrestrial signal. Ofcom's plan appears to rest on the assumption that areas that cannot currently receive Freeview but can receive the four main channels on analogue will be able to receive the digital signal once the analogue signal has been switched off because there will no longer be interference from the analogue signal. However, as my hon. Friend pointed out, we cannot test that assumption in advance; we can only hope that it will be correct.

The first step in Ofcom's plan, as was outlined at the presentation, is to switch off the analogue signal for one channel, which would probably be BBC2. Presumably, there will be an advertising campaign in advance of the switch-off to advise people that they will need to buy set-top boxes to receive the digital signal, but the obvious problem is that people who buy such boxes living in areas where Freeview cannot be received at the moment will not be able to check that they work until the switchover happens.

We are expecting, through the advertising campaign, people to buy equipment that they do not need at the moment, but which they will need at some time in the future. On the appointed day, BBC2 screens will go blank throughout that region. If I were working in a TV shop, I would expect a flood of calls that day; perhaps we should all be rushing out to buy shares in TV repair businesses. There will be a flood of calls from two groups of people: those who missed all the adverts, did not buy set-top boxes and suddenly find that for no apparent reason BBC2's signal has disappeared; and those who prepared in advance but find that for some reason the untested equipment does not work.

Brian White: There will be a third group, which is the technophobes who do not have a seven-year-old kid to do it for them.

Mr. Reid: That is an interesting point.

The failure of equipment to work is likely to be greatest in those scattered rural areas that cannot currently receive Freeview because the equipment cannot be tested in advance. For those in many parts of my constituency, the nearest TV engineer will be 20 or 30 miles away. With a flood of calls all happening at once, it will be a big problem for TV engineers to travel around sorting out those problems. The situation could be even worse for people who live on small islands, where perhaps there is no one who is familiar with the new technology.

The next and final phase, after the phase in which only one analogue signal is switched off, will involve switching off the analogue signals for the other three terrestrial channels. That will clearly lead to a further flood of calls to the TV engineers. I hope that the Minister, in his summing up, can reassure us that the Government do have solutions to the problems that I anticipate.

On affordability, the Government's affordability test is that 95 per cent. of households will have access to digital equipment before the switchover is completed, but Ofcom reports that that target will not be met without a timetable being set. Therefore, there is the problem that the Government might have to commit themselves to the switchover before they know whether their target will be met and then hope that it will. As I have outlined, we will not know whether digital equipment will work in many areas until after the switchover, so we do not know how many people who can ill afford it will be forced to pay a lot of money for a TV engineer to come out and get their digital boxes or aerials fixed in order to pick up new signals.

I hope that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon suggested, the Government will use some of the money that they will make from selling off the spectrum to assist people on low incomes with the cost of carrying out conversions. If they want the switchover to be affordable for people, they must give us cast-iron assurances that affordable set-top boxes will be available to people and that they will be able to pick up the digital signal in all the parts of the country that can presently receive the four main channels in analogue form.

Those are the concerns. I am not an expert on the subject, but I certainly hope that, when he sums up, the Minister will be able to respond to them with assurances.

2.37 pm

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): At the risk of being the third one in a row, I have to say that I am another Liberal Democrat who is not an expert on this subject, but I am sure that the whole House is waiting in anticipation for my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), who will put us all right if he should catch your eye during the winding-up speeches, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That may be the triumph of hope over experience, but I am willing to go with it today.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) has raised an important issue. As hon. Members have shown, it is beginning to be an issue in our constituencies and it will become much more of an issue in the years ahead. My part of the world is the south of Scotland and I would make the bold claim—although I am confident about it—that I probably represent the most beautiful constituency in the whole country. [Interruption.] Perhaps Macclesfield is one small exception. The important point is that, in many places, the source of that beauty is the topography—the hills and the valleys. For all that, read that those are difficult technical circumstances in which to supply television and other broadcast signals.

One local worthy recently highlighted to me that it took more than 40 years to get 90 per cent. analogue coverage for our part of the world, yet it is proposed that, somewhere between now and 2008, we will move exclusively to digital and complete the switchover in the first tranche of regions. That seems extremely ambitious, not least when important villages such as Clovenfords in the heart of my constituency currently barely receive the analogue signals for existing terrestrial channels, and when the issue of Channel 5 still dogs many of the communities across all the towns in the region. So, there has been some surprise that the Border Television region has been selected to be in the first group of regions that will transfer over. I do not want that to be interpreted as a denigration of the technical prowess of the people at Border Television or the many other engineers up and down the country who will tackle this matter, but having spoken to different people in Border Television and elsewhere, I remain concerned that there is a lot of doubt about the technical feasibility of the switchover on such an ambitious time scale. Let no one get the wrong signal from me—if Members will pardon the pun. I am not suggesting that anybody in my constituency does not want digital television services. Those of us who have the good fortune to be able to get Freeview or satellite television and the like appreciate that it is a major breakthrough. As the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) said, it is something of which Britain can rightly be proud, and we all want it as soon as possible. However, it must be introduced in a manageable and sensible time frame, and, as my hon. Friends have remarked, we must take account of some key issues—not least affordability.

[Mr. Michael Moore]

I have been in correspondence about that subject on behalf of different constituents over the past year or so with Lord McIntosh in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. I am grateful to him for the detailed way in which he has sought to answer those letters and tackle the concerns of my constituents. In response to a recent inquiry, he confirmed that analogue will be maintained until digital

"is an affordable option for the vast majority of people" and said that the Government

"are satisfied that the interests of consumers, especially the most vulnerable, are well protected".

My hon. Friends have already highlighted those issues in the guidelines and other correspondence, and I applaud the Government's intention; but I have yet to see or hear the detailed definitions of "affordable", "the vast majority" or "the most vulnerable" that will assure me that important sections of my local community are not left out. Affordability affects not only one television. The days are long gone when households might have only the one piece of equipment to be affected by such a change. It is not simply about changing the black and white telly in the corner over to colour, or getting one with teletext; in many households every room has a television, with VCRs or DVD players attached. Even now pieces of equipment are being sold that are not digital-compatible. For many who do not have a seven-year-old child, a neighbour or friend who can assist, switchover will be a big burden.

Many people are doubtful. They do not have to be technophobes; they just have to be a tiny bit sceptical about the process, given the fiasco that we endured during the Channel 5 switchover. If that is any indication of what the process will be like in the future, people are right to be worried.

Separately, I am concerned about people's ability to choose between different digital platforms. The experts present—we have already eliminated four or five people from that description—have highlighted that there are a number of platforms out there. Beyond Sky Television, and Freeview where one can get it, most people are unaware of any other options. They do not recognise the prospect of other serious options coming on stream in an affordable and accessible way soon. Many fear that only Sky will be available to them because they are not in an area that enjoys Freeview. They also remain doubtful about the boosted Freeview signal allowing them to receive those services in the future.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): I do apologise; I have actually moved down the Room to get a better reception.

The hon. Gentleman and I share the Border Television area, and there is a contentious issue for those who seek to turn to Freeview to get the digital signal. On our side of the border, people want to see BBC Scotland. If they invest in the equipment and pick up a signal from Cumbria, for example, they will not get BBC Scotland. People will be investing without realising the reception that they will get, or the service that will be delivered.

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, not least because we are talking about an area in which Border Television, the ITV provider, has managed to split its signal, so that on the Scottish side of the border we can enjoy Scottish news opt-outs and different programmes from the south of the border. It would be a strange and backward step for people north of the border to be denied access to the Scottish version of the BBC.

I understand that in future people will able to dial up and plug into whichever variation of the BBC they wish to have, through the Freesat alternative. However, many will object to having to have a satellite dish installed in the first place, while there will be others who are not yet aware of the opportunity. The Government and other agencies, such as the BBC and Ofcom, still have a lot of ground to cover in getting awareness of that choice fixed in people's minds. There is serious anxiety that the reality of the digital switchover, particularly in its accelerated state, will mean that people will have no choice and will have to go for Sky or, in limited areas, Freeview.

Digital television is a major breakthrough, as other hon. Members have said. The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East pointed that it affects not only television, but the whole range of digital services, which are exciting and for which the Government deserve credit on pushing forward. However, I am concerned that we run the risk of falling flat on our face if certain issues that have been raised today are not tackled quickly.

It is proposed that we in the Borders will switch over to digital exclusively in three years' time. Very few people in south-east Scotland now believe that that will be possible. Whether because of the feasibility or affordability, or because of the choice that they have been given, people believe that there are still serious questions to answer and they will take a lot of persuading. I hope that the Minister will give some of the assurances that we seek and ensure that the Government heed our warnings as they plan the roll-out over the next few years.

2.47 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on introducing a debate on an important issue, about which many people still have many concerns. Before I turn to his remarks and to the contributions that other hon. Members made, however, I refer to the comment by my hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) about what a major breakthrough digital is. None of us should forget how significant it is. Put simply, digital is better. The picture, the sound and the add-ons are better than with analogue, and there are huge benefits with the electronic programme guides and interactive services. Digital is an exciting development.

The title of the debate refers to television, but let us remember that, along with America, we are definitely leading the way on the wider move to digital, including digital radio. We should be proud of that and acknowledge the benefits. I hope that none of us is suggesting that we do not wish to move forward as quickly as possible, so that as many people as possible can benefit from the new technology.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northavon began by saying that he knew little about the topic and did not even know what his party's policy on it was. I assure him that his party—our party—is enthusiastic about the digital switchover. We believe that it offers enormous benefits and that a lot of good work has been done on it. However, our biggest concern is that there has been a lack of political will and political leadership to help us to move forward.

Brian White: The hon. Gentleman has just acknowledged that Britain leads the world in digital activities and technology, so how can he say that there has been no political leadership from the Government?

Mr. Foster: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the question. If he will bear with me, I will give him a detailed, precise answer. I acknowledge that the question is fair.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northavon raised a number of concerns, and I look forward to the Minister's response to them. I will touch on some of the issues that he raised about the timetable. He talked about the region that we both live in being low on digital take-up so far, but high on the list for switch-off. He rightly raised concerns that have been picked up by others about the need to provide help to various disadvantaged groups such as the isolated, the elderly and the vulnerable.

My hon. Friend pointed out that we should not get too excited about how far the digital take-up revolution has spread. We all know that when the Government and others talk about take-up of about 60 per cent.—the figures vary—that refers largely only to the first and main television set in the home and does not take into account the second or third, or even in some cases the fourth or fifth. He touched on other issues, to which I will return, about houses in multiple occupation.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) made some important points in a useful speech. I was amused by his exchange with the hon. Member for Chelmsford and East Maldon—

Mr. Whittingdale: I am afraid that East Maldon would be very small. It is Maldon and East Chelmsford.

Mr. Foster: I am grateful. I should know it by now, and I apologise to the hon. Gentleman and to his constituents for my failure to get it right.

The exchange was interesting. The hon. Gentleman referred to his problem getting a television service from NTL. NTL could provide him with a television service. I have it, it is an analogue service and frankly—I will get into trouble with NTL for saying this—it is not worth having. However, it is available and he could have it.

The hon. Gentleman pointed out how bizarre it was that various advertising leaflets streamed through his door advertising a service that he cannot get. No doubt, like me, he receives a large number of advertisements from Sky advertising what it can deliver but failing to take into account that, because of my local authority, Westminster, and because I am in a property of multiple occupation, we are not allowed to have a Sky satellite dish to receive Sky's services. A lot of firms waste a lot of money putting literature through doors, adding to the confusion. We need to return to the issue of how confused many people are.

The hon. Gentleman was right to draw our attention to the number of alternatives that are increasingly becoming available as platforms for the delivery of digital offerings. He referred in particular to broadband. Many of us have had briefings on that and know that within two or three years the speed is likely to be such that we will be able easily to get live streaming TV through our computers.

Brian White: It can be done now.

Mr. Foster: It can be done now, but it is not that effective. It raises additional issues about the licence fee for people who might decide not to have television sets but to rely on their computers. Perhaps that is another issue.

There is also the possibility, which we are beginning to see trialled already, of receiving TV through mobile phones. The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East is right to say that we have to take account of some of the new developments in the switchover. However, I fundamentally disagree with him—this comes back to his question—about Government leadership. He implied that, because we have got on with digital and are to some extent leading the way, that brings great credit to the Government.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that, in the royal television lecture in 1999, the right hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), then Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, told us that it would be possible to achieve switchover by 2010. That date has now been dropped because, I argue, we have not seen leadership from Government. We have seen a number of other bodies, particularly Ofcom and the BBC, at work in that area. However, there has been real confusion in the Government's mind about how things will go forward. I asked the Government in September 2004 why Ofcom was offering new licences with the 2012 date in them and whether it had pre-empted anything that the Government might say. The Independent reported the Department's response, saying:

"The DCMS said Ms Jowell referred to 2012 in a speech she gave in the Commons in July."

That implied that she had given a date in July, so I checked precisely what she said in her statement to the House:

"While the broadcasters have not reached a full consensus on the optimum timetable, some—including the BBC—have suggested that 2012 may be the most appropriate date for the completion of switchover."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 22 July 2004; Vol. 424, c. 82WS.]

That is hardly a ringing endorsement from the Secretary of State of the idea that 2012 is Government policy.

Indeed, much more recently, on the day the Secretary of State announced the Green Paper on BBC charter renewal, it was clearly stated that she was giving major responsibility for building digital Britain to the BBC. It appeared to me, at least, that she was asking the BBC to write a blank cheque. There was no clarity about the level of responsibility that the BBC would take or about how much licence fee payers' money it was expected to spend.

[Mr. Foster]

Brian White: The hon. Gentleman will obviously remember the ITV Digital disaster, which was based on some crazy decisions by its board. He will also remember the rescue of digital carried out by the BBC, which should be praised for what it has done to promote digital through its services. At one point, it was easy to think that the whole thing would go down the pan, and the BBC deserves credit for rescuing digital from the disaster at ITV.

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, and there is no doubt that the BBC will, and should, continue to play an important role. Indeed, its technological developments have been important not only for the corporation and its programmes, but for a number of public service and commercial broadcasters, and we would all do well to recognise that. It is fine to require the BBC to play a leading role, and I have no problem with that, but I do have a problem when neither the parameters for that responsibility nor the financial envelope within which the BBC is expected to operate are clearly laid down.

Several issues have been raised. My hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) rightly expressed concern about the potential for people in his constituency to lose out. He and other colleagues mentioned the confusion in the minds of many people. He said, tellingly, that there will presumably be an advertising campaign. I say to the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East that, with such a large number of people currently buying new television sets and new equipment, we need much greater clarity about what they should be looking for. My hon. Friend the Member for Northavon talked about stickers on the telly, and that is a move in the right direction, but there is huge confusion in people's minds when they buy a digital television set about whether it will deliver.

Brian White: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Foster: I will in a second. The hon. Gentleman rightly said that we should be talking about the input, and before he intervened—he can happily do so again—I was about to say that he was 100 per cent. right. Unfortunately, a large number of those who have been buying digital television sets simply have not got that message and have been buying things that may not be helpful to them for quite some time. I think he agrees that I have covered the point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale raised a number of concerns about technical feasibility in his area, although he was in no way knocking the skills of the people there, and he rightly pointed that out. He asked whether it would be possible to resolve the technical problems under the very tight and, as he put it, challenging timetable for his area. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute, he took up the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon about affordability. Several such issues have been raised in reports, not least the Ofcom consumer panel's November 2004 report, which states that there is an urgent need to consider who the disadvantaged groups will be who might lose out and what support they will need. The panel drew particular, but not exclusive, attention to the over-75s.

Although the overall envelope of financial help might be in the region of £250 million to £400 million to provide such people with support, it is worth reflecting that the panel estimates that the cost of providing such support to those aged 75 and over will be between £134 million and £270 million. Of course, others will have to be considered.

There are concerns about whether we are driving forward enthusiasm for take-up and dealing with the technophobes without 7-year-old children, as the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East put it. I assume, from the way in which he said that, that he does not put himself in that category, so if he wants to pop around to my flat afterwards to tune my video in, I would be grateful; I have been trying to get it right for two months.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northavon raised a particularly important issue, which was picked up by others: houses in multiple occupation. The question of what options are available has already been asked. An option for some is to get Freeview, but it is not available to people who do not have access to Channel Five, such as many of my constituents in Bath, so that is not an option.

The second option is Freesat, which costs money—£150, give or take. That is an option for many, but not for those who live in private property covered by planning legislation that does not allow a satellite dish. Those who rent property from a registered social landlord or a local authority are completely stuck unless the landlord or authority has got their act together and done something about the situation.

It is important that we acknowledge those issues. Above all, I want the Government to give clearer leadership and to announce their preferred date, rather than the one to which everybody else says that they should agree.

3.2 pm

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on securing the debate. He was honest enough to say that he did not know much about this subject when he first examined it. However, that is the same for the vast majority of the population. One of the problems is that few people know anything about it, yet the timetable set by the Government is coming up fast. Analogue switch-off may start in just three years, yet little has been done to prepare for it, and there are number of problems attached to it, which have been mentioned.

I have considerable concerns about analogue switch-off and what it will involve, but I am an enthusiast of digital television. I have been a Sky satellite subscriber for many years, and now subscribe to Sky Plus, which is an extraordinary technology. For anybody who acquires Sky Plus, or a PVR—personal video recorder—life is never quite the same again, because of the extra choice that it provides: hundreds of channels; the possibility to interact; and in the long term, the possibility of high-definition television, which has not yet arrived in this country but could represent a whole new dimension.

I am also a Freeview box owner, principally because I have been unable to obtain the television service from my cable provider. Therefore, I am aware of the limitations on Freeview. Even though I live in central London I cannot get Channel 5 on Freeview because, I am told, it is on a lower multiplex.

To complete the picture, I am the enthusiastic owner of two digital radio sets. Nobody has yet mentioned digital radio. It, too, represents a technological development that is beginning to take off, and it raises questions to which I shall be interested to hear the Minister's response. Do the Government plan, eventually, to turn off the analogue radio signal?

Having set the picture and, I hope, made it clear that I am in no way averse to the technology, I recognise that many people do not necessarily want more choice. They are content with their analogue service, and are at best alarmed by and at worse positively opposed to the suggestion that that service will cease and that they will be compelled to move over to digital take-up.

I suspect that when the idea was first mooted, its attraction for the Government was financial. I remember that, four or five years ago, in the heady days after the 3G auction, this was regarded as a pot of gold that would be available to the Treasury and might well pay for half the public spending programme. At that time, there was real enthusiasm for pushing ahead as fast as possible. I do not think that that is any longer the case. Indeed, there is considerable dispute about the net benefit that will accrue to the economy as a result of switchover. The Government have given us a figure of between £1.5 billion and £2 billion, but the consumer group that reported to the Department for Culture, Media and Sport cast considerable doubt on that figure. It pointed out that the cost was measured only in terms of those viewers who currently do not have access to digital TV and will, therefore, incur costs in making the necessary changes, including acquiring set-top boxes, whereas the benefit was measured in the overall bonus to the economy from the whole population acquiring digital television. It was not comparing like with like.

On top of that, there is considerable doubt as to whether the Government's estimate takes full account of all the costs involved. For instance, they have said that the net penalty cost of forced conversion is £25. However, it is not yet possible to obtain a box for £25, and considerable extra costs might be involved. For that reason, the consumer group concluded that the cost-benefit analysis greatly underestimates the penalty costs for consumers of switchover by underestimating the costs and overestimating the benefits. It went on to say that "the methodology appears to be flawed and it ignores many consumer costs" and it recommended that

"a parallel consumer cost benefit analysis should be developed."

That is urgently needed. If we are to take this huge step, we need at least to be convinced that the benefits outweigh the costs.

I have a number of other concerns. First, as I said, the Government have completely failed to persuade those who are aware of their policy that it is a desirable policy. A survey for the Department of Trade and Industry of 4,000 viewers found that more than 70 per cent. are angry about switch-off and suspicious of the Government's motives. More than 3 million householders said that they would refuse to buy digital equipment and half of them said that they would maintain their defiance even if they had to give up TV completely. So there is a huge amount to do if people are to be persuaded that it is a good idea. To do that, we must have answers to a lot of the questions that have been asked. At the moment, we have digital penetration of about 55 per cent. The Government originally said that it was unthinkable to go ahead until digital penetration had reached 95 per cent. It then became apparent that we could not get up to 95 per cent. unless we switched off the analogue signal in order to convert the transmitters to digital terrestrial television. However, that requires the leap of faith that has been referred to. It means that viewers will have to have set-top boxes sitting on their televisions ready for the time when the off-switch is pulled, in the confidence and belief that they will, on pressing a button, have access to DTT.

However, this is not just a matter of set-top boxes. There are a host of other problems. The Government's figure of 55 per cent. digital penetration is encouraging and undoubtedly that figure is growing, but as has been mentioned, that 55 per cent. refers to the main household television set. As I have said, my main household television set is digital, but I have three more, which are analogue. I do not think that I am all that unusual in that.

Therefore, the vast majority of those households that are already classified as digital households will incur significant extra costs in converting their other television sets to receive digital transmission. In some cases it may not even be possible. Of my three extra sets, two have portable aerials on the top; it does not seem likely at the moment that it will be possible to convert them.

There will be a significant extra cost and possibly a significant loss of consumer benefit when switch-off happens. People may well have to incur substantial extra expenditure to continue to receive television on all the sets on which they currently receive it. It is not, therefore, all that surprising that people are unconvinced that they should incur a cost simply to continue to receive what they now receive without paying.

It is estimated that about one in three households need to change aerials and downleads. Around one in five television sets is portable or uses a portable aerial, and reference has also been made to the problem of people who live in multiple-dwelling units. Astra has put forward a good case on why an integrated system with a mast to allow DTT reception, a dish to allow satellite reception and a digital audio broadcasting aerial to allow digital radio reception is desirable. However, in many cases that is not possible at the moment. That, too, needs to be dealt with if we are to maintain the position, and the Government's declared objective, of allowing everyone who currently receives analogue television to receive digital television when switch-off happens.

[Mr. John Whittingdale]

Affordability has also been mentioned. Some work has been done to suggest that those on the lowest incomes are likely to incur the greatest costs. Recommendations have been made about the necessity of offering a financial package. The Ofcom consumer panel has produced a useful report, to which the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) referred, about the potential size of the necessary package of financial assistance, which, in total, as he said, may amount to between £250 million and £400 million. That is another cost that must be compared with the potential benefit that we are told will accrue as a result of switch-off.

Much more information needs to be given to consumers. The stickers with little ticks on them, which are being placed on television sets, somehow suggest that the Government are telling people that it is a good idea to buy an integrated digital TV set. However, many people, as the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) suggested, do not think that it is a good idea to buy an integrated digital TV, because that means locking oneself into the present technology and, if it advances, having to buy a whole new television set rather than a new box. The Government need to consider whether they are offering people the right advice.

Mr. Don Foster: Does the hon. Gentleman agree—I am sure that he has done his research and talked to people—that, bizarrely, buying a new integrated digital set is often also more expensive than buying the kit separately?

Mr. Whittingdale: That is probably the result of the fact that at the moment demand for integrated sets is relatively low, but it is certainly true. Therefore it is difficult to see any reason why someone should want to buy an integrated set.

There have been many references to the fact that we lead the world in the take-up of digital television. That is true. Of those who can principally claim credit for that—there are two, and they do not include the present Government—the first is Rupert Murdoch, who launched satellite and then digital satellite in this country, and the second is the previous Conservative Government. I recall serving on the Committee that considered the 1996 Broadcasting Bill, which ushered in digital terrestrial television. That television, it is fair to say, had some teething problems. Nevertheless, the previous Conservative Government were the ones who paved the way for it.

Ofcom has announced a timetable, which will start very shortly. In last week's Green Paper, the Government placed considerable responsibility on the BBC, yet all the questions that have been asked in this debate have not been properly addressed. Analogue switch-off is classified as a brave decision for a Minister to take. It is desirable that we get there eventually, but I have considerable doubts about the timetable that we are following and whether it is sensible to compel consumers to switch to digital terrestrial television when they might not want to do so. We need to consider the issues much more carefully, but the Government have not provided answers to the many questions that have been asked.

3.16 pm

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on securing the debate and on his work as vice-chairman of the all-party group on poverty. As he said, that work was one of the major reasons why he secured the debate today.

I do not know the origins of digital television, but we would all agree that digital switchover will bring significant benefits to the wider economy of the United Kingdom as well as to consumers, from both the extension in coverage of digital terrestrial television and the considerable number of new services that will use the freed-up spectrum that it will offer.

Since 2001, the Government's objective has been to work with public service and other broadcasters, industry and consumers to develop a collective strategy for digital television, which includes ensuring that all households have access to affordable digital television services.

The prices of set-top boxes and integrated digital televisions have fallen to the level at which switchover is affordable for the vast majority of households. Although take-up is healthy—at the last count, it was about 55 per cent., according to Ofcom figures—it cannot be left to the market alone if we are to achieve switchover.

The Ofcom report, "Driving Digital Switchover", expresses a belief that the digital take-up rate will approach 80 per cent. by 2012 and will rise very slowly afterwards. The vast majority of viewers will need only a source of good information to help them through the switchover. I take on board the comment made by many hon. Members that we must convince them that switchover is right. We are, however, fully aware that some people will need much more information. They may need help to understand what they have to do to install their boxes and check their aerials, and help to understand how to use their new equipment, and we acknowledge that a few might also need financial assistance, as the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) said. I will talk about that shortly.

The Government are committed to ensuring that everyone who can currently receive the main public service broadcasting channels—BBC 1, BBC 2, ITV, Channel 4, S4C, Channel 5 and teletext—in analogue form will be able to receive them on digital systems on switchover. That is the object of the exercise.

Ofcom has indicated that switchover could be completed in 2012, and has published an indicative regional order to that effect. A final decision on switchover will need to take account of the impact on everyone, not least on the most vulnerable consumers.

Mr. Don Foster: The Minister is absolutely right to say that the Government need to decide, among other things, the precise date of the switchover. He will know that I, and I suspect others, have received a letter from the chief executive of Ofcom who says quite categorically:

"We will, by late Spring/early Summer be at the point where operational decisions and political decisions must come together" for various reasons.

"In short, a decision crunch point is approaching when a political decision—either to go ahead with switchover or to postpone it indefinitely—needs to be taken."

May we have an assurance that the Government will make that decision and announce it by the deadline of late spring or early summer?

Mr. Caborn: That is our intention. However, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree with something that the debate has shown clearly. As he said, we can go for dates, but if we are not reassured that we will deliver a service to everyone, including the vulnerable, it would be a mistake to start giving out dates. The first question that must be asked is, "Can we deliver the service?" We as a Government must be sure that we can give clear political leadership. The issue is not just about dates, which are important but just one part of the debate. We must be reassured that the technology is in place and that we can deliver.

This afternoon, I want to try to lay out how we believe that we can deliver the technology to the people that the debate has been about and central to—vulnerable people. Once we are reassured on that point, I will be much more assured about giving dates. That is also the case as far as the Secretary of State is concerned. Ofcom and the BBC do not have the responsibilities that Government have to deliver the service to all sectors of society. That is a political decision of the Government. It is one that we will make when we believe that we have all the information. We think that that is important. What has been useful about the debate is that it has brought that into political focus.

At the heart of the Government's plan is the key role that the BBC will play in switchover. We agree with the BBC's view, expressed in "Building Public Value", that it should have a lead role in the switchover. We will ask the BBC to help establish and manage the organisation that will co-ordinate the implementation of switchover. We will also ask it to take a lead role in public information campaigns, telling consumers what will happen and when and what consumers need to do. That has been clearly emphasised in the debate.

We know from reports from Generics, the consumer expert group, and Ofcom that some people will need considerable help at switchover. We therefore agree with the consumer expert group and Ofcom's independent consumer panel that the vulnerable consumer should be assisted throughout that stage of the switchover. We will also ask the BBC to help establish and fund schemes for the most vulnerable consumers. We are not able to announce details of who will get help at this stage, but we continue to work with the charities that deal with vulnerable households and will set out our proposals in conjunction with the BBC. So, there will be a wide consultation in the area. Details will be set out at the time of an announcement.

Whatever we do, we must ensure that the public have an awareness and understanding of switchover. Broadcasters, and the supply chain to them, will hold the primary responsibility for ensuring that everyone gets all the information that they need about the switchover process. However, the Government will continue to take responsibility for communicating their switchover policy. In November 2004, the Government launched a public awareness campaign that aims to use the mainstream media to educate the media and the public about switchover.

The switchover logo has been referred to, the development of which is a crucial part of the support. The logo indicates digital-ready products and services and reliable information about switchover. So far, 20 manufacturers and more than 200 retailers, representing more than 2,300 retail outlets, and a number of aerial installers, as well as Top Up TV, have signed up to the use of that logo. We are making progress. Information leaflets are readily available at all major stores, including Dixons and Comet. We are also working with charities on plans to ensure that everyone, including those who are hard to reach, get the right information and support. We are working with shadow SwitchCo, the switchover organisation that is being set up by broadcasters and the supply chain to ensure that communication and marketing plans reflect the needs of consumers. We understand that it plans a proactive information campaign at both the national and the regional level. There is surely no clearer message to focus people's minds than the Government's announcement that confirms the timetable of that switchover.

As I mentioned, the Government will confirm the timetable once all remaining issues are resolved and we are satisfied that the interests of consumers—especially, I repeat, the most vulnerable consumers—are protected. One of those interests is the precise coverage requirements. That comprises the number of transmitters to be converted, modes and power combinations. On 9 February, Ofcom published a consultation paper setting out options on how best to deliver substantially the same coverage with digital terrestrial as with analogue transmission. That includes details of the benefits of particular options for availability and trade-offs that would be needed. It has invited responses by 21 March.

Ofcom also published a technical briefing paper on 9 February setting out the proposed regional order for switchover by 2012 as part of its wider spectrum management responsibilities. The order in which the regions will be switched off is based on technical criteria that have been agreed between broadcasters, multiplex operators and Ofcom. The specific dates of the process remain, of course, a matter for Government. The switchover process involves a number of different parties with different interests. For switchover to be successful, there needs to be in place an organisation to manage the process and see it through, hopefully, to a successful completion.

Both the BBC's and Ofcom's reports into switchover supported the idea of a SwitchCo organisation to take forward the switchover project. SwitchCo has been set up as the primary body charged with ensuring the successful achievement of switchover in the United Kingdom. It will need to build constructive relationships with the industry to educate consumers on the benefits of switchover, and allow regions plenty of time to prepare. The structure of the new organisation is being developed and will involve public service broadcasters, multiplex operators and representatives from the supply chain.

Mr. Webb: I am very grateful to the Minister for giving way as I know that he has only a couple more minutes. However, could he clarify the specific point about people who cannot currently receive digital terrestrial? Will they be expected to buy digital equipment in the hope that on the day that the plug is pulled, it will all be fine? What will happen if it is not?

Mr. Caborn: They are issues that have to be worked through. I want to answer some of the specific questions that have been asked if I have time, but I should like to conclude.

The Government are committed to switchover: the question is not "whether" but "when". Switchover is in the UK's interests, and everybody agrees with that. The Conservative Opposition can smirk about that, and giggle and laugh, but we are genuinely trying to manage the system responsibly. We are at the leading edge of technology in this country and intend to stay there. In that position, some difficult questions have to be resolved, but we shall try to do that in the most common-sense and transparent way possible. Giggling from a sedentary position does not help.

The cost-benefit analysis published on 10 February showed the quantifiable benefits of switchover to be around £1.1 billion. Ofcom figures for digital television penetration were estimated to have reached 55 per cent. of UK households. Based on Freeview projections and Sky's figures, that is almost certain to top 60 per cent. of households. However, only 73 per cent. of UK households can access digital terrestrial television services. That figure cannot be increased before switchover, but the analogue switch-off should be seen as not a switch-off, but a switch-over.

I shall quickly respond to some of the specific questions that were asked. In the south-west, take-up is low because digital terrestrial coverage is limited. We need the switchover to happen before we can remedy that. Lack of Freeview is a major issue during the charter review, and will continue to be considered.

We accept that flats will be a challenge. We are working with the industry and the Chartered Institute of Housing on guidance for the housing sector, and I hope that we can resolve some of the questions that have been raised on the matter.

We are looking at the Ofcom plan for voluntary help, and we shall announce who will receive voluntary help and what help they will receive. On the spectrum valuation, that will be released only in 2012 when switchover is complete. Spectrum release can be used only for broadcasting. That may change but we have made cautious assumptions about future worth; we do not think that it is possible to fund switchover costs from the future proceeds.

On covenants, Astra has raised the matter and we have asked it to give us further evidence but we are still not convinced that there is a real problem in that area. On aerials, we have found that in the technical trials that have been done in Wales, the aerials stand up quite well. Switchover signals will be within the aerial groups and at a higher power. Some people will need to upgrade, but much fewer than some of the figures that have been quoted in the media. We believe that on NTL issues, switchover will create competition: all those who receive analogue will get digital at switchover. We hope that Freesat will emerge so that people will have a choice other than Sky as a free-to-view satellite option.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): Order. I am afraid that we have run out of time.

Police (Greater Manchester)

3.30 pm

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise a subject that is of great significance and concern to my constituents. I am delighted to see the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), in her place. I understand that the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety, the hon. Member for Salford (Ms Blears), cannot take part as she is a Member for a Greater Manchester constituency.

It is one of the ironies for the Greater Manchester police that the preponderance of local MPs who have held ministerial office in the Home Department apparently does not help us in communicating the realities of the policing situation in Greater Manchester to the Government. Until recently, we had the right hon. Member for Stretford and Urmston (Beverley Hughes). We now have the hon. Member for Salford and the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), and until recently the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) was the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Home Secretary. When the chips are down, Ministers appear determined to ignore the real problems that we face in Manchester.

I realise, of course, that Greater Manchester's problems are not unique. Yesterday, the chief constable of Nottinghamshire, Steve Green, was reportedly blaming the Home Office's culture of targets and form-filling for his force's inability to keep up with serious crime. He told the Daily Mail that he could not simply switch more police to murder investigations because if he cut the number of officers doing clerical work he would lose money from the Home Office's crime fighting fund.

Incidentally, I note from the Bassetlaw Crusader, a newspaper that I read every week, that Mr. Jonathan Shepherd, our excellent parliamentary candidate in Bassetlaw, has highlighted the 740 additional police officers that a Conservative Government would put in place in Nottinghamshire.

Closer to home, Peter Aaronson, one of my local superintendents, spoke last week about a "frightening" rise in the number of guns on the streets of south Manchester. After 16 shootings during the course of one month, he was quoted in the Manchester Evening News as saying,

"I've never seen anything like it".

Yesterday, in response to the chief constable of Nottinghamshire, the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety said that the Government are committed to reducing red tape for the police. She stated:

"We have already increased the number of civilian workers and announced plans to create the equivalent of 12,000 more police officers".

I am sure that the Under-Secretary will offer similar statistics today.

My purpose today is to try to persuade Ministers to confront the yawning chasm that is opening up between their words and the daily experience of those who have to make our police services work. Indeed, a few weeks ago the Greater Manchester police authority wrote to the Home Secretary saying:

"Put bluntly, we are facing reducing the number of operational police officers and making support staff redundant in the light of the unusual and unfortunate circumstances facing the Force and Authority."

The letter set out some of the major reasons for that difficulty.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): Is it not the case that, as a result of the Government's—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): Order. I am afraid that an Opposition Front-Bench spokesman is not allowed to intervene in an Adjournment debate. Such debates are a private matter between the Back-Bench Member and the Minister. I have to rule the hon. Gentleman out of order: he cannot intervene.

Mr. Brady: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sorry that I cannot give way to my hon. Friend. I am sure that his intervention would have been excellent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman could have intervened from the Back Bench, but he cannot do so from the Front Bench.

Mr. Brady: That is extremely helpful to all hon. Members. [Interruption.]

Mr. Mitchell: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Brady: I am delighted to give way.

Mr. Mitchell: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. Is not the burden of the point that he is making on behalf of his constituents that, intended or not, as a result of the Government's policies his force may have to reduce front-line policing? By contrast, following the election manifesto commitment to an increase of 40,000 police officers across the country over eight years, the Conservative party is committed to ensuring that that force has at least 2,200 more police.

Mr. Brady: My hon. Friend demonstrates huge versatility in making that absolutely core point. The experience of my constituents under the Labour Government is that front-line policing may be cut, whereas they know that it would be increased considerably across Greater Manchester under a Conservative Government. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point so clearly.

As the police authority has pointed out, the major reasons for its funding shortfall are increases in the costs of employment, the fact that Greater Manchester is hit harder than most other forces by increased pension costs, increases in the costs that it has to bear for private finance initiative projects that now have to be funded by the force, and a variety of other exceptional factors. The police authority's concern was repeated by the chief constable, Mike Todd, who stated in the Manchester Evening News on 18 February:

"I am extremely disappointed about the likely outcome of the budget settlement. It is bad for GMP, bad for policing and bad for the people of Greater Manchester.

This will be the second year running that we have had a poor budget settlement, and it will not even be possible to continue what we have been doing this year.

We have worked extremely hard to improve the performance of GMP".

He concluded by stating:

"This will now be put in jeopardy."

That was the chief constable making the point in his own words.

The Manchester Evening News rightly picked up on the issue in its editorial and clearly made the point that the present Government's election pledges were being called into question by the local policing situation. As it happened, the editorial was adjacent to an article by Andrew Grimes with the excellent headline, "Is it time to put Tony out to grass?" I am sure that it made interesting reading, and it was an appropriate juxtaposition in the context of broken election pledges.

Mr. Todd warned that Greater Manchester police may have to make redundancies for the first time in their 30-year history. In response to comments from Home Office Ministers, he said that it would be naive to imagine that redundancies in support staff would not impact on front-line policing.

On 19 February, the Manchester Evening News reported that the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety had said that she expected Mr. Todd to get on with the job and put more bobbies on the beat. That is all very well. We would be delighted to have the chief constable get on with the job, and we all want more bobbies on the beat, and I am sure that the chief constable wants that as well, but he cannot do those things, given the resources and the situation that he is faced with as a result of Government policies and what the Home Office is doing.

My constituents, who worry about crime and particularly the frightening levels of violent crime and gun use, are faced with a war of words between the chief constable and the Minister with responsibility for policing. The Minister says that everything is fine. The chief constable says that the force faces cuts in front-line policing. I mean no offence when I say that I am more inclined to believe the man who is charged with delivering policing in Greater Manchester, and I think that the people of Greater Manchester know who to believe as well.

The evidence is already mounting. Greater Manchester police recruitment, which was previously 100 officers a month, was cut to 30 officers a month, and there is a complete freeze on recruitment this month. The cuts in the Centrex training budget have forced Greater Manchester police to take on more of the cost of training their own officers. I welcome community support officers as long as they are an additional resource and are not used to replace fully trained front-line police officers, but the community support officers already in place are now being funded from the Greater Manchester police budget, not directly from the Home Office. The Home Office wants more community support officers, but long-term funding will come from existing budgets, which will put yet more pressure on the budget for fully trained police officers.

Far from reducing the red tape, the new stop-and-search requirements and the changes to the national recording of crime are increasing the burden of form-filling and bureaucracy. Even with cuts in recruitment, a £500,000 cut in street crime overtime and the withdrawal of funding for local crime-fighting initiatives, GMP still face a significant shortfall. That comes at a time when there are unparalleled challenges in dealing with violent crime and when Greater Manchester police have a regional and national role in fighting terrorism.

[Mr. Brady]

The Minister knows that the Opposition understand the importance of policing. That is why the Conservative party has pledged to recruit 40,000 more police officers, more than 2,200 of whom would be in Greater Manchester. That has been taken up by my Conservative colleagues who, after a resounding victory in June—on which I know the Minister will want to congratulate them—are running Trafford metropolitan borough council. The council will hold its own debate on the crisis of police resources in Greater Manchester and I am sure that, as a result, it will want to press Ministers to resolve matters in a way that avoids cuts in front-line policing in Greater Manchester. My colleagues, Councillor Alex Williams and Councillor Stephen Ogden, are playing a significant role in that, as is Mr. Damian Hinds, who is the prospective parliamentary candidate for Stretford and Urmston.

The Minister, in her reply, must accept that it is not good enough just to tell my constituents and Greater Manchester police that they have never had it so good. We constantly hear statistics, whether on funding or the number of officers, and receive endless good-news press releases from the Home Office, but the reality that is being experienced on the ground—the reality that we heard about yesterday from the chief constable in Nottinghamshire and that has been expressed by my chief constable in Greater Manchester—is very different.

I hope that when the Minister replies she will accept that there is a real problem that could lead to cuts in front-line policing. Most importantly, I hope that she will set out, in clear, measurable terms, how the Home Office proposes to reduce the burdens of cost and bureaucracy and to ensure that Greater Manchester police continue to have the resources that they need to protect my constituents. We do not want to hear that everything is fine because we know that it is not. What we want to hear from her is some real reassurance that cuts in front-line policing in Greater Manchester can be stopped and that the security and safety of my constituents can be guaranteed.

3.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I congratulate the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on securing the debate on police resources in Manchester. I know that police resources have been the subject of much local debate over the past month. This is a useful opportunity to set the record straight and show the extent of Government support for, and investment in, local policing. The Government are committed to providing the resources that the police need to do their work effectively and to fulfil their commitments.

Since 2000–01, expenditure on policing supported by Government grants across England and Wales has increased by 39 per cent. or £3 billion. That is not the picture that the hon. Gentleman was painting. Crime has fallen by 30 per cent. since 1997, using the British crime survey figures, which are universally accepted as the most accurate. Overall levels of crime fell by 11 per cent. in the year to September 2004. The risk of becoming a victim of crime is at its lowest since the British crime survey records began.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The hon. Lady said that the British crime survey is the most authoritatively accepted measure of crime. Will she accept that that simply is not the case? The survey does not include many aspects of violent crime; nor does it include murders or the fastest growing areas of crime, including juvenile crime. Surely she should look at recorded crime. Does she not agree with the leader of her party, who, when in opposition, made it clear that he was interested not in the crime survey but in actual recorded crimes?

Fiona Mactaggart: Of course we should look at recorded crime, and although we cannot get a long-term series of figures because of the changes in recorded crime, one of the things that those figures do is show where we need to make our effort in dealing with crime; one of those areas is violent crime, which is why we are focusing on it. The common experience of crime is most accurately shown by the British crime survey, which surveys victims of crime. If we are to put the victim at the heart of our criminal justice system, which is what we should be doing, we should use figures that accurately capture the experience of the victim.

I am pleased that the Opposition did not seek to divide the House on the police funding settlement for 2005–06, because it was a good one. It was, indeed, better than predicted by many, including people in Greater Manchester. Within that settlement, Greater Manchester police got £412.5 million in general grants, which is an increase on the previous year of 4.9 per cent., or £19.3 million, including an extra £800,000 from the amending report, which makes for an overall increase of 5.1 per cent.

That is substantially higher than the 3.75 per cent. funding floor increase guaranteed for all police authorities, and it is above the police pay increase of 3 per cent. and non-pay inflation of about 2.6 per cent. In addition, there is over £32 million in specific grants for targeted funding and a further £10.9 million in capital provision. Of the £32 million in specific grants, more than half is from the crime fighting fund specifically to help to maintain record police officer numbers.

The situation is significantly better for Greater Manchester police than it was during the previous year when their grant was a broadly standard rate increase in common with other police authorities. Some claim that 5.1 per cent. is insufficient, but I am confident that it is a favourable outcome for Greater Manchester police.

The budget set by the police authority of £493.9 million for 2005–06 is an increase of £25 million or 5.3 per cent. We have provided the necessary resources to enable police authorities to produce an increase in activity to sustain the increased police numbers that we have advanced, and to deliver the improvements in policing. We have also asked the police service to make efficient use of its resources by making value-for-money improvements of over £1 billion—about 3 per cent. per year starting in 2005–06.

The police service has a good record of achieving efficiency gains in recent years, and collaborative procurement is one of the key themes of the tripartite police efficiency strategy. I congratulate Greater Manchester police on saving over £600,000 from regional collaboration on the purchase of body armour. It is through such initiatives that further resources can be released for front-line policing efforts. Releasing officers to the front line is an important element in the police efficiency strategy, and GMP have carried out a best value review which will help to identify opportunities for such redeployment in the force.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, and for acknowledging the excellent work that has already been done by Greater Manchester police in achieving the efficiency savings that have been asked of them; they are doing far more to that end. She is now talking about the importance of getting more police officers out on the beat and out of administrative support functions. Surely she has heard what the chief constable said: he has to do the reverse. Because he may have to make support staff redundant, police officers will be going off the beat, back into the offices, not fighting crime where they are meant to be. Has she not heard that point?

Fiona Mactaggart: I do not predict that that will happen. If we consider the number of police who are available to the chief constable, we see that GMP have sustained that number through the use of the crime fighting fund. Indeed, that was an important part of our strategy to ensure that there will be police on the street.

I can see that the hon. Gentleman is asking who should be trusted. It is a sensible question, because he has referred to his party's commitment to put 2,200 more police on the streets. I cannot yet square that with its commitment to make cuts, as that commitment would cost around £90 million a year. However, let us leave that aside and not poke holes in the Conservatives' fantasy figures; instead, let us consider the record.

Let us consider the Conservative party manifesto in 1992. It said:

"We are continuing to increase police numbers. There will be 1,000 extra police officers this year."

I looked at the figures for police officers in that year: there were 7,061. I looked at the figures for 1993: there were 7,060. The 1,000 extra police officers that were promised turned into one fewer.

Let us take a more recent figure, as the hon. Gentleman seemed to want to do when I referred to the 1992 manifesto. Let us consider the words of his former Prime Minister, John Major, on 13 October 1995:

"So, Chief Constables, begin to plan".

This was his offer to chief constables, such as the chief constable of Greater Manchester. He continued:

"Because in the overall arithmetic of this year's public expenditure settlement we have found the resources over the next three years to put, not 500 but an extra 5,000 police officers on the beat."

Again, I looked at the figures. John Major did not stay in power for the following three years, but nevertheless the Budgets set then were operated by the Labour party—to our cost, frankly—in government. In 1995, there were 7,037 police officers; in 1996, 6,938. Did the number go up the following year, which, as I am using the March figures, was also fully under a Conservative Government? We should remember that we were promised an extra 5,000 officers over three years. In 1997, the figure was 6,922. The following year, under the Labour Government, the numbers began to creep up, and there were 6,949 officers.

Who is to be trusted? The hon. Gentleman's party has a consistent—

Mr. Brady: Will the Minister give way?

Fiona Mactaggart: I will when I have finished this sentence. The hon. Gentleman's party has a consistent record of making promises and not only not achieving them but doing the precise opposite.

Mr. Brady: I am sure that my constituents and others will be fascinated at the Minister's trip down memory lane, whether it is accurate or not. They will also recall that following 1997 police numbers have not risen inexorably, although recently there has been an increase.

Surely the crucial point is what is happening now and the mismatch between what Ministers say, what they promise and what happens in services for all our constituents. We are clearly seeing a stark difference between what the chief constable finds in operational terms and what Ministers say he should find. My question was about whether people should trust Home Office Ministers today or the chief constable who actually has to do the job. I hope that the Minister is not suggesting that Mike Todd cannot be trusted when he says that he may have to make cuts.

Fiona Mactaggart: No, I did not say that and I do not believe that Mike Todd will have to make cuts, although I do believe that there will be a challenge—that is the point, is it not? We have discovered that one reason why, in the early years of a Labour Government, our commitments did not immediately translate into front-line police numbers was that we did not establish a clear mechanism to guarantee that the extra investment would turn into extra officers.

That is precisely why we made the crime fighting fund work as it does and why it gives the power to ensure that the resources translate directly into officers. The crime fighting fund pays for 643 recruits and is making a real difference in Greater Manchester, which has also enjoyed an increase in police support staff of 662 since March 1997. Even though there has been a 39 per cent. increase in police budgets since the election, there will be challenges for front-line police officers. However, we have sought to give them the tools to meet the challenges effectively.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the important example of gun crime and bureaucracy. The biggest increase in gun crime is with replica guns, a significant problem that must be tackled. We have given the police an unbureaucratic and effective tool for dealing with gun crime, by including in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 an arrestable offence of carrying an imitation firearm in public without a reasonable excuse. In addition, we have introduced a minimum five-year sentence for possession of an illegal firearm. Both measures have given the police effective tools to help them to deal with gun crime.

[Fiona Mactaggart]

The hon. Gentleman rightly pointed out that the most powerful way we have helped the police force to deal with red tape is through video identity parades. If one talks to police officers, they will all say that they spend hugely less time nowadays managing identification parades, because of the video identification parade electronic recording scheme, known as VIPER.

The hon. Gentleman referred to stop and search, and yes, some additional bureaucracy is involved in counting the incidence of that. That is because if stop and search is to be an effective policing tool, it must enjoy the confidence of all our communities. We have asked police officers to record stop and search in order to make it the effective policing tool that it is when it does enjoy that confidence.

I was in Reading today, visiting someone in whose shop a crime had been committed, and talking about his experience as a witness and how the police responded to him. As I was there, I walked past two police officers patrolling that side street in Reading. Knowing the area well, I must confess that I was struck by that example, because five years ago those officers would not have been there. We have more police on our streets than at any time. Of course there are challenges to the management of the police, but we have more than 8,000 police officers in Manchester, backed up by additional community support officers.

The extra resources that we have given to Manchester are not, and never will be, enough for the individual officer to say that he can deliver the perfect police force. However, that officer has had a substantial increase in resources, which, along with the resourcefulness that he and his team can show, will enable him to continue to ensure that there are more police officers on the streets of Manchester and that they continue to increase the effectiveness with which they police the community that they serve.

Medway Queen

4 pm

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): In every constituency there are many examples of great people and great buildings. In my town great people have built great ships, including; in 1765, Nelson's flagship, HMS Victory. It follows that we in Medway are passionate about our maritime history, and that is what this debate is about—our maritime history. It is about a unique ship that took working people on excursions and holidays, saved 7,000 men from the Nazis, and would now be lost to the nation if it were not for another great set of people, the Medway Queen Preservation Society. Our ambition is to see the Medway Queen restored, so that she can once again sail the River Medway in all her glory.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister and his Department value our ships. Following consultations, our noble Friend Lord McIntosh recently announced the intention to set up a national historic ships unit that will advise the Government on policies and priorities and co-ordinate with those directly engaged in the preservation of ships to promote public interest in our maritime history—laudable aims that we all support.

One important response to the consultation was the desire for the unit to engage fully with small craft and not to become preoccupied with the preservation of large ships. I hope that my right hon. Friend will be able to comment on that issue, or write to me if he is unable to comment today. I expect that he will tell the Chamber that there are thousands of ships and many worthy causes, and that there will simply never be sufficient funds to restore all of them. He will rightly say that there must be a better way of co-ordinating policy, so that grant-giving bodies such as the Heritage Lottery Fund are better informed when considering applications. That is right, but part of the thinking behind policy must be about the uniqueness and history of the craft, and, as the Government have rightly said, the consideration of the public interest.

I am fully aware that my right hon. Friend does not have a cheque book in his pocket today, and nor will he have one tomorrow. Making grants is the job of independent bodies, but they will be informed by Government policy, and in securing this debate that is what I seek to influence.

The Medway Queen is a paddle-steamer. She was built in 1924, in Troon on the banks of the Clyde, for the New Medway Steam Packet Co. as part of its Queen Line fleet. She was a fine vessel and a model example of Scotland's shipbuilding at its best. I say that because we in Chatham know a thing or two about shipbuilding. Her passenger load was 800 with a top speed of 15 knots. Today, she is the only surviving paddler of her type. The Medway Queen has survived, and that is remarkable given the number of attempts there have been to blow her up, scrap her or sink her. However, despite her remarkable record of survival, given her current state she cannot survive for much longer without financial support.

The Medway Queen was one of many pleasure steamers operating at the time. The ship's regular route was from Medway to Southend. From Chatham she called at Sheerness and Herne bay before reaching her destination on the Essex coast. She also sailed up and down the Thames, to Clacton. That was her life for 15 years from the day on which she was commissioned, apart from occasional repair at the Acorn shipyard, where the finest and most skilled boilermakers in the land attended to her needs.

After war broke out in 1939, the Medway Queen carried children who were being evacuated from Kent to East Anglia. She joined the Royal Navy as a minesweeper, serving for the duration of the war in the 10th minesweeping flotilla in the English channel. By then she was HMS Medway Queen. In 1940, like many small ships, Medway Queen took part in the evacuation of our troops from Dunkirk. She distinguished herself by rescuing 7,000 men. On her seventh trip across the channel, she was badly damaged and reported lost. However, as has become her hallmark, she survived. During those seven trips she gained four awards for gallantry, having shot down three enemy aircraft. She became known as the heroine of Dunkirk—a paddle-steamer shot down enemy aircraft; a paddle-steamer saved 7,000 men.

After the war, the Medway Queen returned to her commercial service on the River Medway. In the 1960s our access to cars and changes in holidays meant that paddle-steamers were becoming redundant. Many were broken up, and the Medway Queen was sold for scrap. There was a public outcry and, once again, she survived. She became a maritime clubhouse on the Isle of Wight. However, by the 1980s the Medway Queen was unused and deserted and once again the breaker's yard beckoned. Yet in 1984 a group from Kent brought her back to Chatham dockyard, intending to restore her. Sadly this group was unable to carry through its intention and she sank, lying abandoned in the River Medway—a seemingly tragic end to a wonderful ship that had once graced the same river but was now filled with tonnes of mud. In 1985, the Medway Queen Preservation Society was formed and became the owner of the ship. It spent the next two years removing the mud and patching the hull so that she might be refloated. A full and professional maritime survey was carried out and the results were promising. She was refloated and moved to her present site at Damhead Creek in the estuary of the River Medway. That is the potted history of this unique craft.

It is 20 years since the preservation society started its huge project. The setbacks along the way have included the ship sinking, the destruction of the visitor centre, including irreplaceable archive material, by vandals just last year, and two rejections from the lottery, the last one being particularly painful. Despite all that, the preservation society has continued because of the huge public support for the project. Everybody in Medway knows somebody who has a story about the Medway Queen. She is held in great affection.

It is important for me to pay tribute to the members of the GMB union. With their help, a new funnel was built in 2002 by young apprentices from the Appledore shipyard in Devon. The lads used parts of the original funnel and riveted them to the new one. Most recently, the unveiling of the new paddle took place with the help of south-east Co-op. Those are just two examples of public interest being aroused, and young people being involved in maritime skills, thanks to the Medway Queen.

As I said earlier, last year's lottery rejection was painful. The society was bidding for £6 million from the Heritage Lottery Fund in order that the hull could be restored to its original riveted specification. A cheaper option of plating the hull was advised against, so the MQPS produced a professional business plan that cost tens of thousands of pounds. It did that because that was what the HLF appeared to be recommending.

I know that there is not enough money for every project. However, when people give their time and effort, not to mention raising funds—which is hard work, as we all know—they should be given clear guidance from the lottery as to what is expected. If necessary, they should also be given help. Otherwise, the criticism of the lottery that it is accessible only to well connected and professional types will continue.

It appears that all is not lost, continuing the theme of the Medway Queen's survival. Shortly after the rejection, Mr. Stephen Johnson, a director from the lottery, said on a local radio station that the lottery was keen to assist the Medway Queen. There have been meetings, a grant has been applied for and the society will work up a cheaper option for the hull, namely a plated one. That was referred to earlier but was rejected. The society has not been discouraged, has made the application and is waiting to hear. The application is for a project management scheme to provide the detail on whether plating the hull can be achieved; it will still cost in the region of £2 million.

The society has been told by the south-east Heritage Lottery Fund that it will be given every assistance in applying for the grant. I hope that that is the case, because the Medway Queen's restoration will be a project for all people. Older hands from the skilled group of retired craftsmen who attend to the ship every Thursday will be able to show younger hands skills that we need to preserve, not just for this ship but many others in our nation.

I conclude with an extract from J.B. Priestley's "Excursion to Hell":

"But now—look—this little steamer, like all her brave and battered sisters, is immortal. She'll go sailing down the years in the epic of Dunkirk. And yet our great-grandchildren, when they learn how we began this war by snatching glory out of defeat, may also learn how the little holiday steamers made an excursion to hell and came back glorious."

The Heritage Lottery Fund said that the Medway Queen was not of sufficient historical importance to warrant a grant last time. Well, the ship helped to shape the nation's history. At Dunkirk, 7,000 souls were saved, so let us save the Medway Queen.

4.12 pm

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw) on securing this important debate. After hearing his contribution, if I had the cheque book in my pocket, I would sign one for him straight away. He spoke passionately about a subject that I know is close to his heart, and it is important that the Chamber hears such messages coming from a constituency. I hope that the advice that is given can be heeded, not just in Government but in other quarters.

As my hon. Friend said, the Medway Queen had a particularly distinguished record in evacuating British troops from the beaches of Dunkirk in 1940. It is appropriate that we are recalling that now in 2005, when we are celebrating the 60th anniversary of the end of the second world war. The Medway Queen saved some 7,000 men not only from the beaches but from the sea, thanks to the courage and tenacity of her crew. I know that some of the men saved still remember vividly, and often recall, how they were rescued.

BEST COPY AVAILBLE

[Mr. Richard Caborn]

After the war the Medway Queen settled into the less adventurous but important role of a pleasure steamer. Sadly, the great ship had the indignity of hitting an underwater obstruction and sinking in the River Medina in the early 1970s. She was tied up at Chatham where her decline and neglect have been sad to witness. I pay tribute to the Medway Queen Preservation Society, which my hon. Friend has congratulated, which was formed to save the ship and secure her future. The society's devotion and commitment and that of the ship's owner, the New Medway Steam Packet Company, bring the story of the proud ship right up to date. Thanks to the work of volunteers, the Medway Queen is now at least afloat in a safe berth in Damhead Creek at Kingsnorth in Kent.

I appreciate that the owners and the preservation society face a huge task in restoring the ship to full working order; there is no doubt about that. I confirm to my hon. Friend that the Government do not provide direct funding support for the acquisition, movement or conservation of historic ships, other than by providing grant-in-aid to museums that we sponsor which have vessels of historic significance in their collections.

However, we are committed to delivering a national policy on ship preservation which preserves the best of our maritime heritage. In February, we announced the creation of a national historic ships unit. That unit will, for the first time, formally advise the Secretary of State and the Heritage Lottery Fund on historic ships, their funding needs and their investment priorities. We expect the unit to be up and running by April 2006. Capital funding for historic ships projects will continue to be dealt with by the HLF and other public or private grant-giving bodies.

In July 2004, as my hon. Friend recalled, the HLF considered a major grant application from the New Medway Steam Packet Co. for £6.7 million towards full restoration of the paddle-steamer. The HLF's trustees recognised the heritage importance of the Medway Queen and the role that she played in British history during the Dunkirk evacuations. They also praised the enthusiasm and commitment of the company and its members. However, the trustees felt that the high cost of restoring the ship, and the level of rebuilding necessary, would not represent value for money in terms of heritage and the long-term viability of the ship. The HLF also felt that a couple of their key criteria for awarding grants—sufficient public access and opportunities for learning—had not been demonstrated.

In August 2004, Heritage Lottery Fund staff met representatives of the New Medway Steam Packet Co. to explore whether there might be scope for a more modest project, funded by the HLF, that would play a part in securing the ship's long-term survival. As a result of their discussions, the company has identified an alternative approach, which could provide a renewed hull and, potentially, a new weather deck. Completion of that work could secure the ship in the medium term and provide the company with a platform for further fundraising to complete the full restoration over time.

Heritage Lottery Fund staff have continued to provide advice on developing the project, resulting in a recent application to the fund for a project planning grant of £31,500 to enable the New Medway Steam Packet Co. to complete detailed survey work, a conservation and management plan for the ship and other technical approvals needed to underpin the restoration of the ship. The HLF received the application on 21 February and, subject to a full assessment of the proposals, a decision should be made in three months. As my hon. Friend recognised, some progress is being made and the way forward is now clearly identified.

The Heritage Lottery Fund will remain the principal source of funding for historic ships. Its trustees make decisions independently of the Government; it is not open to Ministers to intervene or seek in any way to influence its decisions. The HLF has a role to play and it is engaging in that role enthusiastically, giving advice to the New Medway Steam Packet Co. The company's relationship with the HLF does not guarantee funding, because there are always so many competing bids for the available funds. However, we hope that the new national historic ships unit will provide an authoritative source of advice for the HLF and for those engaged in the preservation of our maritime heritage. My hon. Friend clearly outlined how that has impacted on our nation over the years.

I congratulate my hon. Friend again on his support and commitment to this project. He represents an historic constituency that is famous throughout the world for its history and record of shipbuilding. In this 60th anniversary year of the ending of the second world war, I am grateful to him for giving us the opportunity to discuss the future of one of the ships that played such a distinguished and magnificent role in that war.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nineteen minutes past Four o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 16 March 2005

[MR. FRANK COOK in the Chair]

Water Charging (Northern Ireland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[James Purnell.]

9.30 am

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I warn hon. Members that I feel it appropriate that we should apply the new ruling of Mr. Speaker on debates that centre on an area or region that Opposition winding-up speeches be limited to five minutes each. Those speeches will therefore commence 20 minutes before the conclusion of the debate at the latest.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the expected impact of water charging in Northern Ireland. In the absence of devolved government, there is unquestionably a democratic deficit, and people feel it most acutely on issues such as this. Few issues in recent years have generated more interest and concern among the people of Northern Ireland than the proposal to introduce water charging. The public reaction, as reflected at public meetings, in the press and in the attitude of people throughout the community, has been universally critical—albeit to varying degrees—of the Government's approach and the way in which they intend to move forward. No one will be more aware of that than the Minister. As I shall show later, I have some sympathy for him in one respect, in that he picked up a ball that was left for him by the pro-agreement parties in the Executive. However, he did run with it with great enthusiasm.

For all sides in the debate, it is important that the subject is debated openly and honestly. I fear that the Government are in too much of a hurry, and many will accuse Northern Ireland Office Ministers of allowing themselves to be bullied by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and, as a result, of not approaching the consultation process with as open a mind as they should have done. Tangentially may I say, Mr. Cook, that the Minister, as he presses ahead with his wider water reform agenda, should perhaps learn the lesson of that? I strongly advise him not to rush ahead with the project. The issue is not remotely close to having been sufficiently ventilated in public. The debate should continue and further debate and discussion will bring about a better outcome.

It is important that water charging is placed in its proper context: the under-investment in infrastructure over the past 30 years and the approach taken by the last Executive. My party has sought over many years to warn people of the consequences of the course that the Government have followed and to educate people in the evolving debate. We have published policy papers and proposals. In "Water Charging: Exposing the Government's tax-raising agenda—An alternative way forward" and our "Triple Tax Threat" policy document, we set out our position on those matters. We have dealt with the issue responsibly and constructively. The Government, however, seem intent on proceeding with their plans regardless of the views of the people of Northern Ireland. A return to devolution will not necessarily result in any easy answers or solutions, but at least we would have an opportunity to make our own decisions and take responsibility for the choices that we make. At the moment, Mr. Cook, the debate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hesitate to stop the flow of the hon. Gentleman's speech. However, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not remind hon. Members that in establishing this parallel Chamber, the House consciously took the decision—in its wisdom or otherwise—that when the Chair in Westminster Hall was occupied by one of the four senior members of the Speaker's Panel, they should be addressed as Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Robinson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I was saying that the debate is characterised on one hand by a Government who are free to propose as they please, without fear of any electoral consequences, and on the other by local parties that can oppose as they please without the fear of having to take any responsibility. That is not a healthy situation in a democracy, and nor is it likely to lead to the best debate or the best decisions.

I have no doubt that the best way to deal with the situation is an early return to devolution to allow locally elected politicians to sort it out. Some have suggested that parties in Northern Ireland are happy to see direct-rule Ministers taking such difficult decisions so that if and when devolution returns, we can claim that our hands are clean. Let me make it clear, at least on behalf of my party, that that is not the case.

If I were in government today, I would take the same approach that I advocated publicly and privately when I dealt with the issue as a Minister in the Department for Regional Development. I say that because it is interesting to see how some parties are now taking a rather different approach from the one that they took during devolution. Revisionism has been taken to a new level and transformed into an art form by some of them, but I shall come back to that point.

Whatever the nature of the debate about water charging, there can be no doubt—nor, I suggest, any argument—about the need for significant investment in water services. Investment is vital for both the provision of water and the treatment of waste water. When I became a Minister, I was appalled by the state of the infrastructure, which was a consequence of it having been starved of funds for decades. Without the necessary investment, serious health issues will arise and environmental damage will inevitably be caused.

Investment is required to meet European directives and prevent massive fines for the UK, although I rather suspect that the Treasury would remove such money from the Northern Ireland block. Northern Ireland Ministers would probably then reduce DRD spending, so the cycle would continue. We also require investment for the developments that must proceed. We have already heard discussion in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs about curbs on development as a result of the waste water problems in the Province. The consequences of that would be massive for jobs in the construction industry, so the matter must be tackled with a view to the massive investment needed.

[Mr. Robinson]

We should also remember the circumstances that brought about the infrastructure deficit in Northern Ireland. There were 30 years of terrorism—you need not concern yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I am not going down that road. However, it needs to be said that much-needed resources were directed to the fight against terrorism and away from vital infrastructure. Given the responsibility of direct-rule Administrations over that period, it is unreasonable to ask the people of Northern Ireland to make up the shortfall.

A significant element of any water charge will go towards upgrading infrastructure, which is required because of the lack of investment in the past. People in Northern Ireland undoubtedly feel aggrieved at having to pay to put right a situation that others allowed to deteriorate. People especially resent having to pay twice for their water. People in Northern Ireland will recall that in the decade before 1999, water services were funded from the regional rate through an hypothecated charge. The pro-agreement parties in the Executive bear a significant responsibility for the position in which we now find ourselves. The Minister will be aware that the break in the linkage was contrary to the advice given by the Department when I was in charge of it—indeed, when I was performing his role in July 2000.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): Is there any problem facing Northern Ireland that is not linked to the failure of the Belfast agreement?

Mr. Robinson: Save the weather, probably not. I will look closely to see whether there are any other issues. The agreement had a massive impact on the way in which the Government operated. That was why we made critical changes to structures, especially regarding accountability.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): Not one word was changed.

Mr. Robinson: The right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) is talking about the Belfast agreement. We were in the business of burying it, not changing it. He wants it to continue in its original form. However, I shall not be dragged in that direction.

The Minister will be aware that in July 2000, my permanent secretary, Ronnie Spence, and I met the then Minister of Finance and Personnel, Mr. Mark Durkan. We argued that the linkage between water and the regional rate should be retained. The DFP Minister and pro-agreement members of the Executive did not take my advice, as a result of which there was no identifiable way to show that the householders of Northern Ireland were paying for their water, and of course the Chancellor pounced. If the link had been maintained, the Treasury could not have ambushed us.

The short-term implication of the Treasury's decision was to remove any clear justification for an above-average increase in the rates, and the longer-term consequence was to allow the Chancellor to step in and press for water charging in Northern Ireland that was additional to the regional rate. At the meeting with Mark Durkan, I argued strongly against breaking the link for those reasons. I advanced such an argument on numerous occasions thereafter while I was in office, including directly with the then First Minister on 10 June 2002. I also put my views on the public record. My position today is the position that I took privately and publicly and advocated while in office.

It is hardly surprising that people believe that they continue to pay for water through the regional rate, given that there was no reduction in the regional rate when the link was broken. That leads to the inescapable conclusion that, despite the visible link having been broken, people continue to pay for water services through their rates. Indeed, as there is no Barnett provision for water, the regional rate must bear the burden for water services.

When I was a Minister at the DRD, my view was straightforward, as my position on taxation has been throughout my political career. I have been in favour of the lowest possible taxes in exchange for quality services. I have followed such a policy at local government level and in the Northern Ireland Assembly. Indeed, my record at Castlereagh borough council and the DRD speaks for itself. I was opposed to the break between the regional rate and the funding of water services. When the Treasury demanded that Northern Ireland should have a separate water charge and become self-financing, I argued that that could be done by identifying, reflecting and separating the contributions towards water services that were already paid within the existing rates bill and reducing the remaining segment accordingly. Any increase would be required only to fund additional investment, which could be offset by the savings that officials told me were possible in the Water Service and the introduction of a developer's contribution.

It is interesting to see how some parties that took an opposing view at the time have repositioned themselves—resistance to higher taxation appears to be infectious for some when not in government, especially at election times. Only a few years ago, when wearing a different hat, someone who now voices opposition to higher taxation talked about

"necessary substantial increases in locally based revenue in the next few years".

That was a statement by Mark Durkan in 2001. Others pointed out that we would have no credibility with the Treasury

"unless we accept that we have to address the level of local revenue."

That is an Executive paper from the then First and Deputy First Ministers and the Minister of Finance and Personnel in 2002.

In a policy document on the subject, the Ulster Unionist party stated:

"It is widely recognised that Northern Ireland has the lowest household rates in the UK. Central Government is no longer prepared to sustain subvention at current 'Barnett' levels unless the Executive takes steps to address the rates imbalance with the rest of the United Kingdom. Water Charging is the largely accepted way of doing so."

It will not be a surprise to note that that policy document seems to have been removed from the Ulster Unionist party website, for one reason or another.

The Social Democratic and Labour party, whose members are going around the Province campaigning against water charges, took a very different approach when it was in office. The SDLP Minister of Finance and Personnel, Sean Farren, spelled out his position in April 2002 when he said:

"while it may be unpalatable, we may also have to accept that if we want better public services here we will have to pay more for them . . . This will mean looking hard at the rates and at the financing of our water and sewerage services."

There is some merit in putting on public record the advice that I offered the Executive on this matter in May 2002:

"I am open to better suggestions arising through the consultation process but it is hard not to recognise the advantage of Water Service costs being isolated as part of the Regional Rate bill with only the new infrastructure being charged additionally to the Ratepayer and then only if needed after savings have been made, from amongst other things, bureaucratic extravagance. This alternative offers a desirable outcome which (1) clearly identifies the source of income for water services; (2) provides for much needed additional funding for water infrastructure; (3) avoids having to unnecessarily burden the Ratepayer; and (4) enables hypothecation of revenues raised to fund Water Service".

In such circumstances, there would be no substantial increase in local taxes, and the existing arrangements would be appropriate for assessing water charges.

Some local parties have been disingenuous about their approach, but I do not believe that the Government have been entirely straightforward on the issue, either. In support of the introduction of water charges, they put forward a number of arguments that, on examination, cannot be defended. The first is that people in Northern Ireland do not pay for their water. From my remarks earlier, it is clear that this argument cannot be sustained. Given that, to all intents and purposes, no money is given to fund water services in Northern Ireland by the Treasury, the only way that it can be paid for is by people in Northern Ireland through regional rates. The Government may argue that insufficient money is then spent on other public services in Northern Ireland, but they cannot argue that people do not pay for water.

The second Government argument is that this measure is required by EU law. That contention does not withstand scrutiny if one looks at the relevant EU directive, the water framework directive of 2000, which states:

"Member States shall ensure by 2010 that water-pricing policies provide adequate incentives for users to use water resources efficiently, and thereby contribute to the environmental objectives of this Directive."

In the absence of compulsory metering, the Government's proposal does not provide adequate incentives to use water resources more efficiently. Indeed, if the water charge is based on the value of a person's home, there is no incentive whatever to use water efficiently, so it is clear that that cannot possibly be a real argument for bringing forward the type of charging suggested. I would ask the Government to reflect on the matter; the Republic of Ireland complies, or purports to deal, with the directive in a much more flexible way, as I think the Minister would agree.

The third argument that the Government put forward is that people in Northern Ireland do not pay enough in local taxes. In my opinion that contention entirely misses the point. The level of local taxes in Northern Ireland has no impact on the rest of the United Kingdom. Self-evidently, the higher the local taxes, the more local spending power is available. Different council tax levels and varying levels of service apply in neighbouring councils in Great Britain, so why should there be some over-riding reason for the Government to decide this matter for the people of Northern Ireland?

Rate-capping may have been a feature in the past in Great Britain, but the notion of a minimum level seems somewhat novel; in fact, it is absurd. Where else would central Government be asking politicians to increase local taxes and shun efficiency? I have consistently argued, both in office and since then, that savings and efficiencies are a much better way to free-up resources for vital spending than unnecessarily raising rates and taxes.

All the arguments advanced by the Government are fundamentally misconceived. The only argument for a separate water charge turns on the implications of the new system of resource accounting. That was highlighted in the letter from the Chief Secretary to the Treasury to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in July 2002. The implications of not signing up to self-financing water services are likely, due to technical rules, to be damaging to our spending power in Northern Ireland. However, that is not an argument for higher taxation overall; it is only an argument for dividing and administering the existing level of payments differently.

Unless the Northern Ireland Executive make a commitment to self-financing arrangements for water services, Northern Ireland will lose spending power, beginning with tens of millions of pounds each year and leading to hundreds of millions. I have always believed that it is important that the choices, and implications of those choices, should be put before the people of Northern Ireland. Indeed, as the Minister responsible I wrote as early as March 2002 to Sean Farren, the then Finance Minister, and stressed the importance of setting out the context and implications of the choice.

Mr. Trimble: I am glad to hear the hon. Gentleman refer to the impact of resource assessment budgeting. He is right to say that that is a significant factor. However, as I understand it, he is arguing that one digs out the hitherto hypothecated water element in the rates and brings it to a level that will provide self-sufficiency in water services. Does he accept that the implication of that is that the money hitherto raised through the regional rate that went into other services will no longer be available and he will find himself with less money for other services, or having to raise more money through the regional rate to fill the shortfall?

Mr. Robinson: No, I certainly do not. That is a bogus argument. The right hon. Gentleman clearly does not have an accounting degree. If the money is already paying for water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland, it is not paying for other services. Identifying that amount of money, which is already being used for that purpose, does not take it away from any other service; it simply identifies and administers the process differently.

Although the manner in which any water charge is applied is important for those who will have to pay it, the size of the overall burden is an even greater issue.

[Mr. Robinson]

These issues cannot be viewed in isolation from other changes in local taxation in Northern Ireland. Some in Northern Ireland are campaigning under the banner of "Can't pay, won't pay." My slogan and my argument are different: I say that we are paying and should not pay twice. We should reclassify existing local taxes, identify the water charge element, uncouple it from the regional rate and present it as a separate charge, and reduce the regional rate accordingly.

However, in the circumstance that the Government face us with, we can either keep our purity and opt out of discussing the new arrangements that they have suggested or we can take advantage of the legal practice of pleading in the alternative. Taking that position, I must conclude that defining the fairest method of payment to employ is not simple.

My colleagues and I have suggested that people should have a choice between basing the charge on the value of their home or opting for voluntary metering. Contrary to some newspaper letters that are being mysteriously orchestrated at the present time, we put forward that position before, even, the Northern Ireland Assembly elections and it is contained in our policy document. That position allows householders to choose what is best for them in the circumstances in which they find themselves.

The General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland has done a lot of good work assessing the impact of water charging and has produced statistics that have helped to inform this debate. To the Government argument that people in Northern Ireland pay less in local taxes than those in Great Britain, the GCC points out that householder expenditure already forms 12 per cent. more of gross household income than the UK average—without adding the expected higher rates and water charges.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): The hon. Gentleman was talking a few moments ago about "Can't pay, won't pay." Does he distinguish between those who have been developing that campaign along the lines that they have done in the past and those who have been living in moderate housing that was bought when they were working in ordinary employment? The value of such houses has gone up tremendously. With the increase in rates and now their water rate such people would find it utterly impossible to pay.

Mr. Robinson: I am not being critical of those who campaign under the slogan "Can't pay, won't pay," I just believe that it is misconceived and that they are already paying. As for people in deprived backgrounds, the statistics produced by the GCC strongly support the argument that the hon. Gentleman advances. Indeed, an average water charge of £340 would increase weekly expenditure to £389.34, which means that it would equate to 86.9 per cent. of gross household income and would widen the gap with the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): My hon. Friend raises an extremely important point. Is it not a fact that the Government have referred to the increased expenditure on businesses in Northern Ireland in terms of energy and insurance costs, and so on, but have not paid any attention to the higher costs for domestic ratepayers and householders? That is one of the issues that he rightly highlights.

Mr. Robinson: Yes, of course, I agree with that. It is somewhat unusual, is it not, for a Labour Government to be championing the cause of business against the individual consumer? Perhaps the fact that there are no Labour candidates in Northern Ireland has some impact on that position.

To return to the point I was making, essential weekly household expenditure would equate to 47.8 per cent., which would again widen the gap with the rest of the United Kingdom. The figures I have provided give a much more realistic sense of the impact of water charges than the bald comparisons of local tax levels. The GCC estimates that 169,926—or one in four—households in Northern Ireland are at risk of water-affordability and poverty problems. I hope that the Minister takes in that statistic and understands the hardship and anguish that it represents; one in four will suffer from water poverty.

Of even greater concern is the fact that 27 per cent. of households that are on housing benefit and receive rate rebate, which are currently protected from the cost of water in their rate bill, will have to pay water charges, albeit at a slightly reduced level. Whereas those people could escape the water charge while it was included in the regional rate, they cannot escape it under the Minister's proposals. Before the Government go much further with their current plan, it is critical that they think again about the impact of water charges on householders in Northern Ireland. To fail to do so would have serious consequences for Northern Ireland householders as well as for the workability of the proposals.

Before Christmas, while the other parties posed and moaned about water charging and the threat of increased taxation, my colleagues and I attempted to do something about it. During the talks process leading to the Government's paper on a comprehensive agreement, we sought to address the issue on the basis that I set out earlier. Although the Government were not flexible on some aspects of our proposal, we were working towards an outcome that would have led to the Treasury agreeing to allow Northern Ireland to continue accessing the reinvestment and reform initiative borrowing facility while pegging the regional rate for the phasing-in period of the water charge.

The deal, which was in the final stages of negotiation but not completed, would have saved householders hundreds of pounds over the next few years, and involved freezing the regional rate, reducing the district rate by applying Barnett consequentials, and leaving the new Executive to apply whatever level of a resource element they determined to reduce further the district rate. In addition, we sought to lengthen from three to five years the phasing in of water charging. That would have further reduced its impact. The matter was still under negotiation when Sinn Fein, unable to adapt to democratic politics, walked away from the table. That meant that the conditions in which the Government would have activated the proposal were not realised.

Along with the proposal to set up a £1 billion fund to tackle the ageing infrastructure, the Executive would have been well placed, after introducing efficiencies and developer contributions, to produce a much more acceptable way forward. It might not have been ideal in every respect, but within the constraints set by the Treasury, it represented a significantly better deal than the one presently being served up. I urge the Minister and the Government to pick up on those elements of our discussions, and I hope that rather than foisting this unbearable burden on the people of Northern Ireland, they might revise their existing plans.

David Burnside rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With Mr. Speaker's regional rule in place, 37 minutes remain for Back-Bench contributions before the first of the two Opposition winding-up speeches. If a similar situation pertains after the next contribution, I shall review that rule and perhaps revert to the original.

10.3 am

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): I look forward to taking part in this debate under your chairmanship, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you and all hon. Members are looking forward to the Minister responding to some of the questions and points that will be raised in the debate, unlike his ministerial colleague, the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner), who appears to think that one does not have to answer questions raised in Adjournment debates.

As the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) has already pointed out, there is great concern about the Government's proposals for the reform of water and sewerage charges. Unfair is not a word that I usually use in politics, but the proposal is unfair for the general population of Northern Ireland. If I may, I will open my remarks not with the words of right-wing David Burnside, Unionist Orange bigot from South Antrim, but with those of the equality impact assessment that was commissioned by the General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland. It stated that a property-based charge based on capital value will have a negative impact on Protestants, Unionists, married couples, the elderly and their carers. It continued that Protestants are likely to bear a disproportionately greater burden of the domestic and sewerage bill than their representation in the wider Northern Ireland community would indicate. Unionists are also likely to bear a disproportionately greater burden of the domestic and sewerage bill than their representation in the wider Northern Ireland community would indicate. There will be a negative impact on the elderly and those with elderly dependants. Perhaps the Minister would comment on that.

No allowance has been made in the Government's proposals for the most vulnerable in our society. What about pensioners who survive on low incomes but remain in their family home? What about families in receipt of family tax credit? How will they afford to pay for water charges under the new proposals? The Government's proposed 25 per cent. discount for low-income households in Northern Ireland is inadequate to address affordability issues. Will the Minister acknowledge that it would cost £40 million per year to provide full protection for the most vulnerable households? Will he therefore give an undertaking to go back to the drawing board and to come back with a fairer, more affordable suggestion that will not put additional pressure on already vulnerable ratepayers?

We all realise that Northern Ireland's rates, with their different historical background, are considerably less than the equivalent in England, Scotland and Wales but, as the hon. Member for Belfast, East has already pointed out, the income and expenditure profile in Northern Ireland is entirely different. Our household expenditure forms 12 per cent. more of our gross household income than the UK average. If water charges were added, at an average of £340, equating to £6.54 per week, it would increase our weekly household expenditure to £389.34. That would mean that household expenditure equated to 86.9 per cent. of gross household income, widening the gap with the rest of the UK.

Moreover, ratepayers in Northern Ireland face an additional significant hike in their household bills over the next few years. The regional rate, currently at 55 per cent. of the rates bill, will increase by 9 per cent., 9 per cent. and 6 per cent. respectively over the next three years and district rates are also likely to increase with the impact of waste management costs on local councils. The Government must therefore take into account the question of affordability. It is widely recognised that there is growing customer debt. It is estimated that a quarter of county court judgments in England and Wales are for water companies pursuant to water arrears.

Water arrears are currently at £893 million in England and Wales. The cost of the debt burden adds an average £10 to water bills, a further penalty for those who pay. There is something badly wrong with the system. If that were transferred to Northern Ireland on a pro rata basis, it would equate to arrears of at least £29 million. That would have to be borne by higher bills for those customers who can afford to pay. Some 169,926 households—one in four—will be at risk of water poverty.

What is the Government's current estimate of the administrative cost of recovering bad debt through the courts? These are questions that the Government seem never to have answered before. It is expected that many consumers will contest or appeal their new valuation. The Water Service will become the unofficial appeals mechanism for rates, imposing additional burden and costs on it, which, again, will inevitably be passed on to consumers. Who will pay for the administrative burden and delay in collecting water charges?

The only time limit is from the EU directive, which stipulates 2010. Given the obvious implementation problems, why are the Government rushing these proposals through by 2006? No health impact assessment has been conducted, despite the obvious links between poverty, debt and poor health, including stress and mental health factors, which are clearly identified in the Government's own "Investing for Health" strategy. Why not?

There are alternatives. As the General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland eloquently said, they must be "fair, affordable and sustainable". The Treasury has refused to extend to Northern Ireland the so-called green dowry—I suppose that that is something given away on St. Patrick's day—that was given to water companies in Great Britain prior to privatisation. The Treasury should pay to bring Northern Ireland's water and sewerage infrastructure up to the standard of its modern equivalents, instead of the burden of the cost being passed on to local ratepayers. It should fill the gap where the necessary infrastructure and capital investment was not made in the past. The cost of road drainage should not be embedded in a domestic water charge; road users should assume the cost. Further developers could pick up the costs of additional development and infrastructure, instead of existing consumers.

[David Burnside]

Metering is an open subject in this debate. What consideration have the Government given to it? It appears to have been all but ruled out before any assessment has been made about how it could affect local people. Further discussion is needed on the possibility of introducing a metering system with built-in protection of water allowances to protect those who cannot afford to pay.

I own a farm in north Antrim, and I wish briefly to address how farmers will be affected. We already have meters on our agricultural land, and farmers are going to lose their domestic allowance. I would like the Minister to comment on that increased cost to them.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. John Spellar): In order to assist me in my reply, may I ask the hon. Gentleman whether he is proposing voluntary or universal metering? Also, what basis does he want there to be for the charging under metering? Is he proposing marginal cost or average cost for differentiating between those who are metered and those who are not?

David Burnside: My personal view is that optional metering would be the fairest system. Provision could be made for metering to be possible in all new-build housing in Northern Ireland. However, allowances would have to apply, regardless of whether there is a metering system.

Mr. Spellar: May I press the hon. Gentleman? Should there be average costing, so that if someone uses 50 per cent. less water, they pay 50 per cent. less, or should the marginal cost of delivering the extra water be the measure?

David Burnside: The costing would have to be pro rata. There is no way of rating other than to have a pro rata system.

The water reform proposals currently under debate in the Province have not won either a consensus of political support, or support from consumer organisations or representative bodies. We are not time-limited. We need more debate, more information and more clarity, so that we can consider all the issues and try to come to an agreement as to the way forward. The matter was not agreed when the Executive were operational at Stormont; no progress was made then. I believe that it is sometimes right in politics not to rush ahead and make radical changes that will be regretted in years to come. We are limited by the EU directive to 2010. Let us have a longer and broader debate. There are options.

The Government's current proposals will not provide a secure financial basis for future funding without imposing additional increases on consumers, and subsequently increasing the numbers of those who cannot afford to pay. The water reform programme mistakenly places costs on consumers only. It ignores the "polluter pays" principle, as well as the Government's social responsibility to provide adequate protection to those who are vulnerable, as they have done in the recent rating review relief proposals. The Government must go back to the drawing board and look again fundamentally at their proposals.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Any Member seeking to contribute to the debate now should be well informed on what has gone before. If that is the case, I will call Jeffrey Donaldson.

10.14 am

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): I appreciate the opportunity to speak, and I am sorry that I was not here for the beginning of the debate but my flight from Belfast was delayed. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) on securing the debate on an issue that is very important to the Democratic Unionist party and, I know, to my constituents. As I have been going around in recent months talking to people, I have no doubt that there is widespread concern within the community about the introduction of water charges in Northern Ireland. We have debated the origins of that, but let me be absolutely clear in echoing what my hon. Friend said—that the DUP has consistently opposed the introduction of water charges in Northern Ireland. At no stage have we given our support to such a proposition, and we have very real concerns about the Government's proposals and the manner in which the Minister intends to implement the water charging system.

I was interested in what the hon. Member for South Antrim (David Burnside) said about the introduction of pro rata charging. When he was pressed by the Minister, he said that it would be based primarily on cost. I would point out to the hon. Gentleman that 80 per cent. of the cost is on infrastructure, and only 20 per cent. of the cost is on actual usage. We should be careful about going down that particular route, because we would end up with most of the water charge being a fixed-rate charge based on infrastructure and a very minimal percentage of the charge based on householders' actual usage.

As I talk to people about water charges, a number of concerns arise. I talk to pensioners living on their own, for example, who are very concerned about how they will be able to afford the additional levy. The Department has shown a degree of subterfuge in suggesting that it is time that Northern Ireland started paying for its water, like the rest of the United Kingdom. However, the reality is that we in the Province pay for our water through both the domestic and regional rate system. It is not correct to suggest that Northern Ireland does not pay for its water: we pay for actual usage by a distinct charge measured within the rates, and for the infrastructure through the regional rating system. Will there be a compensatory offset against the regional rate for the element that we already contribute for our water system in the Province if the Government proceed with the water charge against the will of the people of Northern Ireland and the wishes of Northern Ireland's political parties?

I accept that there is a need to invest in the water distribution system; there is no doubt that, over the years, the system has been neglected. A figure that is often quoted is that some 40 per cent. of the water supply leaks out of the system. Something should be done about that, and there will be a cost for it. However, I and the DUP are far from convinced that the Government's proposals in the form of water charging are the best, most effective or efficient way of charging.

Returning to the issue of householders, I mentioned pensioners living on their own. They are concerned that they will have to pay a water charge that will be equivalent, for example, to that paid by a family of three or four people living next door. There is a degree of unfairness about the Government's approach to water charging. Unless there is some means of measuring usage, it is very difficult to assess what individuals and households will actually use, and what a fair distribution of the cost will be. That is why water charges are not the best means of addressing the problem, if the problem is the need to invest in infrastructure, because they create inequalities and people feel that they are being treated unfairly.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman rightly puts forward his party's opposition to the charges. Is his party also engaged in the consultation that is currently taking place to try to learn from the experience of the UK, where we have seen increases in water charges and the whole question of affordability has arisen? Is he engaged in that consultation with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, Ofwat, Water Voice and Water UK to try to deal with the question of affordability? There is a window of time in which Northern Ireland can learn from the experience of the UK, where water affordability has become a serious problem.

Mr. Donaldson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. Unfortunately the Department in Northern Ireland is just pressing ahead; it is keen to impose the water charge on Northern Ireland as quickly as possible. There has been some consultation, but I do not believe that we have taken adequate time to learn from the experience of the rest of the UK. I believe that we could learn from that experience.

Recently, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I had the opportunity under your chairmanship to raise an issue about education in an Adjournment debate. I made the point then that we could learn from the experience of England and Wales in terms of our education system. I believe that we could also learn from the experience of England and Wales in terms of the imposition of water charges.

There is another good reason for delay. I believe that the issue is too important to be dealt with under direct rule, and that it should be put on hold until such time as the Assembly is reinstated. I hope that that will happen quickly, with a voluntary coalition comprising those democratic parties that are committed to peaceful means, and that that coalition can then address this issue, in a way that is more reflective of what people in Northern Ireland want and that is in the best interests of Northern Ireland. I urge the Minister to hold back rather than push the measure through and impose it on Northern Ireland against the wishes of the people. We should look at other examples, and at best practice, and we should examine situations where those measures have not worked and the costs have increased for the consumer.

Mr. Peter Robinson: For many years, the Department has been looking at examples, such as Glas Cymru. In fact, during my time in office, we brought over the Scottish regulator. I am sure that the current Minister has continued with those contacts, all of which showed that significant savings could be made within the system in Northern Ireland. Is that not what should be done? The costs should be reduced by efficiencies rather than the Government forcing up the cost of local taxes in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Donaldson: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. He will be aware that during the negotiations before Christmas we proposed the establishment of an efficiency commission in Northern Ireland that would look at public expenditure across the whole ambit of public services in the Province, identify where savings could be made, and then apply those savings to infrastructure improvements. That is why I believe that the Government are putting the cart before the horse; they are spending the money before we have saved the money and, instead of looking for efficiencies, they are imposing another tax on ratepayers in Northern Ireland that people feel is unfair and unjust.

Huw Irranca-Davies: The reason why I made my earlier point is that Water Voice and the other representative consumer organisations in the UK are arguing not against water charges per se, although there are questions about the rapid rises that have occurred, but for joined-up thinking to be rapidly developed between them and the Government to address the question of affordability. Water UK makes the point that although we rightly focus on affordability,

"Socioeconomic groups who can afford their water bills feature significantly in the companies debtor file. In addition a high proportion of debtors have moved in the last 4 years . . . Evidence suggests more people"— who can afford it—

"are now de-prioritising water debt in preference to satellite TV and mobile phones."

It is right that we focus on those who cannot afford to pay, but it is also right that we chase those who choose to escape payment. Does the hon. Gentleman agree?

Mr. Donaldson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that information. He will appreciate that we in Northern Ireland are coming at things from a different perspective. If we had 10 or 20 years' experience of water charges, we would be considering how to improve the system. Perhaps if the hon. Gentleman were in our position of not having water charges, he might look at the matter from our perspective, from which we are asking, "Do we need these water charges? Is there not a more effective and efficient way to raise the funding required for infrastructure improvements, without creating a new tax and putting an extra burden on the ratepayer?"

[Mr. Donaldson]

The hon. Gentleman is right. I believe that the situation will lead to further debt, which is a huge problem in Northern Ireland, as it is in the rest of the United Kingdom. Do we really want people's tax burden and debt to increase yet again—particularly in respect of those on low incomes, the elderly, pensioners, and so on? Will the Government increase the old-age pension to take account of the increased water charge? I doubt it.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): On the issue of affordability and those who are least able to pay, will my hon. Friend comment on the fact that a disproportionate number of people on low incomes are in social housing? Those people find that a significant amount of their rent and rates—usually all of it—is paid through housing benefit. However, under the proposed water charge they will still have to pay 75 per cent., unlike the other charge. More people in the lower income bracket will be in debt as a result of the implementation of the water charge.

Mr. Donaldson: I thank my hon. Friend for his helpful intervention.

We are a party of low taxation. We do not believe that taxation is the best means, on every occasion, of raising money for investment in infrastructure. I urge the Minister to think again about the proposal, because there is not widespread support for it in Northern Ireland. The Minister, who wears another hat and has responsibility for political development, has always upheld the principle that if we are to have something in Northern Ireland—whether in the political realm, or otherwise—there should be widespread community support for it. However, this Government continually impose on Northern Ireland policy initiatives, commissions and all kinds of things that are not representative of the community, do not reflect its views and are against people's wishes.

I urge the Minister to hold back, put the proposal on hold, allow the Assembly to consider the matter at greater length when it is reinstated, consider other areas where the water issue has been addressed, and see whether greater efficiencies can be made in Government, leading to savings that could be invested in our infrastructure, including the water distribution network. It is wrong to proceed in this manner. I have no doubt that this issue will be prominent in Northern Ireland as we face a general election. The DUP's position is clear. We oppose the water charges and believe that the Minister should think again.

10.28 am

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson). I endorse heartily what he said.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) on securing this debate on an important topic, which is the subject of considerable debate, anxiety and concern among many of our constituents. They face the prospect of higher regional and district rate bills and now the imposition of water charges, which will combine to bring about a massive increase in household taxation in the coming years. It is right that we should press the Minister again on these matters and raise the concerns of our constituents.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley made a general point about the Government's approach to such major issues in Northern Ireland. I am struck by the fact that time and again, when I meet direct-rule Ministers and take delegations to meet them, I am told that it is difficult to move things forward or take decisions about specific matters because they are awaiting the restoration of devolved institutions and the Assembly and because it is right and proper that elected representatives in Northern Ireland should take such decisions. In general, that is a rational and sensible approach, but on certain policy areas it completely goes out of the window. Instead of saying that it is right and proper for locally elected politicians to take some decisions, they impose decisions against the wishes of not just the majority of politicians, but politicians and elected representatives right across the community. We can cite several examples of that.

Recently, a higher education order was rejected on a cross-party basis—all parties except Sinn Fein voted against it. It was defeated in the Northern Ireland Grand Committee, yet the Government continue to proceed with it.

Another example is the matter before us today: there is large-scale, cross-party and cross-community opposition to, and concern about, the Government's proposed imposition of water charges. However, they are proceeding by setting aside that opposition and imposing the new regime. I entirely concur with my hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley that the headlong rush to introduce such charges should stop and that time should be taken to consider some of the proposals and ideas that have been put forward today by hon. Members, not least my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East. In his detailed and excellent speech, he outlined several options available to the Government.

The General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland indicated in its submissions that it is right to take time to consider the matter. I urge the Minister to give a degree of hope to the hard-pressed ratepayers and householders of Northern Ireland that he will take time to study the matter further, rather than proceeding by ignoring the collective voice of Northern Ireland Members.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): Will the hon. Gentleman reflect on one aspect of the situation that is especially important in North Down, where there are a number of farmers? He referred to the General Consumer Council's submission to the Department for Regional Development on water metering, so he will know that the council highlighted the significant and damaging effect that water charging will have on rural communities, and especially farmers. They already have a low income and have been hard-pressed for many years. Does he agree with the Ulster Unionist party that farmers would be hit especially hard by water charging?

Mr. Dodds: Since most of those hard-pressed farmers are supporters of the Democratic Unionist party, I am more than delighted to hear that the hon. Lady agrees with us on the matter—on that basis, we can certainly agree to agree.

Reference has been made to a number of sectors of the population that will be more hard-hit than others, but generally what struck me about the GCC report was the fact that there will be swingeing increases across the board in Northern Ireland when one takes into account not only the impact of higher water charges, but the increases in the regional rate and the fact that district rates will have to go up by a considerable amount to take account of the greater costs of waste management. Some of the figures given in the report indicate that by 2008–09, not taking into account the increase in district rates, the rates bill of a terraced house in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East could have increased by 88 per cent.. In south Belfast, rates for a semi-detached house could go up by 77 per cent. In Hollywood and Strabane, rates for terraced houses could go up by 263 per cent. and 127 per cent. respectively.

It would be unacceptable to impose such increases on the people of Northern Ireland. I cannot believe that any hon. Member from any part of the United Kingdom would accept for one moment that their constituents should have to face that triple whammy: increases in the regional rate due to the review that is taking place; increases in the district rates due to increased charges for waste management; and the imposition of water charges.

All that amounts to a looming financial crisis for many households in Northern Ireland, particularly if the valid point made by my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) is taken into account. He said that the most vulnerable households—those in the poorest category—will still have to pay 75 per cent. of the water charges under the Minister's proposals. Under current procedures and regulations, a large proportion of their rents and rates is taken care of, so such people do not face large bills for them. However, people in the poorest category will have to pay 75 per cent. of the water charges under the proposals, which will cause untold difficulties and hardship for many of them.

Fuel poverty is a major problem in Northern Ireland. As the Minister has responsibility for social development, he is trying to address the problem, although I and many others believe that he should go a bit further and put more resources into it. It is incredible that although many people in Northern Ireland—far too large a proportion of our population—are in fuel poverty, if the Minister has his way, the Government will deliberately impose a regime that will result in many people being put into water poverty. That simply cannot be allowed to stand.

In conclusion, I urge the Minister to delay, take stock of what has been said and come forward with proposals that will not lead to swingeing increases in domestic household bills that people will simply not be able to pay.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Lembit Öpik, give me five.

10.37 am

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I certainly shall, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) on securing this debate and support the contributions made by the hon. Members for South Antrim (David Burnside), for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) and for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds).

It is ironic that the Government spend so much time seeking consensus in Northern Ireland and then ignore it when they find it. It is disgraceful, for example, that tuition fees are being imposed despite the unanimous opposition from Opposition parties and all right hon. and hon. Members from Northern Ireland. The fact that the Government lost the vote on that issue in the Northern Ireland Grand Committee but carried on forcing tuition fees on the Province makes people feel that the Government are more interested in imposing their political dogma than in listening to the democratic wishes of politicians and the public in Northern Ireland.

It seems that we are faced with exactly the same problem when it comes to water charging. Water privatisation in Northern Ireland is proving as iniquitous as the poll tax. As the Northern Ireland Assembly is suspended, Ministers in Westminster seem intent on introducing additional charges for water and sewerage services. As we have already heard, ratepayers in Northern Ireland already pay for water and sewerage services through their rates. The new charges would come on top of the payments made through the regional rate.

For all the reasons already outlined, it is obviously grossly unfair to expect the people of Northern Ireland to pay twice for the same services. They are being asked to pay for the decades of under-investment in the infrastructure under direct rule. Ratepayers are not responsible for the diversion of funds and the under-investment in infrastructure for 30 years.

Huw Irranca-Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Lembit Öpik: I have very limited time.

Mr. Spellar: Go on, give way.

Lembit Öpik: Okay, briefly.

Huw Irranca-Davies: There is consensus on the Opposition Benches—it is in opposing any charges on any one of their constituents, and I might do the same in opposition. However, in other UK regions there has been massive investment in infrastructure and it has paid dividends. The question must be about affordability as opposed to the principle of where the charges should go, because people will have to pay them.

Lembit Öpik: While investment in water and sewerage services is crucial, the people in Northern Ireland are not responsible for the under-investment. The Government's consultation has been a charade—a farce—that had a predetermined outcome. I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's position, because nobody in Northern Ireland is happy with what one could call the tap tax. It is unfair and will lead to some of the most vulnerable in society being unable to afford a basic human necessity. In direct response to him, I would say that the Government have tried to make a false comparison between what households in Northern Ireland pay and what those in Great Britain pay.

[Lembit Öpik]

The Government tell people that the average English household pays a certain amount for its water, but they do not tell people that that is for privatised water and that the Government spent millions of pounds of taxpayers' funds to upgrade the system before selling it off. They ignore several facts. Household income in Northern Ireland is 19 per cent. below the UK average, nearly twice as many households there rely on benefit than in the rest of the UK—21 per cent. of households, compared with 12 per cent.—and Northern Ireland households also pay 26 per cent. more for fuel, light and power than the rest of the UK.

There need to be built-in safeguards to protect people whose water consumption is necessarily high. Under the Water Act 2003, the Secretary of State has a duty to protect the consumer interest and specifically to have regard to disabled people, the chronically sick, the elderly, the poor and those residing in rural areas.

I accept the need for improved water and sewerage services, but the ratepayers of Northern Ireland are not to blame for historic under-investment. Home owners have paid their rates. It would be a cruel injustice if they were expected to pay twice—first through their regional rate contribution and secondly through new charges—for those essential services. The present proposals are completely unfair, and the Liberal Democrats will resist any attempt by the Government to introduce them.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: David Lidington, give me five.

10.42 am

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) on securing this debate. I agree very much with what he said about this matter being an illustration of the democratic deficit in Northern Ireland. As he pointed out, it would be to everyone's advantage if people directly elected by voters in Northern Ireland were in a position to take responsibility for the complex and difficult decisions that must be made about the future of the water industry in the Province.

It seems as if there is unanimity in the Chamber about at least one point: there will have to be a great deal more capital expenditure on water provision in Northern Ireland. There are three drivers to that. The first is the decrepit nature of much of the current water network. The second is the forecast increase in demand as people become more prosperous, as lifestyles change and more water is consumed, and as we have a greater number of households in Northern Ireland for a largely static population. The third is the directives coming from the European Union that will force Northern Ireland, along with the rest of the United Kingdom, to improve the environmental quality of water discharges and the treatment of water through the sewerage system. The money must be found from somewhere.

My questions to the Minister will follow up some of the points made by the hon. Gentleman about the nature of the reform proposed by the Government and the likely impact that it will have on particular parts of Northern Ireland society. Will the Minister comment on the Government's time scale? They have always said that they will start to introduce water charges from 2006. That is surely dependent on their having available a robust database of property values derived from the revaluation that has been going on. There have been various reports in the Northern Ireland media that the Government may be contemplating deferring the introduction of water charges. It would be helpful if the Minister would say whether that is the case.

The hon. Gentleman put to the Minister an alternative model for funding the water service: in effect, a hypothecated taxation system. When I looked at page 21 of the Government's assessment of the proposals, it seemed to me that that option was ruled out primarily because they believed that it would lead to increased costs to customers, but that that conclusion depended on the existing budgetary rules from the Treasury remaining in place. We have seen in recent weeks that Treasury rules can suddenly become very flexible over the classification of road maintenance when that suits the Government's convenience, so I ask the Minister to spell out in more detail why the Government have rejected the alternative option.

I go along with the hon. Gentleman and other Northern Ireland Members in saying that the more savings that one can find from the Water Service and elsewhere in Government to offset the costs of capital investment, the better. Some significant savings in the Water Service are built into the Government's plans, but could there be more? Similarly, as the Government are talking about a developers' charge through the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, are they contemplating that proposal for Northern Ireland too?

On the level of charges, have the Government thought enough about certain groups? I am thinking of pensioners who are above the housing benefit level but on fixed incomes, and of large industrial users of water, such as the textile industry and food processors. They will be very vulnerable to foreign competition as a result of any increase in their costs. For them, the competitiveness test in the Government's assessment seems to be a bit of a joke, because it expressly rules out of the definition of competitiveness any assessment of the impact of new charges on their competition with external competitors; it considers only whether there will be an effect on new entrants to the existing domestic market. In addition, what is the position of hospitals? The Government's assessment states that hospitals can expect significant increases in their bills, but I have seen no quantified estimate published anywhere. I hope that one will be published soon.

I shall make two brief points in conclusion. First, how will charges be enforced against non-payers? There is an increasing problem of bad debt in Great Britain. I can think of some parts of Northern Ireland where enforcement will be difficult. How does the Minister propose to deal with that? Secondly, why is he not using either Ofwat or the Scottish regulator in his consideration of the regulation of Northern Ireland's water system, as it seems, on the basis of the Government's documentation, that it is only the matter of legislative time that stands in the way of applying that existing store of expertise to the Province?

10.48 am

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. John Spellar): The hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) raised a number of detailed points with which I shall try to deal, but I may have to reply to some in correspondence. I welcome the opportunity to respond to this Adjournment debate and I congratulate the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) on securing it.

When devolution was suspended in October 2002, we made clear our determination to bring about an early return of devolved government to Northern Ireland. However, that has not, as yet, been possible. One of the most difficult issues that we inherited from the Executive was the need to find a better way to finance water and sewerage services—that is one thing on which I think everyone can agree. An incoming Assembly and Executive would be in a position to change their minds, but not the arithmetic, as I hope to show during my response.

This year, water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland are costing more than £380 million—more than £1 million every day. I have not put much weight in my arguments over the last couple of years on the framework directive but, across Europe, higher standards are being introduced to improve the quality of the water that we drink and to reduce pollution in our rivers, on our beaches and in the sea. That imposes costs on the system while, at the same time, increasing demands are being placed on services in Northern Ireland. The modern lifestyle, as has already been mentioned, requires greater use of water. In addition, the welcome increase in demand for housing in Northern Ireland means that we have to cater for about an extra 200,000 homes that are expected to be built in Northern Ireland over the next 20 years.

All of that is costly. In 2003, it was estimated that the water and sewerage infrastructure would need £3 billion worth of investment over the 20 years until 2023. Some of that investment is already taking place. The spending proposals contained in the budget published by the Secretary of State in December 2004 allocated £735 million for investment in the water and sewerage infrastructure between 2005–06 and 2007–08. That will mean that about £1.1 billion will have been invested in the infrastructure in the five-year period up to 2007–08, and that more than a third of the £3 billion investment that I identified will have been provided before domestic consumers are asked to pay the full water charge.

It is worth re-emphasising the need to sustain investment. Water and sewerage services need sustained and reliable investment over long periods, which is difficult to achieve while the Water Service is within central Government and subject to the normal three-year financial planning periods. It has been accurately shown elsewhere in the UK that the water industry needs long-term planning and reliable revenue streams if it is to be efficient and effective.

The problem in Northern Ireland has been that the Water Service has had to compete for public funds with health, education and transport, unlike in England, Scotland and Wales. That may explain why there has been a legacy of under-investment in water and sewerage infrastructure, as several hon. Members have noted. Let me address the suggestion that that legacy should be financed by the central Exchequer. It is true that there has been under-investment in infrastructure, but that has been a feature of all regions in England and Wales, and not only in the water industry. We have all been living off the Victorian legacy.

It has also been mentioned that when English water companies were privatised in 1989–90 they received what was known as the green dowry. That was off-set in large part by the proceeds of privatisation—some £6 billion—which provided a benefit to all UK taxpayers. The Northern Ireland Water Service was not privatised, so the green dowry arrangements did not apply. However, Northern Ireland's spending power was increased by some £50 million a year to compensate for the fact that privatisation meant that water and sewerage services would, from that time on, be outside the scope of the Barnett regime.

It is also true to say that although there may have been under-investment in the water and sewerage infrastructure throughout the 1990s and up to the present date, Northern Ireland's share of public expenditure has been higher per person than in England, Scotland and Wales.

Lembit Öpik: I find it curious that the Minister is defending the policies enacted during the privatisation of water, whereas I clearly remember the Labour party being fiercely opposed to those privatisation plans in exactly the same way expressed by Members representing Northern Ireland today. Why the 180° U-turn?

Mr. Spellar: I am in no way defending the situation; I am describing it and the position that we are in now. Hon. Members need to say why they believe that UK taxpayers should pay for Northern Ireland's under-investment, when the UK taxpayer did not pay for the legacy of under-investment in England and Wales. I almost detected the implication from the hon. Gentleman that he thought that the voters of Montgomeryshire should pay for that under-investment, or perhaps the voters of Scotland or England. I am not sure that that would be acceptable.

That dilemma was recognised, if not by the hon. Gentleman, certainly by the Northern Ireland Executive before suspension in 2002. They reached the conclusion that there was no realistic prospect of the Treasury providing additional expenditure on the necessary scale. Indeed, it is worth quoting exactly what the Executive said in their rating policy review document, published in May 2002. They concluded that there was "no realistic prospect that this funding requirement will be met from the Executive's routine public expenditure budget, because that would imply unacceptable constraints on the funding of other public services such as health, education and transport".

They went on to say that it was not "realistic to expect the Treasury to provide additional expenditure on this scale, as that would in effect mean that this large bill would be falling on UK taxpayers in a context where households"— in Northern Ireland—

"are contributing much less than those in similar circumstances in England, Scotland and Wales."

[Mr. Spellar]

That was a recognition of the reality, so I give full marks to those who try to change that reality, but we cannot do so, and it has not changed.

As an incentive to introduce self-financing arrangements, the Treasury offered to treat the non-cash costs of water services as fully additional to Northern Ireland's normal allocation of money for public services, thereby removing the responsibility for funding those costs from the Northern Ireland departmental expenditure limit, managed by the Executive. The Executive considered that before suspension, and it is worth noting that the draft budget for 2003–04 to 2005–06 that they presented to the Assembly in September 2002 did not make provision for the non-cash costs that would have been necessary had the Executive rejected the Treasury's offer. So, although it is true that the Executive had not made a firm commitment to introducing water charges, that was one of a number of signals that clearly showed the general direction in which they were heading.

We have to give careful consideration to how we might best develop and maintain the water and sewerage services that Northern Ireland needs for the 21st century. Having examined the limited alternatives, we are satisfied that the Executive were on the right course, and that water and sewerage services should become self-financing.

I am mindful of the time, so I shall move on quickly to the second issue: where should those costs fall? One question is in which area. In line with practice both in Scotland and in England and Wales—although there are variations between the two—we have taken the value of property to be the best indicator. That will mean that those who live where property is more valuable will end up paying more; that is the essence of any rateable system.

Metering is important, too, because that also determines where costs fall. About 80 per cent. of the cost of delivering water to households is fixed, irrespective of how much water is delivered. Only 20 per cent. is variable, depending on the amount delivered. That is particularly the case in Northern Ireland because it does not have the situation that prevails in, say, parts of eastern England, where additional reservoirs and new facilities may need to be provided. If we have a pro rata reduction, as suggested by the hon. Member for South Antrim (David Burnside), those in better-off households will effectively receive a subsidy from those in poorer households. However we cut the amount of money, we come to the point when someone has to pay, and it is really a case of where the costs fall.

On the question asked about rateable value, we are clear that we will have in place the mechanism for sending out bills and collecting money by October 2006. The rateable values are due to be published. We will be working from the common database, so no one in the Northern Ireland Water Service will be in the firing line on appeals and so on. Those values will be published in April 2006. We will also have to get the necessary enabling legislation through, in order to ensure that the Government company and new framework are in place. We believe that we can do that in the timetable that I set out.

We believe that we have taken the right decision. We are following the principles enunciated by the previous Assembly and Executive, and we believe that what we are doing is necessary for delivering a proper water service for Northern Ireland.

Alzheimer's Disease

10.59 am

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I am grateful to have the opportunity to raise this subject with the Minister, although I am slightly disappointed that the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), who I was told would respond and who made pronouncements in the press on the subject over the weekend, is not here to answer questions. However, I am sure that the Minister is a more than adequate substitute.

The requer* has been made simply because of the widespread consternation about the recent revised guidance from the National Institute for Clinical Excellence on the treatment of Alzheimer's. I raise that subject because I have been bombarded with letters from constituents and local health professionals. Some 52,000 people in the UK who currently benefit from these drugs are extremely concerned about the future availability of their treatments. Indeed, there is a lobby of Parliament today on the subject.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Sandra Gidley: I am sorry but I only have time for one intervention and that has been agreed beforehand.

The reaction that I have received so far is that the decision by NICE smacks of ageism and that the mechanism for calculating cost-effectiveness is deeply flawed. As with most things, it is useful to take events in a logical sequence, so I want to start by reminding the Minister of the guidance produced by NICE in 2001. Technology appraisal guidance 19 dealt with the use of donepezil, rivastigmine and galantamine for the treatment of Alzheimer's. At that stage, NICE said:

"The three drugs ... should be made available in the NHS as one component of the management of those people with mild and moderate Alzheimer's disease ... as long as the patients conformed to certain criteria."

Other conditions were laid down at the time and they included assessment and diagnosis in specialist clinics. Only specialists could initiate treatment, the carer's view of the condition should be sought, patients should be reassessed two to four months after reaching the maintenance dose of the drug and the drug should generally be continued only if there had been some improvement. Guidelines also covered when the drug should be discontinued.

No one appeared to have any quarrel with that. It seemed that NICE came up with a system that should ensure that those in need received the drugs, which were not prescribed unnecessarily if there was no proven benefit. NICE deemed that the drugs were effective but acknowledged that they did not work for everyone. When it came to cost-effectiveness, NICE acknowledged in 2001 that some of the methodologies were subject to uncertainty and acknowledged that the estimates of the cost per QALY—quality-adjusted life year, which is impenetrable to most people—covered a wide range of values. This is an important point and I will return to the thorny subject of QALYs later. NICE also acknowledged in 2001 that "cost savings on later institutionalisation are not well established, and quality of life is not easily measured."

Since then, more studies have taken place and the use of these drugs has been recently reviewed. Contrary to all expectations, the preliminary guidance now says:

"Donepezil, rivastigmine and galantamine are not recommended for use in the treatment of mild to moderate AD."

I believe that this is probably the first time that NICE has reversed a decision in such a dramatic way. It goes on to say that people currently on the drugs should be able to continue until it is considered appropriate to stop but it appears to have effectively halted the use of the drug in new patients.

I have been bombarded with letters saying that these drugs could be withdrawn as early as July. We all know that once there is a diminishing number of patients on a drug, there comes a point when the drug company will find that it is not cost-effective to carry on manufacturing it. It is not immediately clear on reading the reports why things are so different now because, in parts of the report, NICE appears to be saying that the drugs are effective. Nor is it clear why the cost per QALY is now more important and the reasoning behind the costs is opaque.

I should like to remind the Minister of the Select Committee on Health's 2001–02 report on NICE. One of its recommendations was that there should be greater clarity over criteria for evaluating clinical and cost-effectiveness. It recommended that "NICE should consider the wider societal costs and advantages of particular treatments and in particular the wider costs and benefits to the public purse of reduced benefit dependency and improved ability to work both for patients and their carers".

The Government said that they agreed with the recommendation and that the Treasury would "be issuing new guidance on economic appraisal which will broadly meet the Committee's point" and would be discussed with NICE. Our current argument about NICE suggests that that guidance might not have been issued, although I suspect that it was issued, but in a form that does not deal with the situation that we are faced with today.

Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I am sure that, like me, my hon. Friend has received representations asking, "What kind of society are we if we are not prepared to spend £2.50 a day to give people with dementia and their carers a better quality of life?" Does my hon. Friend agree that that qualitative aspect, and the preventative aspect with regard to delaying more expensive care, must be brought into the equation?

Sandra Gidley: My hon. Friend raises a good point, which was reflected in the press coverage over the weekend, when the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for South Thanet, seemed to cast some doubt on the criteria used. I will return to that.

The cost issue becomes even more confusing. The estimates of the costs per QALY range from £2,000 to £139,000, depending on the length of treatment and which set of assumptions are made. For reasons that are far from clear, it also appears that more weight has been attached to some studies than others. For example, much weight appears to be attached to the AD2000 study. The logic behind that seems to be that that study must be more reliable than some others because it was not funded by a drug company. That is not a sensible conclusion. Some drug company trials are excellent and others are not so good, and that is also the case for more independent trials. Therefore, it is the science that must be looked at, rather than who sponsors it.

[Sandra Gidley]

I am concerned about this, because experts in the sector have questioned the methodology of the AD2000 trial, to which a lot of weight is given. I have been sent a copy of a submission to NICE from Dr. David Wilkinson, who is a consultant in old-age psychiatry at Moorgreen hospital in Southampton. He was one of the clinical physicians on the inquiry panel. He raises a number of problems with the study. He states that the criteria were flawed because anybody who would benefit from the drug donepezil was automatically excluded from the trial and had to be treated elsewhere. Also, the recruitment was insufficient to provide detailed results; 3,000 people were supposed to be used, but only 565 were recruited, and only 20 remained at the end of the third year. He questions the implementation, too, because he says that he knows from direct experience that the measures were not carried out to ICH GCP—International Conference for Harmonisation good clinical practice—standards. He concludes by stating:

"It was therefore a series of one-year studies with an ever-diminishing number of highly atypical patients infrequently tested by unskilled raters with consequently a great deal of missing data which by their own admission was just made up for the final analysis."

That is quite damning. I am happy to send a copy of the submission to the Minister, so he can read it in more detail.

Dr. Wilkinson also says:

"Despite claims that no long term data were available the data from two robust one year placebo controlled studies showing significant benefit in cognition and function were rejected in favour of shorter term studies."

He also claims that assumptions were based on improvements gained in six-month trials and extrapolated, but with no reference to those who were discontinued from treatment.

It is interesting that Professor James Rafferty, the chair of the appraisal committee of the AD2000 study, was one of the authors of the study. He is hardly likely to criticise his own work. That raises questions about the impartiality of NICE with regard to this particular investigation.

The reaction to the NICE preliminary guidance has been remarkable in its unanimity.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): I did not want to intervene, but may I ask a question? Is the hon. Lady alleging some impropriety on the part of NICE in the way it has conducted the appraisal? That was the gist of her last comment.

Sandra Gidley: My point is that, in the review, NICE should have taken into account the fact that one of the key authors of the study on which it placed so much weight was chairing the committee. There is a case for somebody else chairing the review, and I would be grateful if the Minister considered the points that I am making. I will send him a more detailed breakdown of my argument, which I do not have time to go through today. However, I was concerned when I read the comments. I believe that NICE is generally a good thing and feel worried if anything questions its impartiality or objectivity.

The reactions to the guidance have been almost unanimous. The Alzheimer's Society refers to it as "alarming reading" and makes the point that it is worth spending £2.50 a day on drug treatments for dementia. It also claims:

"The models that NICE use do not allow a monetary value to be put on the things that mean the most to people receiving drug treatments, so they simply ignore them ... Conventional pharmacoeconomics cannot be applied to drug therapies for dementia. QALYs inherently discriminate against older people and thus raise particular problems for calculating the costs of dementia."

One reason for the discrimination is that the calculation of QALYs usually takes earnings into account, and because the drugs are most frequently prescribed for older people who are not earning, the figures are highly skewed. We definitely need a different model when we consider the position of older people.

Help the Aged is "concerned that NICE have not taken into account the substantial gains in quality of life resulting from effective treatment with these drugs".

The Royal College of Psychiatrists

"strongly disagrees with the assumptions and methodology of the health economic analysis that led NICE to these conclusions".

The college repeats some of the points already raised. It says that the economic modelling used by NICE is unrealistic and not based on the use of drugs in clinical practice, and that alternative treatments, such as anti-psychotics, will actively do harm. One feature of dementia and Alzheimer's, if untreated, is often an increase in aggressive behaviour, so we will end up using drugs that are regarded by most people as a last resort and that have been described as a chemical cosh.

Three physicians from the Memory and Assessment Research Centre have written to me pointing out the possible long-term impact of withdrawing the drugs. They point out that the only proven treatment option will be lost and that there will be a two-tier health provision for Alzheimer's, because some patients will demand private prescriptions, meaning that only those with the ability to pay will benefit from them. There is a perception that AD patients are simply being abandoned by the NHS. More alarming, many think that memory clinics will close and services for people with AD will be decimated because managers will take the easy decision to close facilities as there will be no treatment options. NICE and the Government will be guilty of ageism and will lose international credibility, and an even larger burden will be placed on our already overstretched care services.

BEST COPY AVAILBLE

I will admit that I was delighted to see the press coverage over the weekend—"U-turn over Alzheimer's", for example. The Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for South Thanet, is alleged to have said:

"I can understand why the public are so worried. If you have someone in your family with dementia and you have drugs which do work then you are going to find this decision baffling. I want NICE to look at the methodology they have used, which a number of experts have called into question. It may be that once they have looked at extra evidence they will come to a different decision."

A statement from the Department of Health seemed to confirm that, although it was in stark contrast to the defiant stance adopted by the Secretary of State for Health last week.

The Observer said:

"Dr Stephen Ladyman made clear that he will ensure the proposals are overturned."

Much as I want to see the proposals overturned, the statement rang alarm bells, because I always understood that NICE was an arm's-length body and was immune from ministerial interference. Today's debate is a useful opportunity for me to seek clarification from the Minister about what form the intervention will take. The press release said that the submission was to be published on the NICE website. I looked hard at that last night and could not find where submissions were published. Will the right hon. Gentleman commit himself to publishing the submission on the Department of Health website, so that everyone can access it?

The Under-Secretary of State was also quoted as wanting NICE to examine the methodology that it used. It would be helpful if the Minister could inform the Chamber what advice has already been given or what advice is planned to be given about the methodology that should be used instead. If NICE adheres to the recommendation, as is its right, will he confirm that individual consultants should still be able to prescribe the drugs if they wish to, or will he devise alternative means of making drugs such as Beta Interferon available?

I end my speech by referring to a letter from a specialist community nurse who works at a local memory clinic:

"My work involves me exclusively in the initiation of these treatments and their follow up monitoring and review. I see first hand the hundreds of lives enhanced by their introduction. I see the sometimes remarkable improvements in a patient's cognitive and social abilities, the restoration of their former personalities and the return to some semblance of normal life for families disrupted by this tragic disease."

To my mind, those words describe what must seem like hundreds of tiny miracles. That picture is repeated throughout the country. The House and the public need to know what the Government will do to ensure that such miracles are allowed to continue.

11.16 am

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) for giving me the opportunity to respond to her debate. I am sorry that I am not the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), but I shall do my best to substitute for him.

As Ministers, my hon. Friend and I understand the sensitivity and importance of such matters and the need to achieve the right decision at the end of the process in October. It is important to put on the record a couple of matters to which the hon. Lady did not refer. I have been in correspondence with constituents, as she will have been, about the importance of treatment and drugs. At present, about 290,000 patients could receive the drugs, but only one in six people actually receive such medication. She suggested that, if the drugs were not available, that would mean the wholesale dismemberment of Alzheimer's disease services in the national health service. She referred to the closure of clinics and the transfer of resources. I must say to her, with all respect—and I have a lot of respect for her—that that statement is a grotesque distortion of reality. I hope that, on reflection, she will reconsider her words.

I turn to another important point. I did not detect from the hon. Lady's remarks that the document to which she referred is a draft for consultation. Throughout her speech, one would have gained the impression that the draft was a final decision by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence. That is a million miles away from the real position. She referred to several important and learned organisations that have expressed concerns about the draft guidance published by NICE. Those bodies should make sure that NICE has access to their views, and I am sure they will. As it has shown previously when a contested draft guidance paper has been produced for consultation, NICE is willing to revisit the basis of its initial proposal. It took such action with the proposed draft guidance on macular degeneration, with a view to making sure that its evidence is the best and reflects fully the available clinical, medical and scientific research. The hon. Lady assumed throughout her remarks that a decision has been made to withdraw the treatment that is provided. That is not the case. I am glad that she is acknowledging my remarks.

The Government are committed to improving the standard of care for those with dementia. The national service framework for older people that we launched four years ago sought to promote good mental health in older people and high-quality treatment and support for those with dementia and depression. The national service framework aims to ensure that older people have access to integrated NHS and local authority mental health services, providing effective diagnosis, treatment and support for those with mental health difficulties and their carers. I believe that we are making real and solid progress in that sector.

As Neil Hunt, chief executive of the Alzheimer's Society, said in November last year:

"The tide is turning—fewer people are told that dementia is just old age and more people are receiving the support and treatment that they need."

I hope that the hon. Lady welcomes that positive comment from Mr. Hunt.

In 2003, to support implementation of the national service framework, the Secretary of State for Health announced that, as part of the eighth wave of its work, NICE would produce a clinical guideline on the care of those with dementia, including the use of Alzheimer's drugs. NICE is scheduled to issue a consultation version of that clinical guideline in spring 2006.

[Mr. John Hutton]

Hon. Members will be aware of NICE's recent review of guidance on the use of drugs for Alzheimer's disease and the publication of its draft guidance for consultation. The hon. Lady spent much time referring to that. NICE suggests that the use of the Alzheimer's drugs covered by its 2001 guidance can no longer be considered clinically effective or cost-effective, and that they should not be offered to new patients by the NHS. The draft technology appraisal produced by NICE and issued on 1 March is a consultation document. The consultation period closes on 22 March.

The hon. Lady asked me on what basis NICE took the decision to issue that advice. NICE has said that the reason for the proposed change of advice is the availability of more recent evidence on clinical effectiveness. She has sought to challenge that, as she is entitled to do.

NICE will carefully consider all the responses to the consultation—I am sure that the hon. Lady will make a response—before issuing its final guidance in October 2005. Until then, the original 2001 guidance from NICE should be adhered to and patients currently being prescribed Alzheimer's drugs should continue to receive them.

I remind the Chamber of a point with which I hope that many hon. Members would agree: NICE has a strong track record and has built an international reputation for its work on clinical effectiveness and cost-effectiveness. Indeed, its methodologies have been commended by the World Health Organisation. Since NICE was established in 1999, it has issued 88 technology appraisals and 25 clinical guidelines, benefiting many thousands of patients.

However, I know that questions have been asked about the methodologies that NICE has applied in preparing its revised appraisal for Alzheimer's. It is right that such issues should be aired and that they are logged formally with NICE during the consultation period, so that it can consider their implications for its final guidance. I hope that all those with an interest will share their views with NICE during the consultation. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has been communicating with lobby groups and expert bodies to ensure that they submit all the available evidence of efficacy and explain to NICE any reservations that they have. The Department of Health will respond to the consultation, as is its normal practice when NICE issues draft guidance.

The Department of Health's response will touch on some specific areas that I know are of concern to the hon. Lady. It might help if I highlight some of those specifics. For example, we shall ask NICE whether it is content that the wider impact of those drugs, particularly on carers, is given appropriate weight and is adequately reflected in the guidance. We shall also ask NICE whether it believes that its appraisal fully captured the evidence on the effectiveness of those drugs in improving cognitive functioning, and the extent to which any such benefits may persist beyond the short term. In addition, we shall raise other issues, such as the potential costs and side-effects of alternative medications such as anti-psychotics, which might be prescribed for the behavioural and psychiatric symptoms of dementia should the existing Alzheimer's disease drugs be used far less extensively. Our response will also highlight the inter-relationship between those drugs and wider services for Alzheimer's disease such as memory clinics.

That is not, of course, a comprehensive account of the Department of Health's response to the NICE consultation, but I wanted to assure the hon. Lady that we understand the issues that are being raised and that we will, as always, use our own consultation response to highlight issues that we believe to be important.

Sandra Gidley: I thank the Minister for the broad outline, but will he indicate how the public will be able to access that response? That does not seem to be clear at present and there is bound to be a lot of interest.

Mr. Hutton: I was just coming to that point. The hon. Lady asks if we are going to publish our response to the consultation. Yes, of course we will. It will be published on our website and we will put a copy in the Library, so that she and other hon. Members can see it. I do not feel that it is appropriate to go through every nook and cranny in my response, as we do not have enough time, but I wanted to give her the sense that we share some of her concerns. We intend to publish our response fully in the appropriate way.

It is worth pointing out that, in doing so, we are not questioning NICE's processes or its track record in providing good quality, evidence-based advice to the NHS. Nor do we seek, as some press reports suggest, to overrule the national institute or to direct it to reach a particular conclusion. The hon. Lady expressed concerns that we might be preparing to do that. I hope that she is reassured.

I said that NICE is developing comprehensive guidance on the provision of dementia services in the form of a new clinical guideline. Clearly, it is important that the guideline links coherently with NICE'S final assessment of drugs for Alzheimer's disease. We will wish to discuss with NICE how the timing of those two pieces of work is best managed, so that patients, carers and clinicians have access to a single suite of advice covering the management of the condition.

The hon. Lady rightly, and for good reason, confined her remarks primarily to the draft NICE guidance. In the two or three minutes left to me, I would like to widen the debate slightly. It is important that we look at other issues surrounding the care and treatment of people with Alzheimer's disease. In that context, we should not forget the role of families and carers supporting those with dementia. The majority of people with dementia are cared for at home, which can be an incredibly demanding and exhausting task for the carers.

We were the first Government formally to recognise the contribution and concerns of carers. In 1999, with carers and the organisations that represent them, we developed the national carers strategy. We also introduced a carers' grant to support councils when providing breaks and services for carers in England. The grant has been steadily increased every year, and it has provided an extra £325 million over the past five years. It is worth £125 million this year, it will be worth £185 million next year and, in the last local government finance settlement, we confirmed our commitment to continue the carers' grant until the end of financial year 2007–08. Local authorities have been able to use the money to give carers help with taking breaks from caring, and to give them ongoing support with caring. That was a hugely important step.

There is another context to the debate, which was raised when the hon. Lady expressed concern about resources. In July 2002, the then Secretary of State for Health, my right hon. Friend for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), announced a wide-ranging package of measures radically to reform services for older people. By 2006, compared with the resources available today, another £1 billion a year will be spent on social services for older people. The package focuses on six main themes: faster assessment, stabilising the care home sector, an expanded range of services, easier access to community equipment, increased choices for older people, and more support for carers. All those services are of relevance to older people with dementia.

Sandra Gidley: All those services are welcome, but will the Minister acknowledge that the biggest problem facing people with Alzheimer's may be the difficulty of obtaining continuing care funding? Their needs often involve a lot of personal care, which is not funded. As a result, people feel discriminated against because they believe that their needs are related to the health condition.

Mr. Hutton: Again, we have tried to address those issues. The hon. Lady will be aware of the ombudsman's ruling on the application of the rules on continuing care. We are working hard with the NHS to ensure that the outstanding cases are processed speedily and efficiently.

It is worth bearing in mind the fact that the NHS spends considerable sums every year on providing continuing care. In that context, continuing care does not cover personal and nursing care only. It covers the entire cost of accommodation, including the board and lodging of the person, and rightly so, because the NHS's responsibility is to provide the health care that people need. If a person's needs have been assessed as being predominantly health related, it is the NHS's job to fund that care. Meeting the concerns of the health ombudsman in dealing with the backlog of cases will cost the NHS about £180 million—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

11.30 am

Sitting suspended till Two o'clock.

Prison and Probation Services

2 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): A little over 15 years ago, a local magistrate was selected as a prospective parliamentary candidate for an east midlands constituency. At that time, the prison population was somewhat under 40,000, and some of those prisoners had been sent down by him. During a long 30-month campaign as a loyal Labour activist, he was ultra-critical of the then Conservative Government, as Britain was imprisoning more people per head of population than any other country in the European Economic Community. If someone had told him that the prison population would double in a decade and a half, he would have been saddened. If he had been told that rapid growth would occur during two back-to-back Labour Governments, he could not and would not have believed it.

The constituency was North-West Leicestershire, and the candidate, who is now the MP, was me. I am therefore particularly pleased to have secured this debate on the future of the prison and probation services. Both halves of the topic are of considerable interest and concern to me. I will deal in some detail with probation but speak more briefly about the Prison Service, as I believe that others wish to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on that matter.

The Home Office announced in early 2004 that it was creating the National Offender Management Service. At first, it appeared that NOMS would merge the prison and probation services, but it is now clear that, rather than being merged, the probation service is to be dismantled in order to create an American-style corrections agency based on the 10 regions of England and Wales. That centrally driven change will erase local accountability, adversely affect crime prevention initiatives and undermine co-operative work with other criminal justice agencies. I believe, and am sad to say, that the drive behind the change is an ideological commitment by my Government to privatisation. There has been no prior consultation with stakeholders or parliamentarians about the proposals. No business case has been produced to justify the changes or the introduction of market forces. Scores of parliamentary questions asking for the details of the organisation remain unanswered, and the blueprint for NOMS changes weekly. An internal programme risk register says that the probability of the project running into real difficulties is high or very high.

It is critical that probation work remains part of a single service. Research shows that case management, which is to be retitled "offender management", is most effective when it is closely integrated with intervention. The proposal for NOMS splits those two basic functions, and in so doing it can only reduce the effectiveness of probation service work at a time when the service is performing better than ever before. The very existence of the probation service is based on the belief that prison sentences should be reserved for those who have committed the most serious offences and who pose the highest risk of harm, and that the majority can effectively be rehabilitated in the community. The creation of NOMS with its regional bureaucracy and its emphasis on punishment may put that basic philosophy at risk.

[David Taylor]

The probation service provides the court with a range of community orders that reflect the seriousness of the offence, risk of harm, risk of further offending and individual need. Staff work with individuals to reduce their reoffending and to protect the public. A failure to comply with the supervision leads to breach action through the courts and can result in a prison sentence. All that work is underpinned by values of self-determination and the potential for change. The aim is to deal with people in constructive ways that do not degrade or damage them further. Providing support and advice on related problems such as the lack of basic skills, accommodation and unemployment is also key to the work of the service.

The whole concept of NOMS and its design need rethinking. The Home Office has produced a blueprint for NOMS whose key elements are the separation of offender management activity from the provision of intervention and services—the two strands will be managed separately—a clear purchaser and provider split between regional offender managers as commissioners and a range of organisations as providers, and a central spine of accountability and responsibility on offender management. That statement is seriously flawed, and lacks any element of vision or values.

A vision statement should clearly express the objectives of an organisation in a way that builds commitment and clearly reflects its values. In stark contrast to the current statement of purpose for the Prison Service and the current aims of the probation service, backed up by its values, the proposed vision for NOMS does not meet those criteria. It is silent on the objective of the rehabilitation of offenders; on core values and principles; on achieving diversity and treating people with humanity; on supporting staff; on the principle of openness and transparency; and on the need for an approach based on partnership and collaboration.

Instead, the proposed vision is preoccupied with the establishment of a competitive market and the separation of commissioners and providers. There is an absence of sympathy with the current practice and historic development of the probation service. Aspects of the vision and its accompanying mission statement are, frankly, disingenuous. For example, the declared mission statement for NOMS refers to "working together to reduce reoffending", yet the NOMS vision dispenses with the principle of partnership working and introduces instead the concept of "developing a competitive market". Rather than "breaking down the silos", as referred to in Patrick Carter's report, new and deeper silos are to be constructed and introduced.

Despite a reference in the principles to "prioritising work with offenders that clearly demonstrate effectiveness", there is a complete absence of a professional "what works" approach to the establishment of NOMS. Instead, it is being established on the basis of a set of unproven and undemonstrated assertions and dogmas, with no business case yet produced. The proposed vision for NOMS does nothing to address the uncertainty and low morale experienced by staff during its chaotic introduction. It only compounds further the lack of openness and transparency with which NOMS is being introduced: it has been the subject neither of proper parliamentary scrutiny nor any legislative process.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that some increased uncertainty is caused by the fact that the probation service has been so recently reorganised? In my area, a new probation service area was introduced as recently as 2001.

David Taylor: I fully accept that point. I am in regular contact with a number of probation officers in my area, and I know of the trauma that has been endured because of those changes. A further such change now, with a lack of consultation, is not to be desired. The NOMS statement also compounds the disregard for the interests, concerns and views of staff, which my hon. Friend mentioned. In the consultation exercises last year, many people opposed the dismantling of the probation service, and they have been ignored. That compounds the lack of principles and values underpinning NOMS to inspire commitment and pride from staff, as well as the lack of clarity about the future direction and governance of NOMS.

There are alternatives that would deliver the Government's objectives, which I share—enhanced end-to-end sentence management, an increased role for community sentences in the sentencing process and, most importantly, a reduction in reoffending. The staff and their trade union representatives believe that such aims could be better met by developing models that enable structural reorganisation within the existing 42 boards, as my hon. Friend mentioned, which should continue to employ both offender case managers and intervention staff.

Such reorganisation should enable the commissioning of further services and contestability to be done with a clarity of roles, building on the spirit of partnership rather than of competition. It should enable the probation service to remain as an integrated service with a continuing identity with its own director general, supported as appropriate by the NOMS structures of the Home Office and the national probation directorate. Finally, it should also build on the model of the youth offending teams and the model now being introduced in Scotland for prisons and local authorities to require criminal justice agencies to work together locally.

I turn now to contestability, which used to be a two-word quality, highly prized by sportspeople, beauty queens and politicians. When it is welded into a one-word new Labour concept, however, it should be treated with scepticism. The Government say that they are not interested in using the private sector for its own sake, but there is not a scrap of evidence that the private sector can deliver public services more effectively or cheaply than the public sector; the very reverse is true. The community and voluntary sector, on the other hand, has an existing relationship with the probation service and operates with the same public sector ethos as the national probation service itself. A mixed economy involving the community and voluntary sector already exists, and it is by far a preferable option to privatisation.

The weasel word "contestability" was introduced in the document "Reducing Crime, Changing Lives". The Government are fighting shy of such terms as "privatisation" or "outsourcing"; in a separate context, I raised that point in Deputy Prime Minister's questions today. It is unsurprising that the Government are fighting shy of such terms, given privatisation's failure to deliver in the past. Contestability is a flawed model that will result in more expensive, poorer-quality services from non-accountable providers.

The current NPS facilities management contracts are an example of how the use of the private sector has led to increased costs for poorer service standards. The service has discovered to its cost and detriment that private companies owe a first loyalty to their shareholders rather than to their public sector clients and the broader population. There is no evidence whatever that the private sector has been able, for example, to run prisons more cheaply than the public sector. I shall return to that point briefly later.

Providing a cheaper service would have to be, as it always has been, at the expense of labour standards in a two-tier work force. The Government's failure to extend protection against the two-tier work force beyond best value authorities raises suspicions in my mind that NOMS may try to deliver cheaper privatised services by driving down employment standards on outsourced contracts.

We should fight contestability as a route to privatisation on the following grounds. It would fragment integrated service delivery, because all public services use cross-subsidy and integration to share risks and the cost of delivery across diverse populations and communities. Moreover, the private sector is unlikely to bid for NOMS services that have higher than average supply costs, such as rural services, because without cross-subsidy, they cannot be made profitable.

We should also fight contestability because public services such as probation are not commodities; they exist to support the social and economic well-being of communities. We should fight it because public-private partnerships cost more than conventionally funded projects; they borrow at higher rates than the public sector, demand higher rates of return—typically, the rate is 19 per cent. for one prison at Bridgend—and they have high set-up costs involving solicitors, accountants like me and others. Furthermore, they involve a convoluted procurement process and escalate in both scale and cost.

We should fight contestability because the high cost of private finance initiative projects often leads to an affordability gap for the procuring authority, and that gap is often met by reductions in services and capacity. I shall quote briefly comments made by one member, whom I know well, who works in a hostel setting. He sets out his frustration at the abject failure of hostel arrangements to deliver a quality service:

> "It is clear from the way the facilities contract is not working, and the fact that it is not cost-effective, that privatisation is not the answer to our problems. But how can we make the powers-that-be see this?".

Those powers-that-be include the Minister.

If that is the future under contestability, quality of service is under real threat. The artificial split of the probation service into purchaser-provider functions is utterly irrational. The service should remain as a coherent whole and be given proper investment for growth—particularly for hostels and other interventions. The quality of service is under threat because the proposed purchaser-provider split will be expensive to set up and problematic and costly to manage, and it will lead to problems for communication, integration and risk management. We need a strong, efficient and effective probation service. The NOMS proposals do not provide a basis on which to achieve that. The consultation timetable has to be reset and the NOMS review's terms of reference widened to allow alternatives to be explored.

I turn to the future of the Prison Service. The publication in January 2004 of the Government's response to Patrick Carter's review of correctional services has effectively thrown the Prison Service into limbo. More than 14 months later, the service and those working in it remain uncertain about what lies ahead. All those working in and around the criminal justice system continue to acknowledge the great improvement made in recent years by the Prison Service in standards, decency and performance. That has been done through partnership, not through the perpetual use of threats from Ministers—although not, I hasten to say, from the Minister present today—and senior civil servants. Those programmes facilitated improvements in the Prison Service, through partnerships and co-operation, not threats, to a level where there are no failing prisons in England and Wales. The threat of market-testing establishments is not necessary and is being used only to achieve a Prison Service for profit ethos.

Let us consider prisons and the purchaser-provider model. A fundamental aim of the ideologically based concept of the National Offender Management Service experiment, on which its future success or failure is based, is the control of the prison population. In April 2004, the prison population reached an historical high of more than 75,000, which is just below its working operational capacity. On 11 March 2005, the population had returned to those historically high levels and stood at 75,479, although the capacity had increased to cover the predicted population increase. Nevertheless, as a magistrate, I have visited numerous prisons and I know that grossly overcrowded establishments remain.

The most fundamental component of the accepted Carter recommendations is the introduction of a purchaser-provider model for the delivery of prison places. For that to be achieved, the purchaser must have an element of choice in deciding where to purchase the service that they require, otherwise there is not a genuine market. With the prison estate as overcrowded as it is, a purchaser-provider model cannot and should not be introduced, because the element of choice does not exist. It is widely acknowledged by everyone working in the criminal justice system that the prison population needs to be managed. For many people, the question is whether we need NOMS to achieve that, and for the vast majority of those people, the resounding answer is no.

I turn to the future funding of Her Majesty's Prison Service. It is widely accepted that for a number of years the service has been overcrowded and under-resourced. Since the end of last year, the prison population has increased by more than 2,000. Despite the apparent failure of the chief executive of NOMS to achieve his primary aim of reducing the prison population, he has more than once outlined his intention to reduce growth in funding for the Prison Service in future. No organisation can achieve its goals if it is starved of the necessary funding. Martin Narey intends to freeze Prison Service funding. In that context, we should look at early-day motion 603, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard), who will no doubt refer to it himself.

[David Taylor]

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I am listening carefully to the case that the hon. Gentleman is making and I agree with a lot, if not all, of what he says. Does he agree that this is an unprecedented time of uncertainty in the Prison Service and that the Government are forcing it to freeze budgets and recruitment, to stop decorating and maintaining prison cells and to take cells out of operation when the prison population is still increasing?

David Taylor: The Prison Service would not fare well under the major public sector cuts that are anticipated should the hon. Lady's party be elected. However, to deal with her point directly, the Government see budget capping as an incentive for greater diversion to community sentences, which is worth while, as is reviewing the nature of the offences committed by people in prison.

To deliberately and with forethought starve the public sector of the funds that it needs to deliver the service that is expected is unacceptable. This year, we have already seen mothballing of usable prison places and regimes and programmes curtailed due to a lack of resources. A continuation of Martin Narey's stated plans will inevitably lead to the Prison Service failing to achieve ministerial targets, through no fault of its own. To date, after almost 15 months, the chief executive of NOMS has not published the detailed business case to prove that the formation of the new service was necessary.

In November 2004, the Home Office admitted that a detailed business case was being prepared and it was said that a draft was to be placed before the NOMS programme board on 22 November. Despite numerous calls by Members of Parliament for publication of the business case for the creation of NOMS, it has still not been made available. The NOMS programme accelerates into chaos with blithe disregard for events.

In 2004–05, the cost of establishing the correctional service headquarters is in excess of £105 million, which is a huge increase in non-front-line delivery costs. There will also be a requirement for more than 50 staff in each of the regional offender manager sites. The costs of those extra staff will further deplete the resources of front-line services. It is not surprising, when the estimates are considered, that NOMS declined to provide the business case, to which I referred, to justify the continuation of the project on value-for-money grounds.

The glaring weaknesses of PFI seem apparent to all but Ministers. Public-private partners profit from people; the trend in PFI contracts has been to reduce the salaries of staff delivering public services and to cut jobs. Privatisation has led to a two-tier work force in which new starters on contracts receive much lower salaries and benefits than transferred staff. It has led to pensions that are not properly protected under TUPE. Unacceptably, equality suffers under privatisation: many public sector private contracts are delivered by a class of women workers who have no decent occupational pension scheme and who work on inferior terms and conditions. PFI has also led to private companies making unacceptable profits. A National Audit Office report showed that Group 4 and Carillion boosted their expected profit from the Fazakerley prison contract by 75 per cent. Refinancing produced £10 million for them, of which only £1 million was paid back to the Prison Service. That is another example of the private sector putting profits before public service.

It may be apparent from some of my remarks that I do not have a great deal of confidence in the brave new world into which the Government are pitching the probation and prison services. I look forward to my hon. Friend the Minister telling me in detail next Tuesday at 1 o'clock in Room O in Portcullis House why I am wrong. In all seriousness, I have a great deal of confidence in, and respect for, the Minister answering today's debate. I know him reasonably well and his reputation is rightly high. In his earlier political life, he was dubious about high prison populations and the role of the private sector in the delivery of public services. As his route from Manchester and Sale to Marsham street clearly took in Damascus, he will no doubt explain to the Chamber the background to this second conversion of a man named Paul, albeit in the wrong direction.

2.22 pm

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), who introduced the debate, for securing it and bringing this subject to our attention. I shall try not to repeat too much of what he said, because I agreed with virtually all of it. I had hoped that we might be having a similar debate at about this time on the Management of Offenders and Sentencing Bill, which was introduced in the other place, but so far it does not even have a date for Second Reading. It therefore looks highly likely that it will not be proceeded with this side of the general election, which puts the debate off even further.

One of my major concerns, which I share with my hon. Friend, about the process that we are going through in establishing NOMS is the lack of debate in Parliament. I make no criticism of my hon. Friend the Minister for that. He has been generous with his time in meeting me and other hon. Members present. Through the justice unions parliamentary group, he has made every effort to meet and talk to us and we have been very grateful, but there has not been a wider debate in Parliament. The number of hon. Members who have signed the early-day motions on this subject shows that there is considerable concern, but there has not been an opportunity for a full debate.

I am also concerned that, although we have not had a full debate, the reorganisation and restructuring and the setting up of NOMS are moving on. A chief executive was appointed some time ago. More recently, regional offender managers have been appointed, even though they have no regions to manage as yet. Some, I understand, are continuing to do other jobs and will do for the foreseeable future—perhaps for another year or two—as well as taking on the regional offender management role.

Even though I have probably spent more time on this subject than most other subjects in the House in the last year or so, I am still confused about exactly what is happening to the structures, who is responsible for what, what the relationship really is between the regional offender managers and the probation boards, and the future of the boards themselves.

In July last year, the Minister announced that, in the light of the consultation exercise that had taken place since January and the publication of the Carter report, he had decided not to do away with the 42 existing probation boards, but that he was still going to bring in regional offender managers. In making the decision not to do away with those boards, he used the phrase "at this stage". That seems to leave open the possibility, at the very least, that at some point in the future those probation boards will cease to exist.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister will know this because he kindly organised a meeting with the south-west appointment to NOMS where I raised the very point that my hon. Friend is talking about. Members of my board have written to me questioning their present and future role. So, there is a real problem. I am sure that he would say that things are similar in his area.

Mr. Gerrard: That is the case. I have certainly spoken to members of probation boards who find themselves in a situation of considerable confusion. They are not really sure yet quite what the relationship with the regional offender managers is supposed to be. If the ROMs are involved in making decisions about budgets, what does that imply? Who is actually the employer? Legally, as I understand it, the probation boards are the employers of the probation service, but if someone else starts to make decisions about budgets, performance and innovation, it is far from clear to me quite what that will mean for the boards in exercising their responsibility as employers. From talking to people who work in the probation service and the Prison Service, it is absolutely clear that there is a huge amount of uncertainty and worry among staff over their future and where their services are going.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire pointed to the issue of contestability. I know that the Minister will tell us that contestability is not privatisation. We have had that conversation several times. However, I have to say to him that, from the point of view of the people out there who are working in the service, it feels very much like privatisation. There is no question but that that is what it feels like to staff. If the probation service is to be split into purchaser and provider, and work is to be put out to tender, that feels very much as if some of it will be privatised. There is no question but that the talk about market testing of prisons certainly implies the possibility—if not the probability—of private providers taking over.

I recall being involved—I think in 1993—in the first debates in the House about the introduction of private prisons in the UK. I certainly recall the comments of the then shadow Home Secretary—I think that his constituency was Sedgefield—and the opposition that we put forward from the Labour Benches to privatisation. My hon. Friend pointed out what has been happening in the Prison Service.

David Taylor: I am interested to hear the provenance of the remarks that my hon. Friend just mentioned. Another remark from the same source would be something along the lines of "What matters is what works." One therefore draws the inference that if something does not work, it does not matter and we should revert to the normal model. Is that not a reasonable line of logic?

Mr. Gerrard: That is logical. There is also a logic that says that if things are working and going well, why restructure them? If it is not broken, why try to fix it? Given that not a single prison in the public service is classified as a failing prison, why market test? In 2003, the National Audit Office reported on the operational performance of private prisons. It said that the experience of that performance had been mixed: some private prisons had delivered; some of the best private prisons compared with the best prisons in the public sector and that the worst prisons at the bottom were performing at least as badly as public sector prisons.

The NAO acknowledged that private prisons had brought some innovation into the way in which they recruited and used their employees, but said that there was little difference in daily routine. It concluded that the use of private prisons was not a guarantee of success. I have seen no real evidence to back up the statement that the existence of private prisons has had an dramatic effect on how non-private prisons operate. It was said that private prisons have been one of the factors in driving up performance in the public sector. I cannot recall seeing reports of detailed research into such matters.

My hon. Friend referred to prison numbers. That is clearly a huge problem and it is not unique to the United Kingdom. What is happening to prison numbers in many countries is interesting. I recently saw statistics that stated that, from November 1998 to June 2004, in countries where prison numbers could be counted with some reliability, numbers had increased from 8 million to 9 million. Between 1992 and 2004, there had been an increase in the prison population of more than 50 per cent. in 50 countries. The United Kingdom was one of those countries, but the other countries ranged from Argentina, Australia, Cambodia and Spain to Singapore.

David Taylor: A subset of the large prison population that will be of importance and relevance to my hon. Friend's constituency is the larger number of young black men in prison than at university. Should we not be trying much harder than we are as a society and a Government to work with non-custodial sentences and divert people from criminal and antisocial activity?

Mr. Gerrard: That is absolutely right. There are disproportionalities in the prison population in respect of young black men. A worrying trend is the increasing number of young Asian men who are ending up in prison, often through drugs offences. We must be aware of the number of people who are in prison on remand.

BEST COPY AVAILBLE

[Mr. Gerrard]

Recently, there has been a drop in the remand number, but it is still large and adds to the pressure inside prisons. As my hon. Friend said when referring to such pressures, it seems that money is being diverted into setting up the new centralised structures for NOMS, so we are ending up with prisons having unused accommodation. We have prisons with wings that are being refurbished, but the money is not there to bring them back into use with the result that other parts of the same prison are overcrowded. The number of overcrowded prisons is still large. How far does spending money on setting up new bureaucratic structures deal with such problems?

We must consider what contestability or privatisation does to staff morale. There is no doubt that, when there has been privatisation, staff terms and conditions are affected. The research that was done on private prisons showed that prison officer pay was on average between 24 and 32 per cent. lower in the private sector than in the Prison Service, and that a Prison Service pension was between 10 and 13 per cent. more valuable than a pension available to someone employed in the private sector. We have already seen those effects in the prisons, so it is no wonder that prison officers are concerned about more market testing. It is also not surprising that people in the probation service, having seen what has happened in the Prison Service, have started to vent concern about what will happen to them if a purchaser-provider split and privatisation come into parts of that service.

The Minister has said to us before that people should not be too worried because there will be a growing market with more work and that the Government want to do more through the probation service and services associated with it. No one whom I have spoken to in the probation service or Prison Service has any problem with the idea of co-operating more closely or working with drugs agencies that are not necessarily in the public sector. What they are worried about is that their jobs will be put out to tender, and there is no question but that that has an effect on staff morale. We have seen real improvements over recent years, and there are serious questions about what we are doing to staff morale at the moment.

My hon. Friend mentioned the business case for NOMS, which we still have not seen, and we do not know when or if we will see it. That again raises some major questions about what is happening now, before the business case has been seen.

We said at the beginning that the Minister has been extremely helpful to those of us who are interested in the issue. He has met us frequently, discussed what is happening and tried his best to keep us informed, and we are genuinely grateful for that. I suspect that he did not dream up some of the ideas that he is lumbered with and having to implement, and that we might be doing some different things if he was taking all the decisions. However, I hope that he will take on board the fact that there are still concerns and consider whether now is the time to be pressing ahead with the reorganisation. We do not know really where we are going or how we intend to get there, and we have not had either the legislation or the full debate in both Houses of Parliament that we should have had.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend talked about the reduced pay and conditions of the staff in the private sector. Will he comment on the lack of training or poorer quality training for those staff? The regimes for which they will be responsible will be lower quality purely because of that. Is that not a factor?

Mr. Gerrard: That has certainly been an issue in some of the private prisons. The prisons that have been privatised tend to have been new buildings and at the easy end of the market. A lot of work has been done to improve the prison estate, but none of the old buildings that are more difficult to manage has been taken over by the private sector.

To conclude, I think that we should step back and be careful about rushing ahead with something that has not had the full debate in this place that it should have had.

2.39 pm

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I apologise for being late. I was trying to intervene in the Budget debate, but Mr. Speaker informed me that although I have prepared a detailed alternative Budget, the world will have to wait for it until later as I have spoken enough in the House recently.

I want to make a few brief points. As hon. Members will know, last year a group of us came together to form an all-party justice unions group. Members who are in the Chamber—other than the Minister, obviously—are members of that group. We formed the group as a result of the NOMS proposals, to enable us to have a direct view from the staff—the people who are at the work face and who will have to implement the proposals if the House approves the legislation and the Government proceed with it after the general election.

The consternation that has come from all sections of the professional staff has alerted us to the fact that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) said, we need time to think again about the proposals. I will not reiterate the anxieties that people have expressed about privatisation, except to say that we all know of examples of privatisation in the individual services. The problems in some areas, in particular with detention centres, have demonstrated people's concerns about private companies operating with staff who are often inadequately trained, paid and supervised. That is one of the lessons that we need to learn before we go forward with any further privatisations.

I will give one other example. It is of a Ministry of Defence privatisation of the records office in my constituency. Last week, a parliamentary question was answered about agency staff who had been brought in by TNT and who were dismissed for having drugs on site. Drug usage on site has become a problem with agency staff as a result of privatising the service and laying off the staff who were employed by the MOD. That is one example, but many others could be cited.

The second issue concerns why we are going down this road when Scotland is considering a different route. We could take two routes: one is the almost obsessional ideological commitment to market testing, contestability or compulsory competitive tendering, or whatever fashionable term one uses to describe it. That is one route that involves a purchaser-provider split. It tries to model public services on the supposed operation of private services in the private sector. In fact, most private sector operations do not work that way. There is not always a split between purchaser and provider. The rigorous tendering processes that we go through ad nauseam do not necessarily operate in the private sector. In the private sector, there is much more flexibility about continued usage of staff and bringing services in-house as companies expand to ensure that they can perform a multifaceted role in that individual company. So we are modelling privatisation—or contestability, or whatever one chooses to call it—on a myth that does not operate in the same form in the private sector.

The alternative route is the multi-agency approach. For a long time, I thought that there was a political and professional consensus about the value of that approach, whereby different professional groups would come to the same table. They would exchange their professional judgments and develop systems of operation through which, working together, they could tackle the problems that their services needed to challenge.

David Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that one example of multi-agency work introduced by our Government that has worked, is working and is an example to future reorganisations is that of the youth offender teams?

John McDonnell: Youth offender teams are an example, as are the drug action programmes, but there are such examples throughout virtually every public service. The local strategic partnerships that exist in all our authorities involve multi-agencies coming together to talk about common concerns and meet common challenges and to deploy their professional services in a way that adds value—I beg the Chamber's pardon for that expression—to all that the agencies are doing in their fields. There is example after example of multi-agency approaches. I repeat that, until a couple of years ago, I thought that there was cross-party and cross-professional consensus that the multi-agency approach was the way forward, considering the failures of compulsory competitive tendering and contestability elsewhere, particularly in local government and the localised services that we provide.

Scotland has gone through that consultation. There has been extensive discussion at every level, and people's views have been taken into account. As a result, the overwhelming view from the professionals and the communities that they serve was that, rather than go down the contestability route, we should concentrate on the multi-agency approach. Because the new services will be playing such an important professional role, I would rather at least see what the Scottish experience is in the coming period before rushing into making any decisions about England in particular.

There is a real problem, which has been cited by several hon. Members: we are demoralising the very people whom we rely on to deliver the service. What we will see in the coming period, particularly within the probation service, is a flight of staff from the service itself. We will lose the experience that has been built up over generations. We will lose it because people will not feel secure about their future. They will not know whether they have a job in the public or the private sector: they will not know what rates of pay or conditions they will be working under or even what role they will play.

In addition, the staff's professionalism dictates that they want to succeed. They want to ensure that the service they deliver is effective. None of the staff we have spoken to from the all-party justice unions group has expressed confidence that this system will enable them to deliver. The importance of that for us as constituency MPs is that if they do not deliver and the system does not work we will be left not just with an escalating prison population but with large numbers of offenders coming out of prison on to the streets whose problems will not be addressed and who will continue to offend. That is a vista for the future that we need to take seriously.

We need to step back a bit. Once we get past the general election, in May or whenever, there will be an opportunity to go out to consultation again. The Government could start listening to staff professionals and communities in a way that we perhaps did not before. The Government have to be more transparent. We have praised the current Minister—I apologise for using the word "current"—for being extensively involved with the all-party group and meeting as many organisations as he possibly can. That is excellent, but behind those discussions and consultations there needs to be some real material. Not publishing the business case is an indication of a lack of confidence in the proposals and a lack of confidence in the information that is supposed to justify the Government's proposals.

It will need a bit of courage, but after the election the Government should announce a further round of consultation and discuss the proposals again, consider further options and engage in the dialogue that occurred in Scotland to see how those proposals were brought about in contradistinction to the Government's proposals.

Issues have been raised today that need to be addressed. The stability of funding of the Prison Service and the probation service has been a problem for several years. It became almost an autumnal event for us to meet to try to resolve the London probation service budgetary crisis. This year that was not the case, but time and again, we found that as we moved towards the end of the financial year, there was a period of near panic within the probation service; then the Home Office found some way, using creative accountancy, to ensure that we got through that financial year and we lobbied the Treasury for more resources the following year. It would be useful to try to obtain some stability within the probation service in the long term for its overall budget.

I emphasise the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow. We have met prison governors who have told us what the budgetary implications have been towards the end of this financial year, with individual wings being mothballed and overcrowding occurring. Again, they have told us that they need stability so that they can plan their local budgets. There needs to be stability nationally, too, so that there can be a period in which they can plan, based not just on the prison numbers that we project—we should do that more adequately—but on the objectives that they are meant to achieve with the budget they are given.

[John McDonnell]

What we are doing at the moment is setting objectives for both the Prison Service and the probation service that are unrealistic in relation to the amount of investment that we are ploughing into the overall service. I can understand how that has come about. The demands of our community mean we have to achieve the goal and turn around the regime of offending. At the same time, those measures must be followed up with overall investment. On that basis, I hope that after the general election the Minister either retains his brief or goes on to higher things, because he deserves it. If he retains his brief, I urge him to take on board the fact that we need discussion, consultation and the courage to think again and think more radically than we have done.

2.50 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) on obtaining this debate. I also add my voice to those who have said kind things about the Minister and in particular how he has engaged with the all-party group on justice unions, of which I am vice-chairman. I should congratulate the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire not only on securing the debate, but on the content of his speech. His analysis of the economics of PFI and PPP gladdened my heart. There was nothing that he said with which I would disagree. I await the day of reckoning that must surely come when all the wonderful projects proceeding under PFI and PPP have to be paid for. The next generation will basically buy public services and infrastructure on tick, and that cannot be allowed to continue indefinitely. That prospect does not fill me with much happiness, and when that day comes it will give me no satisfaction to say "I told you so."

The hon. Gentleman said several times that the proposals were ideologically driven, and I can well see why. I wonder whether there is a full and proper understanding of the ideology, whatever that happens to be. We have a set of proposals driven by a few slogans or mantras about the desirability of competition and choice in the provision of public services, without any proper understanding of why some people—they do not necessarily include me—would want that competition and choice. An awful lot of what has been included in NOMS has probably been dreamt up by people who do not know the stark reality of service provision at the sharp end. If they have had that experience, it must be somewhere in their dim and distant past, and they must have become isolated from the reality of it.

I should declare an interest and a lack of interest in this debate. The lack of interest is due to the fact that, as the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) said, the Scottish Executive have also considered the matter, and as I represent a Scottish seat, my constituency will not be directly affected by NOMS should it be introduced. However, I commend the Scottish Executive on how they considered the matter. They did so openly and transparently, and they engaged with criminal justice professionals in a way that I am afraid to say the consultation south of the border did not. Ultimately, having gone through the process openly and properly, the Executive decided not to proceed with NOMS.

David Taylor: Is the hon. Gentleman familiar with the comment made by the Scottish Justice Minister, Cathy Jamieson, when she introduced the relevant legislation? She said:

> "We must do more to improve the integration of services for offenders so that they cannot fall between the gaps and services and the organisations that provide them. We must ensure that all agencies involved in the management of offenders work together effectively to tackle re-offending."

That is the key issue, is it not?

Mr. Carmichael: That is absolutely the key issue, and I suspect that the Minister might say the same in introducing NOMS. There is the premise outlined by Cathy Jamieson, with which I agree, and the conclusion. The conclusion that she and the Scottish Executive reached was encouraged in large part by Liberal Democrat Back Benchers in the Scottish Parliament, who are also in the Scottish Executive reining in some of the worst excesses of new Labour. The premise that the Minister would come up with is that NOMS is necessary. If it is necessary, however, the case has to be made for it, and one of the most remarkable features of this debate so far—not just today's debate, but the wider debate that has taken place throughout the preceding months—is that no such case has been made.

I am interested in this debate because I was a criminal court solicitor before I was elected to Parliament. I worked as both a defence agent and as a procurator fiscal deputy—a crown prosecutor—in Scotland, and I have strong views on this subject. I have worked a lot with criminal justice social workers, Prison Service staff and young offenders institution staff, and such experiences have given me a good insight into this topic. Hon. Members are right to deprecate the fact that we have not had a more substantial debate, because the matter under discussion is very important. The probation service and the Prison Service deal with some of the most vulnerable and damaged people in our society. The truth is that they have been failed time after time by the provision of public services; they have often been failed by the education service, by the social work service, and by care homes. I find distasteful the idea that at the end of all of that, they will be put into a system that, instead of addressing their needs, provides profit for private companies.

My greatest concern about NOMS is that we have a highly centralising process that will lead to privatisation. The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire spoke about contestability; I cannot but agree with what he said, because contestability is a good example of a new word for an old notion, where the old notion is unacceptable. It is like changing the name of Windscale to Sellafield. If it looks like a duck, walks like a duck and quacks like a duck, it is a duck. If something looks like privatisation and sounds like privatisation, then in my book that is exactly what it is. That is unacceptable. The separation of commissioners and providers will create an entirely artificial market. The services in question are not normally provided in a marketplace, and the marketplace that will be created will be entirely artificial, and it will inevitably detract from the placing of resources at the front line, where they are most needed.

Let me deal now with the impact of the changes on the probation and prison staff. Those services are often among the least attractive for workers in the sector. The work that we ask such people to do is often a thankless task. If we do not place any value on the professionalism that they can bring to the work they do, I worry that the quality of service that they provide will ultimately be diminished. I know from my own experience working as a prosecutor in the early 1990s, when the previous Conservative Government were severely underfunding the procurator fiscal service in Aberdeen and throughout Scotland, that the ability of those in my office to do our job properly was reduced simply because we did not have sufficient resources, we were constantly stretched and we felt that nobody cared about the work we did. If we go ahead with NOMS, we risk sending that signal to workers in the probation and prison services.

As the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) said, we risk creating a two-tier work force. The measure that is being introduced appears to be all about making savings. Ultimately, they will be made at the expense of the training and fringe benefits, such as pension provision, of the people who work in prisons. I have had some experience of private prisons; I have had clients who were placed in Kilmarnock prison in Scotland, which was Scotland's first private prison. When one enters the prison, the infrastructure seems very impressive. There are lots of shiny new tables—there certainly were when I visited—nice paintwork and all the rest of it, and it all looks very good for the visiting politicians. However, on talking to the inmates about the quality of service provided, I realised where the savings have been made. That prison was the subject of a recent documentary in Scotland and some worrying aspects of how it is run have come to light in the past few days. I know that it is not the Minister's responsibility, but he should look closely at the lessons that are being learned in that prison at the moment.

I reiterate the comments made by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington in asking for more transparency and openness and for more answers to be given, particularly on the business case. If this process is about the creation of a marketplace, surely the business case should be central.

3.1 pm

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) on securing the debate, and I extend my commiserations to the Minister. As was said earlier, it is like déjà vu, as we have been in this Chamber before considering the future of the prison and probation services, and sadly, we do not appear to have made terrific progress.

It is ironic that the title of this debate could cover so many things. It could cover the situation in our prisons and the quality of the work there as reflected in the work of the inspectorate, the work of the prisons ombudsman, the position on prison officers' pensions or the announced closing of the prison ship Weare, but the entire debate has been dominated by NOMS, which seems to have turned into a black hole that absorbs every other debate on the Prison Service, the probation service and what happens to people who offend in our society. Today's debate, which has repeated so many points put to the Minister before, is a rather sad indictment.

I have several questions for the Minister that I hope he will have time to answer. First, what is happening with the Management of Offenders and Sentencing Bill? The Bill has been published, and it was introduced in the House of Lords on 12 January, but nothing has happened to it. It seems alarming that we are discussing something that has effectively been happening for more than a year, since last January's announcement, but we have still not had the chance to discuss the legislation on Second Reading or examine it in this House at all. It has been introduced in the Lords, and there it has stuck. I also ask the Minister to confirm the rumour that the Bill is to be withdrawn and redrafted because its provisions are in some difficulty. I would like him to address that point directly.

Our Prison Service is a mixed bag. Anne Owers, the chief inspector, describes it as suffering from a struggle between progress and pressure. I have been to a lot of prisons during the past 12 months and talked to many prison officers, probation service officers, governors and others involved in the criminal justice system, and I stand second to none in my admiration for the work that they carry out. In the main, the people who work in the service are dedicated and do a lot of good work in our community.

What do we expect of our prison and probation services—particularly the Prison Service? The ordinary man in the street expects that perpetrators of crime should be locked up to protect communities and in order to prove that if someone breaks the law they will be caught and punished. People also expect much more: they expect the redemptive and rehabilitative element to prevent reoffending, and they expect the services to address the enormous issues of poor education, drug and alcohol addiction and—this is now an overwhelming problem—mental illness among the prison population.

The security, transparency and effectiveness of the system is paramount, and despite the best efforts of those working in the system, the Prison Service still faces enormous problems. The service is still 24 per cent. overcrowded; there are at least two self-inflicted deaths a week; and last year prison staff bravely resuscitated 228 prisoners. There were almost 18,000 incidents of self-harm in prisons.

David Taylor: Will the hon. Lady include in her pantheon of desirable qualities for a Prison Service a requirement that the staff be well regarded, stable, well paid and well trained? That is not likely to happen under NOMS. Does she also agree that the service should be able to retain in its buildings those sent into custody? Under past Governments, particularly in their final years, were not early release schemes of an informal nature a daily occurrence?

Mrs. Gillan: I am not seeking to score political points on that aspect of the debate. As I said, people expect perpetrators of crime to be locked up and, as I should have said, to remain locked up. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman and I would agree on that.

[Mrs. Gillan]

To return to the statistics on the current state of our Prison Service, the female prison population has almost doubled under this Government. Sadly, women are twice as likely to kill themselves and 14 times as likely to carry out self-harm in that environment. The availability of drugs in our prisons is also an enormous problem. According to the inspector of prisons, that raises serious concerns. Drugs fuel abscondence from open prisons—something that the hon. Gentleman would obviously be concerned about—and in closed institutions, the advent of drugs is undermining safety and raising levels of debt, bullying and intimidation.

Education and training in prison is also proving to be a weak link. In the last report from the inspector, 18 training prisons were inspected, and only five were found to provide sufficient work and training for their prisoners. I am sure that the Minister is familiar with that information, and I know that he is trying to address those problems. However, it is ironic that I have a letter sent to the Prison Officers Association by no other than his esteemed Prime Minister, who wrote to David Evans before taking up the mantle at No. 10 Downing street:

"In our view, a modern and effective Public Prison Service requires a disciplined and challenging regime free from the problems of gross overcrowding and indiscipline that have undermined the Service in the past."

Unfortunately, I do not think that there has been much progress in the Prison Service since the Prime Minister's words, which were spoken before 1997.

Against that background, there is the continuing development of NOMS, but the way in which that development is taking place does not inspire observers with confidence in the Prison Service or probation service. That has been reflected in our debate. I could take some pleasure in seeing the Minister chided and upbraided by Labour Members, but I do not, because we have been working in quite a good, non-partisan way on the subject. Our ultimate aim is basically the same—to provide a modern prison and probation service for the 21st century. As the Minister knows, however, I cannot ignore the large quantity of paper that is starting to reach my desk concerning comments on the development of NOMS that require answers from him. I hope that he will address some of those matters today.

The consultation process on the proposed NOMS headquarters has raised many issues. For example, the speed at which the proposals are implemented will present real challenges. The consultation process has been so sparse—it has also been rushed through—as to prevent the consultation with staff, and even with unions, that everybody has demanded in this debate. The new contractual arrangements and purchaser-provider relationships will require changes, particularly in relation to reskilling. What measures have been taken to clarify those arrangements? Will the Minister set out the decision processes, particularly on key areas such as information technology and property?

Can the Minister say how any lack of the resources needed to deliver centrally set standards will be taken into account in the assessment of the public sector Prison Service in a market test or in other forms of contestability? Those issues need to be laid out. How is he dealing with clarifying responsibilities and overlap? For example, how is he solving the problems of the apparent separation of security policy from security standards? What will he do about the boundary issues between pure policy and operational policy? How will he handle the transfer of work between the Prison Service and NOMS? Can he confirm that there are anxieties about transferring complete areas, which may leave skills voids and will be dealt with only by extra costs or reduced effectiveness?

What progress has the Minister made on the problems of the prison estate? As I understand it, the scope of responsibilities has not been clarified. How will he deal with the backlog of unfunded maintenance? That is an even more important aspect, because managers can be held personally liable under health and safety legislation. Managers are anxious to know the extent of the support available to them.

Will the Minister comment on the safer custody group and say what he has done to deal with the fears of duplication? Likewise, has he addressed the issues that arise from moving the drug strategy unit as a whole into the health partnerships? I would also like to hear his view on the management of high-risk and high-profile cases, as well as on the policy on sex offenders, domestic abuse and child abuse. Has he established clear lines of accountability so that no serious business or public protection risks are associated with the transfers of responsibilities?

Why is the Minister rushing forward with these proposals when I understand that both director generals do not wish him to proceed at such a pace. All the evidence suggests that the best way forward is for probation to be kept in the localities. In the past month, even the Local Government Association stated in its "Going Straight" report:

"We do not believe that regional structures will help engage with local communities or are best suited to delivering tailored measures for offenders involving local services."

The report added:

"we are disappointed that no consideration seems to have been given to existing partnership arrangements at the local level".

The LGA does not believe that a regional approach will secure the Government's objective of energising local communities.

What is the justification for splitting the probation service into two sections—offender management and interventions—when all the research shows that the best way of working is to keep them together? I do not know whether the Minister is aware that on 10 February, in discussions involving probation board members, a senior NOMS staff member was asked why they were splitting the functions. He replied that there was no evidence that the offender management and interventions split would deliver anything, but said that it had to be done because of political diktat. Will the Minister confirm that that is the view among some officials? If that is the case, it is a worrying state of affairs.

The Scottish route has been laid out well. I would like to know why the Minister has not taken it. We have been encouraging him for months to do so. I feel rather sorry for him, because I feel that he is not driving the process; I feel that it is being driven by other areas of his party and by other provisions. The good will towards him is understood in this Chamber. I understand that the Prime Minister has been involved, and I want to know, as far as No. 10 is concerned, what sort of timetable has been imposed on the Minister?

David Taylor: Does the hon. Lady agree that the Minister may be a victim of forces that he cannot control and that he ought to be protected in the way that we try to protect victims in the penal area? We are trying to perform that role.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Gentleman is appealing to my maternal instincts. Of course, I would always want to protect the Minister.

Nevertheless, in the cold light of day, we have a mess on our hands, and it is exceedingly worrying. The Prison Officers Association, for which I have the greatest respect, has started lobbying on the issue and has produced an excellent pack. Once again, it asks a list of questions. It says that NOMS has so far failed to produce the business case and that the Minister has refused to publish the critical gateway review. We have asked for both those things. The POA says that £90 million has so far been spent on this matter. That has taken place against the background of frozen budgets. I must say to the Minister that that is the case because Prison Service budgets were taken away to shore up other parts of the Home Office, which is an appalling situation. The Prison Officers Association also says that he is ignoring the Gershon report, and that there will be more civil service bureaucracy. It says that there has been wholesale closure of Prison Service accommodation owing to the lack of adequate resources and that NOMS has directly caused further overcrowding. I could go on, but the Minister has heard this before. It is a great shame.

I have been very straight about my view of privatisation, but I refer once again to the Prime Minister's letter to the Prison Officers Association, written before he entered No. 10, in which he gave this assurance:

> "We would halt the extension of prison privatisation and ensure existing privatised prison contracts will be examined with a view to their non-renewal and their full integration into the public sector Prison Service."

That promise has been totally and utterly broken by the Government and is living proof that they are not to be trusted.

Over the year in which I have been covering my current brief and enjoying my exchanges with the Minister—I hope that he has found them as constructive as I have—I have seen that these two services, which provide a great service to our community, are being torn apart by a bureaucratic management process that is being handled incorrectly. If there is a general election shortly and I find myself in his position, I will not find decisions easy to make, but I will pause and consult. I will ensure that I take a grip of the management process, because that is as much as the services deserve. They do not deserve the current chaos and uncertainty.

3.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): This has been an excellent debate conducted in a generous way. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) on his passionate and well-informed speech, which was based on long experience of the issues, and thank him for the kind words that he offered me.

Let me make it absolutely clear that there is uncertainty in our prisons and probation system. We are undertaking the biggest ever reform of those services, but I do not accept that the reform process is a mess. Let nobody be under any illusions about the fact that the Minister is driving that reform. Much as I accept the kind words and support—maternal and otherwise—from hon. Members, I assure them that the process is being driven forward, but that does not mean that we are not prepared to listen. Some of my previous actions demonstrate that I am prepared to listen, and I will continue to do so because it will be impossible to achieve what we have set out to achieve unless people work together. That requires all of us to work with the work force, management and those who drive policy to ensure that, wherever possible, we gain consensus or at least have a proper and full understanding.

My hon. Friend spoke about the lack of vision and values, and it might be helpful if I begin by setting out what I regard as the vision and values that drive the development of the National Offender Management Service. A number of them emanate from the work done by Patrick Carter, now Lord Carter, in the report that he presented to the Home Office just over a year ago, which we fully accepted.

The first issue is that of rebalancing the correctional system. My hon. Friend spoke about the days when the prison population numbered 40,000. I can be precise about the current numbers: there are 75,386 people in prison today, which is many more than all those years ago. What matters most is that the people in prison are those who need to be there. Serious, dangerous, violent or sexual offenders should be in prison for what they have done, and they should be there longer than has been the case in the past. The Criminal Justice Act 2003 and the Sexual Offences Act 2003 will ensure that that happens. However, prison places should not be wastefully taken up by people who are not dangerous. The less serious offenders could be given community sentences and thus put something back for the wrong that they have done. They would be paying the price but could remain at home, being in the community and engaging with the probation service.

On Monday, I was in Wigston—it is an area that my hon. Friend will know—to launch the national clean-up week. Offenders doing community service, which is unpaid work in the community, were refurbishing a sports facility and removing graffiti. That is precisely the kind of punishment that is appropriate for such people. We want to rebalance sentencing so that people are not given short-term prison sentences when they could be doing that sort of pay-back work. We also need to reinvigorate fines to ensure that they are properly enforced.

We will introduce proposals for a day fine in a management of offenders Bill, which I shall speak about in a moment. It is about rebalancing the system. It will also introduce offender management. At the moment, we have two systems—the Prison Service and the probation service. Yes, they work closer together than ever, but they are not sufficiently joined up when it comes to the management of individual offenders.

[Paul Goggins]

We propose introducing a named offender manager for each offender. Each offender will have a sentence plan, and it will be the responsibility of the offender manager to ensure that the plan is fully carried out.

The offender manager will be accountable. One of the problems with the current system is a lack of accountability for the reducing of reoffending. That accountability will be put in place: that responsibility will be made clear to the offender manager. What we seek is what my hon. Friend called a central spine—offender managers managing the sentence plan, which could involve a custodial sentence, or intervention in the community, or both—as it will have a much bigger impact on reoffending.

The third element is that of contestability, which was mentioned by all Members who spoke this afternoon. As predicted, I will make it absolutely clear this afternoon that contestability is not privatisation. Privatisation means a service being given to the private sector—work for which the public sector is not permitted to compete. That is what privatisation means, whereas with contestability, all sectors are encouraged to compete for the work. I am actively encouraging the public sector Prison Service and those who run our probation services to gear up and be ready for contestability. I am confident that, with their professionalism, those services will win a great deal of the work. However, I also want the private sector to show us what it can do, and I want the voluntary and community sectors to show us what they can do, too.

I hope that I am not misquoting my hon. Friend, but I think he said he wanted a mixed economy. I want a mixed economy, but I want it to be based on adding value to the money that we invest. It is not about old-fashioned market testing, or reducing the cost to a minimal level. It is about driving more value out of the money that is invested in our correctional system. In a system that is bigger and in which more money than ever is being invested, I believe that everybody has a part to play; and if we develop that partnership, we can drive more value out of it.

Let be briefly describe the overall aim of the enterprise. We have to reduce the rates of reoffending. We spend £4 billion a year on our prison and probation services. That is £1 billion a year more than in 1997. Despite spending more, however, three in every five people who come out of prison are reconvicted within two years. We have to do better than that, which is why I seek reform.

Mr. Gerrard: Does the Minister recognise that the real sticking point is the question of contestability? None of us is going to disagree with a great deal of what he said, and none of the professionals will disagree. Obviously, when one enters on the major restructuring of a service, one might have difficulties with negotiation and so on. The real problem comes when people think that their jobs are at risk.

Paul Goggins: I am pleased to have been reasonably persuasive so far, but I accept what my hon. Friend says—that when people see changes that will impact on their jobs, they will clearly be fearful, uncertain and questioning. I acknowledge that it is my responsibility as the Minister and that it is the responsibility of all who are involved in the development of NOMS to ensure that the staff feel they are part of the whole enterprise and that their questions are answered. That remains my objective and—this has been acknowledged—I seek opportunities to listen and to engage in conversation. I have done that with the all-party justice unions group and accept that it has been a really important innovation. In order to develop better communication links and to get questions answered, I am considering the possibility of developing a new stakeholder forum with regular access to Ministers, in which trade unions, voluntary sector organisations and others could participate.

Speaking of answering questions, perhaps I ought to move on quickly and try to deal with some of the points that have come up in the debate. First, on consultation, I hope that I have made it clear that consultation is fundamental to the proposal. There were two formal consultations last year—one on Patrick Carter's report and the other on our proposals for organisational change—but it is clear that we will need to have more consultation. I absolutely commit myself to that and, as I mentioned, I hope that we will be able to develop the stakeholder group.

The business case was presented in outline form in Patrick Carter's report, but more is being done on it. The strategic outline business case and the full business case are under development. I say to my hon. Friend that it is not normal practice for the Government to publish the business case for their proposals. However, there has been an application under the Freedom of Information Act 2000 for information about it. That is being considered and, if we have to reveal the information as requested, I shall consider carefully whether in fact we publish the business case. I assure him that work on and consideration of the matter are ongoing. Clearly, there will be more to say on that in the future.

Mrs. Gillan: I am sorry that the Government have to be dragged kicking and screaming, through an application under the 2000 Act, into publishing the business case. It is obvious that the Minister will not have time to deal with all the points that have been raised, so before he sits down I would like him to undertake to write, before the recess, to each and every Member who has taken part in the debate, with answers to all the questions. That is a perfectly reasonable request, and if he agrees he will be able to relax a little rather than trying to deal with everything in the final three minutes.

Paul Goggins: That is a very helpful suggestion, and I am happy to undertake to do that, particularly as the hon. Lady asked many detailed questions which will need fuller answers.

On investment in the prison and probation services, the Government have built 17,000 additional prison places since 1997, and 3,000 more that are in the pipeline will be delivered by this time next year. The probation service work force will be 50 per cent. larger: it had 14,000 staff in 1997 and will have 21,000 staff by this time next year. That is a substantial increase, and there could be nothing further from the truth than any suggestion that this Government lack confidence in the probation service and are not investing in it.

I was grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) for making the point that in the past there has been a budgetary problem in London but that this year, for the first time, there has not been a crisis. That is because we have invested real, hard cash in the probation service. The performance of the London probation service speaks volumes for the way in which the staff have been able to use that investment to drive up their own performance and make a real difference.

Yes, the Prison Service has taken some decisions in the very recent past to deal with overcrowding and to take out of use some prison cells that were to be refurbished earlier than planned, and, yes, we must keep costs under control, but nothing that has happened in the past few weeks and months in respect of taking out places has undermined the ability of the Prison Service to provide those whom it is charged with looking after with safe and secure accommodation.

NOMS continues to develop. The 10 regional offender managers are now in place. In due course, each and every Member of Parliament will be invited to meet their regional offender manager. It is important that they have the opportunity to meet the managers, to find out who they are and how to contact them, and to ask them questions.

The organisational structure is still under development. I withdrew the original proposal last July, but we continue to work on further development.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must turn our attention now to the next topic for consideration today.

Julia and William Pemberton

3.30 pm

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): I rise to raise the case of the murders in November 2003 of Julia and William Pemberton by Alan Pemberton. After shooting his wife and 17-year-old son, Alan Pemberton took his own life. Those deaths followed a history of domestic violence to which the police were alerted 15 months before the tragedy.

A number of the family and friends of Julia and William Pemberton are my constituents. I share their desire to understand the events leading up to that appalling tragedy and to stop similar events happening in future. We ask the Home Secretary, via the Minister, to call for a homicide review, to ask for the conduct of the coroner in the case, Peter Bedford, to be reviewed, and we seek a review of the granting of injunctions in domestic violence cases.

Many people are familiar with the final moments of Julia Pemberton's life, after the transcript of her 999 call was read to the inquest in September 2004. People heard of Julia's desperate pleas for help, her saying that her husband was approaching, was in the room and then silence, because Alan had found her, hit her and shot her. What is not so well known is the list of police failings leading up to the murders. The family are in no doubt that those failings contributed significantly to the deaths. If the police had done their job properly, we could expect those three people to be alive today.

The state has a positive duty to protect life. Home Office circular 19/2000 made that clear. It said that a force policy should be issued on domestic violence, making it clear that "the main duty is to protect the victims and, if applicable, any children from further abuse", that incidents should be investigated fully, and stressing

"the importance of comprehensive record keeping."

The Thames Valley police failed Julia and William Pemberton in all those areas. The chief executive of Refuge, Sandra Horley, said that, in her 28 years of experience working with women and children escaping from domestic violence, she has never come across such a tragic and preventable series of events.

The family and I have had many meetings with Thames Valley police. Some have taken place with the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), in whose constituency the murders were committed. I am grateful to the police for giving us many hours of their time at those meetings and for answering many questions in writing. However, the family and I remain hugely dissatisfied with their response.

I have also discussed domestic violence issues with Swindon's police, who are part of the Wiltshire constabulary. They have a far more proactive approach to domestic violence. The difference in attitude is remarkable. I should like to record my appreciation of the commitment of Swindon's police to those issues.

I share the family's scepticism of the commitment of Thames Valley police to policing domestic violence. We have seen incompetence, complacency and the failure to follow Home Office and Crown Prosecution Service guidelines. That is apparent in the details of the events, and can be seen in the police's refusal, despite many requests from the family, to initiate any sort of inquiry.

[Ms Julia Drown]

I shall relate the events to the Chamber. In September 2002, Julia informed her husband, Alan, that she wished for a divorce, following years of abuse. Alan threatened to kill Julia and commit suicide. To reinforce that threat, Alan left out in the study his and Julia's wills for Julia and their children to see, with instructions in the event of their deaths for their son William, then aged 15. Alan also scrawled numerous menacing messages in the study.

A threat to kill is a serious crime, and Julia and her brother, my constituent Frank Mullane, reported those threats repeatedly and persistently to the police in Newbury and begged them to visit the house to see the corroborating evidence. The police promised to attend, but did not. The police recorded the incident as a domestic dispute and did not report it to CID. Instead, the police domestic violence file recorded that further calls from Julia's brother Frank did not need to be responded to fast-time, despite Julia saying that she was willing to make a statement and to press charges.

After two days of relentless ringing of the police and getting no action, Julia and Frank visited Newbury police station, where they were referred to the domestic violence unit. Julia was advised to take civil action to secure an injunction preventing Alan from entering the family home or communicating with her, with a power of arrest, which she did. The domestic violence co-ordinator wrote a letter in support of that action, in which she stated, with reference to the wills being left out:

"In all my experience as Domestic Violence Co-ordinator I have not come across such a cruel act. I have flagged Julia's address to the effect that—any incidents from or to the house are to be treated urgently."

That did not happen. Julia was informed that, if she made a 999 call, even a silent one, the police would be with her within 10 minutes. Again, that did not happen. By failing to visit the house, Thames Valley police failed to witness evidence in situ, so failing to give Julia the protection that she needed. There was no attempt to establish possible escape routes for Julia if Alan tried to enter the house, or to provide her with a safety plan.

Over the next several months, Julia and members of the family continued to receive numerous threats from Alan Pemberton. In April 2003, Julia and her son William returned from holiday and found the locks of the house superglued. She and her brother Frank reported that incident to the police, who promised that Alan Pemberton would be interviewed. He was not, despite the fact that, as the only likely suspect, he was clearly in breach of the injunction with the power of arrest. The police did not visit the property to collect any evidence. New locks had been fitted since the courts ordered Alan's exit from the house, so the presence of his fingerprints would have been incriminating.

A month later, Julia was told by the police that the case would not be pursued for lack of evidence and that the crime file was closed. That incident was never linked to the domestic violence unit, although Julia and Frank had repeatedly told the police of the injunction with the power of arrest in place and the death threats. Thames Valley police have since admitted that their handling of that incident was a failing on their part.

In May 2003, an envelope was hand-delivered to Julia's house addressed to William. Enclosed was a copy of the affidavit that Julia had sworn to secure the injunction. There were several menacing threats scrawled across the affidavit in Alan's handwriting, giving further evidence of his intentions. After seeking legal advice, Julia and her brother Frank delivered the affidavit to Newbury police station and explained the history of death threats, the glued locks and the injunction with the power of arrest in place. They made it very clear to the officer on duty how important that threatening document was, and Frank asked that it be reported to Sergeant Downing, to whom he had reported the original death threats.

Frank phoned the police after they had left the station, but it fell on deaf ears. Yet again, the police failed to respond appropriately to that third piece of serious evidence. As it is highly likely that Alan had delivered the affidavit to the house, it was a likely further breach of the injunction. It was also evidence of the continuing threatening behaviour of Alan Pemberton, which itself breached the injunction. The family had understood that any breaking of the injunction had to result in an arrest. I should be grateful if the Minister could clarify that.

Alan did not receive a response from the family, so he personally gave another copy of that document to William, who was aged 16. It is surprising that, as well as not addressing the abuse that Julia suffered, the police seemingly did not consider the seriousness of involving a child in the matter. The police have no record of having received the document, which, after the murders, was found in the closed glued-locks file. However, it took the family to tell the police of the existence of that evidence. Thames Valley police conceded that officers should have visited Alan Pemberton after seeking such evidence and that a lack of basic investigative skills existed. The police claim that they cannot identify the officer who took delivery of the document, despite a very particular description having been given by Frank Mullane.

In June 2003, Julia met the domestic violence co-ordinator. A panic alarm was subsequently installed in her home. She told the co-ordinator about the ongoing situation, the incidents involving the locks and the affidavit but, yet again, no action was taken to tackle Alan. That was a failure by the police, who should have done more to protect Julia. In terms of preventing a crime in the case, there was a complete disregard of the repeat victimisation suffered by Julia Pemberton; inadequate monitoring of the case; appalling information handling; a lack of supervision of the domestic violence co-ordinator; no training given to domestic violence co-ordinators; and a failure to use any of the available legislation, including that on the breach of injunction and the Protection from Harassment Act 1997.

More significant was the failure of Thames Valley police to recognise the seriousness of domestic violence and to implement an effective policy. That should have happened following Home Office guidelines issued in 1990—13 years earlier; surely there was enough time for them to be implemented, especially when they were reinforced by further guidelines in 2000. Instead, two sets of strong recommendations for a proactive approach to domestic violence incidents through arrest, investigation and recording, which were produced to protect the public, were ignored. Instead, for Thames Valley police, the co-ordinator's role was purely one of liaison, but it should have been more.

Thames Valley police have tried partly to excuse the failure to investigate the crimes by saying that they have a highly inexperienced force. The family are rightly appalled that the obvious failure to educate and to train officers appropriately should be dismissed so easily. It is shocking that, pre-July 2003, the police authority did not have any domestic violence policy at all. Thames Valley police have told us that they are revising their domestic violence policy. I have seen evidence of that and I welcome it, but concerns remain.

For example, the new policy will include a risk assessment. Although they have since changed their view, the police's first assessment to the family was that, even under the new policy, Alan Pemberton may not have been classified as high-risk. That statement is shocking, as a domestic violence co-ordinator had already marked the risk as having escalated, so that all incidents to and from the house would be treated urgently. If the new risk assessment model would not have unquestionably classified Alan Pemberton as high-risk, one questions the effectiveness of the entire policy.

I share the family's concerns about the slowness with which lessons on domestic violence are being learned by Thames Valley police. The family and I have pushed the police to find out what went wrong and to learn lessons from these tragedies. We are concerned that domestic violence has not been taken seriously by past and present chief constables. Home Office research indicates that an apparent lack of direction and managerial commitment to domestic violence results in a marginalisation of domestic violence work. That was the case up to and including November 2003, and we have no confidence that the situation has changed.

Julia Pemberton was thoroughly disillusioned with the police response. As a health visitor, she was a member of the local domestic violence forum, but she was shocked to find out first-hand the true nature of policing in this area. She was left to take out a private injunction, was advised to move—an impractical option for her at the time—and was told to have an aromatherapy bath and relax. One can imagine her feelings—that utterly trivialised a threat to kill. If what happened were not, literally, deadly serious, it would be farcical.

Julia reported to her friend, comparing that with the police response to a stolen bike:

"when my son's bike was stolen two police officers turned up at my door. When my husband threatened to kill me, no one was there to help."

To add further insult to the family, 10 months after she died, Thames Valley police sent Julia a customer satisfaction survey.

On 18 November 2003, Alan Pemberton arrived at Julia's house, ostensibly to take William for a driving lesson. When Julia heard sounds of commotion outside, she called the police. Her 16-minute 999 call described her fear for her and her son's lives. She reported several gun shots and pleaded for help. The transcript, read out at the inquest, left out crucial parts of the call. During the call, Julia was asked repeatedly to give her address. She sought advice on whether to run or stay, and was told to stay hidden. She questioned why it was taking the police so long to arrive, and was told that police were on their way "now". Perhaps a minute before she died, she was even led to believe that they were outside the house. She was told to stop screaming and shouting.

Julia was asked to give directions to her house. It took between 10 and 12 minutes before the property was identified, despite the fact that it was flagged on the police computer and that previously Julia had been told that even a silent 999 call would be responded to urgently. It is sickening to think of how Julia must have felt when it dawned on her—as it clearly did—that, despite repeated police promises of a fast response if she ever rang 999, they did not even know where she lived.

Of course, Julia was not allowed to know that the firearms policy at the time appeared to exclude the option of immediate attendance to firearms incidents. We have heard differing police dispatch times. The first response was unarmed, and left 24 minutes—not, as she had been led to expect, 10 minutes—from the start of the call. It took 24 minutes for an unarmed team to be dispatched. By then, William had been shot five times, and Julia four times.

That unarmed team dispatched to locate the property arrived to see William's body on the drive. In an incredible act of bravery, and contrary to Thames Valley police policy, the three officers—Hadley, Ainsley and Blackburn—attempted to help William. The family have thanked those officers and I join them. However, the irony is that the officers who stand out as having done everything, and more, that the family could have expected from the police, were the ones who breached the police's policy.

What Julia needed was a firearms response, but it was more than one hour after she picked up the phone before the first armed response arrived outside the grounds. Armed units did not enter the house for almost seven hours, despite the fact that no sounds from it had been heard for more than six hours. Instead of going directly to the house, armed units were sent to a remote rendezvous point, and further problems were caused by poor communication among the police. The wrong silver commander was initially called, with the correct one not called for more than an hour after the start of the 999 call. When the silver commander finally arrived, he moved the rendezvous point and did not take command until three hours and 26 minutes after the call started.

During that time, it was not known whether Julia was dead or alive. The police priority was to preserve the lives of officers rather than the lives of victims. The police justified their lack of action by saying that it was not known whether Alan was still in the house and therefore a danger to the police or the public, even though no noise had been heard by anybody after 7.40 pm, 13 minutes after Julia's call had ended.

The police have now recognised that their firearms policy was over-cautious. The review of their firearms policy as a result of a similar tragedy at Highmoor means that they may now intervene more quickly and go directly to the house, which is what Julia needed. However, it is critical that future victims are given a true estimate of armed response arrival and, more importantly, whether the police will enter the house on arrival. It is not acceptable that a victim who is relying completely on the advice as they consider their options is told lies, leading them to make potentially fatal choices.

[Ms Julia Drown]

I turn now to events subsequent to the murders. After the family had an initial meeting with the police, the police refused to meet them again until after the coroner's hearing. That gave the family no option but to put their lives and grieving on hold while they tried to comprehend what had happened. I had to wait months for even a reply to my first letter to the chief constable formally asking for a meeting.

There are still lessons to be learned from the case, including on action in response to threats of violence and the advice on escape routes and police response times that is given to domestic violence victims. I hope that the Minister will see the necessity of a full homicide review, so that all the issues can be examined and learned from. I realise that he does not have the powers to insist on such a review, but I hope that he will be willing to raise it.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on the conscientious way in which she has pursued the case and supported the family's quest for an inquiry. Has she had an opportunity to note section 9 of the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004, which allows the Secretary of State to order a review of any domestic violence killing? The interesting point is that the provision does not seem to say that that is applicable only to deaths after the passage of the Act. It may be that the Secretary of State has the power to order Thames Valley police to order an inquiry.

Ms Drown: I thank my hon. and learned Friend for that intervention, and I hope that the Minister can clarify that point for us. The other lessons may also need to be referred to the Department for Constitutional Affairs, and I hope that the Minister will do so.

In July 2003, Julia returned to the Reading court to have an injunction with a power of arrest renewed. In addition to her original affidavit, she had sworn a further two, detailing the ongoing threats and breaches of the injunction. However, the injunction was reduced to an undertaking. Julia accepted that, because it avoided her having to go through a full hearing and because the police were aware of her situation and had installed a panic button. She was led to believe that Alan could be arrested, even without the stronger injunction.

We can see how the law lets such people down: to avoid a traumatic hearing, protections weaken for victims. Under the Family Law Act 1996, it is clear that the courts should not accept an undertaking when the respondent has used or threatened to use violence, as happened in this case. I hope that the Minister can clarify how that happened and say what could be done to give people better protection through the process—in particular, whether the police should apply for the injunction rather than the victim.

On the inquest, the first coroner appointed to the case had legally unacceptable connections with Alan but failed to exclude himself until the family threatened judicial review. I hope that that can be investigated. Even with the actual coroner, there were problems. There are different sorts of coroners' inquests. One has a narrow remit and the other a wider one, which is used if the coroner wants an investigation under article 2 of the European convention on human rights to establish system failure. In such article 2 cases, it is possible for more extensive inquiries to be made. Even if article 2 is not invoked, the coroner has a duty to be alert to the evidence presented and to adjourn if he finds any indication of system failure by an organ of the state. Any scent of system failure that might have contributed to a death should lead to the coroner adjourning the case.

Initially, the family decided not to pursue article 2, because they wanted to minimise their trauma and they did not have access to all the information. For example, Thames Valley police refused to produce the command and control logs for the family until after the inquest, which prevented them and their solicitor from discovering some of the facts and the extent of the system failure.

At a preliminary hearing in May 2003, the police defended any moves by the coroner to include witnesses that might indicate that he was widening the interest parameters. The police's attitude can be summed up by the words of the barrister at the inquest, who described the gluing of all external locks, which should have been taken seriously as a reason to question Alan Pemberton, as nothing more than £150 worth of damage—in other words, an accounting entry.

The family submitted to the coroner before the inquest a statement reminding him of his duty to consider article 2, but it was clear that he had no intention of pursuing that. Yet, as the inquest progressed, it was apparent that there were ample indications of system failure. The Highmoor case, which showed that police firearms policy was over-cautious, was well known to the police by the time of the inquest and should again have been a reason to look at system failure.

The coroner accepted far too lightly the delays in the police response on the night, suggesting that, for the first dispatch, if one deducts the time of the call, the time delays were less serious. That is crazy, given that the police want victims to stay on the line. The comment that makes a mockery of the police's duty to protect and preserve life. The coroner failed to pick up glaring contradictions given by the Thames Valley police officers at the hearing, which revealed the further need to review the case. These inconsistencies should have given rise to serious questions as to what happened.

> "The only way . . . Julia Pemberton's life could have been saved would have been if she had had armed police escort throughout the time that she believed she was at risk"

The coroner showed a total lack of compassion and sensitivity towards the family of Julia and William Pemberton and in particular to Laura, the surviving daughter. He expressed no acknowledgement of the family's grief and offered no words of encouragement to Laura. Perhaps most revealing was when he remarked that William could not have done something to deserve being shot, implying that Julia did. In view of all those failings I hope that the Minister will agree to get that behaviour looked at, to consider a homicide review of the whole case and to look at how injunctions need to be dealt with in future.

This is about the two people who are killed every week in this country from domestic violence. I hope that the Minister will also agree that an apology is due to the family from the police and the coroner. It would be a comfort to this grieving family to know that their unstinting work has achieved something for others who might otherwise face the trauma that Julia and William faced on that horrific night and in the months that led up to those fatal moments.

3.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): My hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) will appreciate that by outlining the case in great detail she has not left me much time to respond, but I will do so as fully as I can. May I begin by congratulating her on bringing the tragic case of Julia and William Pemberton to the attention of the House this afternoon? I join with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) in paying tribute to the way she has pursued the issue and others in this place on behalf of her constituents. It is important when we develop policy that we do so in a way that is informed by cases such as this tragic one, so that we get our policies right and make them more effective.

It was concern about precisely this kind of tragic case that gave the momentum to the legislation which my hon. and learned Friend mentioned, the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act, which it was my privilege last year to take through the House. It received Royal Assent in November. There are some relevant measures within that Act which I hope will give my hon. Friend some reassurance.

There are two main messages. The first is to victims of domestic violence: the Government and the law are on their side and they can expect that the law will move more swiftly to their aid. Just as important, the message to the perpetrators of domestic violence is that their behaviour will no longer be tolerated and that if they persist in that behaviour they will feel the full weight and force of the law as it bears down upon them.

It might be helpful if I mentioned some specific measures in the Act that are relevant. First, it makes common assault an arrestable offence. That means that it will now be a police matter whether to arrest when called out to a domestic violence incident when there has been an assault. In other words, there will no longer be the burden on the victim to press charges. Secondly, it criminalises the breach of a non-molestation order and changes the law, so that the police can always arrest for breach. Where a non-molestation order has been issued, breaching it will always be a criminal offence and therefore will attract the power of arrest. Again, that shifts the burden of responsibility for enforcement from the victim to the criminal justice system.

I hope that my hon. Friend is reassured that the new power addresses one of the key points that she raised. In other words, the power of arrest will automatically be attached to every breach of an order. She mentioned the specific case involving Julia. The problem seems to have been that the order was downgraded to an undertaking and that her understanding of what that undertaking meant in terms of the power of arrest was not actually what could happen. We must ensure as we go forward that everyone—the police and the courts—are clearer about the new powers.

We are extending the availability of restraining orders to cover all violent offences. Following any violent incident, courts will now have the power to issue a restraining order against a perpetrator or potential perpetrator. We are also introducing local multi-agency homicide reviews. During 2005, we shall commence the introduction of homicide reviews for all domestic violence-related homicides, so that local agencies can learn lessons and adjust their policies and procedures accordingly. I shall say a little more about that in a moment.

I know that my hon. Friend has a specific concern about whether there could be a domestic homicide review in relation to this case. She acknowledged—indeed, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar made it clear—that there are new provisions for domestic homicide reviews to take place. We are developing guidance on that. The reviews will not be mandatory. We want them to be light-touch investigations that improve practice, so that local agencies can make the necessary changes, but there will be a reserve power for the Secretary of State to order such a review if there is a lack of willingness and it is considered necessary for that to take place.

My understanding is that there is not a power for that to be operated retrospectively, but given that the issue has been raised this afternoon, it will need further clarification. My noble Friend Baroness Scotland will meet my hon. Friend and members of the family in the near future. I hope that, by the time that that meeting takes place, we can be clear on whether there is a retrospective power. I do not believe that there is that power, but I undertake to provide clarity on that. Having said that, there would be nothing to prevent the local agencies from deciding to conduct such a review themselves. Already in certain parts of the country and certainly in London on occasion, the agencies voluntarily agree to undertake a review. It is a deeply serious point that we should learn from every tragedy wherever we can.

My hon. Friend will understand that, although we all look forward to the introduction of the important measures in the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act, the question whether there is a retrospective power will need further clarification. She will also understand that, although I have responsibility for the law and policy in relation to coroners services, I do not carry the authority to discipline coroners or to take any view about their conduct. That is a matter for the Lord Chancellor and the Department for Constitutional Affairs, but I will draw to the Lord Chancellor's attention the comments that she has made this afternoon.

The 2004 Act will give us new powers to ensure that the victim in cases of domestic violence is better protected, but in the end we are trying to change the culture—the custom and practice—so that all criminal justice agencies operate with the interests of victims of domestic violence at the heart of everything that they do. Domestic violence homicide reviews will help to change the culture, as will the more certain powers that we have, but we must make it clear that the victim is our top priority.

Environmental Crime

4 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate this very serious issue, which will become an increasing problem when the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill is eventually passed. I am delighted to see that the Solicitor-General is present and I welcome her to the debate. We have had one or two exchanges across the Floor of the House, but this is our first opportunity to consider the issue in depth.

My starting point is the excellent explanatory notes that the Government prepared in readiness for the debates on that Bill, which has been revised and is due to receive its Second Reading in the House of Lords. Paragraph 303 on page 43 of the explanatory notes states:

"The Bill contains a number of new reverse burdens of proof (which means that, to take advantage of a defence provided, the accused is required to demonstrate his innocence once the prosecution has proved certain facts, rather than the prosecution being required to prove the accused's guilt on all issues). A reverse burden can be legal, where the burden is on the accused to prove that the defence applies to him on a balance of probabilities, or evidential, where the accused must bring sufficient evidence for the defence to be an issue, and then the prosecution must disprove the defence."

I pause momentarily to remind you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the House that I am a Scottish advocate, albeit a non-practising one. My recollection of environmental crimes incurring a reverse burden of proof some 20 years ago is rather hazy, so studying the Bill, other legislation and some of the court cases has provided an opportunity to update my knowledge.

My worst fears were confirmed during the remaining stages of the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, including Third Reading, on 21 February this year. The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality, who led for the Government at that stage and through all the stages of the Bill, intervened on me to clarify the position. He said:

"If people do not like the fixed penalty notice, they do not have to pay the penalty, but they must then go to court and marshal their defence at that point."

I understand from questions that the Solicitor-General has replied to that it will not be for the Crown Prosecution Service to prosecute environmental crimes under the Bill, or any other environmental crimes; it will be for the local authorities to do so. However, there was confirmation from the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality that the accused will have to go to court to prove their innocence and incur considerable expense in the process. That alarmed not just me, but my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who said on that occasion:

"The worry about fixed penalty notices is that, if they are issued willy-nilly, people are put in an extremely difficult position in deciding whether they should go through all the hassle of going to court and many people will therefore give way. We want to ensure that fixed penalty notices are not issued without due care, and I understand that that is what new clause 6 is supposed to do."—[Official Report, 21 February 2005; Vol. 431, c. 49.]

Some concern about the reverse burden of proof was expressed in relation to other legislation. I refer in particular to the passage of the Criminal Justice and Police Bill in 2000–01. I do not have the Official Report reference, so I shall refer to an excellent note prepared for me by the House of Commons Library, quoting research paper No. 1 of 10. It refers in particular to the concerns that the civil liberties pressure group, Liberty, expressed. Those concerns are as valid as the arguments that I present to the Solicitor-General this afternoon. Liberty is quoted as saying:

"We are concerned that these provisions are a further manifestation of the trend to mix criminal and civil law procedures. This dilutes the principles and protections of criminal law in particular the presumption of innocence and the burden of proof. Although these procedures will not attract a criminal conviction, they relate to behaviour that is by definition criminal and can lead to a criminal conviction if a penalty is not accepted."

The quotation continues:

"We are particularly concerned that a penalty can be issued if an officer has reason to believe a penalty offence has been committed (Cl. 2(1)). This is a lesser standard than the criminal burden of proof.

If a person provided with the notice goes to court to protest his or her innocence rather than pay the fine, the burden of proof the police will be expected to establish is beyond reasonable doubt. The practical implications of this are that there will undoubtedly be a large number of people challenging these notices, causing not only the administrative burden of issuing fixed penalty notices, but also upon the courts."

I hope that the Solicitor-General will address some specific points in her response. The Library note on the reverse burden of proof prepared for me for today's debate has confirmed one point. We are all aware of the most recent court cases—namely, the House of Lords decision in Sheldrake in 2004 and R v. Johnson in 2003—and the Court of Appeal guidance on reverse burdens in the Attorney-General's reference No. 1 in 2004. Since the Human Rights Act 1998 was passed, we have seen an increasing commitment from this Government to reverse burdens of proof. According to the House of Commons Library note, as the use of reverse burdens grew, one difficulty was that draftsmen of parliamentary legislation did not always make it clear whether defendants were to bear the legal burden of proof or an evidential burden. Since the Human Rights Act came into force, with section 3 requiring courts in so far as it is possible to interpret legislation in a way that is compatible with the convention rights, the new feature has seen the possibility of reading down legislation in cases where putting the legal burden on a defendant would be incompatible with convention rights, but putting the evidential burden on him might not be.

Those people who do not wish to express or recognise any guilt for offences—quite serious environmental crimes, which we all agree must be rooted out—will increasingly have no alternative if they wish to proclaim their innocence but to refuse to pay the fixed penalty notice and go to court. There is concern that that will put a lot of pressure on the court system and that it may not be able to cope.

One aspect of the law that should have been addressed in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill was not. I am referring to farmers or landowners who have vast tracts of land, often do not have the time to visit all of it, and who are the innocent recipients of waste that is dumped on their land. It could be hazardous waste, toxic waste, chemical waste or building waste. If the land is privately owned, the Environment Agency is charged with removing the waste at taxpayers' expense.

However, the landowner is deemed guilty of an environmental crime. That will come into force under the Bill. It is currently before the House of Lords, so it could still be amended, except that it will be considered only on Second Reading, and not in Committee or on Report because of the timing of the general election.

It seems that there is a huge imbalance. An environmental crime has been perpetrated wilfully by an individual, but the onus of removing the waste is placed on an innocent party. I think that the phrase used is that it will be their decision whether or not they remove that waste and, if they do, it will be at their expense.

The only remedy that the innocent party will have under the new provisions in the Bill is that the police can catch and prosecute the perpetrator and then the cost to the landowner of removing the waste could be recovered. That was always our stance and we are delighted that the Government have adopted our position by making fly-tipping an arrestable offence. I welcome the opportunity to place on the record our worries and, hopefully, I shall receive a positive response from the Solicitor-General.

I think that the Solicitor-General said that, over the past six years, there has not been much opportunity to count the number of cases. The House of Commons Library has said that it would take substantial research to go through all the legislation. We are told that, in 1996, 219 examples of legal burdens or presumptions operating against a defendant were found in 540 offences that were triable in the Crown court. It said that, since then, no proper research has been carried out into such matters. However, for the purposes of this afternoon's debate, the Solicitor-General might have undertaken such research. We regret the drift towards the reverse burden of proof. We envisage a situation in which we shall rely much more on a party proving his innocence through no other means than by his having to go to court.

Let us consider the even more regrettable situation in which an innocent landowner is left with the task of removing waste that has been dumped on his land without his permission. Such serious environmental crimes are covered under the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill. I hope that that the Government will table amendments to clarify the position and to make sure that the situation that we envisage can be stopped in its tracks.

4.14 pm

The Solicitor-General (Ms Harriet Harman): I thank the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) for choosing this matter for debate, giving me the opportunity to discuss in detail a subject that has gone backwards and forwards between us in both written and oral questions and answers. It is a good opportunity for the hon. Lady to identify the full extent of her worries and for me to set out our principles and try to reassure her about such matters.

I wish to set out broadly the Government's approach and cite some examples, so that we can be clear about the starting point from which we are moving forward. The hon. Lady has obviously given the matter a great deal of close scrutiny, and I will look at the detailed points that she has raised. Obviously, I share her concern—I am sure that all Members would—about ensuring a presumption against reverse burden. It is in the DNA of us all to support the expectation that someone is innocent until proven guilty, and the responsibility should be on the prosecution, whether that is the local authority or the Crown Prosecution Service, to prove guilt.

Of course there have been, and are, exceptions to that, but the question put was whether there are many of them. With respect, I am not sure that I approach the issue in the same way. I do not think that one can quantify unfairness; the question is whether each individual measure is unfair. There cannot be a general climate of unfairness. If there is a reverse burden in both an environmental Bill and a completely different Bill, that does not add together to make unfairness. One must be satisfied that each and every provision is not unfair. So I do not accept the quantity point.

Also, I am not entirely sure whether there has been an increase or decrease at any stage. I think that the hon. Lady is saying that there is a trend of increased reverse burdens. Even if she is right about that, I do not think that it is necessarily a problem. However, I am not sure that she is right, because no one has counted, but I think that they will start counting after today's debate, as it is an interesting point.

When we make law in the House, we need to be sure that it is right in principle, that it is intellectually coherent, and that it works in practice in dealing with the problem that the legislation attempts to address. We would expect that in every bit of legislation, whether primary or secondary.

I am not at all as familiar with the Vale of York as the hon. Lady, but in my constituency issues of reverse burdens have not caused a problem. I know that she has a different relationship with environmental offences because of her constituency, and I will mention that later; but, generally speaking, I do not have a problem with constituents coming to see me—which they do in large numbers—feeling that somehow it is put on them to prove that they were not in the wrong and committing an offence. I do not see any constituency evidence that the issue causes a problem in the way that the hon. Lady identifies.

Miss McIntosh: Obviously I do not know a great deal about the right hon. and learned Lady's constituency either, but I would imagine that Camberwell and Peckham is deeply urban. My constituency is deeply rural. I have limited my remarks primarily to environmental crimes, but there are seven other examples of the trend in primary legislation that I would like to share with her after today for her further information. However, on these environmental crimes, the point is that the Government have signed up to EU directives, and now there is nowhere for the waste to go. That has made placing it on privately owned land too attractive.

The Solicitor-General: We do not have vast stretches of countryside in my constituency, but we have plenty of fly-tippers, and plenty of people with loads of tyres on the back of lorries that they want to dump somewhere. So we are familiar with some of the issues, although perhaps on a different scale. I will get to that point in a moment.

I shall start with the general principle. The majority of criminal offences require the prosecution to prove all elements of the offence to the criminal standard—that is, beyond reasonable doubt. The principle that a person is innocent until proved guilty has always been a foundation of our common law; that principle is now reinforced by the direct application of article 6 of the European convention on human rights to the UK following the introduction of the Human Rights Act 1998. So, any unfairness that might otherwise have required people to wait to get all the way to Strasbourg can be judged right now in domestic court proceedings.

[The Solicitor-General]

However there are a number of offences, some of long standing, where the burden of proof relating to some issues may be transferred to the defendant. These typically arise where an exception is provided and the accused must demonstrate that he falls within it, or where there is some excusing circumstance of which only the accused has knowledge. Those are typically the two bases.

Where the burden is transferred to the defendant, it may be a legal or an evidential burden, depending on the intention of the legislation. A reverse legal burden requires the defendant to discharge the burden but to the lower standard of the balance of probabilities. An evidential burden requires only that a defendant raise an issue in evidence, and once properly raised it falls back on to the prosecutor to disprove the matter beyond reasonable doubt.

The Court of Appeal and the House of Lords have considered the circumstances in which reverse legal burdens will be found to be reasonable and proportionate on a number of occasions since the implementation of the Human Rights Act 1998. They have identified a number of principles to be applied in considering whether a reverse legal burden will be compatible with article 6(2), most recently, as the hon. Lady said, in the case of Sheldrake. In that case, the House of Lords confirmed that the European convention on human rights does not outlaw presumptions of fact or law but requires that they should be kept within reasonable limits and should not be arbitrary. That has to apply not in the generality but to each and every specific offence that we are considering. The effect of the court's decision is that the overall burden of proving the offence should remain on the prosecution and that the trial of the issue should be fair. A reverse burden will be deemed compatible only so long as it is in pursuit of a legitimate aim, it is justified and it is proportionate to the overall aim of the legislation.

A simple example with which the hon. Lady will be familiar is the case of a defendant stopped in public while carrying a bladed article. Under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 he has a defence if he can show that he had it in a public place for a good reason: for example, he is a carpet fitter on his way to work. The courts have found that the reverse legal burden on the defendant to prove that good reason on the balance of probabilities is fair and proportionate. The defendant is in the best position in that sort of case to prove that he had a good reason, and the prosecution continues to bear the burden of proving all the other elements of the offence: the fact of possession, the fact that the defendant was in a public place and the fact that there was a bladed article.

One environmental example, which has been found to be compatible with the ECHR, is the offence of fly-posting under the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. That offence is intended to tackle the problem of businesses fly-posting walls, advertising hoardings and other street furniture with posters advertising their event. The offence has a reverse burden in that a person is guilty of this offence if he is the owner of the land covered by the posters or if it is his business that is being advertised, unless he can prove that the posters were being displayed without his consent or knowledge.

That reverse burden was supported by the courts recently in the case of Savvas. The Court of Appeal found that there was a reverse burden of proof in relation to knowledge and consent. To place a reverse burden of proof on persons whose business was promoted by fly-posting was determined to be reasonable and proportionate, as it was in the public interest, the exception was easy for the accused to prove, and of course, it was only on the balance of probabilities.

I understand that the hon. Lady may have some concerns, which she has expressed, about the reverse burdens of proof in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, which she indeed raised on Report. The central purpose of the Bill is to improve the local environment that directly affects people's quality of life wherever they live. It provides enhanced powers for local authorities and the Environment Agency to tackle local environmental quality and antisocial behaviour. I mention that because those reverse burdens do not arise in a vacuum; they are about remedying a problem through legislation. As well as having to be fair, they must be proportionate to the problem that is to be addressed.

The Bill contains reverse burdens of proof for a number of offences, and I will explain some of the reasons behind this in a minute. However, before I do, I should stress that this Bill has been, and will continue to be, subject to the usual checks and balances to ensure that it does not contravene the ECHR. The Bill has passed through the House of Commons and is currently waiting for its Second Reading in the Lords. The Joint Committee on Human Rights has published the results of its consideration of the Bill, stating that it accepted

"the statement in the Explanatory Notes that the new reverse burdens in the Bill are compatible with the presumption of innocence in Article 6(2) ECHR".

So, it has been given a clean bill of health by that Committee.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs signed a statement confirming that the Bill is compatible with the European convention on human rights, as did Lord Whitty of Camberwell for the purposes of the Bill's introduction in the House of Lords. The Government consulted extensively for two years on many of the Bill's measures and no complaints about reverse burdens were registered with the Government by groups such as Liberty, with which there has been an exchange of correspondence. Indeed, the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality offered Liberty a meeting if it had any concerns, and it did not take that offer up. If it has concerns—or if the hon. Lady's concerns are the same as its concerns—there is no reason why such a meeting should not take place. The Bill is not something that has not been examined and thought through.

Some of the reverse burdens in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill slightly amend or improve existing reverse burdens introduced by the then Government in the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. Appropriate reverse burdens have been around in environment legislation in relation to fly-tipping, litter control notices and fly-posting for some time.

I am aware, however, of two new examples of reverse burdens on nuisance vehicles in the Bill, which I understand the hon. lady queried on Report in the House of Commons. Clauses 3 and 4 of the Bill make it an offence to sell two or more cars on the same road as part of a business or to repair a vehicle on the road as part of a business. That is something we know about in Camberwell and Peckham—I say that with some feeling.

A person cannot be found guilty by the courts of those two offences if the defence proves to the satisfaction of the court that he or she was not selling or repairing the vehicles as part of a business. Those two clauses therefore create a legal reverse burden of proof, as the defendant is required to prove something to avoid being found guilty. However, the prosecution first has to prove that the defendant had two cars on sale for the question of a defence to arise in the first place.

The offences are targeting the rogue trader, not the private seller. Two or more vehicles being advertised for sale on the same road suggests the presence of a business venture. Local authorities have told us they have great difficulty in proving that an individual is acting in the course of a business when the transaction occurs in the street. In the unlikely case of a private seller selling two or more vehicles, it would be easy for them to prove through Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency documentation that the vehicles were registered in their own or their family's name and that it just so happened that the vehicles were being sold at the same time. It is easily proved through the DVLA that such vehicles are being sold and that such people are not traders trading on behalf of someone else.

The burden of proof is on the basis not of beyond reasonable doubt but of the balance of probabilities. That is a common-sense approach, particularly when the alternative is considered. That would be far more invasive; to put the burden on the prosecution would require intrusive powers to be given, for example, to examine paperwork or bank accounts. It is more humane to the defendant to say, "Well, you produce the information," rather than to say, "We are coming in to get it". It makes it cheaper for local authorities.

The hon. Lady might also be interested to know a cross-departmental group on ECHR issues in criminal law meets every two months. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Environment Agency and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister are represented on that group. A sub-group examines reverse burdens. So, a machinery of government incarnation addresses her preoccupations. It constantly examines what the courts are saying and seeks to ensure both that such things are being kept track of and that whenever the courts say something, we ensure that we comply with it.

The hon. Lady talked briefly about mixing criminal and civil law procedures together. So long as we have the right safeguards, we should not be hung up about which jurisdiction is involved. We just want the law to make common sense for people, for it to be fair and for it to address the problem that presents itself. I am sure that it would be useful if she had a meeting with the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality to discuss the issues further. I would also be happy to do so at any time.

It being half-past Four o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 17 March 2005

[MR. JAMES CRAN in the Chair]

International Development Policy (Science)

[Relevant documents: Thirteenth Report from the Science and Technology Committee, Session 2003–04, HC 133, and Second Special Report (Government Reply), Session 2004–05, HC 235.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Gareth Thomas.]

2.30 pm

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): I hope that we will be brief in our contributions, but pungent in making strong points. It is a lovely day and we ought to be out there getting some vitamin D in our system to revivify us for events coming up in the next few weeks. I am very pleased to introduce to the House the subject of the use of science in United Kingdom international development policy, and I welcome colleagues from all parties to the debate.

In July 2003, we decided to conduct an inquiry into how science and technology were informing decisions on the spending of our aid budget, how research was being used to underpin policy making in international development and how the UK was supporting science and technology in developing countries. This led us to examine predominantly the work of the Department for International Development, which had about £3.8 billion of the aid budget in 2004–05—no insignificant sum. This is the first time that the Science and Technology Committee has addressed the work of DFID; the International Development Committee has, of course, produced many reports considering DFID's performance and activities.

We received 100 submissions of evidence and held seven evidence sessions, involving DFID officials, organisations working in capacity building in the developing world, organisations involved in agriculture, forestry and environmental research and development, and those involved in engineering and health research and development. We talked to the chief scientific adviser to the Government, officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, UK Trade and Investment, the British Council and the Secretary of State for International Development.

We visited the Overseas Development Institute for discussions with the fellows and directors there, and we travelled to Malawi, where we visited agriculture and health projects and met the President of Malawi, Members of Parliament and senior officials. This is a high-flying report that took wide-ranging evidence.

We are very grateful for the assistance of our specialist advisers: Andrew Barnett, the managing director of Sussex Research Associates Ltd.; Professor Anne Mills, professor of health economics and policy and head of the health, economics and financing programme at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine; and Professor Michael Elves, the vice-chairman of Rothamsted Research Institute.

I do not want to go into all the definitions in this area, which can cloud the debate, but I shall just say that development science appeared in our report as shorthand to refer to the spectrum of social and natural sciences, engineering and technology, undertaken for the purpose of informing, supporting or promoting our international development programme. We should not confuse that with the phrase "development studies", which usually refers to a branch of social science concerned with international development. The point of me saying that will become clear in my remarks and those of others.

International development is big news at the moment, and science and technology, and indeed engineering, are featuring increasingly in the aid debate. We have heard about the Commission for Africa and tsunami warning systems; people are recognising from such things the fact that science and technology and engineering are essential for international development. Indeed, everyone seems to be getting in on the act, such as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said this week of tackling climate change:

> "If our economies are to flourish, if global poverty is to be banished, and the well-being of the world's people enhanced, we must make sure we take care of the natural environment and resources on which our economic activity depends".

There is a growing emphasis on science and technology, and engineering, in international development. Recently, they have come up front, which is a very welcome development. Our report makes that clear.

When we first announced the inquiry, science and technology and international development were hardly ever mentioned in the same breath, and DFID had the reputation of being a Department that did not really do science as such. We decided in 2003 that it was time for our Committee to take a good, hard look at DFID. Indeed, it is true to say that international development is far too important to be left to economists and social workers. We have to work with them, but science and technology must be alongside.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way; he brings so much expertise to the subject. Is there not a certain historical irony here in that half a century ago, when there was a colonial situation rather than international development, science played a major role? Doctors were key figures in that administration and large numbers of diseases were wiped out, many in areas to which they have since returned. In some respects, science was more prominent then than it is now.

Dr. Gibson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. It is absolutely true that things come round, and round again, but our knowledge of science, technology and engineering is much greater now than in those days. It has to feature to a greater extent than it did then, which is what our report urges.

Our inquiry generated huge interest in the development community in the UK. People were clamouring at our gates to tell us of their concerns about DFID's approach to science. There is no doubt that DFID does a lot of excellent work around the world—we saw that at first hand in Malawi—but we found evidence that science had been somewhat sidelined within DFID.

[Dr. Gibson]

Science and technology should play a central role in international development policy. Why? Because scientific capability is essential for improving agricultural productivity, generating new medicines and systems to deliver them, developing water and sanitation facilities, identifying and exploiting sustainable energy, and conserving the natural environment—no mean agenda. Time and again, we heard that this message had not got through to enough DFID staff, and the Department needs to ensure that science comes out of its box and plays a major role in the determination of our international development policy.

We are pleased that Professor Gordon Conway, who is here today, has been given the job of looking into this area, which immediately shows the value of Select Committees as we got a response before the report was even published. That decision is welcome, and it is further welcome that Gordon Conway is a scientist—a real, bona fide, hard scientist, unlike the soft social scientists. I say that, of course, with my tongue in my cheek. It is so important to have that information in the Department.

We are interviewing Professor Conway in the Committee next week, and we shall be asking some short, sharp questions about the support he is getting, how long his job might last and what he is going to do with the rest of his life, particularly in his current job. There will be lots of ugly questions to ask, but we want to ensure that this initiative has a significant influence on our policy. That is very important. I hope that he will be able to engage the permanent secretary, who is an elusive character, and ensure that he or she—whoever it is at the minute—plays a major part in developing the initiative. There may be one chief scientific adviser, but there are many permanent, grey secretaries around, and we hope that they will work together and mainstream this work in the Department.

We visited Malawi to see how DFID is supporting people in developing countries in identifying and meeting their science, technology and engineering needs. We saw some wonderful enterprises there that have been funded by DFID: a particular bridge was sterling, and some work in relation to agriculture was excellent, but much more could be done in a strategic way.

We were impressed by the quality of the staff and the work that they were doing, and we extend our thanks to our hosts, who made the trip so informative and very enjoyable. I believe that the man who showed us around was called Harry Potter; it seemed hard to take that there is another Harry Potter in the world. He was obviously big in the communities of Malawi and well-respected, which is a credit to the work of the Department and the British Government.

The trip drove home to us just how basic science and technology infrastructures are in these developing countries. We noted the brain drain of Malawi's skilled health workers and teachers, which was having a serious effect on the ability to support science, research and health services in Malawi. I am sure that many other members of our delegation who saw that at first hand will want to refer to it.

Our report calls on the Government to boost significantly the funding available for building capacity in science, technology and engineering in developing countries. We want DFID to carry on emphasising the need for developing countries to identify their own priorities instead of always having to follow a donor-driven agenda. That is extremely important. How can a country identify its own needs for sanitation, disease prevention or research unless it has indigenous science, technology and engineering capacity? How will science, technology and research be represented in national policies if scientists and researchers have no voice at the policy-making table? Other Members might pick up on that point.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): The hon. Gentleman makes a very important point about the need to ensure that recipient countries can decide their own priorities, but I hope he acknowledges the fact that there is a tension between that and a recommendation of the Committee, which is that a condition of the provision of direct budgetary support must be that the recipient country does not have discretion on whether to invest in scientific and technological support. The Government have some difficulty with that recommendation on those grounds. How does he square the circle between those two principles?

Dr. Gibson: There is no easy blueprint for that process; there has to be co-operation on an item-by-item basis. We should not try to lay down a blueprint, but take up the issues as we talk to people in particular countries. The situation will be different in different countries, and in different parts of those countries. There is no blueprint, and we should start to move our way through gradually, taking on the problems issue by issue. We called on the Government to boost significantly that work in developing countries.

When we visited the Overseas Development Institute and met people at the coal face, as it were, struggling to find sustainable sources of funding for their institutes and research groups, we found that DFID was perhaps not taking responsibility for looking after UK scientists. We should always remember the excellent work of developmental scientists in the UK and how they have been instrumental in building the UK's reputation in international development. We took evidence from individuals at the Overseas Development Institute who were involved in that.

Developmental science does not usually involve the sexy research that gets people fancy, Watson and Crick-type papers in Nature, but it makes a real difference in the fight against poverty and disease in developing countries. We must ensure in this country that we do not inhibit that work by having research assessment exercises that do not include such innovative and exploratory activity. These are difficult areas, as the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) said in his intervention, but we must ensure that such issues are recognised by research councils. Again, I am sure that that point will be taken up in more detail.

We called for the Government to set up a development sciences research board with an initial budget of some £100 million, which would fund research partnerships between groups in the UK and in developing countries. There is a lot of activity going on, but it must be boosted. The board would help to stop the erosion of the UK's development sciences skills and research base, and provide a much needed boost to the research effort to underpin international development policy making.

The Government's response promises to set up an "advisory" development sciences research board, whatever that might mean. Perhaps the Minister will explain what "advisory" means in such a structure. What is the point of having such a board if there is no funding? Indeed, £100 million is a drop in the ocean compared with this country's £4 billion aid budget. I look forward to hearing his explanation, and I am sure that others will return to the point.

I conclude by commending DFID for the constructive way in which it engaged with us during this inquiry. I have mentioned the appointment of Professor Gordon Conway, and the Department has increased its research budget from £80 million to £136 million per annum. It is beginning to work more closely with colleagues at the Office of Science and Technology and the research councils. Perhaps the real problem involves achieving a cultural change at DFID. We wish Professor Conway well in trying to institute some ideas that no doubt he and many others in this country have to support the developing world.

We are supporters of DFID and the work that it does. We hope that these changes will initiate in DFID's treatment of science and technology a higher-quality basis for its work and for the support it gives to developing countries.

2.45 pm

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): I am proud to have been a member of the House of Commons Science and Technology Committee in this Parliament. We have produced more reports than has been the norm in recent years, and many have been on important subjects—not least the one that we are dealing with this afternoon. Some of our reports have been controversial, and there is more controversy to come from the Committee. Other reports have had a clear influence on Government policy, as we believe this report on international development and science has done.

I pay tribute to our Chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), who has driven the Committee forward mercilessly in this Parliament, sometimes during difficult times for him and the Committee. I also pay tribute to other Committee members for their commitment, and a special tribute to those who do not come from a science and technology background. Furthermore, we have been supported by some excellent staff, who have produced some extremely well written reports.

When we started this investigation, there was clearly not a scientific culture in the Department for International Development. As our Committee's Chairman has explained, such a culture is beginning to develop now, and the House should be grateful for that. The Government's clear advice was to appoint a chief scientific adviser in all the state Departments to work with Professor Sir David King, the Government's chief scientific adviser, as well as with individual Secretaries of State, and to ensure that each Department was aware of the scientific advances—indeed, scientific controversies—that might affect it.

"Horizon scanning" has become an important phrase; the Government are now looking 10 and even 20 years into the future, at where science and technology might take us and where controversies might arise. I do not think that this country and this Parliament have necessarily been very good at that in the past.

I am pleased that the launch of our investigation appeared to be influential in persuading DFID to appoint a chief scientific adviser. The recent refocusing of DFID on the role that science, engineering and technology can play in developing the millennium development goals and last week's announcement by the Secretary of State for International Development that even more money is being made available to support that change of policy are very welcome developments. I am sure that they will bear fruit in the not-too-distant future.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North said, science, engineering and technology tend to have a low priority in developing countries. Recently, our Government have concentrated on ensuring that many such countries are developing good governance. That has been high on their list of priorities, and rightly so. Occasionally, I visit regions such as Palestine and Kashmir, where it is very difficult to find anyone studying science, engineering or technology—even in school, never mind at the further and higher education levels. Of course I accept that it is important to develop good governance to build the structures before high-tech science is brought into such countries. However, other countries are now ready for development, as I shall try to explain.

I have mentioned Palestine, and we must not forget that the Palestinians live cheek by jowl with the Israelis. Israel is one of the most developed countries in the world for science, engineering and technology. Unfortunately, the Palestinians who live next door, across the artificial border, are not benefiting from that at all—in fact, they are going backwards rapidly, while the Israelis are going forward.

I have seen such contrasts as I have travelled around the world as a Member of Parliament. They are so stark that we Members of Parliament have to try to do something about them.

Mr. Brazier: As one who once shared an office with a Palestinian engineer, I should like to put on record how much I support what the hon. Gentleman has said. The problem that he mentions has nothing to do with native intelligence, nor with the old educational system for the Palestinians, some of which used to be very good; it has everything to do with the sorry political situation in the region.

Dr. Iddon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments. I have many highly educated Palestinian friends. The education system in Palestine is excellent and would be even better without the closures there.

Although changing the culture towards science, engineering and technology in DFID in the UK is important, it is even more important that that change in culture is felt in the country offices. After all, it is at that level that the changing culture towards science, engineering and technology can have the greatest benefit to the citizens of developing countries. DFID will, of course, need to recruit more scientists, engineers and technologists if that culture is to permeate through the entire structure, from London to all the important developing countries. I accept that it will take time for that change of culture to permeate down to the digits of the organisation's body.

[Dr. Iddon]

There are eight millennium development goals, which are listed on page 8 of our report. In my opinion, science, engineering and technology policy can influence nearly all of them; that is evident from the headings. For example, if we are to developing countries have not only to produce enough food to support their own people in an often adverse environment, but to bring in foreign currency by exporting agricultural products. Most of those countries rely predominantly on agriculture for sustainability.

"Eradicate extreme poverty and hunger",

Regulations on the import of food into developed countries are an immense problem for developing countries; our supermarkets and, indeed, our own Parliaments are expecting better and better quality food to appear on the shelves of our shops and on the plates of our dinner tables. That produces an enormous burden for developing countries to overcome. Protectionist trade barriers also have to be overcome if such countries are to be successful in exporting their agricultural products.

Child mortality rates and the levels of disease in developing countries are totally unacceptable in the 21st century. Frankly, I am embarrassed when I visit such countries. It is a great tragedy that they train so many professionals—at such a considerable cost, relative to their economies—yet almost within a few years of training, those professionals die of infectious diseases. At the moment, that happens more rapidly than ever before, because of HIV/AIDS. That cannot be right; countries lose a lot of their professional expertise in that way.

During our trip to Malawi, we broke into two groups: health and agriculture. I was on the health team. My longest-lasting memory of the trip is of touring the Lilongwe Central hospital, where the conditions were horrific. There was one nurse for 80 patients. People, even those in the terminal stages of various diseases, were sleeping everywhere: in the corridors, on the floors in the wards, underneath beds—even out on the verandas, where temperatures plummeted to freezing at night.

When I had been to Africa before, the climate had been oppressive. However, on this visit, I was stunned at Malawi's climate at that time of the year: it was literally freezing, and I felt very sorry for the patients with very serious illnesses whom I saw sleeping outdoors. Tuberculosis was killing AIDS patients before the HIV virus killed them. I suppose I should have realised that before my visit, although subconsciously I already knew it. Lilongwe Central hospital—a large hospital—was even short of anti-TB drugs. There were not enough supplies available. Consequently, patients were dying of what is, after all, a curable disease in the west. Thanks to this Government, the antiretroviral drugs were just arriving in Malawi during our visit, although unfortunately much too late for hundreds of thousands of Malawi citizens. However, hope is there for the future.

As one of our leading newspapers highlighted a few days ago, the west has taken its eye off another killer disease; I mean malaria, of course. When I was a university lecturer, I used to give lectures on the development of antimalarial drugs, from Jesuit's powder—quinine, as it is better known—onwards to the more recently discovered drugs. I also lectured on other ways of keeping malaria under control in continents such as Africa. At that time, I was quoting a death rate of 4 million people per annum worldwide. Tragically, that death rate is even higher today and is rising rapidly, because, I think, we have taken our eyes off the ball on malaria. The situation has also been exacerbated by the fact that many of the drugs become redundant as the malaria bug mutates.

In Blantyre, we visited Professor David Molyneaux from the School of Tropical Medicine at Liverpool university. I was very impressed with him. He said that the focus of health policy makers on HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria in Africa—partially as a result of the millennium development goals—is detracting attention and resources from other infectious diseases in Africa, such as leprosy and river blindness: debilitating diseases that have such deleterious effects on some of the poorest communities throughout Africa.

It is important that DFID should ensure that the pursuit of the eight millennium development goals does not take resources away from already existing programmes that deal with very necessary projects such as the supply of clean water and effective and safe sanitation, the health care projects to which I have referred, the development of good infrastructure and even the development of sustainable energy.

Millennium development goal No. 7 is "Ensure environmental sustainability". That, also, can be achieved only by the application of science, engineering and technology. For example, most rural villagers in Africa burn local wood—either directly, or by turning it into charcoal first—for all their cooking. On television the other evening, I saw a successful project that allowed people in a remote African village to cook their food using the energy of the sun instead of having to burn wood. That was a simple, basic application of science that cost the villagers next to nothing. It was also saving the environment, because Africans often take trees down without bothering to replant, as they do not have time for that kind of thing.

I mentioned our visit to Lilongwe Central hospital and the shortage of nurses. It is not as if Malawi is not doing its best to train professionals such as nurses. Many of them cannot afford to work on the wages that they are paid by the national health service in Malawi, so they have been leaving the country. Many of them have been coming to Britain. Some, however, have been siphoned off into international development programmes that have been started in Malawi, often with no benefit to the country.

For example, foreign drug companies might launch a project on tropical diseases in Africa with the intention, obviously, of making a profit from the discovery of a new drug. However, that discovery might not be aimed at benefiting the citizens of the country that the company is using for the research project. Many soldiers and other troops alike fight throughout the world in tropical theatres of war. It is a well known fact that during world war two, troops were dying or becoming debilitated from infectious diseases in tropical theatres of war faster than bullets or bombs were putting them out of action. Often the research projects in developing countries are not set up for the benefit of the citizens of the countries, but for the benefit of the countries themselves.

I am glad to say that there is a voluntary code of practice that discourages NHS employers from actively recruiting health care professionals from developing countries. However, it has unfortunately been possible to get around that code by using private-sector recruitment agencies. I therefore welcome the proposal, made by the Department of Health on 25 August last year, to strengthen the code of practice. I am pleased to say that DFID has offered to double—I think it was to double, although the Minister will confirm that—the salaries of nurses working in the Malawi national health service. I hope that will help to retain them in the service.

Dr. Harris: The proposal mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, which we discussed in Malawi, is interesting. I have always had a question in my mind about what research underpins the view that the policy of doubling—as opposed to tripling or multiplying by 1.5—is right. It was not clear to me when I was in Malawi that that was anything other than a figure plucked from the air in the hope that it might work. It would be possible to carry out research to find out whether that would be an appropriate policy and what the scale of support should be.

Dr. Iddon: I accept that, but something had to be done and it had to be done quickly. I am pleased that DFID took immediate action, even if it did not have the basic research to cover the point raised by the hon. Gentleman.

I have another simple example of what we are doing wrong in continents such as Africa. The British high commissioner held a reception for us and a lot of the country's leading scientists, engineers and technologists while we were in Lilongwe. It was quite an interesting evening; I certainly met a lot of interesting people. One was a scientist, who I believe is a geologist and he told me something quite simple. They drill for water all over Malawi, as has to be done to sustain life in any country. However, the problem is that wells are being drilled to varying depths and possibly, or even probably, penetrating the base of the aquifers—large underground lakes where that extremely useful water lies. When an aquifer is penetrated, a leak is created.

The geologist pointed out to me that what is needed in Malawi is an up-to-date, in-depth geological survey of the country and regulation to prevent people from drilling water wells willy-nilly or doing anything else that might upset the geological structure of the country.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): How does my hon. Friend square that excellent observation with the laid-back approach in paragraph f on page 26 of the Government's response, which discusses the Natural Environment Research Council? Apparently, the Government are concerned about the reduction in UK expertise, but no details are given. They continue:

> "Nevertheless, activity is maintained in those areas, often with international finance institutions or EU funding."

Does my hon. Friend not agree that that is an appallingly laid-back approach to the huge and important problem that he has just raised?

Dr. Iddon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and the answer to his question will come in a few minutes.

Corruption is a big problem in underdeveloped countries, and one that the President of Malawi seems determined to tackle, thank goodness. We visited Ntcheu district hospital, halfway between Lilongwe and Blantyre, and heard about its problems. Drugs are ordered from the central medical supplies unit in Lilongwe but many simply fall off the back of the wagon before they arrive at the district hospital. As a result, people either suffer longer or die in the hospital. The pilfered drugs are either sold on the black market or parallel traded back into their countries of origin for huge profits.

I wish the President of Malawi well, but the President alone cannot solve the problems of corruption. The management of those problems will have to go through the governing structure of the country. However, even more simple things were a problem. We discovered that the hospital, sadly, was short of microscopes—basic pieces of equipment in any hospital.

Much of the science, engineering and technology required by the developing world, such as microscopes, is very basic. However, it needs to be adapted to local circumstances. We saw excellent examples of such projects in Blantyre, where people from the university of Strathclyde were working with local villagers, asking what their problems were and developing basic scientific solutions to those problems.

As I said, I have been to Africa before, and to other developing countries. Occasionally, one visits a remote village and has to go to the toilet. Frankly, I have not enjoyed such experiences in past decades. However, I was caught out in one small remote African village and was absolutely amazed: there was no smell, and it was extremely clean. It had a clay floor, and was in a mud hut, but had none of the problems that I have experienced in the past. The reason for that was revealed on our visit to Blantyre, where a special filter has been developed to plug into the sanitation system of such remote villages. Hundreds are produced quite cheaply in that African country. That is another example of basic science that can be applied in Africa.

Surprisingly, even some of our most advanced technology can have the greatest impact in such countries. I saw a programme on the television the other evening about the satellites that are used to track big game. Big game migrate hundreds of miles across Africa, particularly in the Rift valley, and occasionally get near villages and trample crops. That can cause havoc when the crop is the only sustainable means of life in a small village. An advanced form of technology is now helping to sustain people in one African country in a basic manner.

[Dr. Iddon]

When I was a university lecturer, we used to send the textbooks and journals that we no longer required to such countries. They were extremely out of date, but at the time they were welcome for teaching subjects such as chemistry in remote parts of the world. We were not really doing them a favour in terms of modern technology. How much better it would be if people learning in Africa had laptop computers in front of them and were able to download information from all over the world. Indeed, people are beginning to do that in remote parts of the world.

What is the point of sending extinct journals and textbooks to Africa any longer? They can all be made available on a computer and even the most up-to-date science can be transmitted anywhere in the world, theoretically, and downloaded for the benefit of the citizens of that country. The Committee has just completed a report on open access publications, where the author pays to publish and people all over the world have free access to those publications. The Committee has been fighting—although, unfortunately, the Government are not yet convinced—for open access publications so that people in developing countries do not have to pay to access the most up-to-date scientific and medical information produced throughout the rest of the world.

Many years ago, I visited several developing countries. The contrasts were plain to see. It was clear despite all the poverty that I saw throughout the length and breadth of India that their successive Governments knew what they had to do: train as many professional scientists, engineers, technologists and medics as possible. Even though I saw people dying from infectious diseases and starvation, the Indian Government ploughed ahead with a policy that seemed mad to their own people. Let us consider India today. We export some of our jobs to India because Governments have been so successful in using SET to forward the development of the country. They are still doing that. They believe in education as a saviour of the lives of their people.

That contrasts with another country that I visited at about the same time: Tanzania, in east Africa, where I taught chemistry at the university of Dar es Salaam on two visits. At that time—admittedly about two decades ago—the Government were struggling with similar problems to those found in India, but the culture was completely different. The Government were not progressive about science, engineering and technology, corruption was rampant and there was no movement at all. Such contrasts can be found throughout the world.

As a chemist, I find it extremely different to do chemistry in the tropics. In my laboratory in Salford, I used diethyl ether to extract new molecules that I had synthesised in reaction mixtures. I naively thought that I could do the same in Africa. I started to do some basic research and showed how to handle the basic equipment. I then said, "Where's the ether bottle?" That was a crazy question to ask, because ether boils in Africa and, in the right proportions with air, it can cause explosions. I gave that idea up.

I have a friend in Dar es Salaam called Jim Harvey. He is from Bolton, which is why I have kept in touch, and he is a supporter of Bolton Wanderers, so I have to keep him informed about them. Jim has stayed in Malawi for several decades. He is married to a Malawian woman and they have a Malawian family. I am sorry. For "Malawi" read "Tanzania"; I am still talking about Tanzania. He imports basic chemicals. When I went, all chemicals had to be flown in, and the cost was prohibitive. Today, Jim is helping to start that market. When I visited for the first time, Tanzania was not producing its own soap, but was importing it from the large countries. I hope that Tanzania is beginning or has started to produce its own soap.

When I was in Tanzania, a lot of foreign aid money went in. I saw it wasted. Specialists went in, told the local population what they should be doing and did not ask what the problems were or what help was needed. A lot of the projects were extremely short term. Clearly, over several decades countries, such as Britain and the other aid countries across the world, have realised that what we were doing was wrong. Even providing a basic piece of scientific equipment is probably not the right thing to do. If the equipment breaks down, there will be no technician to fix it and, in any case, where will the spare parts come from and who will pay? Those are all basic questions to ask when dealing with the developing world.

The developing world needs professional people, but where should we train them? We have brought them out of their own countries and trained them in the UK, in Germany and in America in their hundreds and thousands. Unfortunately, great numbers have not returned, which has been rather sad. With the advent of long-distance learning packages, satellites and computers, we can train people much better in-country than out-of-country. I hope that we can start to do that in an even bigger way.

I pay respect to the British Council, which does an excellent job in encouraging exchanges of academic staff between countries in the developed and undeveloped worlds. That is still important. I have benefited from exchanges myself, and after I went to Tanzania and India, I kept up the relationship with those people and have analysed the samples that they sent me in the post, run nuclear magnetic resonance spectra for them because they have never had the instrument, and helped them to examine MSc and PhD theses.

It is important that such relationships are continued. The British Council science sector has a global budget of £8 million, with dedicated science programmes in 62 countries, including 12 developing countries. That is not enough, and I hope that the council will consider those countries and increase the number in the programme.

I am pleased that this country, along with others, is involved in capacity building in individual countries despite all the problems, and I believe that it is the way forward. However, it seems that countries are in competition with one another and are not actually working together. I implore DFID to try to organise things like the Commission for Africa, where countries are brought together for the common good. In the past, I have heard many civil servants and professional people say that it is good to go to such countries because that builds up confidence so that they will begin to trade with us. That is a reasonable reason to deal with a developing country, but not the real reason, which is to try to give them the same standards of living as we have had in the past.

Direct budgetary control has been referred to. Despite the high level of corruption, the British Government seem set on giving direct budgetary support to developing Governments. The Centre for Land Use and Water Resources Research has said that the "shift within DFID to direct budgetary support to countries . . . is diminishing the donor agency's ability to provide direct technical guidance to development projects".

When we challenged Mr. Paul Spray, head of the central research department at DFID, who is here today, about the impact of that policy shift on existing SET projects in the developing world, I do not think that we got a clear answer. That worried the Committee. It is extremely important, and I say it in a constructive way, that DFID carries out an analysis of shifting policy in the way that I have explained.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) has mentioned the National Commission for Science and Technology in Malawi. I was impressed by its vision, its plans and the professionalism of its members. Unfortunately, they receive only a fraction of the official budget awarded to them. As a result, they cannot involve themselves even in high-level policy making, and they certainly cannot implement many of the excellent policies that they have developed on paper. The commission did not appear to have any overview of the work being carried out by international donors, and it had no way of ensuring that the donors complied with the regulations laid down for research papers in Malawi.

The UK is committed to achieving the UN expenditure target of 0.7 per cent. of gross national product on international aid, at least by 2013. As a member of my party, I am very proud of that. That is the only way—especially if every country follows suit—that we will be able to develop the undeveloped world.

In conclusion, I am pleased that the Committee launched the inquiry, because it seems to have focused minds in DFID, and it seems to have been influential in the appointment of the chief scientific adviser to that Department. I look forward to DFID's ongoing shift in policy having a beneficial effect on countries such as those that I have mentioned in the under-developed world.

3.16 pm

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): The Select Committee's investigation was a fascinating one to undertake. It started for me with the basic question of whether we were looking to use the appropriate science and technology for development work. Clearly, as the Chairman of the Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), has said, there is not much scope for glamorous, leading-edge, Nobel prize-winning research. There is not much scope for applying high-tech solutions to problems in the developing world, but there is an awful lot of scope for the intelligent use of basic pieces of technology—preferably extremely low-cost but easily deployed and used by local people, and in which it is easy to train them.

When we started the inquiry it immediately became evident that there were two trends in the Department for International Development, including the downgrading of the importance of science and technology. That was evidenced by the fact that DFID had discarded its scientific adviser and was breaking up its scientific directorate. That does not send out a strong message about the importance of science and technology in development work. It left two important questions. First, was DFID left with sufficient scientific capacity to be an intelligent client of the work of other people in science and technology, upon which it might want to draw?

Secondly, there was the question of a policy shift from programme work in countries towards direct budgetary support, which has already been explored. If direct budgetary support is to be successful, the recipient country must have the capacity to take advantage of it properly. It must also have the quality of governance to ensure that the budget is spent on development work and that the money does not disappear through corruption.

The first question, about the scientific capability of DFID, was addressed early in our investigation. We heard evidence from a wide range of expert witnesses who were all worried about the trend towards downgrading science and technology and the takeover by social scientists, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North has referred. That is putting it rather crudely, but as hard scientists we have a certain prejudice against social scientists.

We were gratified when, before we had even finished the inquiry, the Government saw the light and DFID appointed a new chief scientific officer. It is gratifying to see him present. He is an old acquaintance of mine, formerly the vice-chancellor of one of my local universities and a scientist of international—

Mr. James Cran (in the Chair): Order. I simply wanted to say, lest somebody follows suit, that under our rules it is not permissible to refer to strangers.

Dr. Turner: I beg your pardon, Mr. Cran. I fear that we perhaps become a little too relaxed and informal in the setting of these debates. I apologise.

Dr. Gibson: I spy strangers.

Dr. Turner: Indeed.

The Government's having appointed a person of international repute to the post, it is clear that whether it is entirely down to the Committee's good advice or for whatever reason, they have seen the error of past ways and set out on the right path. That sends the positive message to all involved in development work that science and technology will get their proper place in development work.

The second question, about whether the recipient countries have the necessary capacity or governance, was vividly illustrated by our visit to Malawi. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) has already referred to our visit to the central hospital in Lilongwe, and that really was an eye-opener. I have seen some pretty rough hospitals, but nothing quite like that. Anyone who wants to complain about conditions in a national health service hospital, and sometimes they are not perfect, should see that hospital. They would probably never want to complain again. It was something out of a picture of hell.

[Dr. Turner]

The capacity was simply not there: there was one nurse for 80 beds—beds full of people dying of AIDS-related diseases. The hospital facilities were not only basic but in many cases practically non-existent. The pathology labs had hardly any equipment, and there was a paucity of trained technicians. They were capable of only the most basic diagnostic tests and then, because of corruption, only if the reagents or equipment were working. The hospital's drugs order and laboratory reagents, and everything else it wanted, had to come from the central supply depot, and 50 per cent. of it disappeared en route.

In the world's 13th poorest country, the capacity and governance were simply not there. Direct budgetary aid in a country where the infrastructure is so poor is clearly not a workable proposition.

Mr. James Cran (in the Chair): Order. Would you resume your seat once again, Dr. Turner? I am sorry to interrupt you a second time, but you are turning away from your microphone, and I regret to say that your words of wisdom are not being picked up, so you have to look at the microphone.

Dr. Turner: I beg your pardon, Mr. Cran. Microphones have never attracted me much.

Mr. James Cran (in the Chair): Nor me.

Dr. Turner: There were massive capacity problems. The capacity problems for nurses alone were extraordinary. The country trains 480 nurses a year, but regrettably they do not stay in Malawi. Sadly, some 400 nurses a year leave the country, and most end up working in the UK. That is not deliberate NHS recruitment policy; the nurses often go to private institutions, but subsequently find their way into the NHS. That is a major problem; it extends to everybody. Whether they are technicians, scientists or whoever, the country needs them all.

We were impressed with DFID's programme work in Malawi, and we saw a good example with its work on AIDS. That also relates to capacity building, because the supply of antiretroviral drugs to Malawi had just arrived when we were there. ARV drugs on their own are no use; trained personnel are needed to use them properly and ensure that patients follow the correct regime. There was a total lack of health personnel in Malawi who were able to do that. DFID was setting up centres, and when we were there the first three had been set up. It was DFID work using DFID workers. The three centres could deal with only a few thousand patients, so the first thing DFID did was set up a chain of centres and train the workers throughout the country, because literally millions of people in the Malawian population are HIV-positive.

The programme will take time, but that work was absolutely essential. Nothing could have been done with those ARV drugs to any useful effect without it. It was quite clear from that case that in countries at a low level of development, it is unwise to focus on direct budgetary input. Instead there should be sensible collaboration, with programme work reflecting the priorities of Governments in the recipient countries. Simply pouring in cash is no answer to the problem.

Likewise, the capacity difficulties of the higher education system in Malawi made an undoubted impression. There is not an awful lot of higher education there, but we visited one institution in Blantyre. It was very much dependent on its British Council-provided HE link with the university of Strathclyde. Without that, it would not have been able to pursue the again not high-flying but basic and practical research that it was carrying out with the university's help. That included absolutely essential work—in the African context—on ways of dealing with protozoan parasites in the water supply.

There was concern that that British Council programme might be coming to an end, and I do not think the Committee addressed that in its report. Rather than ending such programmes, the British Council, with Government funding, should be enhancing them, because they are valuable and the work that they do relates directly to DFID's input in those countries.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North referred to the joy of meeting the real Harry Potter. It was very sad that he was about to retire, because I imagine that he was one of the best people that DFID has ever had on its books. I hope that DFID has managed to find an agronomist of equal calibre to lead that part of its programme in Malawi.

Another thing that worries me slightly is the part of DFID's budget—it is, unfortunately, a large part—that is not spent directly by the Department but is our contribution to the European Union's international development aid. In the past, I have seen the grossest possible misuse of EU international development aid, in Peru. A few years ago, shortly before President Fujimori was expelled, EU food aid was being unpackaged, bagged up again, labelled as a gift from the president and distributed only to those poor people in the barrios who were guaranteed to vote for him. Some of that money was obviously British. I therefore advocate strongly that DFID take a close look, to ensure that such abuse has been stopped. That example was appalling and did nobody any good whatever.

With your permission, Mr. Cran, I shall digress slightly from our report. My hon. Friend the Minister and I share an obsession with renewable energy, which is an aspect of science and technology that will become increasingly relevant to international development. We have already heard references to the practice of using wood for cooking. I am quite sure that the steady quarter of a mile a year advance of the Sahara desert south towards the rest of Africa is not helped by the clearing of brushwood for use in cooking fires.

One of the most important things that can be done for the developing world is to give it renewable, cheap and robust energy that does not detract from our efforts to ameliorate climate change. We cannot just say to the developing world, "Sorry, you cannot have carbon-based energy", when we have spent centuries polluting the world with carbon emissions and enjoying our standard of living. We have an obligation to provide the developing world with renewable energy that it can actually use.

Fortunately, I am happy to say, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has already initiated a programme called REEEP—the renewable energy and energy efficiency partnership—to disseminate a renewable energy kit that can be used in villages. Photovoltaic energy is used—the obvious starting point—but there are other possibilities, such as small, cheap wind turbines, or indeed anything that is renewable, cheap and robust.

There is another possibility that I find attractive. I am obsessed with tidal stream energy in particular, and should perhaps declare an interest: I am associated with a company that is involved in its development. Nonetheless, the technology can in principle be applied to an awful lot of the developing world, not only on coasts, but on rivers.

One of the most devastating things that happens from time to time is the building of enormous dams in order to produce electricity, which create a great deal of environmental damage behind them and can deprive countries below them of water supplies. Alternative technologies are being developed that can produce hydroelectric power without massive dams, or the huge capital cost or environmental damage. As such technology matures and becomes available in smaller and cheaper forms, I hope that agencies such as DFID will adopt it and help its dissemination in the developing world, where appropriate. Doing so would make an enormous contribution not only to the developing world, but to the rest of the world, because it would help with our campaign to ameliorate climate change.

Perhaps hon. Members read a recent account in The Observer of a project on the Congo, involving massive dams, to supply electricity to most of Africa. That is not the only way—technology can deliver something much better.

The main message, which, I am happy to say, DFID is receiving loud and clear, is that science and technology can play a vital role in the developing world. If they are used successfully, that will be to the good of everybody, and not only the developing world, but the rest of us, too.

3.36 pm

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): I shall try to ensure that the microphone is near enough. Also, I know that the Minister has to leave briefly, so I shall mention one thing to him before he goes.

I am proud of the report. Quite often in Parliament, we get things done only because we secure the support of lots and lots of people. So, if 500 people are involved, one of us has only a five-hundredth of the action. In quite a few meetings of the Committee, I wanted us to take the issues covered in the report on board, but I was in a minority of one. Slowly, that became a minority of two, three and four, so I regard myself as perhaps the originator of the report and I feel very proud of that.

Dr. Iddon: Well done!

Mr. McWalter: I thank my hon. Friend. The Minister also played a role in that. I was once sitting with him on the Back Benches—he might not recall those far-off days now—when he asked the then Secretary of State for International Development, my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short), a question about renewable energy, for which my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner) has indicated his enthusiasm. The Minister asked a question that I can only describe as scientifically well informed. However, the response was so dusty and negative that I turned to him and said, "Something must be done about that."

My right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State did a hugely good job in many ways, but science was not her forte and as a result a lot of the policies that the Department developed lacked that ingredient in a major way. I would therefore like to thank the Minister for playing his role in developing that consciousness—although he did not know he was doing it—in the Committee.

The report has another origin. In 1999, I had the good fortune to go to Malawi. I am sorry; I have the same disease as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon), as I am getting my African countries muddled up. I went to Mozambique to monitor an election on behalf of the European Union. As well as having some exciting adventures, I saw a harbour at Beira, where seven or eight rotting hulks had completely devastated what used to be one of the most beautiful seaside resorts in Africa. Far from being a seaside resort, the harbour was a rotting and polluted tip.

That deposit raises a number of questions. Who will ever remove those rotting hulks? What capacity does Mozambique have to avail itself of the expertise of marine biologists? Who with the necessary skills in chemistry is around to try to ensure that, in the end, an environment to which tourists may be invited will be safe for them to enjoy? In a sense, the whole African problem was encapsulated in the poverty, misery and lack of jobs and of capacity represented by those rotting hulks.

When I came back, I asked questions, questions and more questions, but I never found anybody who could give me anything remotely like an assurance that someone somewhere would ever do something about the problem. As a result, I formed the strong view that we should press for our inquiry, particularly as the first part of addressing the problem involved high engineering skills.

We have reached the stage where the lack of scientific interest in the Department has definitely changed. On almost every issue, the Government response says, "We agree, we agree, we agree." Indeed, I never have read a Government response that agrees with so many Select Committee recommendations. I thank them for that, as it is a real step forward. Despite that, however, the agreement is often—how can I put it?—rather thin. It is not wholehearted and it does not embrace the problem; it is only a kind of agreement with the words. The Committee still feels that the required change of culture—so that the words come from the heart and have a huge depth of understanding, commitment and work behind them—has not yet happened.

I intervened earlier on my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East, in connection with what the Department has said about the Natural Environment Research Council, or NERC—we are in alphabet soup now, I am afraid. NERC has the capacity to do geological surveys of the sort that would really address the water table issue that my hon. Friend talked about. I do not yet feel that the problem is fully grasped by the author of a report that says, "Well, activity is maintained." Somebody somewhere does not seem to understand the issue, which is the destruction of water resources in parts of the world where people are dying of thirst. Just one accident, piece of stupidity or under-informed piece of drilling can have that effect.

[Mr. McWalter]

We are moving in the right direction, but DFID is still suffering from "departmentitis", if I may put it that way. It has a sense of what it can do within its own resources, which are limited, as all resources are, and thinks, "Well, what do you want to do? Quadruple our budget? Multiply it by 50? We don't do badly with what we're given. We're well on the way to hitting all sorts of targets and we've changed the culture." However, the report has a strong look at one thing: where the Department cannot do something itself, it should get serious about what other Departments are doing. It must be aggressive, and get angry and square-jawed. It must get other people off their backsides and make them take the issues seriously.

As the Chairman of the Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), said, when we talk about the research assessment exercise, for instance, we are told that it is with another Department—the Department for Education and Skills. Research councils are covered by another Department—the Department of Trade and Industry. When we talk about educational needs, the issue, in part, is whether the Department for International Development is going to push those other Departments, with their much bigger budgets, to reconfigure appropriately so that they are empowered to deal with the problems in international development, and ultimately the problem of those rotting hulks in the harbour in Mozambique.

That is the issue, but every time our report moves into that territory, the Government response shrinks back. For instance, a key recommendation is to have a development sciences research board, and not just, say, the Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council. The Committee often considers that research council, which does extraordinarily important and interesting work, but if there is a research council for particle physics and astronomy, is it not strange that there is no research council for dealing with this problem, which is the biggest problem in the world?

What is going on? Somehow or other, we can get people to become deeply involved in particle physics and astronomy, but those who are working in development sciences must wait for the crumbs that drop from the table of the other research councils and hope to catch on to a bit of the action if they are lucky. That really is not good enough. I hope that, given the strong ministerial team at the Department for International Development, the general attitude of not taking seriously the brief to change the way that other Departments act will change.

That culture is not easy to tackle. The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), who temporarily is not in his place, talked about the amount of work done 50 years ago by our engineers, doctors and economists in addressing third world issues, as they were then called. He omitted to say that, often, that work was premised on the idea that there was a match between what we wanted to do and what was wanted, and we then gifted that to the developing country. For instance, we are quite excited by the idea of hydroelectric power, as my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown said. So, where do people get a chance to put up a really big structure and do some really exciting work on a scale that they would never get a chance to tackle anywhere else? Try Africa. Where can people flood valleys and villages without too much furore? Try Africa. In that example, our civil engineers had a really interesting project and somewhere to do it. That was the technology transfer we engaged in.

Such projects, which involved cutting-edge engineering, are no longer available to us on anything like the same scale, but the response of our engineers has not been to try to use their expertise to carry out other projects that might have a greater synergy with the countries and economies they are working with. It has been to withdraw.

The Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council told us, "We don't really do that kind of thing," because its concept is that it wants to do cutting-edge research—that is what it gets its bread and butter for—and there is no cutting-edge research that can sensibly be done in that field in Africa. I think the research council is wrong, but that is by the way.

The synergy still exists in the case of the Medical Research Council, which is still involved in a lot of interesting stuff that can be done only by people who are strongly in touch with the developing world. A lot of that valuable work goes on both in this country and in the developing country.

In the case of economics, people are excited by the capacity to do experiments in countries overseas in a way that they could not do them here. So, there is still continuing and extreme interest and excitement among medical and economic researchers, but that was all premised—the hon. Member for Canterbury, whose remarks I have been discussing, is back in his seat—on having a match between what we did here and what the other countries might be able to use or might like. That relationship is over. Now, in most contexts, although we still say it in some, we do not say, "We've got this. Would you like it?" Indeed, in some circumstances—as with things such as the smallpox vaccine—it was clearly right to say it. However, in general, the model is not impositional, but co-operative.

A co-operative relationship means that we need first to develop more appropriate technologies in this country, informed by—in the case of Africa—the African dimension. In developing those more appropriate technologies in this country, we need more work to be done in the African country as well. That is quite an expensive model. If we just do things here and ship them out, and we develop the expertise in doing so and get a product and a market, that makes a lot of economic sense for the UK. If, instead, we tried to tailor more of what we are doing to the needs of African countries, things might not run quite as well in terms of world markets. However, that is what those countries need, and sometimes it is also what we need.

The expertise, such as it is, that I bring to the Science and Technology Committee is in mathematics and information technology. I am struck by what happened

50 years ago when a mathematician from Cambridge went out to try to teach people in Uganda some mathematics. He did not take out the mathematics and ram it down people's throats. He came back with a conception of how to teach mathematics that, in my view, has enriched the world ever since.

The books by W.W. Sawyer, "Mathematician's Delight" and "Prelude to Mathematics", are still in print all this time later. Anyone who wants to understand something of the delight and beauty of mathematics will see how the challenge of taking those ideas about mathematics and trying to get the Ugandan students to understand them gave a richness to the subject and to that professor's work that they would never have had without it.

Let us be clear on this matter. That is only one example, but I am trying to make a point to those who think that we should just do things here, and then take them abroad and give people these gifts. This is not a relationship between donor and recipient. It is a co-operative, two-way relationship. We have a hell of a lot to learn and a hell of a lot to improve through having such a relationship with other countries.

As part of that, the report tries to take very seriously the plight of countries that lack capacity. One of the things that we seek to do is change the conception of science and engineering that young people in this country have. I gave a talk to a sixth form the other day and I asked 80 students how many of them were interested in going into the sciences or wanted to do a scientific subject at university. Three hands went up. The others all wanted to do other things. The conception of science among those students was—to a boy and girl, to a man and woman—that it was boring and hard and that it would not enhance their lives or the lives of others. The three who put their hands up were black and female, and they all wanted to be nurses.

The reality is that something is happening in education in our country—the Science and Technology Committee has given extensive evidence of this in another report—that means that the kids do not think that they are empowered to help those in desperate poverty if they do sciences at university. Who has broken that link? What kind of education is it that means that people who are educated come out with A-levels, but do not understand that a peasant in Rwanda might find it helpful to have access to someone who understands something of how water can be delivered so that it is clean and fresh, or something about human functions and toiletry so that they can ensure that the capacity of human beings to despoil their own water supply is addressed?

When we were in Malawi, I was part of the agriculture group, but, inevitably, we also dealt with health issues. One involved a polluted water supply. The chromium level in a particular well had been assessed—the technology was available to do that, which was good—as being 16 times the normal level that human beings can tolerate. Obviously, there was an issue about how to try to address that—an issue that only somebody who has graduated in chemistry can address. Kids are being poisoned because, somehow or other, those in the world who could have learned how to address that problem never even thought of doing so.

As a by-product of the visit, on my return I wrote to a company in my constituency that deals with mining technology. It has an office in South Africa. I wanted something else to happen as a result of that knowledge. After all, if water contains 16 times the level of chromium that it should, presumably there are some chromium salts in the vicinity. There could be chromium ore that could be mined. That is potentially very valuable. Let us face it, Malawi has precious little in that respect. However, it is difficult to get anybody to see the potential implications of such a decision.

The people who knew about the issue had it down as a health problem. They had "departmentitis" too. Nor did they see the problem as something that could give them information that might be used to develop the economy of Malawi. That did not occur to them at all. That is the sort of problem that we are used to in this country, but it is not the sort of problem that is always understood in our own Government or in other countries.

I want to conclude by talking about not just the Committee's report, but the evidence it took. I have been very harsh on engineers, not least because the Royal Academy of Engineering could not be bothered to give us any evidence. However, it was kind enough to invite me to address its members at a lecture, which I did at considerable length. I was very grateful for that invitation, and they listened very carefully to some fairly harsh criticisms.

In the body of evidence is a memorandum from the Institution of Civil Engineers, and if Members are interested in reading only one memorandum, they should read that one, because it contains so much that is relevant to our essential problem. I was particularly interested in it because the department of civil engineering in my local university in Hertfordshire has shut. Like other members of the Committee, I regard such contraction of opportunity as a major source of concern. I want DFID to take note of this issue and to do some badgering on our behalf.

Reference is made in the memorandum to how all the various problems come together. For example, it states that "health depends on access to safe water, water depends on engineering; health depends on education, education on communication, communication on technology; food depends on markets, markets on transportation, transportation on access, access on engineering; health centres need buildings, buildings need energy supplies, all need construction and technology."

If someone has "departmentitis", they are going to be a bit fuddled by that list, because it transcends any particular Department at each stage.

We in this country need an understanding of how to manage technological and scientific projects, so that we can use that knowledge and expertise to break down departmental barriers and to break through the "it's not my problem" tendency. We need to understand that, if DFID is to be really effective, it has to kick a lot of other people into action as well, and to take seriously the range of problems that we have articulated in this report.

The report has the capacity to make the world a better place. Members of the Committee can only argue the points that have been put so persuasively to you, Mr. Cran, by my colleagues. However, I hope that out of this debate will come a determination on DFID's part properly to found a development sciences research board, to break through the tendency to ignore what is going on in other Departments and instead to make strident recommendations to them on a regular and scientifically well-informed basis.

[Mr. McWalter]

4.3 pm

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): It is a pleasure to participate in this debate and to follow that "cri de coeur" from the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter). I am wearing two hats, in a sense, in contributing to this debate, because I speak not only as a Liberal Democrat Front Bencher but as a member of the Science and Technology Committee that conducted this inquiry. That double position should not create a problem, because this issue is not that party political. Indeed, all members of the Committee, regardless of party, have shown a willingness to recognise the excellent work that DFID is doing.

I note that, in turn, DFID and the Secretary of State in particular have been willing to recognise the report's importance and the validity of many of its recommendations. Indeed, the Secretary of State has publicly quoted the Committee's report, work and recommendations in respect of certain policies. It is always welcome when Select Committees achieve such recognition. As I know from my experience with other such Committees, although we can draw attention to a particular issue, it is often forgotten. That said, there are disagreements between the Government and the Science and Technology Committee on the specifics, which I hope to explore. Because I went on the trip to Malawi and participated to a significant extent in drawing up the report, I do not want to talk generally about this topic—as Front Benchers often do—but to consider some of the specific recommendations in the Government response.

As has been said, it was a fascinating inquiry and one that was somewhat different from the more home-based inquiries that we have undertaken. It enabled us to think more broadly—indeed, globally—about the importance of science, engineering and technology, and of research in general. That contrasts with many of our other inquiries, which have focused instead on issues relating to UK science. I would like to thank whichever Committee member it was who recommended that we conduct this inquiry, and I think that the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead played a big part in that regard, as he said. Indeed, the Committee had already agreed before I joined it in November 2003 that the inquiry should take place.

I want to echo the thanks of the Chairman of the Committee and of the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) for those who helped us with the report, including the Clerks and the specialist advisers. Because this was a new issue for me—and, I suspect, even for those with more Select Committee and scientific experience than me—their role was crucial. Putting together any visit to Malawi was never going to be straightforward, but that was especially true of one involving some rather free-thinking—if not freewheeling—Members of Parliament.

Malawi was a good example to focus on because it has dreadful problems, and it was right that we looked at both agriculture and health. Progress has been made with governance, but no one is convinced that the Malawi Government have entirely sorted out such problems. Indeed, it is sad to note that Malawi was in the news because its recently elected President—I think that he took office while we were there—was concerned about ghosts haunting his residence. That is unfortunate, because there are many highly competent and intelligent people in the Malawi Administration—indeed, such people are to be found not only in Government positions but in public service—who are keen to do the right thing in terms of governance and policy.

Malawi was also a good example to focus on because there is no doubt that the work that DFID has done there over the years has been good, valuable and welcomed. Indeed, such work is a good example of what DFID can do. Very few people had a harsh word to say about DFID, but that does not mean that we did not have criticisms of its policy. That said, it was very satisfying to see the difference that DFID has made, and has attempted to make, in that country. Some DFID people were extremely helpful with our inquiry, an example being Paul Spray, who came with us to Malawi and gave evidence twice. He seems hard to avoid: I have met him since—in fact, he is a constituent of mine—and perhaps he is even listening to this debate in real time. It is appropriate that we pay tribute to his assiduousness in ensuring that we were offered guidance, even if we did not always take it.

There are many things that strike a visitor to Malawi, but on the drive from the airport to our first destination, we all remarked on the huge number of coffin shops at the roadside. Words cannot describe the impact on Malawi of the HIV/AIDS epidemic and, as a result, of malaria, tuberculosis and other diseases.

One issue that I want to discuss is capacity in the health care setting. Health care professionals in Malawi are migrating to the developed world and to other developing countries, but those in developing countries are also migrating to the developed world, thereby causing a domino effect. However, we need to bear it in mind that health care professionals are also dying in large numbers, so there is a "double whammy" effect, as one of the Members present described it during an evidence session.

I want to discuss evidence-based policy—I am particularly keen on that issue, about which there is more that the Government can do—capacity building and what we should do about UK capacity specifically. It is hard to do justice in a short contribution to the extensiveness of the recommendations or, indeed, to the extensiveness and variation in quality of the Government's responses to them, some of which have been excellent. None the less, I shall seek to do them justice.

Our report clearly recommended the establishment of a development sciences research board. Paragraph 198 of the report states:

> "We propose that a cross-cutting Development Sciences Research Board be established with a mandate to award grants for development sciences R&D to UK-based institutions."

Mr. McWalter: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the excellent facility at Warwick university that carries out research into engineering specifically related to developing countries is having huge difficulty in securing a research assessment exercise rating and the support that it needs to carry out its frontier-breaking and excellent work?

Dr. Harris: Indeed, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will bear with me because I am going to discuss what the Committee said about the RAE's impact, along with the Government's response.

The Government's response to our report states that they wish "to avoid duplication of existing administrative mechanisms, including those of the Research Councils for addressing interdisciplinary issues and for managing cross-Council programmes."

So in effect, they were saying that they were not going to create a development sciences research board with grant-giving powers. However, in an albeit somewhat cheeky attempt to be helpful, they said that they intended "to adopt the Select Committee's suggestion (paragraph 202)"—

in fact, it is not a listed recommendation—

"of establishing a small working group of representatives from the Research Councils, OST and DFID, plus others, to assess what objectives an 'advisory'"—

we should note the Government's use of inverted commas—

"Development Sciences Research Board might fulfil."

In so far as paragraph 202 of our report talked about a small working group, it was preparatory not to an "advisory" development sciences research board, but to a proper version of such a board. If the Government intend to adopt another approach, so be it, but they should not claim that the Select Committee recommended that approach.

I would be interested to learn what progress has been made in respect of an "advisory" development sciences research board. What would such a board do, and how would it avoid the problems of duplication that the Government cited as their reason for not implementing our recommendation? Who is on the working group, what is the time scale for reporting back, and what were the reactions of the Treasury and of the Office of Science and Technology? DFID might well be very keen on this proposal, but it is not clear that those departments share that keenness.

Mr. McWalter: We should also note that duplication is a very strange reason for not going ahead with this proposal, given that the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council says that it does not do such work. So anything involving engineering is, in fact, not being duplicated; rather, it is not being done at all.

Dr. Harris: Indeed, and this issue relates both to the RAE and to investment in UK research capacity. One of the report's recommendations expresses our concern about the erosion of the UK development sciences research base. In it, we ask the Government to be proactive, and not to "sit back and watch this happen, never mind contribute to the process of erosion."

In that, we were referring to the problems created by the issue of untying research contracts in this country. I have some sympathy with the Government's position, and the Government response to our criticism of the impact of the untying approach was robust—from my role on the Front Bench, at least, I recognise that the Government have a point. If we have done it ourselves, it is easier to coerce and cajole other countries to do what is necessary in respect of untying, which gives us a position of moral responsibility.

I am prepared to accept that the Government may have been right to resist sticking their hands up and saying, "We wish that we had not done it", but I hope that the Minister will nevertheless accept the onus on the Government to be proactive. One of our general questions is whether the responses were the research councils' views or whether they were a Government statement of the research councils' views. The research councils recognise the concern, and they have some measures in place, but I am not convinced that they are doing enough to solve that problem, which is one of the reasons why the Committee said that a new research board with grant-giving powers is necessary.

The other issue is the difficulty caused by the research assessment exercise. The report makes it clear that the RAE did not give enough credit to development research, but the Government response stated that the Government do not think that there is a problem with the RAE. Whatever one says about the RAE, there are clearly perceived problems, and it remains a controversial enterprise. I ask the Minister to think again about whether he can argue to the responsible Department that the RAE contains distorting factors—whenever anything is measured or assessed there are distorting factors—that tend to underplay the value of development research in a field that is under pressure because of the question of untying.

Mr. McWalter: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way on three occasions. Both the Government response and many of the contributions from those who work in the field do not accept that there are difficult problems in development matters. The memorandum from the Institution of Civil Engineers, which I quoted earlier, states that "there must be a way of controlling this process to ensure that difficult problems impacting on the most vulnerable sectors are not ignored in favour of those problems easiest to reach merely to achieve targets."

That suggests that there are major intellectual difficulties in that area that should attract research council or research board status. Perhaps the Government and many governmental agencies do not properly understand that point.

Dr. Harris: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, who has put his case well, and I am happy to give way to him or others, while we have time.

In response to the issue of the RAE, the Department for Education and Skills stated:

"The DfES does not however accept that the RAE has done less than could reasonably be expected to give recognition to research in development sciences."

I think—I cannot speak for the rest of the Committee—that that is a rather formulaic response, and evidence must be produced that a justification for that rather relaxed approach to the problem has been sought.

[Dr. Harris]

I want to move on to the key question, which I raised earlier, whether Government policy in that field, and indeed in other fields, is properly evidence based. The Government have said that they want to see an evidence-based response. The Committee's first recommendation stated that "a scientific, or evidence-based, approach to policy making is an integral component of good governance."

The first two words of the Government response were, "We agree." I wonder what they are doing to assure themselves that their policies are evidence based. I do not know how they can be certain that that is the case, when they do not have external, peer-reviewed research into the evidence of the effectiveness of their policies, either before or after those policies' implementation.

The Government response gave me the impression that a lot of the consideration of whether those measures work and whether evidence exists in the first place is done in-house. If consideration is conducted by people of competence who are acting in good faith and who believe in what they are doing, part of the problem is that that system includes an in-built bias.

I hope that the Minister accepts that it is at least worth considering whether, for example, the Economic and Social Research Council should examine the extent to which Government policy making is evidence based. The Committee made that recommendation in our recent report on the ESRC, and I was disappointed that the Government response, which was published recently, said, "No". Although the ESRC said, "Yes, we want to do that", the Government—perhaps on their own behalf or perhaps on behalf of the ESRC—said, "No, it is not necessary", because the chief scientific adviser is assessing the evidence-based policy in the field of science and technology. For a start, there are other policy areas that do not have a chief scientific adviser.

A good research programme that can be peer reviewed and that can be published is the way forward, because we have a moral obligation to ensure that taxpayers' funds, of which, I am pleased to say, the Government are spending increasing amounts, are well spent and that we do not go down blind alleys. We do not want to make the same mistake that the US Government are making on policies with regard to condoms. In Malawi, it was sad to see that funding could not be spent in the most efficient way, because of political policies based on very little evidence.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): On the hon. Gentleman's specific point about peer review by the ESRC, one additional difficulty is that we are about to start a new joint programme of research with the ESRC, so a conflict of interest might arise. I will, however, reflect on his wider point, which is outside this particular debate, and write to him in due course, once we have had a chance to think about the matter.

Dr. Harris: I am grateful to the Minister. Conflicts of interest must clearly be avoided when anyone reviews the effectiveness, and especially the cost-effectiveness, of work. His point is valid, but it also applies to the evaluation of DFID policy. I am looking for the ESRC to allocate funds to independent researchers and to evaluate other research, policy or actions.

On the question of where policy is flawed, we visited an HIV testing and treatment centre in Malawi, which has multiple sources of funding—it is partly funded by the American National Institutes of Health and it receives Catholic funding. It does several things, such as testing, post-test counselling and providing people, whether they are HIV negative or HIV positive, with advice on sexual health. It was interesting to note that because the NIH says that its funding cannot be used to distribute condoms—it is rigorous in ensuring that its money is not spent in that way—the clinic must use funding from a Catholic charity in order to distribute condoms. That is not because the Catholic hierarchy agrees with that policy, but because the workers from the charity take a practical approach on the ground and because the charity's hierarchy is perhaps less precise about seeing exactly how the money is spent.

If the Government have any influence with the US Administration—I hope that they do, because one might hope that more influence is a side effect of other controversial policy areas—pressure should be brought to bear on the US Administration, who should have a rational, scientific and humane policy, rather than one based on, I believe, religious fundamentalism, which is so damaging and which goes against a balanced approach.

The brain drain is clearly an important issue on which other members of the Committee have already commented, and I have been concerned about it for some time. The Government must address a number of points. First, we need good data and, more importantly, information on the extent of the brain drain and on the various push-pull factors. In the evidence sessions with both DFID and the Secretary of State, I raised those questions, and the Secretary of State indicated that some work is occurring on a global level. I feel that some of the work reported in the Government response to our recommendation 59 is not only global—and therefore not UK-specific—but not health care sector specific.

It is hard to view the Government response to our recommendation as having much credence when it only discusses highly skilled migration from developing countries. It argues that some of the studies show, and I have no doubt that they do, that there may well be a net benefit in terms of the flow back—the Government call it "a positive feedback effect"—of remittances to such countries. Financially, that may be correct. However, even if nurses from Lilongwe hospital in Malawi sent back thousands of pounds from hugely well paid NHS nursing jobs—I question whether that is the case—what can that money be spent on, if that country contains no health care professionals? Although the Government's point might apply to workers such as IT technicians from India, I simply cannot believe that there is a financial price worth paying in net remittances back to such countries for the depletion of precious health care workers who have themselves survived those illnesses. It is a dreadful situation, which has been well described by other hon. Members and which I will not repeat.

I have argued—to a certain extent, the Committee's report suggests this—that one way round that problem is to encourage NHS workers to go to those countries on NHS salaries to replace that manpower loss, on a numbers-for-numbers basis. The Nursing and Midwifery Council keeps records of the countries of origin of nurses working in the health service, so we know exactly how many Malawian nurses are registered to nurse in this country. That figure is countable, and we can offer NHS workers—there are hundreds and thousands of NHS workers, and I think that a sufficient number of them would be willing to do this—the chance to replace those nurses on secondment and on their NHS salaries. We have a moral obligation not to benefit financially from such migration.

I accept that the Government cannot stop people moving without discriminating against people from certain countries. Except where bilateral agreements exist, they say that the NHS should not recruit from such countries, but bilateral agreements appear to exist with other Governments to supply us with nurses, and then those countries take nurses from Zimbabwe and Malawi. We must look beyond whether foreign countries agree in their own terms that that is a good thing, and be a bit cleverer. As I said in an earlier intervention, I also question whether the strategy of doubling nurses' salaries will be sufficient and whether it will work at all. We need to find out exactly what will work, and research is needed on that.

This has been an excellent debate. We have heard four fascinating and different contributions from Members who have seen the situation on the ground and taken evidence from a large number of people. We owe a special tribute to the Chairman of our Select Committee, not only for introducing this debate in the manner in which he did, but for the way in which he has steered a busy Committee to do an awful lot of work at a point in the electoral cycle when people are busy. I offer him my personal thanks for the way in which he has chaired this inquiry and others. I look forward to the Minister's response to the points that I have made, which I hope that he accepts have been constructive.

4.30 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I, too, think that we have had an excellent debate, and I also want to congratulate the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) and the whole Committee on a fascinating report.

As I listened to members of the Committee who have spoken mention, implicitly, their high-powered qualifications, I felt a ghastly confession coming: I won a scholarship to read natural sciences at Oxford, but I bottled out and read maths and philosophy instead. I am ashamed to say that the only thing that those two syllabuses had in common were that they contained almost nothing that had practical application, although I very much enjoyed the excellent teaching. I am not sure how much I benefited from it.

The remarks of the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) have emboldened me to make a few wider points about the scientific base in the country before dealing with the heart of the report. I am appalled at what is happening to our science and engineering base. I come from a family of engineers—my father and grandfather were both engineers.

One of the most valuable research organisations in the world, which is extremely relevant to international development, is just next door to my constituency, and is one of the seven main research centres of Pfizer, the world's biggest pharmaceutical company, all but two of which are in America, the others being in Japan and east Kent. During the past three years, successive Departments, other than the Department for International Development, have taken actions that, in conjunction, have left Pfizer with the impression that it is not wanted.

First, the Department of Health has run down our local acute hospital, and an extremely expensive and valuable facility funded entirely by Pfizer, and of considerable value to the local community, has been abandoned as a result. Secondly, the university of Kent, after a brave rearguard action, lost its chemistry department, not through any wish of the university or its hard-working chemistry dons. It was the only chemistry department within 50 miles of the Pfizer facility. It was lost partly because of decisions on research grants, partly because of declining numbers, and above all because no one in central Government was willing to say that the facility must be kept. Thirdly, and incredibly, just a few months ago, the Department for Education and Skills decided that the local grammar school in Sandwich, only a mile or two from the research facility—

Mr. James Cran (in the Chair): Order. I am beginning to think that the hon. Gentleman is wandering wider than the reports under discussion. It is a long time since I have heard the words "international development" or "science and technology" linked together.

Mr. Brazier: Indeed, Mr. Cran, you are quite right to reprove me. Pharmaceuticals are of course behind a large part of the science relevant to international development, which is why many of us were amazed to discover that that local school had been designated as a language school.

As you rightly restrain me, Mr. Cran, let me come to the report. At no point does it question the motives of the Department for International Development, and I am certain that no one here today wishes to do so. It ponders at considerable length and in great detail, however, the wisdom of several of that Department's decisions. Again and again, we read in the report of actions that tend towards undermining the scientific community in this country and that do not help the development of science and engineering in the countries that we seek to help.

We would all agree on the fundamental, implicit premise of the report that science is an essential tool in the battle against global poverty. All Members who have contributed to the debate have given concrete examples. We would also agree that much of the United Kingdom's reputation in the international development field is due to its pre-eminence in the scientific community. It has co-ordinated many projects that have revolutionised the lives of some of the poorest people on the planet, such as the Medicines for Malaria Venture. Malaria was prevalent in the part of Africa in which my grandfather served, which was then northern Rhodesia and is now Zambia. Currently, the project is trying to produce one new anti-malarial drug every five years. A different example is the creation by the International Maize and Wheat Improvement Centre of a range of new maize varieties, which are grown on more than

[Mr. Brazier]

2 million acres worldwide. Those new seeds are much healthier and have a nutritive value almost equivalent to cow's milk. Such projects are making a huge difference to the lives of many people in developing countries, and are essential to any effort to lift them out of poverty.

Given comments about pharmaceutical companies in the third world pursuing profits for their own ends, sometimes at the expense of the economy, it is also appropriate, at this point, to say that a great deal of scientific research is done by pharmaceutical companies for the benefit of people in the third world, sometimes with no prospect of a return. River fever has also been mentioned, and Merck, one of the world's largest pharmaceutical companies, and the world's largest charitable donor—if products in kind are included, it exceeds Bill Gates in that respect—developed the cure for river fever and has saved hundreds of thousands of people from the sheer grinding misery and agony of river fever. It did so knowing that it was unlikely to get paid for it, and its drugs are distributed free in many countries.

I gave examples a moment ago of DFID using its science wisely, and it is acknowledged as doing so in the report. In fact, at a number of points, the report praises the work of DFID, praise in which I am only too happy to join. As one goes through the report, one is left with twin conclusions, which are really two sides of the same coin. The first is that DFID gives far too little thought to the sciences. The second is that when it has given thought to them, it simply does not have enough scientifically minded people in key positions to be able to think about the issue properly.

Remarkably few staff in DFID, as all Members who have contributed have remarked, have a background in sciences or research. The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris), who speaks for the Liberal Democrats, made the point that we should all sign up strongly to the view that the best approach in international development, as in other areas, is an evidence-based one. Sadly, my brushes with the social sciences in this country have often suggested to me that they do not necessarily always work on an evidence-based approach. I do not want to test your patience by giving a lot of examples, Mr. Cran, but I shall give just one from the all-party adoption group, on which I do a lot of work: it is astonishing how little the treatment of desperately needy children is based on a proper analysis of trials, including trials done in other countries that have used particular approaches.

Dr. Harris: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, for whom I have a great deal of admiration and who is very nice. On the question of an evidence-based approach and the developing world, however, will he at least acknowledge that if there is no evidence base to suggest that his party's recently announced policy on screening migrants for tuberculosis will make any difference whatever in a cost-effective way to the issue of TB in this country, which is microscopic compared with that in the developing world, as is the case with HIV, that raises questions about his party's policy in a contentious area? I have not heard any evidence supporting the policy, and all the scientifically based evidence that I have seen suggests that it would be pointless in practical terms.

Mr. Brazier: I am happy to correspond with the hon. Gentleman if he wants to set out his evidence. That policy was first proposed by a colleague who is a medical doctor, and it is the practice in many other countries. Perhaps all those countries have departed from the evidence base, but I would be interested to see what evidence the hon. Gentleman can produce.

The report states:

"We believe that the current levels of scientific and technical expertise are insufficient to ensure that DFID can behave as an intelligent customer for science, technology and research. There is a pressing need for DFID to increase the number of in-house staff with a research background, particularly in the natural sciences."

The report points to institutional disregard for the sciences.

Of course, we all welcome the appointment of a chief scientific adviser, and Professor Conway seems an excellent choice. It is sad, however, that the Department has taken so long when it has been pressed for several years to appoint someone to the post, and that the Department's research strategy, it seems, was drawn up before Professor Conway was appointed. Another piece of evidence is that all the chief advisers on individual scientific topics in the Department have been downgraded to the rank of head of group. The report also points to the fact that DFID made "only a cursory contribution" to the 10-year scientific investment framework. All that has not gone unnoticed in the scientific community in this country. I hope that my earlier examples, which you kindly allowed me to put on the record, Mr. Cran, illustrated what an unhappy community it is in many respects, not least in my part of the world.

The Department depends on the science community's good will. It expects to be able to use British research organisations, often for free, and to be able to benefit from their activities. Time and again, however, it has taken actions that, at best, could alienate the community and, at worse, actively handicap it. Too often owing, one fears, to a lack of interest in scientific matters, the Department has failed to evaluate fully the research that it has sponsored, meaning that it is neither properly valued nor properly utilised. The Royal Society of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene gave one example:

"Satellite-based monitoring of rainfall is the only feasible way of obtaining an overview of the large-scale rainfall pattern in Africa. Governments and NGOs could use such information to feed crop and famine warning systems and crop yield models. However little emphasis is placed on this research, as it is not of direct use to individual farmers".

Again, because country-based DFID staff have so little scientific expertise, the excellent material developed at DFID's expense, or even given to DFID for free in some cases, simply does not receive proper appreciation in the field. That is a genuine grievance of the scientific community, and it is reflected many times in this report. Ultimately, the Committee concluded that good intentions and increased resources would not improve the situation on their own, and that a "culture change" was needed. The Department's policy shift from supporting major programmes and projects to direct funding of a nation's budget is a case in point.

While that is based on the best of motives—I understand the thinking behind it—the consequence has all too often been seriously negative for science and technology projects in the recipient countries. The report quotes Professor Julian Evans:

"It requires a sophisticated Government to appreciate what research can do for development, or a sophisticated donor to promote that idea".

He also remarked that

"DFID used to have that capability", which implies heavily that the Department no longer does. I would therefore differ slightly in emphasis from the last two Members who spoke. Of course we must listen to the recipient countries and see how they want to use such research. However, there is a role for the developed world. When, to use the earlier example, we are dealing with the countries that are struggling most, we must say that although particular information may not be useful to their farmers, if they can structure their Ministries so that such information can be used and understood, the advance warning of problems ahead would be hugely useful to those countries as a whole. There is scope to offer some leadership, but we are simply whistling in the wind if we believe that we can do that unless DFID has enough scientifically trained people in post.

The Government's policy on conditionality—that they will not dictate the budgetary policies of another country, nor make aid conditional on such policies—has all too often meant that they cannot insist that aid previously directed towards such projects will still go there. As the report puts it:

"If DFID is not minded to 'push' science and technology by illustrating the medium and longer-term benefits they can yield, it is highly likely that the understandably short-term perspectives of developing countries will result in science and technology being overlooked."

I do not see anything patronising in that. The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) made a very good point earlier about India looking ahead and benefiting enormously from doing so. It is sometimes difficult for people, with the best will in the world and the widest of understanding, to look past people who are actually dying and see what the impact will be on the next generation. A balance must be struck, and the report is right to say that we have a role in that regard. However, we need scientific staff to be able to help countries to do that.

Even when developing countries decide to spend money on their scientific communities, the report is concerned that DFID is unable to give adequate advice. Professor Evans is quoted in the report:

"With a very few exceptions, the DFID in-country offices are not staffed or charged with giving special attention to weak national research capabilities. Nor do they seem to have a role in suggesting redirection of rather academic national research programmes towards solution of the urgent problems faced by the poor."

There are, as every speaker has said, too few people on the DFID payroll with a concrete understanding of science, so how can the Government expect people on the ground to take scientific matters seriously when they employ so few people with backgrounds in the hard sciences? Is it really appropriate for an English graduate, for example, to be in charge of assessing a new malarial treatment? Of course not.

One of the worst recent decisions, in my view, was to untie DFID grants to the scientific community. That was made with the purest of motives at heart: obviously, it allows the best people in the world to work on a particular problem and gives the prospect of improving scientific capacity in developing countries. Furthermore, it can lower the cost of goods in principle, saving money for the Department. However, unfortunately, there is a parallel here with other areas of Government purchasing: other countries do not appear to have followed suit. That means that the research departments of UK universities are at a distinct disadvantage compared with their counterparts abroad, who can sometimes now call on UK funds and money from home.

DFID's decision has come under attack, not least from Sir David King, the Government's chief scientific adviser. The report quotes him, and I agree with the Committee's conclusion:

"The current situation poses a threat to the sustainability of the UK development science research base and has therefore resulted in feelings of distress and disappointment towards DFID in the research community."

I must return—the relevance is so obvious—to our eroding scientific base. Had there been more money available for research grants, some of the chemistry and other physical sciences departments that we have lost would have survived. Can anyone seriously imagine that the French Government would allow research money to go abroad for an international development research programme? We must think the matter through in the round. Those departments will be needed to provide young scientists, not only for all the other areas in which the British economy needs them, but for good scientific recruits to DFID. What better pre-career path for a DFID member of staff than to come through a university whose department is engaged in research for DFID?

The Department has sadly had too little interest in the scientific community in recent years, and it has come under considerable fire in an extremely well-written and perceptive report. To their credit, Ministers have responded rapidly. We now have a chief scientific adviser in post, and more money is being switched towards the research department. However, the Department must go further. The Government should make the appointment of the chief scientific adviser just the beginning of restructuring far more of the Department towards considering the role that science can play in international development.

The report is an excellent piece of work, and I pay tribute to the Chairman and members of the Committee, including my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), who could join us today but who, I know, played a major role in it. It is an example of a parliamentary Committee in the House of Commons at its very best, producing a hard-hitting impartial report, and I am glad that the Government have made a start in responding to it.

4.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): I, too, am grateful to the Select Committee for its inquiry and for the report that it produced. As my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), who chairs the Committee, said, the subsequent discussions between his Committee and the Government are a model of the value of interaction between Select Committees and Departments. I am conscious that I am the only non-hard scientist present, and as such, after the excellent contributions from my hon. Friends the Members for Norwich, North, for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon), for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) and for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner), and the similarly effective and probing contributions from the hon. Members for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) and for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), I am conscious that I have had, in a sense, a tutorial in science, and I am better for the experience.

[Mr. Gareth Thomas]

I wish to begin with what may seem a controversial comment, by attempting to rebut the notion that before the Committee's inquiry, DFID simply did not do science and had no scientists in its ranks. I am grateful for the Committee's comments about the staff that it met, including Mr. Paul Spray, who heads our research department. Among the many excellent and talented people in DFID are agricultural scientists, fisheries experts, veterinary scientists, entomologists and engineers, some of whom are in senior positions. No one can pull together an HIV/AIDS strategy without recognising the importance of scientists in stepping up the effort to find an HIV/AIDS vaccine or an effective microbicide, or to consider the effectiveness of antiretroviral treatments available.

I recognise that there was a perception that we did not do science well enough and that we needed to step up our work and our engagement on science. In that sense, the galvanising impact of the focus that a Select Committee inquiry gave to the issue was enormously helpful. The Committee's report pointed to various shortcomings, and I am pleased to say that things are moving on. We have had a good debate, and a number of hon. Members have made further comments, on which I and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State shall reflect. I know that the Committee will have a specific discussion next week with our new chief scientific adviser, which, I am sure, will help further to inform our work.

We believe in the importance of science, and I know that the Committee welcomed the four main elements of our research strategy: sustainable agriculture, especially in Africa; the killer diseases of tuberculosis, malaria and HIV; climate change; and what to do where states do not work in the interests of the poor. Hon. Members have referred to my right hon. Friend's announcement last week of what we shall spend to implement the strategy. We have announced an extra £50 million a year, which is a 58 per cent. increase, up from £86 million last year to £136 million in 2007. That is further proof of our belief in the importance of science.

One of the strongest messages that the Committee delivered was the need for a chief scientific adviser, and I welcome the appointment of Professor Gordon Conway, a fellow of the Royal Society who, as other hon. Members have rightly recognised, has unrivalled expertise in applying science to development. He joined us in January and has already made an impact in helping us to consider the impact of the tsunami, where the Department has been feeding into the panel of experts that Sir David King was asked by the Prime Minister to bring together. His first task will be to draw together for Ministers a science and innovation strategy for the Department.

The initial thoughts on the purposes and elements of such a strategy—I qualify that by saying that they are very initial, and there will be a proper consultation process—are that such a strategy needs to incorporate an overview of the science and innovation work that the Department already has under way. We need to identify any key gaps in science and innovation in international development work. We need to ask how we might address such gaps. There is the issue of capacity building for science, engineering, technology and innovation, particularly in Africa, and we need to explore further the concept of centres for excellence, and to look at in-house resources already available in the Department. I am sure that Professor Conway will outline his and the Department's thinking on those areas to the Committee next week.

One other element of the science and innovation strategy will be to consider how to provide better advice to our country officers on how to handle science and technology issues, to which my hon. Friends the Members for Bolton, South-East and for Norwich, North referred. Last week, Professor Conway was in South Africa at the invitation of that country's Minister of Science, discussing science, not just in the context of South Africa but of the whole continent. We recognise the importance of raising with Governments areas in which science and technology can play a major role. Poverty reduction strategies do not have to focus only on the short term, the immediate, or next year.

A good poverty reduction strategy should also take into account the long-run investment needed to help countries to move out of poverty, including science, technology and engineering. As my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North said, that is not simply a question of imposing British ideas. The Commission for Africa got it right when it said:

> "History has shown that development does not work if it is driven from outside. Africans must lead and the rich world must give support."

Our science and innovation strategy will be a tool to give support to African countries' lead.

A number of hon. Members touched on budget support. I make no apology—nor does the Government's response to the report—for using budget support. I draw hon. Members' attention to the fact that the Commission for Africa affirmed its importance where Governments are strong enough. I would, however, point out to Members who are concerned about budget support that country offices discuss growth strategies and how to tackle poverty with other countries—with civil servants in a range of Government Departments, as well as with Ministers in those countries—in order to help them to develop and improve their policy and analysis. That is a key entry point for dealing with issues to do with the role of science and technology. The science and innovation strategy will address how we can take such work forward.

I also accept that capacity building in science and technology is necessary, and we must expand the work we do in that regard. We currently work alongside and support a number of organisations and institutions in Africa and elsewhere which might already be identified as centres of excellence, such as the Kigali Institute of Science, Technology and Management and the biotech business incubator at the International Centre for Research in the Semi-Arid Tropics in Hyderabad in India.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): I apologise to the Minister; I have not been present for most of the debate, as I was serving on a Delegated Legislation Committee.

In addition to budget support and support for recognised centres of excellence, may I make a plea for support for what might be called blue-skies science and blue-skies thinking? Three years ago, the Department for International Development supported a project to improve cultivation of a plant called Artemisia annua, which now produces some of the most promising cures and treatments for malaria. A constituent of mine, Mr. Jeremy Lefroy, pays tribute to DFID for backing that project, which he describes as being at that time:

"Frankly a motley collection of motivated individuals with a concern for attacking malaria".

Jeremy Lefroy is not only a constituent of mine; he is the prospective Conservative parliamentary candidate for Newcastle-under-Lyme. I have no hesitation in paying tribute on a cross-party basis to the work that he has done in conjunction with DFID. I ask the Minister to listen to representations on blue-skies thinking, and to consider setting aside a small portion of future budgets for such projects.

Mr. Thomas: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) for that intervention. We have set aside a very small amount of money that will be available to the chief scientist for what is known as horizon scanning, which is the same thing as blue-skies thinking. That will help to promote work that we will be able to incorporate in our science and innovation strategy.

My hon. Friend referred to malaria. World tuberculosis day is one day next week, and the Department hopes to publish a consultation paper on that day on what further we can do, in addition to what we are already doing, on the two key diseases of TB and malaria. There has been concern that focus on them has been eclipsed by the great focus that there has been on HIV/AIDS, and that insufficient attention has been paid to them. I hope that the consultation paper that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will publish next week will help to alleviate some of those concerns, and will provide a further opportunity for the hard-science community to engage in research on those two key killer diseases.

Dr. Evan Harris: What contribution does the Minister think that forcing poor countries to screen migrant populations for tuberculosis will make with regard to the impact of that disease in such countries? So far as he is aware, is there any evidence base for there being any efficacy whatever in screening migrant populations for TB in our country with the detection tools that we currently have, as well as in terms of the worldwide problem of TB?

Mr. Thomas: There is a case for screening for TB in certain circumstances. Incidence of TB is rising, and we need to step up our work on it, and on malaria, in a variety of ways. I share the hon. Gentleman's aversion to the policy suggested by the Conservative Opposition. However, some screening is done, and that is appropriate in the right circumstances. If the hon. Gentleman has concerns, or wants to make further comments, the consultation paper that we will publish next week will provide an opportunity for him to do so.

I want to move on to how we promote UK capacity in development sciences. A number of Members have focused on that, and the Select Committee report addressed it in detail. It recommended that the substantial increases in the aid budget, which are now carried through in the substantial increase in our research budget, should be complemented by increased funding for development science research in the UK as a whole. In particular, it suggested that a development science research board should be established to oversee the use of those funds and that that should be closely linked to the work of the research councils. That is an important issue, and the Government's response to it shows that some progress has been made.

In an intervention on the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon, I mentioned that the Department has agreed with the Economic and Social Research Council that both of them will contribute to a new three-year £13 million programme for researches that propose ideas that will have a positive impact on world poverty. I recognise that that is only a small step in the direction in which the Select Committee wants us to travel.

The Government's response acknowledged the report's recommendation for additional funds alongside the aid budget. In our response, we announced the establishment of a working group, chaired by Sir David King, to consider that recommendation and to feed its conclusions into the 2006 spending review. That working group is also charged with assessing the form that a development science research board might take; Sir David King has already met with Professor Conway and Sir Keith O'Nions to prepare the ground for further consultation, and we look forward to learning of their further deliberations.

Mr. McWalter: I am listening to what my hon. Friend the Minister is saying with considerable glee, and I hope that those discussions will result in us getting much closer to the Select Committee recommendations than the initial Government report might have suggested.

Mr. Thomas: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. I am sure that he will understand that I cannot comment further at this stage on how those deliberations will pan out, but I have no doubt that he will continue to follow with interest what the outcome in the 2006 spending review might be and other aspects of this issue.

The Commission for Africa presented its report last Friday. It makes four main recommendations on science and technology. We are keen to learn of the African response to those ideas before we decide how to respond. First, the report called for a long-term investment programme to revitalise African universities and to support the development of centres of excellence in science, engineering and technology. To back that up, it proposes that $3 billion should be invested over 10 years to develop those centres of excellence.

[Mr. Thomas]

That was one of the topics for discussion in Professor Conway's meeting in South Africa last week with the New Partnership for Africa's Development. NEPAD is already committed to the agenda of examining how we can develop centres of excellence. It has undertaken five regional workshops to discuss relevant issues—examining what work is currently being done across the continent, what further work is needed, what its priorities should be, and what collaborative work might add value to what is happening at national and regional level. The intention is that the results of those workshops will be brought together in a series of proposals for the NEPAD science and technology ministerial meeting, which will take place in Senegal in June.

The Commission for Africa's second recommendation was on health. It called both for more direct funding of research, and for incentives such as advanced purchase contracts to stimulate research. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has focused on that. The Government are ready to work with G8 partners and others to enter into agreements in this area, not least with regard to malaria vaccines. We plan to increase health spending by our research department by at least £20 million a year, in order to fund new drugs and vaccines, and to research the key questions of culture, behaviour and health systems that explain why some countries have done so much better than others in reducing HIV transmission.

The Commission for Africa report called for increased research on agriculture; the Select Committee's visit to Malawi addressed that. Sustainable agriculture, especially in the context of Africa, is the first of the four priorities for DFID's research programme. We are also contributing to the major international study led by the World Bank—the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, that is—on the role of science and technology in agriculture over the next 25 years.

The Commission for Africa also called for a co-ordinated capacity-building programme on climate change between donor and African research institutions. In the spirit of that recommendation, we have asked a network of developing country research institutes to scope out what further research on climate change might be appropriate. Climate change is one of our G8 priorities.

I wish to respond to some specific questions asked by Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East touched on the specific problems that the people of Malawi face in dealing with the HIV/AIDS epidemic in their country and on the severe shortage of nurses and doctors there.

Mr. Brazier: The Minister mentioned four priority areas. Obviously, agricultural initiatives can be locally led; I saw a successful example of that in Papua New Guinea. However, is the Minister really suggesting that there can be local leadership in areas such as the development of HIV drugs and the analysis of climate change, which involves one of the most difficult modelling processes?

Mr. Thomas: That depends on the nature of the research. If what is being studied is the effect of climate change on a specific African country, that research programme will need to take into account the ideas and contributions of scientists in that country. On the other hand, the science of climate change more generally requires an international piece of work. The Commission for Africa was rightly saying that research institutes in countries that already have considerable expertise on climate change or HIV/AIDS need to continue to work with researchers and scientists in developing countries and to do so much more closely so that they can better understand the impact of the particular issues in those countries. As I have said, the Commission for Africa report was published on Friday, and we want to learn of the response to it of African countries and scientists before we decide what our response will be to those four recommendations.

To return to the matter raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East, he may be aware that there is a £100 million programme of assistance to Malawi, which is focusing specifically on the capacity of its health service and how it responds. We are seeking to increase significantly the number of doctors and nurses by raising their pay and making further investment into the wider health sector.

In the past, high drug prices were the biggest factor in hindering an effective scaling up of the response to HIV/AIDS. I hope that prices can fall still further, but the key issue is capacity on the ground, in terms of nurses and doctors being able to support people in rural areas as well as in urban areas as they start to receive treatment. In that context, the World Health Organisation initiative of getting 3 million people on to antiretroviral drug treatment by 2005 is hugely important and has galvanised a considerable response; the number of people with access to such drugs has increased.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East may be aware that the Department for International Development, and the UK Government more generally, will host a financing conference on AIDS in September. That conference will incorporate the replenishment conference for the global fund. It will also consider the financing needs of a range of other UN and multilateral organisations that work on HIV/AIDS. I am sure that it will address the issue of health sector capacity.

Dr. Iddon: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister would like to pay tribute to the work being done by Banja LA Mtsogolo. We visited its clinic at Ntcheu, which is near to the district hospital that I mentioned in my speech. The work that it is doing is extremely impressive, and it is partially funded by DFID. So, as other hon. Members said, we saw good work on HIV/AIDS throughout Malawi.

Mr. Thomas: I join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to that work. As he said in his broader remarks, we need to build on the lessons of that work and the information that is being pulled together. I hope that our broader work on HIV/AIDS, and the science and innovation strategy that Ministers have asked Professor Conway to draw up, will allow us to do those things.

The last point that needs to be made on HIV/AIDS is that, as a result of the G8 summit that took place on Sea island last year, the UK is tasked to take forward work on stepping up progress towards getting a workable vaccine into operation. Development Ministers in Europe have met the European Commission to consider how we can allocate more funding and how to pull together more effectively our scientists who work on vaccines and microbicides. We need to work more effectively with American scientists who, until now, have made much of the running on a vaccine for HIV/AIDS.

One does not often have the opportunity to take part in a debate in which one can talk about both HIV/AIDS and sustainable energy. They are two passions of mine. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown for raising the issue of sustainable energy. I pay tribute to his continuing work on the issue, not least through the excellent all-party group on renewable and sustainable energy. He and my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East alluded to wood-burning in stoves and how we can find sustainable alternatives to that. I am sure that both my hon. Friends would join me in paying tribute to the work of the Intermediate Technology Development Group, which, as I am sure they will be pleased to hear, is getting consistent funding from DFID to take forward that work and work on sustainable energy more generally.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown will also be delighted to know that the Commission on Sustainable Development will focus on access to energy in its work programme for the next year but one. I hope that that will provide a catalyst for work throughout the international community on increasing access to energy in Africa and other developing countries, but doing so in a sustainable way. My hon. Friend will also be pleased to hear that, at the Bonn conference on renewables last year, the World Bank announced that it was going to increase substantially its funding programme for investment in renewables and other forms of sustainable energy.

The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon asked about the impact of the way in which we have untied our aid programme. We have been in discussion with the Higher Education Funding Council and with the UK research councils to explore areas of mutual interest, not least the importance of global issues to their agendas, including the research assessment exercise, which was the focus of the hon. Gentleman's concerns. We plan to establish an international development research funding forum to discuss UK research funding. HEFC and the research councils will be among the participants.

I hope that I have done justice to the excellent contributions of other hon. Members. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Norwich, North, and to his Committee, for an extremely helpful report. I look forward to having discussions with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and our officials on how we take forward the ideas it contains.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Twenty minutes past Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 22 March 2005

[SIR NICHOLAS WINTERTON in the Chair]

Post Office Closures

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watson.]

9.30 am

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I am delighted to have secured this important debate on the scandal of post office closures, which results, I hope to show, from specific policies set and followed by an uncaring Government. As so many colleagues are here this morning—I thank them for taking the trouble to attend—I will keep my remarks as short as I can.

One of my constituents, Mr. Keeler, wrote to me on the subject, and I can do no better than to read his measured and wise words. He said that our much cherished post offices

"enable people to enjoy and carry on their life", and continued:

"I am aware that government decree has removed many of the services which could be obtained from a Post Office, but little thought has been given to the hardship this will cause. Many elderly people . . . prefer to draw their pension in cash from their local Post Office. Each Friday, I take my 91 year old neighbour to collect her pension . . . If very mature folk have trouble walking, the use of the bus service is a further problem due to the length of time they might stand at a bus stop waiting for a bus."

Mr. Keeler goes on to make many telling and excellent points. He really cares about people and about his community, so we are indebted to him for informing the debate.

Post offices are important for society. They are the very social fabric of Britain, and closing them hurts vulnerable, disabled and elderly people most. Visiting the post office gives people interaction with their local community; they meet their peer groups there. For them, it is not simply a commercial venture or a chore. Post offices have an important social role that they have played well for many decades. It should not be underestimated or undervalued.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Is the hon. Gentleman familiar with independent research by Postwatch, in which 75 per cent. of respondents said that their local post office was extremely important to them, and 91 per cent. that it played an important role in their local community? Will he call on the Minister to review the way in which barriers are put in the way of old and disabled people who want to open and use post office card accounts but who are constantly pushed back to using existing bank accounts? Is that not a problem?

Bob Spink: Of course I agree with that entirely. I shall come to the excellent statistics provided by Postwatch, and I shall speak later about the services that the Government have withheld or withdrawn from the Post Office.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): My hon. Friend mentioned disabled people. In Clitheroe, a wheelchair-bound lady was able to go independently from her home to the post office and to access all the services that it provided. When her post office closed, she became dependent on somebody to take her by car to the post office that she had to use. However, when the car parked and she got out in her wheelchair, she found that the post office was on a hill with a steep gradient. That has detracted from her quality of life, and it is another reason why the network should be protected.

Bob Spink: My hon. Friend makes a telling point. When post offices are considered for closure, we should take into account not only the distances between existing post offices but physical obstacles that might have an impact on elderly or disabled people such as the lady from Clitheroe. We must have special regard to obstacles such as hills, rivers, canals, major roads and bridges between post offices, and we should consider the nature of the community served by the post offices, including factors such as deprivation and concentrations of older or disabled people in the area served by the post office threatened with closure.

David Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the view of Mr. Pat Shawcroft, the sub-postmaster of Kegworth, a prosperous village in north-west Leicestershire, that, even in villages such as his, there are still pockets of deprivation and people who have a real need to use the post office? Their needs should not be overlooked when the Government, correctly, give priority to deprivation in urban areas.

Bob Spink: I agree entirely with that.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): At the outset of what promises to be a lively debate, I would like to put on the record the fact that Postwatch agreed to some sub-post office closures. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that some post offices had to close?

Bob Spink: I do accept that, but the question is whether the figure should have been 3,000 in the past three years. We should have been much more discriminating and taken into account the social cost of closing those post offices.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): It may be helpful to point out that in the west midlands, from where both the Minister and I come, Postwatch opposed 73 closures but only 15 post offices were saved. The opposition of Postwatch to many closures was totally ignored.

Bob Spink: In my constituency, there have been several closures—last year there were six, every one of which was fiercely opposed. Postwatch assisted me in opposing many of those, yet every closure went ahead.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): The point is that Postwatch opposes many closures. Will the Government support Postwatch in its opposition to some closures? Will they ask the Post Office to consider the closure programme in total rather than piecemeal?

[Richard Younger-Ross]

Why has Decoy post office in my constituency, which was given notice to close in September, still had no answer?

Bob Spink: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely telling point. The Minister has heard it and will no doubt address it. The social cost of closing post offices must be taken into account. In fact, I was saying before the interventions that we should not underestimate the social impact of post office closures and nor should we undervalue the social benefits that post offices bring to our community. If that means we need social funding, who cares whether we support our post offices at the expense of a couple of new politically correct Government quangos? We are not talking about a lot of money, and the post offices are much more useful and more valuable to our society than almost all the expensive quangos, put together, that the Government have created. The Government have seriously mixed up their priorities.

Post offices have a commercial dimension that we should not forget. They add to the viability of our shopping areas and community centres. They help newsagents, chemists, florists, grocers, cleaners and cafés to attract customers and to provide the critical mass of small businesses required for a centre where people will congregate. As the main banks drive for ever-more profit by shamefully closing branches in villages and in smaller urban shopping areas and high streets, post offices are increasingly important. It is more essential than ever not to close them, yet the Government have not got the message; they simply are not listening.

UNITE, the National Federation of Royal Mail and BT Pensioners, has an active and socially extremely responsible local branch in south Essex. I met its representative and treasurer, Mr. Colin Melluish, last year and I hope to meet UNITE again soon to discuss the better deal for pensioners that it is promoting. It is doing that because it is a good and caring group. UNITE is seriously concerned that the post office network in the UK is failing to meet the needs of our most vulnerable citizens.

According to a 2004 MORI poll, "Subpostmaster Income: The Impact of Changes to the Benefits Payment System", 44 per cent. of sub-postmasters have seen their income decrease in the past year and 43 per cent. are worried that their businesses will not have a future. The crisis in the rural post office network is such that 90 per cent. of those post offices are no longer commercially viable without Government subsidies, and many face closure. Independent research by Postwatch, another excellent organisation, shows that rural post office closures are having a profound effect on local communities. The research showed, as the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) mentioned, that 75 per cent. of respondents felt their local post office was extremely important to them. More than half—about 60 per cent.—thought that it was essential to their way of life, and 91 per cent. agreed that it played "an important role in their local community".

Those figures increased among the elderly and those with disabilities that affect their mobility, which is hardly surprising.

The much-respected National Federation of Sub-Postmasters has published a hard-hitting manifesto urging the Government to pull up their socks in the run-up to the general election. I expect another U-turn from the Government. If they are listening, they will certainly see the sense in that. The manifesto born out of the frustration of sub-postmasters all over the county lists a series of unfulfilled Government promises and warns that further inaction could mean the end of the post office network. The key demands include:

"Government must provide more funding to pay for the social and economic service provided by post offices. Government must take a leading role in ensuring that all major banks enable their customers to access their bank accounts at post offices."

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is making an important point about rural post offices. According to the Post Office, 85 per cent. of rural branches are loss making, and the Government have extended the subsidy for the time being, but unless they come up with more business for those post offices, the post offices cannot survive. He is hitting on that point: without business, the post offices cannot survive, but the Government have not yet identified that business.

Bob Spink: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. Of course, the subsidy of £150 million is peanuts these days in terms of the social benefit for our communities across the country. The Government have given the subsidy until 2008. It is too little and it must be extended for longer to give certainty and clarity to post offices to encourage them to stay open and provide the service that they obviously do provide, which is needed both economically and in terms of social impact. As well as paying for that social benefit, the Government could help by providing more work; perhaps some benefit work can be given to post offices. So, there are two angles. Post offices need more work and, I am not ashamed to say as a Conservative, they need subsidy. They need certainty.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am sorry to disrupt the hon. Gentleman's speech, but I need some clarification on the point about subsidies. Is he saying that in his view—we will hear later whether the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman supports him—post offices, whether urban or rural, should be subsidised fully by the Government?

Bob Spink: My personal belief is that post offices provide a social benefit for our communities and we should be prepared to pay for that, but we would not have to subsidise post offices if the Government had not changed so many policies and, for instance, removed the pension book and introduced payments by automatic credit transfer directly into banks. That is why post offices need subsidy. I am disappointed by the Minister's intervention; I thought we were going to hear the U-turn that we all expect from the Government.

The third key demand from the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters is that a "comprehensive range of local and national government services should be made accessible throughout the UK's post offices".

It goes on to say:

"Without urgent Government action our much-loved national post office network is in serious danger of extinction."

In short, closing our post offices is tearing the heart out of our communities. It is changing our shopping areas much for the worse. It is destroying many of our important and valuable small businesses. Most importantly, it is hurting vulnerable, disabled and elderly people, and that is unforgivable.

The latest figures show that about 15,000 post offices remain nationally and that closures have accelerated greatly over the past 18 months or so as a result of Government policy. We have seen more than 3,000 closures in recent times, and more are expected. That trend must be stopped. House of Commons Library research shows that 90 per cent. of urban closures in the past five years have taken place since March 2003, with the majority closed as part of the so-called network reinvention programme. So, it is essentially a recent problem that is accelerating out of control. Colleagues will not be surprised to learn that the Library research also shows that, yet again, London and the south-east come off much worse than the rest of the country from the Government-promoted closures. Until Labour took over in 1997, the fall in post offices was about 1 per cent. a year, but that rose to 7.4 per cent. under Labour last year.

Dozens of post offices have closed in Essex. Six have closed in Castle Point in recent times. Each and every closure was fought by me and by many caring constituents, such as Mr. Keeler from Benfleet, and excellent local councillors, such as Bill Dick, Colin Riley, Mark Howard, and Mr. Canvey himself, Ray Howard. We have produced petition after petition in the House of Commons and we have put in a lot of hard work behind the scenes. Working together, we are still fighting the closure programme. Indeed, we are starting to have some success. Councillor Ray Howard and I will preside over the reopening of the post office in Canvey village at Jones's corner, in Long road, which will be a great community asset. We hope to do that over the next week or so.

Councillor Ray Howard recently helped to get motor vehicle licensing facilities at the excellent Winter Garden post office. He speaks highly of the postmistress there, who is a caring lady. Councillor Mark Howard is fighting alongside me to get a new post office opened in the Canvey Island shopping centre on Furtherwick road to replace the post office that closed in the Martin's newsagents in the Knightswick centre. That is essential. The value of good, hard-working local politicians working with the Member of Parliament to save post offices and to get them reopened cannot be overestimated.

Mr. Evans: The Government could be imaginative about where post offices are located. In my village, there was one in the pub, "The Swan with Two Necks". It was a part-time post office, but because it was not valued and given sufficient resources, the landlady, who was tied to the business, decided in the end that she could not go on with it. Lots of premises and businesses are semi-operative but could be made properly financially stable if services currently held by some post offices that cannot make a go of it were allowed to be transferred to them.

Bob Spink: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. We have to be flexible in our considerations, and there is no one-size-fits-all solution. The problem is that with the Government withdrawing so many services a post office can provide, post office viability becomes questionable. Where a post office has no ancillary retail function, it is particularly difficult to retain viability. We must be flexible when we consider solutions.

Returning to Castle Point, there is no doubt that we have suffered badly from Labour's policies locally. We have seen many of our post offices close in recent years, and I congratulate the local press, particularly the Yellow Advertiser and Castle Point Evening Echo, on their campaigns to save them. One Yellow Advertiser front page from the middle of last year is headlined "Post Offices Set to Close." The story says:

> "Sources confirm at least three proposed closures are to be announced later this month in the latest bid to centralise branches. The move comes just months after the axe fell on three other sites in Castle Point last year."

Castle Point is not a big community. It cannot afford to keep haemorrhaging post offices, and all six branches have closed. I am trying to replace at least one of them. The Yellow Advertiser went on to say in its exclusive, by Steve Neale:

> "Post offices have seen trade dwindle since the Government introduced pension and benefits payments through the main banking outlets."

It is typical of the local press to be fighting for the interests of our community, and I congratulate them—there must be an election coming.

We must be clear about why so many post offices are being closed, because only by knowing what is happening and why, will we be able to understand and develop the necessary solutions. We must not blame the Post Office. It is easy to think that the Post Office is an ogre, but it is not. It has to respond to the situation in which it finds itself. We must not blame our excellent and caring postmasters and postmistresses. I commend them for their caring and diligent work over many years. They deserve to choose to retire when they wish to retire if they are offered a decent package, so I do not blame them at all. They would not have had to retire if the Government had left the services with them and their post offices were not unviable. The blame for the closures lies squarely with the Government, and I hope that with an election coming we will see the U-turn that I keep on hoping the Minister will tell us about.

The Government must do something to stop the rot. It mostly affects the grey vote, and retired people are keen to give the Prime Minister a clear and unequivocal message at the polls. The Government must re-examine the £150 million annual subsidy, consider extending it beyond 2008 and, in the meantime, look to replace the necessity for that subsidy by re-providing post offices with work that they can do to make themselves viable again.

Michael Fabricant: With respect to that £150 million of subsidy, does my hon. Friend agree with me and the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters that merely subsidising the income of sub-postmasters is only a short-term solution? As he has said, it takes us only to 2008. Should that money not be used, together with a change of Government policy, to recreate a new working environment for post offices so that they have a long-term future that will not require subsidy?

Bob Spink: My hon. Friend has put his finger on the point. We need certainty and confidence put back into the system, so that post offices know that they will be viable in the longer term and that they can redevelop their businesses as they ought to.

The Government must reconsider their callous withdrawal of the pension book. The new payment method is not better; it is not more convenient for elderly people. Elderly people do not like it, they often do not understand it and they forget their personal identification numbers. It is difficult for them, and it is not acceptable to treat elderly people contemptuously. One key problem created entirely by the Government was caused by their decision to switch payment of pensions and benefits from post offices to automated credit transfer into bank accounts. That drove a stake through the heart of our traditional post office network. It is estimated that it removed at one stroke 40 per cent. of post office income. How can post offices survive that loss?

Mr. Evans: We were all told that it would be okay, because people would be able to get debit cards, go to post offices and withdraw their pensions from machines. Does my hon. Friend agree that that might have been one answer to the problem except for the fact that in too many cases the machines charge senior citizens for withdrawing their money and that the charge, as a proportion of their pensions, is far too expensive?

Bob Spink: Yes of course. Added to the £1.50 withdrawal charge, there is the £1.50 bus fare to get to the post office, and, with the community charge, the pensioner has no money left out of his basic state pension to buy a loaf of bread.

The Government must reconsider support for Crown post offices, and they must offer a short-term financial package to prevent their closure. It would be a terrible blow if a large number of Crown offices were sold off to become hotels or—even worse— flats. The Government must act urgently to prevent that unacceptable loss of service to the public.

A few months ago the all-party Select Committee on Trade and Industry criticised the Government's level of subsidy for Crown post offices and called for short-term finance from public funds to prevent their closure. I fully agree with that conclusion. Its necessity distresses me, however, because the Government have withdrawn the work that post offices used to do.

We must see a viable plan to safeguard the post office network, enabling post offices to offer different financial services, such as full banking. That could include, for instance, direct debit, so that customers could obtain utility bill discounts and, through turnover, post offices could remain viable and open without the need for public funds to subsidise them.

The Government must start listening to local communities and must pay attention to their needs. Local people will send that message very clearly to the Prime Minister at the general election.

9.58 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am very pleased to speak in this debate. It is raised by the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink), and I thank him for that. It is highly propitious, and I wish to speak entirely about one post office and the repercussions of its closure. I would like to say, however, that my hon. Friend the Minister has fought several closures in his constituency as a good constituency MP, so he has some experience of the way in which the process operates. Easy as it is to cast aspersions on the Department of Trade and Industry, it is also far too easy to say that responsibility lies at the door of the Government. Although the Post Office is a public corporation, or whatever its status is now, its way of doing things is set by its own independent management, and in the story I shall tell, I shall not let the Post Office off the hook.

I find it a little bit rum of the Opposition to talk about what they would like to do with the Post Office. If we are playing the game of U-turns, I hope that they might reconsider their policy, as far as I understand it, which is to privatise the Post Office. The Liberal Democrats have a policy of privatising the Royal Mail. I am not always of one mind with the Government, although I am a supporter, but I received a personal assurance from the Prime Minister on Thursday that it is the Government's intention to keep the Post Office public. If we can agree that today, we shall have made significant progress.

David Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Liberal Democrats occasionally give opportunists and bandwagons a bad name? In North-West Leicestershire, there was a scurrilous, scaremongering and dishonest campaign to suggest that two urban post offices in Cropston drive and Meadow lane, Coalville, were to close. Despite confirmation from the Post Office that that would not happen, they are still campaigning on the basis that there is a secret closure list, even though that has been denied. Is that not opportunism gone mad?

Mr. Drew: I will leave that as a statement from my hon. Friend, as I have no evidence one way or the other. He has made his point, and I am sure that he feels as strongly as I do as a constituency MP that the aim is to keep open as many post offices as possible.

My story starts with the list produced some years ago by the Post Office to do with its designation of the branch network. It kindly referred to all its branches as urban or rural. Some of us would say that it could have referred to some as suburban, but the designation was made. When the list was produced, I had no real disagreements with the way in which branches were designated, except in one case, which was that of the Whiteshill post office.

Whiteshill is a village. It looks like a village, it feels like a village, and the people who live there know that it is a village. However, the Post Office designated the post office as urban. They did so because, by pure chance, a sliver of the village abuts the Stroud urban area. On either side, there is countryside, but it happens to be a traditional ribbon development that has begun over time, by a house or two, to be encroached on by the urban area. I am thankful that that is all the encroachment that will remain as we will fight any planning applications, including rogue ones—I will say no more about them—that have tried to infill. We have managed to defend the village.

One advantage of being designated as a rural post office is that rural subsidy applies, as the hon. Member for Castle Point mentioned. In Nympsfield, that led to the recovery of the village post office, which was lost but has reopened because of the subsidy. I hope that the Conservatives and Liberal Democrats will put it on the record that they will continue that subsidy. Although it could be used in other ways, it is a lifeline. The £150 million a year is not chickenfeed; it keeps a lot of our post offices open. Notwithstanding the migration of benefits to different methods of payment, the subsidy must be continued, not just now, and not just for the next year or two, but into the future. We need a rebirth of that way of keeping post offices alive.

When the original designations were made, I was told not to worry because they were merely designations. Then, network reinvention took place and all of a sudden an apparent slip of the pen became a crucial matter of how Post Office management considered a post office. Again, there was no immediate worry. When we looked at the first round of closures, only two were considered, followed by a third. They were Cam Woodfield, Cashes Green and Bath road in Stroud.

I had two criteria by which I judged it right to fight on behalf of those post offices. First, I considered how the community responded. In all cases, there was hurt, upset and questioning about whether closure was right. It depended on whether there were alternatives, which were certainly considered. The second criterion is not openly talked about, but I will talk about it. It was the attitude of the postmaster or postmistress.

The hon. Member for Castle Point, quite fairly, talked about the packages that were made available. I talked to postmasters and postmistresses across the network, and those who have decided to stay in the suburban network—most of Stroud is what I call semi-rural and is not truly urban—deserve the highest praise. They have continued to run those businesses, which we all know are not terribly profitable, and many have said that they are working for less than the minimum wage. They are providing a social service, but they wish to do so. They believe that to be their life's work, and it is right that central Government should support them.

In each case deemed for closure, I checked and talked to the postmasters and, in one case, the postmistress. It was clear that it was difficult to run a viable business. It was wrong to stop them from getting the advantages of the packages. Maybe we could have taken matters forward in other ways, but I was clear and open with communities about the repercussions if we tried to keep a business going that would not only remain unviable but would become more so.

I point the finger at some communities, who want it both ways. They want the post office to remain open, but may not use it often. The Government can be blamed for the way in which they have moved through benefits changes—which are the responsibility not of the DTI but of the Department for Work and Pensions—but I have challenged people to go and get a post office card account. My wife and I have a post office card account for our child benefit, and it is not as difficult to have one as people tend to make out. If communities want to keep their post offices, it is important that they keep money coming through.

Malcolm Bruce: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but I want to reflect a conversation that I had with my local postmistress. She said that of all the people receiving child benefit in our village—there are a lot of children in the village—only three have opened a card account. One is my wife. Other people have found it too much hassle and have not done so. It has not been made easy for people.

Mr. Drew: That is the perception and the problem. When people go through the process, as we have, they find it is not as difficult as they think, although I will not say that it is easy. There is evidence that even to this day the post office card account is seen as a poorer alternative to the other ways in which money can be drawn.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Let me be clear about the post office card account. Information came to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions about the difficulties experienced with those accounts and to my office when I became a Minister. We have ironed out those problems, I hope, and the number of post office card accounts now stands at 4 million.

Mr. Drew: That is good to hear. It shows that people can use that means to draw money. I hope that they do so. I challenge all my constituents: if they want to keep their post offices, the minimum that they can do is look at how they can draw money in such a way. If it is not suitable for them, at least they have looked at the options.

Whiteshill village and its post office were in quite difficult circumstances because of issues of compliance with the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which meant that work would have to be done. However, the key difference was always to do with the postmistress—I have to be circumspect, because we all know that postmistresses and postmasters are not supposed to talk to the general public if they are highlighted for closure and because there is still the potential of legal action. I cannot say much more as it would be improper, but hurt is so deeply felt that the community may choose to take matters further.

The post office wanted to remain open. By pure chance, the post office had been in the family in one form or another for more than 100 years. There was tremendous pressure on the family to keep it open, let alone on the wider community. That was not a problem at first, because it was not in the initial list of closures that were largely brought forward on the back of the Post Office's trawl to see who might want to phase in closure. The Post Office then changed the game slightly, by suddenly nominating Whiteshill post office for closure. That came as a shock to the postmistress, who had made it clear that she did not want to close her post office.

The process got under way, and we had consultation. I would like to say that it was full, frank, open and believable consultation. I have met people from the Post Office on a number of occasions, and I have always said that I do not agree with closure. I have also met people from Postwatch, and I have told them that I do not agree to the closure of this post office. As far as I know, Postwatch has never got back to me on the matter, and I have been very disappointed. When it has, it has sent a series of holding letters.

The Post Office has been told by all concerned that the post office in question is a rural one and should be treated as such. If it were deemed a rural post office, it could remain open, but if it stays as an urban post office—notwithstanding the fact that custom is not very good—it has to stay open for five and a half days a week, which is an increase on its current opening hours. That is not acceptable; the postmistress cannot do that because she does everything herself.

[Mr. Drew]

Lo and behold, under notice of closure we have a situation where the nominated branch, Paganhill is in a one-stop shop, which is about three quarters of a mile away down the hill. The one-stop shop has been taken over by Tesco, which has a policy of removing post office branches from one-stop shops wherever it can, and it has made it clear to us that it wishes to do that. It looked for all sorts of people to take it on; it was not easy. Eventually, the community got involved and, working with Tesco, the local council and the people who run Maypole hall, which is the local community hall, have said that once they can get an individual to consider taking it on—there is another postmaster in the area—they can run a community post office. Everyone, including the Post Office, seems to be happy about that.

During that time, the Post Office came on board, and it has had to suspend the process of closing Whiteshill, because its nominated branch was under threat of closure. We have not yet signed contracts or come to firm agreements on our ability to deliver Paganhill post office, but having suspended the process of consultation, the Post Office has started it again. It did so without anyone knowing it had started again, including the MP, which led to the announcement that closure will take place tomorrow: March 23. There was no further consultation, and that came as a total shock to everyone.

The Post Office nominated a branch that was itself under question. Admittedly, it also mentioned the main branch at Stroud, but that is well over a mile from Whiteshill. I thought that it was not possible in the network reinvention programme to nominate a branch that was further than a mile away. I would like clarification on that; I know it is an issue that concerns the relationship between the DTI and the Post Office, but we need clarification. If Paganhill were to close—I do not want that to happen because we have worked damned hard to make sure it does not—the nominated branch would be well over a mile away.

The process has been made much worse; I shall choose my words carefully. The pressure that was brought to bear on the postmistress and her husband is not fair. Some people would say it is a question of bullying and a matter of saying, "Sign this form because you cannot do anything but sign it. You are going to close." That is not negotiation or consultation: it is the imposition of a decision. In that village, we are fortunate because we still have a voluntary shop. It was always possible that we could negotiate an outcome that would lead to better throughput in the use of the post office, but that has not been offered to us. It has been a question of the Post Office saying that the post office is an urban one, so it will have to close.

I wish to put three points to the Minister. First, the original designation stands or falls by what size of population can be termed urban. A figure of 10,000 is used, and the Post Office has reinforced it with a series of maps. I do not know whether anyone has seen the maps, but they are computer-drawn—I almost said computer-driven; I wonder whether they are that, too—and they are so vague as to mean anything to anyone. I challenge the Post Office to say whether it is prepared to defend those with a definitive explanation of the difference between rural and urban Britain.

Secondly, we cannot have a process of consultation that is turned off and turned on again without people knowing about it. That results in closure where people have no opportunity whatever to say that the circumstances of the closure are wrong because of the designation.

Lastly, there is the point of how to nominate a succeeding branch that is acceptable to people who are losing services. That has to be clarified because it is wrong if the nominated branch may close; that is not an acceptable way of making such decisions. I use Whiteshill as an example of what is wrong.

The process is difficult, and my hon. Friend the Minister has to oversee it and the way in which the Post Office has to be called to account. We know that there is not enough money in the system; the Government have to pump-prime it. They have to do so because the post office is a public service, which, I am pleased to see, is beginning to make some money through the Royal Mail. That is well overdue but greatly to be welcomed.

We must build confidence in the network. I always remember the statistic showing that people still trust the Post Office more than any other public service, but unless we sort out the Whiteshills of this world, that trust will go. It will evaporate, and people will say that the Post Office just reneged on its promises.

I work on verbal understandings. I had assurances from people that the Whiteshill post office would not close until and unless we sorted out Paganhill. It is wrong that we have been told that it will close anyway. It is not I who bears the brunt, although, I have to be honest, it is not an electoral asset to have it closing in advance of a probable general election. I am thinking not about myself, though, but about the way the community has been short-changed and the pressure that has been put on the postmistress, which is unacceptable and must be fought. I hope that the Government will listen carefully and do something about that.

10.17 am

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): This is a very important debate, which goes on in every constituency in the country. We all have to deal with the issue, and I shall not pass up this opportunity to raise some constituency issues as well as discussing wider national ones.

I have been a Member of the House for 22 years and when I started there were Crown offices and branches in my constituency. I lost the Crown offices about 15 years ago and was told at the time that it would make no difference. However, very often when I ask in certain post offices for certain services, I am told that they are reserved for Crown offices and I cannot have them, so it did make a difference.

The post office in Keith, which is currently in my constituency but will not be when the new boundaries take effect, has long asked for passport forms. The postmaster runs another post office where he does have passport forms, and he therefore knows how to deal with them, but he has been denied them on the grounds that Keith was never a Crown office. That has nothing to do with whether it would benefit the community or whether it was a relevant service; he cannot have them because the post office was never in a particular category. That is simply bureaucracy and not a real response to the service, which is partly a criticism of the Post Office and its relationship with the agencies. When one takes the matter up with the Post Office, it says that it is a matter for the Passport Office. The Passport Office says, "No, we just did a deal and they tell us which branches they are distributed through." That issue has never been satisfactorily resolved.

My constituency, within its current boundaries, is substantially rural although the main town, Inverurie, was designated during the very first round of urban reinvention. As I was leaving a meeting with Post Office management, one of them said, "By the way, I have just written to tell you that Inverurie has been designated as urban." My immediate response was to ask which office was being closed. He said, "No, no. We are just designating it as urban." Three weeks later, we were told which office was being closed. There was no consultation and, unlike in the case of the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink), although I was more than willing to fight a campaign, the postmaster said, "I'm sorry. I'm taking the money, and I'm not prepared to stay." The will to fight for it did not really exist in the community, which was somewhat disappointing.

In Aberdeen city, part of which will be in my constituency under the new boundaries, there was a proposal to close 15 offices. At the end of the process, 11 were closed. That was after phase 2 of urban reinvention when, under pressure from Members on both sides of the House, the Post Office agreed to review the process. What it actually did was to put up more offices for closure and close the ones that it was going to close anyway. It did not fundamentally change the process, but it made it look better and made some people feel better.

The postmistress at Bankhead post office, which will be in my constituency under the new boundaries, happens to be the secretary of the local branch of the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters. She told me, "The business has gone from this office in the last 12 months, so I'd like you to fight to keep it open, but frankly all that will happen if you do is that I'll have to close it myself in 12 months' time, and I'll get no compensation." It is not always easy to fight to keep post offices going, because the financial considerations are significant.

The owner of one post office in my constituency, in Pitcaple, decided simply to change the business as he did not wish to continue it. The Post Office is keen to keep a post office going there, but for the past two years it has not found anybody to run it or any premises in which it could operate. Clearly, that post office is not going to reopen.

Here is a tragic case: a good, lively shop with a post office in the village of Auchleven, which I have visited regularly and which is a real model of the kind of village shop that can survive in this day and age as a successful business, was perfectly reasonably sold by the owners because they wanted to retire. They sold it in good faith to somebody who said that they would take the business over, but within three months the new owner closed the business and applied for planning permission to convert it to a dwelling house. I am still fighting to get the Post Office and the local council not to co-operate in that venture, but I am left with the problem that someone must be persuaded to operate both the post office and the shop; they are not attractive businesses any more because their fundamental long-term viability does not inspire confidence or tradability.

Bob Spink: That is the point. Although we must sympathise with postmasters and postmistresses who decide to take the package and retire, as they have every right to do, and with people who wish to change the nature of their businesses, the problem is that there are no new people taking their places because the Government have removed post office functions and destroyed the viability of the post offices. The Government must address that.

Malcolm Bruce: That intervention was timely because I was just about to move from examples in my constituency to the national picture. The hon. Gentleman made my point exactly: it is all very well challenging parties to say that they would continue support for rural post offices, as the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) did—I have no problem with that, but it is not enough unless there is confidence in the long-term future. For the record, my party does not have any plans to privatise the Post Office, which we see as a public service. We are not so sure about the future of Royal Mail, but the Post Office is a social service, as the hon. Member for Stroud said, and will inevitably require support one way or another.

Mr. Sutcliffe: So, is the Liberal Democrat policy to privatise Royal Mail but sell off the other?

Malcolm Bruce: No, our policy is not to privatise either of them. We said that the liberalisation of Royal Mail may require some rethink in the future. Royal Mail is actually subsidising the Post Office, so one way or another, we must make sure that the Post Office is adequately supported as a public service. I hope that that clarifies the position.

We need to move from the current situation to a position in which there is confidence in the future of the network and individual businesses. Over the past few decades, post offices have been closing at an average rate of 305 a year. In the past 10 years, the number of post offices has reduced from 19,251 to 14,976, so there was a dramatic fall in the number of post offices under the Conservatives, which has accelerated under Labour, particularly with the urban renewal programme, and there is no end to that in sight. People are concerned about urban reinvention and the likelihood of some kind of rural reinvention because even though, theoretically, the idea is to end up with a stable, reduced network in which we can have confidence in the future, the reality is that we are reducing the network but the confidence in the future is not there.

The hon. Member for Castle Point rightly said that we need a plan that gives guaranteed revenue and guaranteed business for the valuable work of the post offices, but there are two problems with that. When I was in a post office in Leicestershire, looking at the community point—I shall come back to that—the postmistress told me that it was a busy shop and post office and that people said to her, "Oh, you'll never close; look how busy you are." But she pointed out that although the post office is busy and there is always a queue at the counter, the value of transactions is very small. Lots of people want to use the service, but they spend only £1 or £2. That is the real issue: we have to pay more to those who run post offices, subsidise post offices or find other kinds of business that will effectively cross-subsidise them.

[Malcolm Bruce]

I am tabling questions to all Departments to ask what their information purchases cost—the cost of forms, distribution and printing—to see whether co-ordinating that and using the Post Office, not necessarily exclusively, but principally, might generate substantial revenue for post offices.

Members may not have looked at the sub-postmasters' experiment with community point, which is not yet a definitive answer but is nevertheless an interesting way forward. Regrettably, the Government pilot scheme, "Your Guide", did not go forward because it was considered to be too expensive—I make no comment on that. The postmasters have tried to develop the scheme using the same pilot area of Leicestershire because people there are familiar with it. They have not had the e-Government support that they deserve and need to make it work, but one thing that came across to me as having big potential was that if each post office had a computer terminal with a printer behind the counter, virtually every Government form could be immediately accessible online and printed in the post office, for which a charge could be credited to the account. That would save on printing costs, as printing would be done to order, and there would be no worries about stockholding and pulping, or about forms being out of date because they would be accessible, up to date and online. I hope and believe that that solution is a way forward in partnership with Government that could help to boost the viability of the post office network.

In an ideal world, everything that happens in the post office would be paid for as a fully commercial business, including public services, although I accept the point made by the hon. Member for Castle Point that if a small subsidy is needed to keep the social network, it would be a disaster if that network were destroyed for the sake of a relatively small amount. We need to agree what is the viable total network and try to support it in the best way possible.

It is interesting that post offices run by the Post Office appear to lose the most money. That leads me to believe that as the Post Office has changed, the relationship between it and its branches has not changed fast enough. For example, an Office of Fair Trading adjudication is going through the system in which convenience stores with post offices have challenged the restrictions imposed on them by the Post Office. That is a point of contention on which not all postmasters agree, because the postmasters and shopkeepers are not necessarily the same people. I can see the point of view of shop owners who say, "We are operating a business here, of which the post office is a part, not the sole aspect, and we object to the Post Office telling us what we can do in the other part of the shop," but I also understand the Post Office's reasoning, particularly as it is developing new services. I shall be interested to see the OFT's conclusion.

I support Post Office management trying to introduce new commercial services, but I do not know how successful they will be, as the environment is very competitive. One reason why the Royal Bank of Scotland refuses to co-operate with the Post Office is that it regards it as a direct competitor in both cash and financial services, and it says that under no circumstances will it co-operate in allowing its customers to access money through the Post Office. HBOS has taken the same position. I am glad that Clydesdale bank has now started to allow people to get cash through the Post Office.

I am conscious of the time, but let me make a Scottish point. We in Scotland are particularly disadvantaged as a result of the decision of our two biggest banks, the Royal Bank of Scotland and HBOS, not to co-operate with the Post Office, because that means that many people in Scotland—a high proportion are customers of those banks—will not be able to obtain cash through the Post Office, and yet the card account has not come across as the ideal alternative.

Although MPs make party political points on this issue, all of us know how important the post offices in our constituencies are and how much they are valued and used. We want to find a solution to this dilemma that will give confidence for the future. The Government face a great challenge; they are going through a process that is demoralising and damaging to confidence, and most sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses are not at all convinced about how the endgame will finish. I have made some constructive suggestions, and I hope that the Government will address them in a sensitive manner. They must ensure that the combination of business and whatever subsidy is required will guarantee a future. The fact is that 85 per cent. of rural post offices are not profitable, and unless we solve that problem, swathes will be cut through the service in rural areas. Postmasters and postmistresses will simply walk away, as they will be unwilling to continue to subsidise the Post Office, because the tables have turned; the Post Office is not subsidising them any longer; it is the other way around now.

This has been a good debate, and I am sure that we will continue to discuss the subject through the coming election campaign.

10.31 am

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): We have had a number of debates on the Post Office in the past few years, and one thing that characterises them is a sense of unanimity. There is a strong feeling among MPs of all parties, who, after all, are elected to represent their constituents, that the post office system has tremendous value. We recognise that post offices exist not just to sell stamps; they also play a valuable role in our communities. Debates on this subject are pleasant because, although we might have specific differences about how to maintain the post office network, we all agree that it has huge value.

It is a great pleasure to me that my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) has secured the debate, and I congratulate him on that. He and I, and my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), who was present earlier, were elected to the House at the same time, in 1992. We are still here—more or less.

The debate has been interesting. All Members, regardless of political party, care about the Post Office. The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) pointed out the importance of the Post Office brand, and, as the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) said, that brand is not being utilised enough. I think we all agree on that. The Post Office brand is recognised and respected, and it is regarded as having great integrity. The BBC used its brand to enable it to operate in a wider range of areas, which has cross-subsidised its programme making, but the Post Office has decided not to use other services as a way of keeping post offices viable, either because of externally applied restriction or because of its own restrictions.

The hon. Member for Gordon raised a fascinating point: he explained how, historically, there are differences between post offices that had always been sub-post offices and those that were originally Crown post offices. What does it matter if they are now sub-post offices and they want to offer certain services, such as providing passport applications? Why should they be disallowed from doing so? I have no idea. Can the Minister answer that? Have the Government put that restriction in place, or, as I suspect, has the Post Office done so? Either way, will the Government intervene to ensure that all post offices are able to offer a large number of services, because that is what will keep them viable?

The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) spoke about the fact that some people find it difficult to get to their post office. With regard to the urban reinvention programme, the Post Office said that it would not close post offices more than one mile distant. The Post Office also claimed that it would take into account natural obstacles, but that simply does not seem to be the case. We have heard time and again, not only in this debate but in debates in the main Chamber, about areas where elderly people live and where there are mountain ranges, canals or torrential rivers—I exaggerate slightly, but I am making my point—and the Post Office says, "Well, there are two post offices within a mile of each other, so one of them can close," even though, in practice, the other is inaccessible. That is wrong, and it must be addressed.

The Government cannot get off lightly, because they have played their part. We heard from the Minister today that 4 million post office users are now account holders, but not all of them wanted to be. Many elderly people have difficulty in operating cash cards. Many have difficulty in remembering their personal identification number—as do I. Many, and many disabled people, too, find it difficult to enter their PIN on the little keypads that are provided; they really are quite small. For understandable reasons, the banks are now introducing chip and PIN, but lots of people have problems in operating keypads, when they go to the gas station to buy petrol, for instance. That is an important issue.

The Government are spending an extraordinary amount of money to try to persuade people to give up their cash books. Some £10.5 million of taxpayers' money is being spent to persuade benefit claimants to abandon their order books in favour of direct payment; that figure has been obtained by the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters. That is equivalent to the taxpayer spending £70 per benefit claimant. Of course, the direct payment facility should be available at post offices for people who have bank accounts, or who do not like dealing in cash; it was initiated by a Conservative Government, and I applaud new Labour for continuing with the programme. However, it is wrong to do that in a way that prevents people who wish to keep their benefit books from doing so, particularly as those people are vulnerable, and find using such benefit books difficult enough.

In this debate, and in others, we have heard of the many campaigns that Members have run to keep their post offices open. Postwatch has played its part. It may not have replied to the hon. Member for Stroud, but it is generally quite proactive. As I mentioned in an intervention, it opposed 73 closure proposals in the west midlands but only 15 were withdrawn. When there is unanimous opposition to certain post office closures among local authorities, local communities, Members of Parliament, and Postwatch, and yet the Post Office still closes those post offices, one has to wonder whether it is completely deaf. Does it not recognise that the Post Office, as well as the Government, has a duty of care in this area?

Mr. Sutcliffe: The hon. Gentleman suggested in his earlier intervention that my constituency was part of the west midlands. Bradford does not want to join the west midlands. It is strictly Yorkshire.

Michael Fabricant: I am grateful for that helpful intervention; I do not know what made me think that the Minister represented a west midlands seat. My geographical knowledge of the United States is far better than that of the United Kingdom. I thank the Minister—I like to refer to him as my hon. Friend—for making that helpful, creative intervention.

Postwatch also pointed out the question raised by the hon. Member for Gordon: when is it convenient and when is it not convenient to close a post office? Sometimes it is convenient to do so because the postmaster wants to take payment from the Post Office to surrender their position. As Postwatch said:

> "We believe that POL's choice to use subpostmaster preference as a major part of selecting which post offices to close has in a number of cases meant that businesses closed that were in some ways better than those that remain."

That issue must also be addressed by the Government. Although I understand and accept that Post Office Ltd is a separate organisation in law, the House and Members should not forget that it is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Government. It is not right for them to say, "Mea non culpa. This will operate at arms' length. We shan't intervene". As a former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry might have said, the Minister should be intervening before breakfast, before lunch and before dinner, so far as some closures are concerned.

It is not just hon. Members who have been intervening, or trying to intervene, to keep post offices open. I have received a series of e-mails and letters from people in their communities who have been trying to keep various post offices open. Such people include: Pamela Singleton in

[Michael Fabricant]

Pudsey; Marco Forgione in Richmond Park; Ian Gibb in North Warwickshire; Stella Kyriazis in Telford; Richard Aitken-Davies in Derby, North; Robert Buckland in South Swindon; Richard Willis in Sutton and Cheam; Margaret Harper in Worcester; Mark Garnier in Wyre Forest; Justine Greening in Putney; Andrew Griffith in Corby and east Northamptonshire; Alexandra Robson in Wolverhampton, North-East; Anne Milton in Guildford; Mike Freer in Harrow, West; and George Lee in Leeds, North-West. They have all run campaigns to try to keep their post offices open. They have joined in the local community. In some cases they have succeeded, and in others they have not.

Under the Conservative Government, about 1 per cent. of post offices closed each year; under the new Labour Government, the rate is running at 7 per cent. The total number of post offices has fallen by more than 3,200—17 per cent.—since the Government came to power. The last figures available show that 15,304 post offices in the United Kingdom still existed at the end of 2004.

The hon. Member for Stroud, whom I am pleased is taking part in the debate, tabled a written question. He asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry

"what discussions she has held with . . . parish . . . councils".

The Minister for Employment Relations, Consumers and Postal Services replied:

"I have not held discussions with parish and town councils or with the National Association of Local Councils at this stage."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 21 December 2004; Vol 428, c 1615–16W.]

I hope that the Minister will hold such discussions, because I know that he cares about the issue. He is a caring sort of Minister, but caring just is not enough; doing is what matters.

Mr. Drew: As the hon. Gentleman has quoted me, I would like to respond. To be fair to the Post Office, the rural network has tried to evolve an interesting way in which parish councils and other voluntary groups can be brought in to help run it. That is exactly what should be done as a matter of urgency. We need that to be brought forward and not left as a future possibility. Does the hon. Gentleman agree?

Michael Fabricant: As I said near the beginning of the debate, many of the issues cross party boundaries. Yes, I agree with the hon. Gentleman's point. There should be greater community involvement, not only at the stage of discussing whether there should be a closure, but, as was said, to help keep post offices open in a constructive way; that could be as part of a village shop or, as we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley, as part of a pub.

There are all sorts of different mechanisms of having full-time or part-time post offices by which we can create a footfall. But the position has been damaged under the Government because of the Post Office card scheme. I am talking about a footfall that improves the viability of post offices. Sub-post offices depend on people coming into them for their survival. Under the Government much business has been lost. We have stated:

"A Conservative government would aim to increase the number of services available from urban and rural post offices and so increase their long-term viability. We will . . . work . . . with the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters".

I meet with that body on a regular basis.

The Government have failed to give adequate backing to the Post Office card account. They have made too complicated the process by which customers open accounts. The Government have betrayed the trust of local people by doing so, and they have tried to dragoon people into using card accounts, as my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point said. That has been done against people's will, and public money has been used to force them to do it. That means that customers are likely to open bank accounts out of frustration. Trade at the local post office, which is the village shop, will dry up.

Local post offices provide a focus for the community as well as merely being places that provide stamps. Our aim must be to create an environment where post offices thrive in the United Kingdom, not only for the benefit of the Royal Mail, but for the benefit for the communities we serve.

10.47 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I congratulate the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) on securing today's debate. He has been assiduous in voicing local concerns on behalf of his constituents about Post Office Ltd's urban reinvention programme proposals for his constituency. I add my congratulations to him and his colleagues on the efforts that they have made on behalf of their local community. I was pleased to hear him say that one of the post offices will reopen. I congratulate him on that.

Since I became the Minister with responsibility for postal services in September 2004, I have examined the whole area of postal services with great interest. Some people have accused me of being a masochist in accepting that responsibility, given the nature of the problem that we face in relation to a trusted service. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) is correct in saying that despite all the issues relating to the Royal Mail and the Post Office, people still trust them as brand names.

The hon. Member for Castle Point spelt out his views clearly and fully. That is why I questioned him on subsidy. He spoke strongly about the social aspects of post offices and the importance of maintaining subsidies. I will return to issues relating to his constituency a little later if I have the time to go through them in great detail and if he allows me to do so.

Today's debate has been important. I agree with the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) that what tends to happen in situations such as those that we are discussing, particularly with a possible general election around the corner, is that the issues become politically emotive as we all knock spots off each other in determining who was responsible for things. I will return to some of those issues.

I agree that all of us, when we get down to the detail, want a viable post office network, and we want the Royal Mail to survive and develop. We need to try to find ways of examining the issues together. I was grateful for some of the suggestions that the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) made. We are at the next crucial stage. The first plan for Royal Mail recovery was in 1999, and it concludes this year. We need to consider what the next plan will entail. Remarks were made about the rural subsidy. What is interesting is that the time frame has given us the opportunity to see what local communities want to do about the range of services that post offices should provide. Some innovative ideas have come from the pilots, which could contribute to a future plan.

The post office network is relevant to every Member of Parliament. We all share concerns about the future provision of post office services in our constituencies. I assure hon. Members that the Government are fully committed to maintaining a viable nationwide network of post offices. The truth is that there have been decades of underinvestment, and the business was in a spiral of decline. If the network is to survive and thrive, it needs to change significantly. The Government want a post office network that can prosper on the needs of today and the future, not those of 20 or 30 years ago.

Because the Government have grasped the nettle and taken the necessary steps to restructure and revitalise the Post Office, the future of the network has rightly become an issue of national debate. We all share concern for the future provision of post office services in our constituencies, and we want to maintain a viable network. Everyone involved faces a massive challenge. I pay tribute to those local communities and people who have voiced their concerns about post office closures. However, I take the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud made about the fact that some people have unfortunately joined the campaign after the horse has bolted, so to speak, given the massive problems that the network was facing.

The starting point for Government policy on the post office network was the performance and innovation unit's report of 2000, "Modernising the Post Office Network". The Prime Minister called for that report in 1999, because it was clear, following decades of decline and zero investment, that dramatic action had to be taken to get the business on track. We set about producing policies that would help secure a future for the post office network, which was something that the previous Government failed to do.

I was interested to hear the Opposition say what they would do if they ever return to power. I would ask why they did not do those things when they had the opportunity during their previous reign.

Michael Fabricant: The Post Office was not under such pressures then. It is primarily because of the introduction of the card scheme that we now have to propose such measures.

Mr. Sutcliffe: That was a good try, but not an effective enough one, because closures were already taking place during the Conservative reign, as hon. Members have pointed out. If we consider the problem honestly, we find that it has much to do with the relationship between the Royal Mail and the Government. They have basically been at arm's length since 1967. On other agencies using the Royal Mail and post offices, lots of good work could have been done to ensure that Post Office Ltd played an integral role in community regeneration, especially if we consider the money that the previous Government invested in regeneration and what this Government have done. There could have and should have been an opportunity to involve post offices and other services in such regeneration. That did not happen, and we all stand to blame for that.

The PIU report showed quite starkly that the network of post offices had not kept pace with the changing needs of its customers. Too often, post offices had become dingy and shabby through lack of investment and were losing business. The Post Office faces an enormous challenge. In recent years, Post Office Ltd has incurred substantial losses: £163 million before exceptional items in 2001–02, £194 million in 2002–03, and £97 million in 2003–04. Some 96 per cent. of the nation's post offices are run by sub-postmasters—private business people who have invested not only their own money into their businesses but a great amount of care and effort into helping the post office network to achieve its high status.

I pay tribute to the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters. I meet the federation regularly and have discussed its manifesto, which contains many interesting ideas, although, as the federation acknowledges, they are uncosted. It is run by people who are committed to the network, as hon. Members have said. It is vital that we listen to the federation and to people who have invested many years of their life in the network.

It was right that Post Office Ltd gave those people who wanted to get out the opportunity to do so through the payments that were made. Some people were put under a great deal of pressure over some decisions. I shall return to the example that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud raised from his constituency, because I am concerned if people have been put under the pressure that he described. I will write to him with details about the two post offices that he mentioned and will look at the issue of undue pressure being put on people.

The post office network has been contracting since the 1960s. The previous Government presided over 3,500 closures between 1979 and 1997, but in all that time produced no policy on how to structure the network and ensure that it would remain relevant in the 21st century. There have been reductions in post office usage for all sorts of reasons. The absence of investment by the previous Government was an important one. However, major advances in technology, greater mobility, and changes in shopping and financial habits mean that a large proportion of our constituents simply do not use post offices as they used to and that custom has sharply reduced. That trend is not a matter of the Government or some unseen market force acting against the interests of the Post Office and its customers; rather, it is about ordinary people—our constituents—making choices.

The decline in transaction volumes has not been caused just by the changes in benefit payment arrangements that have recently been completed. The decline started well before the move to direct payment and applies not only to benefit payments but to a much wider range of services, including Girobank and National Savings transactions, telephone bill payments and postal orders.

[Mr. Sutcliffe]

As the recent National Audit Office report noted, the change is not a uniquely British phenomenon. Research commissioned by Postcomm, the regulator for postal services, has noted that people in other countries increasingly access services electronically over the telephone and through the internet. In response, most countries have been remodelling their networks, usually by closing the smallest or least profitable offices and converting directly run offices to agency offices. In Germany, for instance, the number of post office branches has been reduced drastically, from 30,000 to 13,000. In Britain, other networks, such as those of the retail banks, have also been scaled back. Like them, the post office network needs to adapt to changes in people's preferences and new ways of doing business. Such external changes pose big challenges to the network of post offices, which have to be addressed not ducked. That is what the Government have done and it creates the emotion that we have seen.

Postwatch has done a tremendous job of creating a picture for consumers, through its response to Post Office Ltd's plans. That was a deliberate plan by the Government, in order to create a balance, so that a number of things could be dealt with. Royal Mail and Post Office Ltd were losing money, and the Government set them targets: to turn the situation round, to stop those loses, to maintain a viable network, and to ensure that there were no unplanned closures. The difficulty would have been an acceleration in those closures, creating gaps, which would not have put us in the position of having post offices within a mile of one that had closed.

Postmaster preference, Postwatch operating on behalf of the consumer, and Post Office Ltd were involved in trying to create a viable network. Clearly, there have been difficulties. Since becoming the Minister with responsibility for postal services in September 2004, I have tried to ensure that hon. Members in all parts of the House have had the opportunity to meet Post Office Ltd directly. I have done that through arranging surgeries in the House on Thursdays with senior management of Post Office Ltd, so that hon. Members can at least have face-to-face discussions about the concerns that have been raised.

The Government are listening. When we look at the new plan, we shall have to consider the role of Postwatch and Postcomm, the regulator. Postcomm is looking at a survey of how the urban reinvention programme has affected certain areas. If gaps appear, we shall have to ensure that they are filled.

We are debating a difficult issue to which I am sure we shall return, notwithstanding what happens in the general election. Hon. Members have shown great dedication in dealing with the issue. If we take party politics out of the debate, as I am sure we will after the election, and consider the good ideas that are around, I am sure that we can restore and develop our constituents' confidence in Royal Mail and Post Office Ltd. That way, we can ensure that our constituents understand what has happened and what we all agree is the need for change, and that the change is as painless as possible for them. If we do that, I am sure that confidence will return.

Western Balkans

11 am

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I am pleased to have been given the opportunity to raise this subject, which, unlike many others, will not be high on the list of issues in the run-up to the forthcoming election in the United Kingdom, so we can get away from the party politics that pervades too many of our debates at the moment.

First, I want to pay tribute to the Foreign Affairs Committee, which recently produced a report on developments in the western Balkans. Although it is something of a curate's egg, there are more good bits than bits that are not to my taste, and I certainly welcome the Committee's involvement. It is important that the UK and the rest of Europe take the future of the region very seriously, not only because it is in Europe, but because it holds the key to stability and peace in Europe and therefore must not be ignored.

As it happens, today is the sixth anniversary of the eve of the bombing of Yugoslavia and it is interesting to consider how far we have come since then. The region had already been in turmoil for some considerable time, but in many ways the bombing of Serbia—Yugoslavia as it was then called—was a turning point for it. I always make the point, and the Minister for Europe has heard me do so on many occasions, that history plays an important part in the region and is forgotten at our peril, but I want to be more positive and concentrate on what has been going on recently and what can be done in the future.

Some recent developments have been positive. I am delighted that the UK and the European Union are trying to be as even-handed as possible in the area. That has not always been apparent to some people, but recent insistence in the case of General Gotovina in Croatia and the indictment of the Kosovan Prime Minister, Ramush Haradinaj, have shown that the west is trying to change the fact that too many people in Serbia and the diaspora feel that they are the only victims of what has happened. Also today, the President of Serbia and Montenegro, Mr. Svetozar Marovic, is visiting the UK again. I do not know what discussions he is having or with whom, but I hope that those diplomatic efforts will not go unrewarded.

I will not deal with the whole region, not only because of the lack of time, but because in recent years I have concentrated my efforts on several specific parts of this diverse region. I shall start by talking about Macedonia, which is an interesting part of that area of the world and, in many ways, as successful as any country there in implementing policies that the west would like. It is certainly keen to join the European family. Also, it has tried hard to implement the Ohrid agreement and has succeeded, despite the nervousness caused by a recent referendum that could have put that in grave jeopardy. Successive Governments have made every effort to ensure that the country is a model of integration in the Balkans.

In light of Macedonia's efforts—it has supported the coalition in Iraq and a member of its armed forces has even been killed over there—we sometimes need to give more support than mere words.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that Greece could be more helpful in its relations with Macedonia and provide additional encouragement to its long-term ambition of joining the EU?

Mr. Randall: My hon. Friend pre-empts me. Greece is being helpful to Macedonia in many respects, certainly economically, which is to be welcomed. Other countries, including the UK, could help economically through business and bilateral arrangements, but the big problem with Greece is still the sticking point over the name of Macedonia. In most of our deliberations in the House and elsewhere, most people—even Ministers who normally have to be very wary about such things—will refer to the country as Macedonia, because that is its name. However, my hon. Friend may be aware that the Greeks, and therefore the EU, have insisted on the full title being the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. I am not sure whether Greece would like to be referred to as the former Ottoman province of Greece, or whether Finland would like to be called the former Russian province of Finland. They would not be altogether chuffed with that idea.

As in so many parts of the region, there are little nuances—the title of a country is more than a nuance, however—but it is about time we got past the problem with the name. After all, the United States, China and Russia have accepted the name of the country as Macedonia without the "former Yugoslav" bit tacked on. The UK has a wonderful opportunity, through our forthcoming presidency of the EU, to have a chat with the Greeks and try to make them see sense. I am not an expert on German politics, but I believe that the Bundestag, the lower House of the German Parliament, recently passed a resolution to that effect, so we might be able to find help and allies on the subject.

Unfortunately, there are signs that the problem with the name is becoming a bit like our problem with Gibraltar and Spain. Recently, I heard that a plane carrying the Macedonian Prime Minister to talks in Turkey was not allowed to go through Greek airspace because "Macedonia" was written on its side. One hears all sorts of stories in that region. That story came from an eminent source but, not having access to the Macedonian dailies, I cannot verify whether that happened, although I believe it did. If it did, the UK Government ought to have more than a quiet word with our colleagues in Athens, because I would be nervous if a problem over the title of a country got down to what we would all agree are childish levels. I do not think I will be going to Greece on my holidays in the immediate future, after that little diatribe.

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): The hon. Gentleman could go plane-spotting.

Mr. Randall: Although the Minister claims that plane-spotting would be an amply good pastime for me, one of my constituents did that, which did not help his summer holidays that year. Having been a bird watcher, I know the perils of walking around the Balkan countries with a pair of binoculars around my neck.

More seriously, I return to existing conditions in Serbia. Before the civil war, Serbia was not exactly at the forefront of economic success. It was doing quite well years ago when I was a student there, but it fell behind under successive Governments. In 1990, the income per capita was $2,850; now it is only a few hundred dollars. We can see what has happened to a large proportion of the population: unemployment is 38 per cent. and rising, and sadly, industrial production is down 50 per cent. compared with 1989.

[Mr. Randall]

I understand, and I know that the Minister will repeat, the insistence on the bringing to trial in The Hague of Mladic and Karadzic, and I know from speaking to members of the Government in Serbia that they are keen on that too. All I can say is that I would like to know whether the British Government or our allies—NATO or whatever—have firm evidence of where those people are. If I thought that the authorities had been given firm evidence and were unwilling to help, I would have less sympathy for them.

I remain open on that issue, which I know is very big in the country. The Serbs feel that they were not granted the same rights as the Iraqi people to try those who caused severe problems—problems is an understatement. The issue gets to the people there. They saw a further such example when there was no international tribunal in The Hague, or anywhere else, for the criminals who caused all the difficulties in Iraq.

I know that this is a big problem, but I hope that the British Government and others are not saying, "We want those people," if they have firm intelligence. If they can offer help on the ground with intelligence, I hope they are doing so. If they are not being helped by the authorities, I would certainly have a deal less sympathy for what is going on there.

That said, there is a severe humanitarian problem in Serbia and—albeit less so—in Montenegro. Of course, Kosovo is included in that, and it is sad that a number of people come to my surgeries in fear of returning to Kosovo because of action by the Kosovo Liberation Army. They feel that the army is still in control despite international efforts.

Kosovo is not the wonderful idyllic state that perhaps we sometimes want to think it is following our intervention there. In many ways, I presume, the indictment of the former Prime Minister of Kosovo reflects, without stirring up too many other problems, our obsession with Irish republicans. It becomes difficult to accept that they have given up military and criminal action, and we have seen in recent months that they have not given up what they say they have given up. Kosovo is like that, only more so.

A mere Back Bencher can possibly do a service by raising a matter continually. I cannot do the grand politics of the region, but I can raise the humanitarian problems that exist. This country was instrumental in making things worse by the bombing, however well intentioned the Government and the majority of people in this country—although I happened not to be one of them—thought the intervention would be. What worries me is the huge number of refugees living in Serbia: there are internally displaced people living in appalling conditions, but they are not the only ones who are important. Because of the economic state of the country, there is incredible poverty away from the major cities.

One of the problems is that people such as me tend to go to Belgrade when we visit and we see a café society that is still almost blossoming. It is a pleasant place, there is affluence and the shops are full of items, but if one goes a few miles away to villages that were never really developed anyway, one is back in an era that many people would be shocked to see in Europe today.

Indeed, I heard a report from someone who recently visited a hospital in Zemun, which is just outside Belgrade, on the other side of the river. The last of that hospital's cookers had packed up, so patients could not have any hot meals and it was down to a couple of volunteers to keep things going. However, Zemun is a major conurbation; it is really part of Belgrade. That that should happen anywhere in Europe—virtually in the capital city of that country—is a disgrace and we must do whatever we can to help.

Pensions and pensioners are one of the biggest problems. There have been masses of suicides because elderly folk cannot afford medication or, in many cases, food. I do not think that I am exaggerating: I really do think that there is a humanitarian disaster there, and we must do something. We owe it to those people not only because they are in Europe, so we should be doing something anyway, but because of the history—not just the recent history—and the fact that the Serbs have been our strong allies in the past.

Incredibly, the Serbs still have great respect for the British. This is the moment to show that we can and we shall help them in their hour of need—not just paternalistically by giving aid, but by treating them as equal partners. The future of that area lies in ensuring that it integrates within the European family. That is some way off, but we must give those countries hope.

11.18 am

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): I am genuinely grateful to the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) for introducing the debate, because it allows the Government to place on the record in the House our current thinking on the western Balkans. I pay sincere tribute to him, as he has consistently brought to the House—in the form of parliamentary questions, oral questions, Adjournment debates and interventions in broader European debates—the issues of the western Balkans in general and of Serbia, to which he is greatly attached, in particular. He has done so very moderately, avoiding some of the polemic to which the region has given rise.

I entirely take the hon. Gentleman's point that the people of Serbia deserve a better deal, if not a new deal. For me, Belgrade is the natural capital of the western Balkans. The people of Serbia are cultivated, intelligent and skilled, and in every way have the potential to deliver enormous benefits to the European economy. No Government more than this one would want to see Serbia as anything other than a full member of the European family of nations. I welcome President Marovic's return visit here; his political business was done on his previous visit a couple of weeks ago. I am in regular and, I hope, friendly contact with other leaders in Belgrade, but it would be helpful if all Serbian elected politicians and leaders in Belgrade spoke with one voice on behalf of the Serb people.

It would also be helpful if Serbia moved forward with economic reconstruction. I refer hon. Members to the interesting article in today's Financial Times about the problem of investing in Serbia and, in particular, the difficulty of ensuring that land is available for investment. According to the Financial Times, great swathes of land are still held under state control, with no liberalisation of land ownership. That results in a paradox: Serbia is one of the poorest countries of Europe, but its housing is among the most expensive. So, there is much that the Serbs themselves can do. I have also had meetings with leading British multinationals to urge them to invest in Serbia and the region. For example, I would like to see direct, low-cost flights to Serbia, as we now have to Croatia. That would be a good step forward.

Unfortunately, there is the fundamental problem of coming to terms with what happened in the 1990s. The entire elected leadership must clearly say, urbi et orbi, that the indicted war criminals—not just the fugitives Karadzic and Mladic, but the generals whose whereabouts are known—must go to The Hague. We welcome some of the transfers, but I would like 2005 to be the year in which there is a real effort in Serbia, including the Republika Srpska in Bosnia and Herzegovina, to bring to an end the problem of sending indicted generals and leaders to The Hague.

One might wish that the tribunal process were different, but we cannot rewrite history. Honourable men have gone there, including Ramush Haradinaj, the Prime Minister of Kosovo, who immediately accepted his responsibilities when he was indicted and flew to The Hague without fuss. Others might care to follow his example. We would like 2005 to be the year when we make clear and definite progress in the western Balkans.

It is nearly two decades since Slobodan Milosevic made his infamous speech in Kosovo Polje. We all remember with shame the inability of European Governments in the early 1990s to rise to the challenge of stopping the murderous nationalism that was unleashed in that beautiful part of our common European home.

On Sunday, I took my children to see the film "Hotel Rwanda", and I know how often you have raised the issue of human rights in Zimbabwe, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It was horrifying to be reminded of how, 11 years ago, a British Government colluded with other European Governments and the United States to prevent the United Nations from backing its forces in Rwanda to stop the genocide. I recommend that all Members of the House take their children to see "Hotel Rwanda".

That happened in 1994, but a year later there was a genocidal attack on European citizens, when 8,000 were killed in cold blood at Srebrenica. They were killed because, like the Jews and Roma in the Nazi era, they belonged to the wrong religion or the wrong community. We all thought that the scapegoating of Jews and Gypsies had stopped in 1945. Well, Srebrenica proved us wrong. The United States had to intervene to impose the Dayton settlement, but four years later we saw waves of asylum seekers—I am sure that all Members of the House have had them in their constituency surgeries—fleeing Kosovo because of the brutality there. By then, at least, Britain had a new Government, who were not prepared to sit on their hands. We had decisive British leadership to put together a coalition that was not frightened to use force to deal with tyranny and terror.

That is history—the last century. Today, let us try to look forward, not back. This year, we have a chance to close the chapter on that lost decade and, in particular, to send a message to the men and women of Serbia that their talents and skills deserve a full future in a Serbia fully in Europe.

The same is true for Croatia. I regret that it was not possible last week for Croatia to begin talks on accession to the European Union. In my view, it is question of when, not if, a Croatian Minister sits in the European Council and Croatian MEPs take their place in the European Parliament at Strasbourg. Britain wants Croatia in the EU.

When I was made a Foreign and Commonwealth Office Minister four years ago, one of the first visits I undertook was to Zagreb. I asked the then Croatian Government to take immediate action to deal with the case of Ante Gotovina, the Croatian commander accused of serious war crimes by the international tribunal in The Hague. Alas, my entreaties fell on deaf ears, and they have done so every year since.

For four years, I have been repeating that message, and so have Ministers from other major European Governments. Alas, too many agents and officers in the Croatian state apparatus defied the authority of the elected Government and, far from co-operating in persuading Gotovina to report to the Hague, they colluded with him in evading both his and Croatia's responsibilities under the international rule of law. No one can join the EU on the basis of refusing to accept their responsibilities under the international rule of law.

Let me make this appeal through the House of Commons to General Gotovina. An officer of any rank in the army of any democratic state must accept the authority of the elected Government. An officer of any rank in the British Army, the American army or any European army who is charged with any crime in connection with his command has to answer to the Government.

The patriotic and honourable course for General Gotovina is to stop holding the Croatian nation to ransom and to report to The Hague. He will face a fair trial, his living conditions will be good and he will have full legal representation. If he surrenders voluntarily now, there is even the possibility of bail, although I must emphasise that that is a matter for the tribunal, not for any Government, and nor is it a question of negotiation between the tribunal and the accused. As a soldier, General Gotovina should do his last great patriotic duty by going to The Hague. I urge him to open the door to Croatia joining the EU by reporting to the international tribunal.

The same goes for Messrs. Mladic and Karadzic. We have sought to work with Serb authorities, but, in the end, it is Serbs who can track down and capture a person wanted in Serbia or the region of Serbian nationality. It is up to the Church and the communities to understand that Serbia's route to Europe lies through The Hague. We will continue to offer co-operation and officials, including from the Ministry of Defence, are seeking to work with the Serbian Government. The British Government want Serbia on the road to Europe, but not at the price of sweeping under the carpet the terrible crimes committed at Srebrenica 10 years ago.

[Mr. Denis MacShane]

The hon. Member for Uxbridge mentioned Macedonia, and I understand that the position is difficult, but he is slightly wrong, as the United Nations, NATO and other international bodies use the name attributed to Macedonia when it split from the former Yugoslavia more than a decade ago. This is a passionate issue in Macedonia and in northern Greece. In Macedonian northern Greece, 2.5 million Greeks see themselves as Macedonian. The name, for them, is a passionate issue. I am not a Solomon in the House of Commons or the Foreign Office to decide between Skopje and Athens. I know that talks are going on. In English, we say that a rose by any other name smells as sweet. I do not know whether that is a proverb in Greece or in Macedonia, but I urge Athens and Skopje to try to find a solution to the problem.

Mr. Randall: I understand that there is a problem with the name, but will the Minister give an assurance about relaxing the visa regime? At the moment, Macedonian diplomats still have to get visas to come here. We are one of the few EU countries where they have to do that.

Mr. MacShane: We take the view that all citizens from a country where we have a visa regime in place have to apply for visas. Obviously, diplomats accredited to the United Kingdom travel on a diplomatic passport. That is the normal position under the Vienna convention. I am happy to look into that, but where there are visa requirements for citizens, we are not, for obvious reasons, granting the right for anyone to obtain a British visa without going through the normal procedures.

I have not been able to deal with Kosovo, but there is a review procedure in that regard. If the hon. Gentleman and I are returned as MPs after the election, we may be able to discuss the issue in whatever positions we find ourselves. Again, I pay sincere and genuine tribute to him for how he brings these issues to the House. The presence of someone who is so interested, committed and sincere in his knowledge of the region represents a wonderful opportunity for the Government.

11.29 am

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

Coal Health Claims

2 pm

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I am very grateful to Mr. Speaker for allowing me to initiate this debate. The subject is of interest to many right hon. and hon. Members who represent mining and former mining constituencies.

I am very proud that the Labour Government put in place the coal handling agreement, which compensates miners and former miners who were affected by their exposure to dust. Thousands of miners and former miners and their families have been compensated for having their health ruined by exposure to coal dust, but no amount of compensation can restore the health of those men, or make up for the heartache that many of their families went through in watching their loved ones die. However, it helps, and in my constituency the scheme has paid more than £18 million to miners and their families. That is evidence that the Labour Government recognise the injustice that was done to those men, and are trying to put things right.

Proud though I am of the scheme, the way in which some solicitors and, more sickeningly, claims handlers have sought to exploit it and the victims—who are often elderly or dying—disgusts me and many of my parliamentary colleagues. I am at a loss to know why their sickening and cruel practices have not been highlighted or given more publicity. I can only repeat what I said in this Chamber on 26 August 2004: because the victims are in coalfield communities, rather than leafy, middle-class suburbs, the media choose to ignore their plight. I hope that by raising the issue again today, we can publicise the way in which claims handlers and solicitors exploit vulnerable and dying people.

To highlight the appalling way in which claims handlers exploit coal claim victims I shall describe the case of Mr. R. Jobes of Tanfield in my constituency and his dealings with an Ashington-based company, Industrial Disease Compensation Ltd, which is now known as Freeclaim IDC. Mr. Jobes, a former miner, had just over £3,000 of his compensation deducted by IDC. It passed his case to a firm of Liverpool solicitors, Silverbeck Rymer, which, on completion of the claim, deducted the money to recover "IDC's costs" under the agreement that Mr. Jobes had signed.

Silverbeck Rymer was first instructed on 5 February 1999; the judgment that led to the setting up of the coal handling agreement was given in 1998. Therefore, when the firm took the case from IDC, it knew that the scheme was under discussion and that it would not have to enter into any litigation on Mr. Jobes' behalf. Ironically, it was also a member of the claimant group of solicitors, so it was well aware of developments. Indeed, the judge at the time warned the claimant group not to incur any unnecessary disbursements while negotiations on the scheme were taking place. When it took on the case, Silverbeck Rymer knew, as did IDC, that there was no risk at all. When the handling agreement was put in place in September 1999, it also knew that its costs would be covered by the DTI and that the DTI would not attempt to recover costs from claimants in cases that failed. Why, then, did Silverbeck Rymer and IDC deduct that money from Mr. Jobes' settlement?

I reported Mr. Jobes' complaint to the Law Society, and I would like to record my thanks to the case officer, Mr. Ian Roberts, for his work on Mr. Jobes' behalf. The adjudicator considered the report, found in Mr. Jobes' favour and directed Silverbeck Rymer to pay Mr. Jobes £3,775, including £250 compensation.

In what I can describe only as a highly critical judgment, the adjudicator is clear that Silverbeck Rymer should have advised Mr. Jobes that there was no risk in his case and that there was no need for the agreement with IDC. His report states:

"I have concluded that they did not explain matters to Mr. Jobes so that he could properly understand the funding arrangements and he was not, therefore, in a position to give informed consent to the deductions made by them later".

In this case, there was no risk to IDC. It simply gained £3,000 for passing the case from its client to Silverbeck Rymer. I shall go into this further later on, but clearly the relationship between claims handlers and solicitors is important; claims handlers could not exist without the collusion of some solicitors. A question that still remains is what else did IDC get from Silverbeck Rymer? Did it buy the case and get a fee? I shall highlight a case shortly in which a fee was paid by a solicitor to a claims handler.

Although IDC has changed its agreement since Mr. Jobes' case, there must be many hundreds of claimants in the north-east and nationally whose compensation, like that of Mr. Jobes, has been plundered by IDC. I strongly urge them to come forward, because their cases need to be investigated. What IDC did in Mr. Jobes' case was unjustified and there must be many other people in a similar situation.

Freeclaim IDC is still operating and, according to its website, is "one of the leading compensation claim funding specialists in the UK."

It goes on to claim that it is "genuinely 'win no fee'... There is no need for a client to pay the registration fees, administration fees... or start-up costs levied by other compensation service companies."

If that sounds too good to be true, it is. Certainly, Mr. Jobes' dealings with the company were not "win, no fee": he lost more than £3,000. Later, when it changed the agreement, it charged those registered with it an administration fee of £35. To say that its service is "win, no fee" is absolute rubbish, and it is certainly not true in relation to its latest product.

Having satisfied its bank balance by milking the victims of coal health handling agreements, Freeclaim IDC is now targeting asbestos victims by charging £587 for a CT chest scan and getting people to take out £1,500 loans for insurance policies to cover unsuccessful cases. I have real concerns about unqualified individuals asking people to have CT scans. Will the Minister ask the relevant Department to look into those activities? It worries me that a company with no medical expertise is exposing people to high levels of radiation.

Clearly, contrary to the claim on the website, the service is not "genuinely win no fee". I have read the agreement, which states:

"In the event of a successful claim Freeclaim IDC guarantees the maximum of £399 will be deducted from your compensation to cover legal expenses which cannot be recovered from your opponent".

It goes on:

"This includes a fee of £100 + VAT to cover administration costs in arranging for the CT scan."

The sting in the tail is:

"Please note—"

it says in very small print—

"that if you are a Trade Union member and if the court considers that it would have been more appropriate for you to pursue a claim via your Trade Union, IDC reserves the right to raise the £399 maximum deduction from your compensation to £800".

Surely, solicitors should advise their clients—as they should have in Mr. Jobes' case—that there are alternative ways of funding and pursuing their cases. For example, if they are members of a trade union their cases can, in most cases, be handled for nothing. Likewise, if they look at their household or other insurance policies, they might find that they are covered for legal expenses. Why are solicitors not advising people that there are alternative ways of pursuing cases? Asbestos victims are still finding themselves out of pocket.

The Newcastle Evening Chronicle highlighted the case of a trade union member who went to IDC but decided to pursue his case through his trade union, Amicus. He has been left with a bill for more than £500.

The Law Society needs to take an urgent look at the relationship between its members and claims handlers. It is not good enough for it to state that claims handlers are unregulated; the actions of its members are allowing claims handlers to operate, to the financial detriment of individuals who could get access to justice more cheaply and, in many cases, more effectively.

I thought that I had come across every scam there is in relation to miners' compensation claims, but there is a new firm operating in the north-east. An advertisement from a company called Mineworkers Compensation Services appeared in last week's Sunday Sun in Newcastle:

"Do you have an ongoing compensation claim against the coal board? Transfer your claim to us and get £100."

It is not clear from the advertisement whether that is from a Government organisation, so I rang the freephone number and posed as a potential client. What I have to expose alarms me greatly. I spoke to a Mr. Philip Rogers, who was very helpful and forthcoming. He gave me a lot of information. I understand that he is a partner in a claims handling company. He stated that he set it up because a lot of law firms had taken on too many cases and, he said, could not deal with the backlog. I asked him whether he and his colleagues were solicitors. "No," he said, "but we have a close relationship with a North Shields-based company called Hindle Campbell." I asked him what would happen if I moved a claim to his firm. He told me that I would be given £100 straight away for transferring it. I asked whether anything would be deducted from the compensation. He replied, "Oh, no, certainly not—we get our fee from the solicitors." The firm of solicitors is paying his company to steal cases from other firms dealing with such cases, which is scandalous.

The more worrying point arose when I asked Mr. Rogers about his relationship with Hindle Campbell. He told me on the phone, less than half an hour ago, that he works for both organisations. He is a partner in the company that he has set up, and he also works for Hindle Campbell. That is against Law Society rules, and it demonstrates that claims handlers—in this case, Mineworkers Compensation Services—could not exist without the collusion of, if not working in partnership with, firms of solicitors.

[Mr. Kevan Jones]

I also asked about Hindle Campbell's record in miners' compensation. Is it an expert or large firm? I understand that it is a small practice in North Shields that does personal injury work like any other company, and that it has no expertise in miners' compensation work. I shall certainly write to the Law Society about this, but I must also ask the Minister whether he will have a meeting with the Law Society, or at least raise with it the issue of collusion. None of these claims handlers could operate if they did not have firms of solicitors working with them.

The Government must regulate claims handling firms. Self-regulation has been tried and the Claims Standards Council has been set up, but it is not acceptable to me. On its website, it claims to ensure "that its members deal with consumers on the basis of decency, probity and fairness."

It claims also that it is "independent from the industry" and "achieves this by... Vetting... organisations seeking membership".

I am not sure what vetting is performed, because on the same website one finds that one of the council's members is Freeclaim IDC. Under the membership section, the website goes on to say that members "must be able to demonstrate their integrity and financial probity as well as their being 'fit and proper' for membership."

If Freeclaim IDC is a member of that organisation, that is a clear joke.

I am concerned that the Claims Standards Council is recommended on the website of the Department for Constitutional Affairs. It should be removed at once. If those companies are involved, I would love to know how the organisation vets them. I would not want the Government to give the organisation any credibility whatsoever.

I understand that the Claims Standards Council has applied to the Office of Fair Trading under the OFT's consumer code approval scheme for the approval of its code of practice. I urge the OFT and the Minister to resist any moves by the council to have its code endorsed while a company such as Freeclaim IDC is allowed to be a member.

The activities of Freeclaim IDC and other claims handling firms are a scandal. Innocent and often poor people are being exploited because of their ignorance of the legal system. That must stop. Many of us in this Chamber went into politics to fight injustice. In my experience, there is nothing as unjust as the cases that I and other Members have come across, and the way in which claims handlers have exploited the old, the vulnerable and the weak.

Legislation is urgently needed. Action is urgently needed. I plead with the Minister to introduce regulations for those organisations and, in the meantime, consult the Department of Trade and Industry to see whether some of those groups can be closed. Some of their advertising is misleading; they make out that they are solicitors when they are not, and the Law Society is turning a blind eye to the activities of some of its members. I find that appalling.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the way in which he is highlighting the abuses. Would he go so far as to say that the people who represent individuals in legal matters should be professional lawyers, or is he saying that there is a role for a person who is not legally qualified to give legal advice? Does he have any thoughts on the idea that seems to be emerging from the Clementi review that non-lawyers should be able to own legal practices?

Mr. Kevan Jones: As someone who for 12 years practised in industrial tribunals and was not legally qualified, I accept the Clementi review. Certain things can be done without legal qualification. The important point is that regulation is required. It is woefully lacking in terms of the Law Society, and the organisations I have mentioned are outside its remit. They must, however, be regulated.

I urge the Government to act, because if they do not, the scandal that has gone on for the past few years over miners' compensation will continue. With new scams being invented, it is clearly continuing. More importantly, the vultures are moving into other areas of compensation, and the poor, the weak and the vulnerable will lose out.

2.19 pm

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): I am delighted to follow my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones). I shall not follow his path of highlighting individual cases; I merely want to speak to the principal issue that claims handlers should be regulated, not self-regulated.

This is an ideal time for the Department for Constitutional Affairs to act. We have already heard about the Clementi review. I note with interest the comments made by the Lord Chancellor yesterday, and I want an assurance from the Minister that claims handlers will not fall outside the net. They are cowboys: they are making false claims, raising false expectations, taking money out of people's pockets who cannot afford it, and on many occasions leaving people in debt. Enough is enough.

The Minister knows well about those complaints. He told the House not long ago that claims handlers were in the last chance saloon. My hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) and I went to see the Lord Chancellor earlier this month, and I am delighted that the Lord Chancellor has taken up the opportunity to go to the heart of the Nottinghamshire coalfield to Thoresby miners welfare this Friday—Good Friday, a public holiday—to talk directly to the people involved. The claimants will talk with strong voices about the way in which scams have operated on them.

The time has come to act, and we cannot delay any longer. I hope that the Minister will be impressed by today's debate. I am sure that the Lord Chancellor will be impressed by the voices of men and women in Nottinghamshire who have been quite bluntly given false hopes and expectations. The problem is simply this. People in coalfield areas are honest and hard working. Many of them have given their health and, in many cases, their lives working down the pits to keep us warm. Although there have been difficulties, the two coal health schemes have been enormously important in north Nottinghamshire. My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham quoted figures for his area; in Nottinghamshire, the two schemes together have brought in £265 million to former miners because of injuries to their health. Of that £265 million, however, a significant amount is simply being siphoned off.

My hon. Friend talked about claims handlers, and one body of claims handlers is the trade unions. I have talked to a variety of trade unions in the coal sector: the National Union of Mineworkers, the Union of Democratic Mineworkers, the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers, the deputies' union, and the British Association of Colliery Management—Technical, Energy and Administrative Management, the managers' union. All of them make some charge for handling coal health claims.

The BACM makes a small charge in lieu of trade union membership. I do not object to that. It is right that if a trade union operates for somebody outside the membership, it should charge a membership fee. I fundamentally object to companies such as Vendside, which is connected to the Union of Democratic Mineworkers, in effect double charging. Let us be clear that with coal health claims the union gets its fees from the Government, and they are significant and substantial fees. I am at a loss to know why any trade union should be ripping off members and former members by double charging and taking a fee out of the compensation awarded to miners. That is wrong, it must stop, and those bodies, which are about fraternity, ought to act more sensibly.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree with the comment made by Mr. Bleddyn Hancock of NACODS South Wales, who said way back in 1998 in an interview in The Independent:

> "The individual will end up with a fraction of what they will get. The general procedure is that miners go through their union because it will back their claims and we have the miner's interests at heart"?

Does my hon. Friend think that Bleddyn Hancock would be on sounder ground if NACODS South Wales were not deducting 10 per cent. from claims?

Paddy Tipping: I have taken a great interest in the matter. That individual does not operate only in south Wales; his organisation operates in the Kent coalfields, and significant sums are being made. I know also that the gentleman concerned was a trustee of the miners pension scheme and made some fairly outrageous comments and false promises about that. Organisations ought to look after the people they represent, and the double-claiming in the trade union movement is quite wrong and should stop.

As my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham said, given the tremendous amounts of money coming into the coalfields, claims handlers are casting their net wider. Asbestosis has been mentioned. One area of operation is the making of false promises to women who used to work in the textile sector over their deafness claims. Many of those individuals are claiming through Vendside, many of them have taken out loans, and many of them have been left with loans when they cannot make payments on the cost of an unsuccessful case. Instead of no win, no fee, it is no compensation and real debt. That is most unsatisfactory. I say to the Minister that that is a real scandal and the time has come to act.

The second scandal is the issue well illustrated by my hon. Friend—the unsavoury relationship between some claims handlers and some firms of solicitors. I am delighted that the Law Society has begun to consider the matter more closely; I am sorry that it has taken so long for it to act; and I hope that it will act with vigour, so that those claims handlers who have a relationship with firms of solicitors, leading to the conning of people in the Nottinghamshire coalfield, are dealt with appropriately. Professional people who ought to know better are letting the desire for money work against their public interests and, more particularly, their professional interests. If that is the case, they should be disciplined.

2.28 pm

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): This is the biggest, richest and best industrial injury compensation scheme in the world. It has already benefited miners and their families in my constituency to the tune of about £60 million, but on the margins is a problem that will become the biggest scandal in British legal history—the solicitors who have routinely ripped people off. The Government have not given it proper attention, but they need to do so—not least in the Lord Chancellor's Department.

A subsection of the biggest scandal in British legal history is the claims handlers; they are the dirtiest side of it all.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

John Mann: May I first pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) for securing the debate? More importantly, I pay tribute to him for taking the lead and exposing solicitors and claims handlers, irrespective of the pressures and threats that they may bring to bear on him, me and others.

Chris Bryant: I join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Mann) was moving from the problem with solicitors to that with claims handlers. I wonder whether his experience has been similar to mine. It has been easier to get money back from solicitors, but the danger is that we do not know how many people might have been double charged by solicitors. Would he support the Government's conducting a systematic trawl through the people who have received final settlements to find out how many have been double charged, so that we can get their money back for them?

John Mann: I would wholeheartedly endorse that. The problem is that people feel that once they have signed a piece of paper they are legally bound. The solicitors who are given the work by the claims handlers write and tell the individuals, and take a dual instruction—one from the claims handler and another from the claimant. I have letters, received in the past week, from the largest firm of solicitors when it comes to outstanding claims, Beresfords, warning people of the danger of not paying money to claims handlers. That is a routine feature of the system.

[John Mann]

Let me explain how claims handlers go about their business. I can give a good example. Only two weeks ago, I was on the Larwood estate in my constituency. A widow aged 92 had received a knock on the door. A claims handler had gone to a pensioner's bungalow—it would be a good bet in Worksop that a miner or a deceased miner would be related to the person living there—and asked: "Has anyone in the household or any of your relatives worked in the mining industry since 1954? There's money due to you and we can get it."

In the miners' welfare clubs, it is the same. I suspect that some miners' welfare clubs were paid to put leaflets out. Men, some of whom have retired, and widows of men who may have died many years ago were told that they could get some money at no risk to themselves. The companies said that they would do the work and that those people need do nothing. It seems perfectly reasonable, on the face of it, that there should be a payment for the work that has been done.

I have referred more than 700 cases to the Law Society in which solicitors were negligent about advising that, with this scheme, uniquely, the defendant had conceded the costs and they would be paid in full.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that the case of Mr. Jobes against Silverbeck Rymer highlights that point exactly? The company was working not in the best interests of Mr. Jobes, as solicitors should, but in its own best interests to get the fee or the work.

John Mann: My hon. Friend makes a pertinent point. Who are the solicitors who work for such companies? For example, Moss Solicitors threaten me and my constituents, but, having read an adjudication from the Law Society, it has been repaying money in the past week as a good will gesture. Why is it repaying a good will fee to my constituents if it has done nothing wrong?

Moss is the firm of solicitors that told my constituents that, as the Law Society has confirmed in writing, I—as the MP—was "playing politics" by challenging it. I do not know whether we have the advantage of free libel advice in this place. If we have, I appeal to a solicitor who is an expert in libel law to come forward, because anything that I can win from Moss Solicitors I will donate to the miners who have not received at least £500. That is an offer that a decent firm of specialist solicitors might like to take up.

Why do I have only 700 cases, when there are thousands in Bassetlaw alone? People believe that because they signed on the dotted line, they are legally bound. They do not understand, even when they read my column in the Worksop Guardian, that they did not have to sign and that the advice was negligent. In the case of those who understand, another factor comes into play. People come in drips and drabs, because of embarrassment. They feel that they have been made fools of, and that is a key consideration.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that a claims handling company that calls on a home in a mining community and encourages people to sign on the dotted line but fails to inform them that the DTI would pay the legal fees is culpable and should have to make a refund?

John Mann: I have demanded that. My hon. Friend mentioned IDC. I have dealt with similar cases, and I have written to suggest such a refund but the company has declined to correspond with me. There is PR Associates; large amounts of money have been taken from claimants when they have rightfully won their compensation.

Another such company is Union and General Services. I would like to sue that firm but, of course, I cannot do so because it has gone into voluntary liquidation. So, who can we find? Mr. A. J. Revill was the owner. We can do something to him, because information provided to me in the past few days suggests that Mr. Revill is a member of a party that I know rather well. Should it be the same Mr. Revill—I apologise to my fellow party member if it is not, but the details seem remarkably similar, as the address is near to that of Union and General Services in Thorne in Doncaster—our party should expel him forthwith because he is not fit to hold a party card of the Labour party, or, indeed, of any party.

Huw Irranca-Davies: My hon. Friend is making a commendable speech. Does he have any sympathy with IDC? The article that I mentioned from 1998 cites IDC's managing director, David Towler, who said:

"We only take a 32 per cent. cut on a small proportion of claims. Our average cut is 11 per cent.".

Does my hon. Friend not have any sympathy with that?

John Mann: It is money for old rope.

The name, Union and General, sounds reputable—it sounds like the kind of company one might go to: the deal, to the individual, sounds good. It will take only 10 per cent. or so. The fact that the defendant had conceded the entire payment of the fees was not made clear, and that is the point of law.

The biggest firm, Vendside, was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping). Many interesting things will begin to emerge about Vendside in the next few weeks, I am certain. One issue that my hon. Friend the Minister could consider referring to his friend, the Chancellor, is the VAT charged by the claims handlers. In the case of Vendside, is there an input VAT as well? Are there union costs? Is a company being set up to maximise tax benefits that would not be available if so-called membership or union fees were being paid? Union membership fees are not "VAT-able". The Inland Revenue needs to address that imminently.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the confusing features of such cases is that people who were associated with trade unions—including

Mr. Towler, who started off in the unemployment centre in Sunderland but now drives a nice new Mercedes and lives in a big house in Northumberland—have given legitimacy to some of the claims handling companies? Frankly, we cannot blame a lot of people for thinking that the companies are part of the trade union and labour movement. Until recently, I understand that Freeclaim IDC was registered in Guernsey.

John Mann: Such companies have that legitimacy. Claims handlers and solicitors are swapped between companies. I believe that some of those connected with Vendside worked elsewhere, including for Capita Insurance Services—or Aon IRISC, or any of the various names that it has gone under. That should be specifically investigated by the Minister to see whether there is any impropriety about data protection and the exchange of information and whether Government contracts have been suitably worded to stop people illicitly transferring information or knowledge from one organisation to another. I do not know, but with all the claims such things need to be considered.

There are other solicitors: Moss, AMS Law, Beresfords, Frank Allen Pennington, Robinson King, Kidd Spoor Harper, Mincoffs, and Watson Burton. Those are merely the ones I have referred to the Law Society. They are not tin-pot, diddly-squat organisations, but big, rich, wealthy solicitors, who are bringing down the good name of solicitors across Britain. We need stronger action against them from the Law Society and the Government.

In my view, the Government could do more. We cannot just wait. Frank Allen Pennington repaid £705 only last week to one of my constituents. This week, it refused to pay.

We cannot take cases in dribs and drabs and ones and twos at the whim of any solicitors who have conspired with the claims handlers to take money illicitly, in my view, from our constituents. The Law Society should be doing a lot more and should also be considering that collusion. I have handed some of my files to the fraud squad. I do not believe that everything is in order and have suggested that the fraud squad investigate. It is one of the biggest scandals I have ever seen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. Let me stress that nobody has broken the rules yet, but if any of those cases has been submitted to the court it becomes sub judice and falls under that rule. No one has broken it yet, but this is a wee health warning.

John Mann: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have a list of cases but I have no intention of referring to a single one. The generalities are the issue. The DTI could and should have done more, and should be doing more. The Lord Chancellor's Department is, rightly, answering the debate, so may I suggest to the Minister that his Department look at funding test cases against each of the claims handlers to prove to our constituents that the money should never have been taken? That would open the floodgates. Rather than each individual having to take civil action at risk to themselves to prove the point, the Government should take test cases to show that in the spirit of the agreements such people should not have been deducting the money.

Finally, for other kinds of claims, such as the textile, deafness and knee claims, we clearly need a system that works far better. Having been enticed into making a claim, a constituent has found that having won the claim they owe money because of the interest that has built up under the insurance policy. I am challenging that, and I believe that our challenge will succeed. However, we should not have to challenge it, as regulation should be much tighter—at least as tight as the Financial Services Authority's remit over insurance sellers and others. Claims handlers should fall within the ambit of the Law Society, which should have increased powers to deal with them. We need to get the money back for our people from those hideous organisations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The purpose of Westminster Hall debates is for the Member raising the topic to receive a full reply from the Minister. We have yet to reach the winding-up speeches, but if the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) promises to be brief, I will call him.

2.45 pm

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): I will indeed be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker. First, may I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) and apologise to him for not being here for his opening speech?

Claims handlers came on to the scene just after the two compensation schemes were widely publicised. My hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) referred to some of the names that claim handlers use, such as Union and General Services, the Miners Welfare and Compensation Agency and PR Associates. Many of those names are meant to mislead. Many people in mining communities associate the Miners Welfare and Compensation Agency with the Coal Industry Social Welfare Organisation, and they associate Union and General Services with the trade unions. People have been misled into putting their claims with solicitors through go-betweens—claims farmers—which have taken large amounts of money.

Let me give an example from my constituency. I shall not name the widow because the case is likely to proceed to court, but she was visited by the Miners Welfare and Compensation Agency. She thought that it was an official organisation related to the Coal Industry Social Welfare Organisation, and she gave it permission to take her case. It lodged the case with a firm of solicitors called Lopian Wagner of Manchester. That lady had £9,000 taken from her total compensation, and the company went as far as making a deduction from her bereavement payment. It took the full weight of this place and the focus of the media to force the company to refund her.

Claims farmers need to be controlled, and I urge the Minister to think about how that can be done. I suggest that it can be done through the way in which the Law Society controls solicitors. We could make the solicitor taking on the work from a claims farmer responsible for paying the fee, rather than the claims farmer being able to charge the client. If we controlled the system through the solicitor, we would get to grips with this scandalous operation, and solicitors would be extremely wary of taking on a contract with a claims farmer.

[Mr. Michael Clapham]

It must also be pointed out that there are two ways in which claims farmers deal with solicitors. Sometimes they take cases and charge a solicitor for delivering the cases to them, but on other occasions they come to an understanding—almost a contract—that the solicitor will pay their fee from the compensation the claimant receives before the cheque is sent on to the claimant. If we tackle the situation first through ensuring that claims farmers, like solicitors, have to have insurance, and secondly by controlling them through the solicitor by making the solicitor responsible for the way they behave, we could get to grips with the problem. However the Minister decides to proceed, this scandalous problem must be dealt with.

2.49 pm

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): I join others in paying tribute to the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) for securing the debate and to all other hon. Members who have spoken and reinforced, with many local examples, the points that he made. The importance of the debate is shown partly by the fact that it is one in a long series of debates over the past few years that hon. Members have raised about claims handlers and solicitors double charging.

As we have already heard, it is an important issue because of the number of people affected and the amount of money involved for people who are often elderly, sick or bereaved and are gaining compensation for injuries or deaths in the family resulting from work that was performed. In Chesterfield alone, up to January more than £6.6 million was paid in compensation just for respiratory diseases. About 2,300 claims have been settled or are in the process of being settled, with interim and outstanding settlements, and there are about another 1,800 after that. It is a major problem in ex-coal mining constituencies, and it results from the way the system has been so disgracefully exploited and abused.

We have heard many stories of disreputable behaviour, initially by solicitors double charging, and we heard today about claim handlers or firms, which are exploiting people who, as we have heard repeatedly, are often elderly, sick or from families of miners who have died. We have heard examples of their activities, such as cold calling, misleading claims of no win, no fee, and conning people into paying for expensive insurance, which makes a mockery of the idea of no win, no fee.

We are fairly lucky in Chesterfield in that my constituency case load and my talks with the local unemployed workers centre yesterday reflect the fact that there do not seem to be any problems with the main group of NUM solicitors—Graysons—which deals with most cases in my area. There are complaints, though not on the same scale as those that some Members have reported, about claims handling companies operating in the area. We are relatively lucky, but we do experience many of the problems that we have heard about.

Chris Bryant: Part of the difficulty is that we do not know the real extent of the problem. In all the cases in my constituency in which we have tried to get money back from lawyers, we have been successful, but we have not been so successful with claim handlers. However, I have no idea whether I have seen the real extent of the problem; the Government need to trawl through so that we know the extent of the problem.

Paul Holmes: I agree absolutely with the hon. Gentleman: we do not know if we have dealt with or uncovered the tip of the iceberg or a substantial part of the problem. We simply have no idea how extensive the problem is.

Huw Irranca-Davies: We are scratching the tip of the iceberg. It was estimated that one of the biggest claim handlers in my region—NACODS South Wales—had raised £13 million by the middle of last year. That is only one organisation with 40 members, so where is the money coming from? The Minister must take on board and feed back to the DTI the fact that we need a root and branch investigation of what is happening with claim handlers, because I think that millions of pounds are being skimmed off from miners.

Paul Holmes: I agree that we do not know how big the problem is. I have come across examples of elderly people who either do not want to pursue the matter because they are too old, or are embarrassed because they feel that they have been made a fool of and ripped off. Unless we find the people responsible, we will not know how many are out there, because there are many hidden cases.

We have heard lots of details today and in previous debates about what happens and about individual cases, and I will not rehearse that. I want to talk about why it happens and what we can do about it. As we all know, unscrupulous people in any area of activity will always exploit loopholes to make money, even when that means exploiting elderly and sick people. Some abuse has been immoral but legal and within the scope of the law. What can and should the Government and the Law Society do to minimise such abuse?

The original 1997 agreement could have explicitly prohibited the charging of an additional fee for solicitors' work, as has been done in other cases, but the Government did not do so. That led to the exploitation of double charging. The rules were changed later, which has led to most, but not all, solicitors stopping double charging.

Reimbursements by solicitors who double charged are being made, but often only when the individual, perhaps through their MP, pursues the case. Some firms of solicitors have made a lot of money out of double charging, but are not systematically going through their files and automatically reimbursing the money. Individuals bringing cases forward are, again, just the tip of the iceberg.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Last year in Westminster Hall, I raised the case of a company in Newcastle, Mark Gilbert Morse, which has about 29,000 claims, but has reimbursed only about 50 individuals. I have tried to urge the Law Society to trawl that company's books to see who it has not paid back. Would the hon. Gentleman support the Government taking action to force that company and others to pay back every single penny, not when people complain to them, but as a matter of course?

Paul Holmes: The hon. Gentleman touches on the point that I was going to raise at the end of my comments. We need to consider what the Government can do to close loopholes and enforce compensation or reimbursement if people have been exploited. Between them, what can the Government and the Law Society do? Rather than wringing their hands and saying, "This is terrible, but it has happened and it wasn't totally illegal", action must be taken. It is almost worthless for a law firm to deal with only 1,000 individual cases that have been brought to its attention out of a total of 19,000, because the vast majority of people who have been exploited and ripped off are not getting the compensation they deserve. The Law Society could have been more proactive earlier, and I ask the Minister what the Government and the Law Society could do.

Claim handlers, which we are specifically discussing, can flourish only when solicitors work with them by buying claims from them—otherwise there would be no point in having claims handling firms. Therefore, by using such firms, solicitors are endorsing their activities. Many people criticise the Law Society for being ineffective in policing itself and its members, and I have a lot of sympathy with those criticisms, but at least it is willing to talk about the need for better regulation of groups other than lawyers and solicitors.

The Law Society has talked about claim handlers and claims management companies needing greater regulation. It points out:

"Before March 2004, solicitors were not permitted to pay third parties for the referral of cases. The rule was designed to ensure that there were no improper influences constraining the independence of advice given by solicitors to their clients. However, the rule was subject to significant criticism from the Office of Fair Trading (and some solicitors' firms) as being anti-competitive."

The rule was changed in March 2004, but with certain conditions—for example, that there should be no cold calling, although we have heard that that still happens on a large scale. Will the Minister tell us where we are in reviewing that change made a year ago, and whether the Government plan to reverse it to prevent claim handlers from selling on bulk cases to solicitors, which was prohibited under the original rule?

The Law Society also states that, for some years, it has been "pressing the Government to introduce effective regulation of claims handling companies. The Society has suggested that this could be done by amending the definition of litigation in the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, so as to cover advice given in contemplation of litigation."

That suggestion would mean that

"only those who were qualified to conduct litigation could operate claims handling businesses on a commercial basis."

Alternatively, the Law Society suggested that "regulation could be achieved through the Office of Fair Trading."

Will the Minister tell us where the Government have got to on that subject, and, in the light of Sir David Clementi's review, what action they plan to take to control claims handling firms and stamp out the abuses that we have heard about?

It is not enough to complain about the exploitation of the elderly, the sick and the bereaved in our constituencies, as has so eloquently been described today and in previous debates. What action will the Government take to close legal loopholes and stop abuses, especially with regard to claim handlers, and, if necessary, to enforce action to ensure that all firms of solicitors refund double charging that they have legally extorted from people in the past? Surely solicitors who abuse the system and refuse to refund the money, or are difficult about doing so, should be struck off, because they are not fit to continue practising.

2.59 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): We have had a most useful debate; I congratulate the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) on securing it, and on speaking as he did. He exposed a range of abuses in the coal health claims system, under the two schemes that were started following the success of the group actions in 1997 and 1998.

It is worth reflecting that, having established liability—the unions must take a good deal of the credit for pursuing the cases in the way they did—the handling agreements were a major step forward. At least in principle, those agreements should mean that the people who suffered, their widows and their dependants receive the money much more quickly than they would if everything had to go through court. However, there are still well over 400,000 claims to be dealt with, so there is still some way to go.

One aspect has not yet been mentioned, and I would be grateful if the Minister commented on it. It is the criticism in The Northern Echo earlier this year about Capita IRISC, if it is still called that, a claims-handling business that the Government use to deal with claims through the Department of Trade and Industry. According to senior civil servants, a memorandum disclosed to The Northern Echo suggested that "the work of Capita Irisc should be put out to public tender as soon as possible, to allow other companies to bid for the contract."

The article went on:

"Capita Irisc 'has been causing concern' over the years and successive officials 'have not grasped the nettle'."

Mr. Kevan Jones: I accept that some of us have a slight advantage over the hon. Gentleman, as we have lived and breathed this issue for a while, but I point out that Capita is not a claims handling company, although I concur with some criticisms of how it handled the coal claims dealt with by the DTI.

Mr. Heald: Capita IRISC is described as the claims handling company for the DTI, but, of course, it does not play the same role as the claims handlers that the hon. Gentleman is talking about.

Capita IRISC seems to be criticised substantially for "allowing 'a paper mountain to develop within the system' with 'layer upon layer of low grade staffing'."

It has been suggested that there is a

"clearcut breach of the department's procurement rules"

in allowing it to continue to do its work over such an extended period.

Paddy Tipping: I sympathise with criticisms about IRISC. The criticisms that the hon. Gentleman read out appear to come from the DTI, but if there are real criticisms to be made, they are of the DTI itself for not giving clear guidance on policy and for badly miscalculating the number of claims that would be made. The real problem is not with IRISC; it is with poor policy advice that initially came from the Department.

[Paddy Tipping]

Mr. Heald: The point that I was about to make—and it ties in with what the hon. Gentleman says—is that it looks as though there is a case for a review of what happens at the DTI, to see whether it can speed up what it does. The hon. Gentleman makes the point that the initial estimated number of cases was wrong. I think that the Department estimated there would be 100,000, and in the end there were about 750,000, so no one could argue with that.

The schemes are very important, and the points that have been made by hon. Gentlemen today are important, too. If, as it seems, people have been given false hope, and told that claims were worth while when they were not, that needs to be addressed. There has been substantial double charging, and not just in relation to the £2,000 that the Government provide; in addition, substantial proportions of claims were taken by solicitors and claims handlers. That needs to be addressed, too.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The issue is much wider than one of claims-handlers encouraging would-be claimants to think that their claim would be much more substantial than it was. There has been any number of cases in which they encouraged the gullible claimants or their descendants to exaggerate or fabricate the evidence or extent of the illness or injury caused by mining. That is utterly reprehensible, is it not?

Mr. Heald: Yes, indeed. Every time a false or hopelessly exaggerated case is brought, it slows the payment of claims to those who desperately need the money, many of whom are elderly.

I agree that we should look at the relationship between solicitors and claims handlers. It is welcome that the Law Society has said that double charging is unethical, and has asked firms to pay back the money that was double-charged. I agreed with the point made by the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham): the Law Society might be the best focal point, in terms of trying to achieve some control over the whole system. It would be well worth the Minister's while to consider that, and to see whether there is some way in which solicitors' rules can be tightened to ensure that the claims handling side of the system works better.

Huw Irranca-Davies: May I postulate a way forward that the hon. Gentleman might want to consider? It arises from Sir David Clementi's review. He sets out six broad guidelines on how legal services should operate, and they include matters such as the protection and promotion of consumer interest. However, what is not mentioned in those six points is ethical behaviour and ethical standards, although he does talk about them later, and says that they should be in the regulatory framework.

Does the hon. Gentleman believe that anything that comes out of the review should result in us putting the need for ethical behaviour from solicitors in regulations, and right at the top of those regulations, too? Does he agree that there should be an ethical duty on solicitors that forces them to avoid getting into the same situation again, a situation in which some of the most vulnerable constituents—let us not beat about the bush—are being ripped off by solicitors?

Mr. Heald: As I said in an intervention on the hon. Member for North Durham, there is concern about what happens once we say that people who are not professional can represent others in legal proceedings. I practised in industrial tribunals as a lawyer for many years, but I know that often the trade union representative knew more about the matter than I did. There was some excellent representation on offer from the trade unions, and indeed employers. However, we want to be sure that people are given good quality advice. I am worried by the idea of an organisation that does not have a person trained in legal matters undertaking work when it is not skilled in what it is doing. The trend at the moment seems to be towards allowing more of that sort of approach.

The hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) said that there has been a change, and that previously solicitors were not allowed to buy in great classes of cases. One could argue that there were good reasons for that. All movement seems to be towards opening up legal practice to more competition from people who are unqualified. Although there might well be a case for that, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that ethical conduct, high professional standards and all those aspects of the matter should be at the centre of our concern.

Huw Irranca-Davies: Does the hon. Gentleman feel that ethical conduct should be set out as a duty in regulations? That is the strongly held feeling of many hon. Members; such conduct should be a duty for those involved—whether they are lawyers, solicitors or a management organisation—and not something implied.

Mr. Heald: Certainly, one needs to achieve that outcome. We are still considering the Clementi review, and I imagine that the Government are doing the same. If one follows the logic of the review, which is that people who are nothing to do with the legal world can own solicitors' practices, it opens up the possibility that one of the claims handling firms that has been discussed could buy a firm of solicitors and operate it, even though it was not legally qualified in any way, and might not have the same standards as the solicitors' profession would normally expect. It is important that we act in a way that retains the ethical standards of the solicitors' profession, and I agree that it is important to focus on the Law Society and its role.

I would have thought that, by and large, trade unions probably provide a pretty good service in this area. However, if there are concerns about how trade unions are operating, there should not be any barrier to ensuring that they are properly regulated like everyone else.

There seem to be concerns about how the DTI and solicitors operate. That needs to be addressed, and perhaps that is also true of claims handlers, through the Law Society. Perhaps the trade unions need to raise their game, in some cases. I will be extremely interested to hear how the Minister intends to accomplish all that.

3.10 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) on securing this good and important debate. I particularly thank my hon. Friends the Members for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping), for Bassetlaw (John Mann) and for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) for their powerful and passionate contributions.

The debate is, in effect, about justice—social justice. It is about what all of us in this Room went into politics to do: assist people who are vulnerable and who cannot speak up for themselves. Therefore, it is most definitely about the role of our solicitors in society, and the claims management industry that has grown up over the past few years. Central to that discussion is the subject of regulation, particularly of our solicitors.

We expect the highest standards of our solicitors and lawyers; on the whole, they are respected across the world, but it is the practice that we are debating today that goes furthest towards undermining that reputation. That is why the Government made the decision, which they announced yesterday, to accept Sir David Clementi's recommendation on the regulation of solicitors: that is, to separate their representative function—their function as a trade union of solicitors—and their regulatory function. It is precisely because of some of the frustrations that we have heard about this afternoon that that decision had to be taken. There is an issue about how our solicitors are regulated, notwithstanding the work that the Law Society has done and is doing on the issue. I will come back to that.

The sharp and wicked practices in the claims management sector must stop. My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood reminded me in the House a few months ago that the sector was in the last chance saloon; the saloon door is now closed. The Government are moving to regulate that area. It really is outrageous what some of our vulnerable constituents have had to experience.

Obviously, I do not represent a former coal mining area, and particular issues arise in those constituencies. However, what my hon. Friends and I share is the fact that we represent some of the poorest constituencies in this country—the constituencies that come high up in the index of deprivation, the constituencies where over 50 or 70 per cent. of children are on free school meals. We understand what that means for those people. We understand the incomes that they have, and we understand what it means when someone knocks on the door, advertises in the newspaper or appears on television, wearing a suit, and says, "Look, I can provide this service." We understand what it means to those very hard working people who take on face value what professionals claim to offer before moving on to exploit people.

When we talked about the issue, we tended to assume that claims handling is a dry, technical or legal issue, and we heard in this debate that it is far from that. It is not about legalese; it is about the everyday lives of some of the most vulnerable people in this country, especially in former mining areas in the north, and in the Welsh valleys and other areas.

This issue is about access to justice. It is about ensuring that people have honest, accurate and effective legal support that does not raise expectations but is fully committed when a client has a genuinely good case. People must have proper routes to redress, where redress is required, and compensation must be targeted on those with genuine cases who deserve the full weight of our support. The Government's position on this issue is clear. We need to tackle the practices that help to encourage false expectations of compensation, and to improve effectiveness and efficiency for people who have a genuine claim.

Let me explain why some of the practices of claims management companies have been unacceptable. Their methods of dealing with potential clients are often inexcusable. Some of them use the hard sell, putting the squeeze on people even if there is little chance of them receiving compensation. Their practices are even worse because of the kinds of people they approach—ordinary working miners and former miners, and people who work in the textile industry and factories. They are vulnerable people who expect more from lawyers, and from people who operate with lawyers and the insurance industry. The law can seem like a minefield, and it is the job of legal professionals to help people plot their way through it. At its best, the legal system in our country is the finest in the world, providing honest, transparent and expert advice. However, claims companies have failed to live up to that standard. Many of them earn money by using complex systems of referral fees and charges, and, ultimately, the losing party picks up the cost.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I welcome today's announcement on the regulation of claims handlers, although it will take some time to come into effect. Meanwhile, I would like the Minister to urge the Office of Fair Trading and other organisations to act against some of the claim handlers. Will he agree to join me and other Members who are present in meeting the Law Society and other organisations to see what we can do to clamp down now on some of their sharp practices?

Mr. Lammy: Absolutely. I will meet all colleagues in this Room and beyond who want to continue to take action on this issue before a regulatory framework is put in place. I will continue to work with the Claims Standards Council to see what more we can do, and I would be happy to meet the Law Society, which is doing work in this area. We must do more with solicitors, too.

Members have raised issues to do with the Department of Trade and Industry. The Trade and Industry Committee is looking at this issue, and it is due to report shortly. Colleagues in the DTI will want to wait and see what its report says before taking action. All across the Government, the pips are squeaking for this group of people; that is happening because of pressure applied by Members who are present.

David Taylor: All Members for mining areas and former mining areas will welcome that announcement. Will the Minister clarify whether the regulation he mentions will operate within the terms of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, to which the hon. Member for

[David Taylor]

Chesterfield (Paul Holmes) referred, so that the definition of litigation is widened to include advice given in contemplation of litigation?

Mr. Lammy: It might be. We are moving forward: we are accepting the Clementi recommendations; later this year, we will publish our White Paper; we have stated that we are bringing the claims management sector into the loop. As we continue to introduce legislation, we must look closely at the key issues. As we move to regulate the claims management industry and to set up a new regulatory framework for our lawyers, we must look at any gaps that exist, and at how to get the best legislation possible.

Chris Bryant: Everybody will have been glad to hear the Minister say that the saloon door is closed. However, although I do not want to mix metaphors too much, unfortunately, in many cases, the horse has already bolted. There are many cases throughout the country—thousands we suspect, but we do not know precisely how many—where people have already had the money taken from them. That is a serious problem, and changing the legislation now will not affect those cases. Will the Minister look into how we can establish the precise level of this problem in our country? That might be a matter for the DTI, rather than for his Department.

Mr. Lammy: Colleagues in the DTI continue to look into that, and, as I have said, the Trade and Industry Committee is working on it. Many people who are caught up in this way are out there in the system. In its newsletter to former coal miners—not just individually, but through their networks and organisations, and through the citizens advice bureaux and other organisations—the DTI has called for people to come forward. There are problems caused by the fact that some of these cases began a long time ago; people might have moved or died, for example. However, that work is going on, and through the networks and the concerns voiced in this debate, colleagues in the DTI might be able to take it forward in a more strategic way, regardless of what the Trade and Industry Committee says. We should not underestimate the size of this issue, or how long some of these cases go back.

I have spoken a little about the effects of some of these practices—the cold calling, the hard sell, the aggressive behaviour, the unprofessional conduct—on vulnerable people in our communities. We have heard a lot about that from Members today. The Government have favoured self-regulation, and I welcome the steps the Claims Standards Council has taken. It has attempted to produce comprehensive rules and consumer and commercial codes of practice—although I was concerned by what my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham said about the fuzzy line of some of that practice between solicitors and claims managers, and I will look into that.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I have enjoyed the Minister's contribution, and I welcome what he has said, but how can the Claims Standards Council have any credibility when organisations such as Freeclaim IDC are founding members? That is not merely akin to giving Dracula the keys to the blood bank; such organisations have been given a say in how to construct the council. It can have no credibility at all if the very companies that are ripping off my constituents and those of other Members are founder members.

Mr. Lammy: I hear my hon. Friend's frustration. We said that we would move to self-regulation; that has happened within the last year, and I said that such companies were in the last chance saloon. I know that my hon. Friend will accept it in the right spirit when I say that for all regulatory frameworks—for those covering doctors as well as solicitors, and, indeed, for the rules governing the professional conduct of Members of Parliament—there will always be bad apples. However, the Claims Standards Council has been in a position where it can ill-afford its own members to be engaged in some of the conduct that my hon. Friend has done so much to bring to the attention of the Government and the country. That is why I take what he has said in this debate very seriously.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I also welcome much of what the Minister has said. However, I want to make it clear that many Labour Members feel that this is not a matter of the occasional bad apple; the whole barrel is stinking and rotten.

With regard to the adoption of the Clementi principles and the review that the Minister has carried out, he has talked about extending into the regulatory framework the claim handlers. Does he also want to include the unions in that?

Mr. Lammy: A separate set of regulations governs the unions. They would be surprised if the Government were to suggest that they should be brought within the regulatory framework for solicitors. However, I have heard what has been said about some associations that operate in and around the unions.

It is also important to acknowledge the good work that unions do for poor people throughout the country. I have met enough union members, leaders and solicitors who have made representations to me about things like small claims to know that the unions do a lot of good work, and I would not want them to be tarnished by a few bad apples.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I entirely agree with the Minister's sentiments. I am not asking him to consider pulling the unions within the entire regulatory framework, but where unions act as commissioning agents to solicitors, they must fall within it, because no other framework will regulate their activities in that regard. NACODS South Wales raised an estimated £13 million from people, and many of them now want their money back. That can be achieved only if the union falls within this framework.

Mr. Lammy: That is right, where there is a clear crossover. That reminds me that lawyers are often employed within our unions, and that they deal with solicitors and with claims managers, and that all of that behaviour must come within the scope of proper professional conduct. That is what my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) wants.

When we produce our legislation, he and his colleagues will be keen to ensure that it contains the principles and language that provides that professional conduct.

It has also been said that we should emphasise the concept of ethical behaviour. That has always been at the heart of what we expect of a lawyer in this country, along with independence, honesty and integrity. That is why the Government take this matter so seriously. This activity is damaging that perception. I say that with no self-interest as a consequence of being a lawyer myself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Strangely enough, lawyers do not have to declare an interest in this House, which is a situation that is unique to them.

Mr. Lammy: There are a few of us in the Government.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Too many.

Mr. Lammy: Some people think there are too many of us, as my hon. Friend says.

I have explained our position on self-regulation. We must carry on working with the Claims Standards Council, while investigating what my hon. Friends have mentioned, but we must also continue moving towards regulation. I encourage my hon. Friends to engage in that process.

I agree with the DTI about solicitors or claims handlers who overcharge. Those charges are unethical and immoral. The DTI has advised claimants to make sure that they check the charging policy, and that they should not sign anything without having read it first. It has also asked claimants to seek advice from an independent source, such as their local citizens advice bureau.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Our time is up. I invite Members who do not wish to wait for the next debate to leave quickly and quietly. I must also suspend the sitting for a moment, for which I apologise to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge).

3.30 pm

Sitting suspended.

Weapons of Mass Destruction

3.33 pm

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North) (Lab): In some ways, this debate should be considered in the context of two previous Westminster Hall debates. The first took place on 18 January 2000, when we looked ahead to the new millennium and the issue of weapons of mass destruction. We need to consider how we have moved forward in the past five years. The second debate, which took place on 8 March 2005, was secured by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn). We examined the nuclear non-proliferation treaty review. I mention that if only to try to minimise the repetition of points made by me and by others in that debate, for which the same Minister was present.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The same Deputy Speaker as well.

Mr. Savidge: And the same Deputy Speaker.

I also want to concentrate on the relevant section of the United Nations Secretary-General's high-level panel report, "A More Secure World: Our Shared Responsibility", to which the Secretary-General responded yesterday.

I said in the debate on 18 January 2000 that I felt insufficient media attention was given to this subject, although it has received considerably more subsequently. Initially, that was in part due to the all-party group on global security and non-proliferation, which was established that same week.

The Foreign Affairs Committee, in a report that year on weapons of mass destruction, said:

> "Media interest in nuclear weapons and arms control treaties was boosted in March 2000 when Michael Douglas, UN Goodwill Ambassador, urged Members of Parliament to encourage the Prime Minister to take a leading role in preserving arms control regimes."

It said also that while the British and international media coverage had "eye-catching headlines", it gave serious coverage to the issue, which was followed up in a further meeting that we had with the then UN Under-Secretary-General for Disarmament Affairs, Jayantha Dhanapala.

More permanently, the issue has also featured highly as a result of the terrible events of 9/11. Although they did not involve WMD, they bought to our attention the threat of WMD and terrorism. It is a matter of common consent that they are a major problem and one about which our worries have increased since 2000.

As I have said before, it is important that we use careful definitions in relation to WMD and terrorism, particularly as they can be used as a pretext for war. As many people have said, the term "WMD" contains the danger that, although it is a useful phrase, it blurs the difference between the threats posed by different forms of weapon. The radiological weapon, or dirty bomb, is sometimes included in this area. As the high-level panel's report says, it should perhaps be described as a weapon of mass disruption in that it would probably cause comparatively few fatalities, but could lead to a large part of a city being uninhabitable for a while.

The vast majority of chemical and biological threats would also not cause mass fatalities. A lot of loose talk is used in relation to lethal materials such as ricin, which have not been put into a weaponised form that could be used to kill a large number of people at the same time. Similarly, it should be remembered that the worst case analysis of an anthrax attack on Washington was based on a highly sophisticated weaponised version of that agent being used.

[Mr. Savidge]

However, one cannot rule out the possibility of serious biological attacks if, for example, someone wished to cause indiscriminate death on a large scale and distributed a virus in a hub airport. There is also the possible danger, as the report indicates, of biotechnology or genetic manipulation enabling things of a much more serious nature to occur. In general, it is true of nuclear weapons that we can say, as the report does, that any use would be catastrophic.

On terrorism, it is perhaps important to define the terms we use, because while all terrorism is heinous—the high-level panel correctly condemns all forms of terrorism—it is probably true that the majority of political terrorists would not find it in their own interest to cause massive fatalities. However, they might find that something such as a dirty bomb would be in their interests.

It is only the absolutist, unconditional, apocalyptic groups of the type that the Prime Minister described shortly after the events of 9/11 that would want to kill very large numbers of people. We think primarily of al-Qaeda, but we should not think just of Islamic fundamentalism, as can be seen from the examples of the Aum sect or Timothy McVeigh. We should also recognise that we cannot rule out the possibility that political terrorist groups can become absolutist terrorist groups, be it through fanaticism or frustration.

If we are to reduce chemical and biological terrorist risks, we need to get far better control of the stocks that exist, particularly in the former Soviet Union. As the high-level panel says, we need to apply the chemical weapons convention and set about trying to destroy all chemical weapons by the target date of 2012. We also need to seek to establish, through negotiation, a biological and toxic weapons convention with proper verification.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): I recently asked the Foreign Secretary in a written question if he would

"list each multilateral negotiating forum in which United Kingdom nuclear weapons are under discussion pursuant to . . . Article 6 of the . . . non proliferation treaty."

My hon. Friend the Minister for Europe, answering on behalf of the Foreign Secretary, stated:

"None." —[Official Report, 10 March 2005; Vol. 431 c.2002W.]

Does my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge) agree that that puts the United Kingdom in breach of its obligations under article 6 of the NPT? It states:

"Each of the Parties to the Treaty undertakes to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament".

Mr. Savidge: With my hon. Friend's permission, I would rather leave it to the Minister to say what the Government's position is on that.

Llew Smith: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Savidge: I am sorry, but I am short of time.

The greatest immediate threat is from nuclear weapons. The high-level panel indicated that there is a real possibility of terrorists producing a simple gun-type nuclear device, whereby the combination of two amounts of highly enriched uranium could produce a bomb roughly similar to that which the South African Government produced during the apartheid era. The panel suggests that the use of such a weapon in a major city could lead to the deaths of anything from tens of thousands of people to more than 1 million.

One need only imagine the scenario of, say, a suicide bomber in a van in London taking out the whole of Westminster, Whitehall and Buckingham palace. If they chose the state opening, for instance, they would destroy not only the buildings, but the people, which would decapitate the state. One can picture similar scenarios in different capitals. An attack in Washington during the State of the Union address could take out the Executive, the Congress and the judiciary. One can repeat that example for various capitals, whether of dictatorships or democracies. Such an attack could devastate a country and cause panic worldwide. Modern capitals cannot ban vehicles from their centre, so it is therefore in the common interest of all countries, of whatever type, that we co-operate to reduce that threat.

It is important that we reduce proliferation both of nuclear materials and among states and non-state actors. The high-level panel report indicates that the nuclear non-proliferation treaty has enjoyed considerable success, with only eight definite nuclear weapons states—with the possible addition of North Korea—over 40 years, as compared with the much higher number that most experts predicted beforehand.

However, the "atoms for peace" strategy, as Eisenhower put it, has had problems. Civil nuclear energy and military production were assumed to be completely separate, but we now know that they can have considerable dual use. We must therefore beware of the fact that the nuclear power industry produces not only materials that terrorists could use, but targets that they could attack.

The report also indicates that as many as 40 of the 60 states that now have nuclear power are suspected of being able to produce nuclear weapons fairly rapidly. It warns of the risk of a cascade of proliferation. We must therefore recognise the basic risks in the nuclear power industry. However, on the assumption that it will continue to expand, we must certainly try to reduce reprocessing and enrichment, ensure the use of low-enriched uranium rather than highly-enriched uranium, enforce the additional protocol and increase security in the ways discussed at the International Atomic Energy Agency conference that the Government hosted in London last week.

We must also have the utmost control. It is not satisfactory that Sellafield cannot account for significant quantities of weapons-grade material, not only because of the risk of material that is not being properly checked being passed to terrorists: how can we answer if a country such as Iran claims that it cannot account for significant amounts of such material? Will we find that acceptable?

I repeat the appeal that Senator Sam Nunn made when he spoke at the conference and here in Parliament: when the UK is to try to persuade the G8 to deal with the problems of climate change and global poverty, we should also insist that we fulfil the promises made at the G8 meeting in Canada to give proper financial support to the threat reduction programme of decommissioning. That is vital in and of itself, but it is important also because not fulfilling past pledges gives little meaning to the commitments that we make at future G8 meetings. Furthermore, the four issues of poverty, climate, weapons of mass destruction and terrorism are crucially interlinked as we try to build a safer world.

The report makes many other constructive suggestions, which I shall not go into because of time and because some were covered in our debate on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, but I repeat the one major claim made on the nuclear weapons states. We should not abandon the 13 steps that were agreed at the NPT review conference in 2000 and we should give evidence of good faith as to our commitments, including those under article 6, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) indicated.

The report comments on the A. Q. Khan threat of black market distribution of such materials and suggests that the proliferation security initiative deserves support in that respect. The only caution that one should offer is to be wary of precipitate military action, because that can obviously be dangerous, in which context it is correct that the world community is thinking of diplomacy to address the difficult situations with Iran and North Korea.

We should also not forget that there are worse dangers than nuclear terrorism, such as regional nuclear war. Only two or three years ago, India and Pakistan faced terrible risks. There was an acute danger at that time, and we should give our fullest support to the leaderships of both countries, including the past and present Government of India, in their work in the peace process. I am sure that they would say that a number of other countries, especially the US and the UK, played a crucial, positive role in helping to defuse that dangerous situation. However, we must face the fact that if there is more proliferation, further risks of regional war may increase.

There is also the risk of accidental nuclear war. It is surely insane that, this long after the end of the cold war, there are thousands of nuclear weapons, exceeding any possible rational defence or deterrence requirement of any country involved. It is even more insane that so many weapons are on hair-trigger alert. The United Kingdom has set an example by de-alerting, and we should urge other nuclear weapons states to follow it.

I stress the views in the report of the high-level panel, but one cannot ignore the fact that there are different views in the world today. There are influential voices in the United States—neo-conservatives and other hawks—who, in their most extreme version, take a view of US national sovereignty that opposes international treaties, arms control and the United Nations. Such commentators take the view that military might rather than common security should be the basis of defence and that aggression should take preference over diplomacy. Also, they talk of pre-emptive and preventative war. The Project for the New American Century talks of seeking US military dominance throughout the century. There are also plans for new nuclear weapons, and the military-industrial complex seems to be even more powerful than when General Eisenhower coined the phrase.

Such voices give frighteningly different visions from that espoused by George Bush senior of a new world order. Indeed, I would suggest that such views are very different from the mainstream tradition of both the Democratic and Republican parties. If such counsels prevail, we will surely increase rather than reduce the risks we face, and we may even face the risk of global nuclear war, whether before or after the end of the century, which could endanger humanity as a whole.

In a world where nuclear weapons cannot be disinvented, and if we are to have a more secure future, we need to strengthen the United Nations and international treaties and progressively to develop a fair system of international governance and law whereby conflict can be resolved without resort to war. That might seem an impossibly distant vision for a human race whose entire history and culture have been dominated by war, but it shows the scale of the challenge we face.

3.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge) raises an important subject, in which I know he has a long-term interest. As he said, he took part in the debate on similar matters that occurred here two weeks ago. We all agree that weapons of mass destruction pose one of the biggest threats to the security of the United Kingdom and its interests, at home and abroad.

My hon. Friend referred to the recommendations of the UN high-level panel. That is a body which has our support and we are already acting on many of its recommendations. I shall also deal at this stage with his point about Sellafield. He made a point that I do not suppose he would want to press too seriously, comparing the situation in Sellafield with that in Iran. UK civil nuclear facilities, unlike those in Iran, are fully open to International Atomic Energy Agency inspection, so there can be no doubt about our willingness to co-operate fully and answer any questions that the international community may have, although I note his point.

The main threat is the use of WMD by states and terrorists against the UK or against British economic interests.

Llew Smith: On the question of weapons of mass destruction, in particular nuclear weapons, going back to a previous job held by the Minister and a far more important one, editor of Tribune, I know that he was a supporter of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, if he was not a member. With that in mind, does he agree that there are no circumstances that justify the use of nuclear weapons? While I am on my feet, I ask him to answer the question that my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge) refused to answer on the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Mullin: I shall have to come back to my hon. Friend on the point about the non-proliferation treaty;

[Mr. Mullin]

I shall drop him a note about that. As he said, I was an undistinguished editor of Tribune and it is extremely difficult to foresee any circumstances in which nuclear weapons could be used. That, I think, given my current incarnation, is about as far as I can go.

Llew Smith: My question was not whether the Minister could foresee any circumstances. I asked whether he accepts that under no circumstances could the use of nuclear weapons be justified. This is a Government position and I assume, as the Minister is part of the Government, that he has no problems answering that particular question.

Mr. Mullin: I know what my hon. Friend is attempting to do: he wants somehow to separate me from the rest of my Government colleagues, and I decline, if he will forgive me, to go any further down that road.

I spoke about how the main threat is the use of WMD by states and terrorists against the UK or against British economic and strategic interests overseas. We are addressing the production and trafficking of WMD-related material by states, companies and individuals, and working to guard against less obvious risks such as the use of higher education courses in the UK and elsewhere by individuals seeking to acquire technology for proliferation purposes.

Limiting the threat posed by WMD requires coherent policies to detect, deter, check and roll back programmes for the development of WMD and related delivery systems in countries of concern such as North Korea and Iran. We are deeply concerned about North Korea's decision to suspend participation in the six-party talks and its claim of an enhanced nuclear capability. We urge North Korea to re-engage and support the efforts of the US, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea to that end.

We also have serious concerns about Iran's nuclear programme. Following our agreement with Iran, we—along with colleagues from France, Germany and the European Union—are engaged in discussions with Iranian officials. We want a long-term agreement that will provide objective guarantees that Iran's nuclear programme is exclusively for peaceful purposes. The steering committee established under the agreement is meeting tomorrow to review progress.

Mr. Savidge: Can my hon. Friend tell us whether there is any truth in the reports in the press last week that Iran suggested a joint project with the United States so that the US could be reassured about its programme?

Mr. Mullin: I am not aware of any.

Given such clear threats, we must strengthen international co-operation against the proliferation and the use of WMD. We must at all costs maintain an effective multilateral regime. As I said when we debated this subject two weeks ago, the nuclear non-proliferation treaty remains the cornerstone of nuclear non-proliferation. It is a strong treaty, with the widest membership of any arms control treaty, and it retains the wholehearted support of the UK and the vast majority of the international community.

However, recent events have shown that a number of states continue to pursue clandestine nuclear weapons programmes and that there are individuals willing to assist them by providing sensitive materials and technology. The treaty must, therefore, be strengthened.

Llew Smith: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Mullin: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I have only a few minutes left and I am unlikely to get to the end of my speech. I shall happily have a discussion with him after the proceedings are over.

We have no wish to reopen the treaty, but we need stronger measures to address non-compliance. We also want to build support for new measures to combat the spread of sensitive technology. We want to ensure that sensitive nuclear items are not exported to states that may use them for weapons purposes or allow them to fall into terrorist hands.

We are working with partners to make the necessary amendments to the Nuclear Suppliers Group guidelines. We are also working to put into effect the principles set out in the written statement to the House of 25 February 2004 from my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, which said that states that fail to comply with their IAEA safeguards obligations should forfeit access to enrichment and reprocessing equipment and technology.

As regards biological and chemical weapons, we continue to work towards universal adherence to the chemical weapons convention and the biological and toxin weapons convention, in particular to include states such as Egypt, Syria and Israel. This year marks the 80th anniversary of the Geneva protocol against the use of chemical and biological warfare and the 30th anniversary of the biological and toxin weapons convention. The UK will chair this year's annual meetings, where we will be discussing such issues as codes of conduct for scientists. As president of the G8, we will follow up on a range of earlier suggestions on tackling biological threats.

A stronger international framework is essential, but not sufficient in itself, as I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North will agree, to meet the proliferation threat. We want greater practical engagement in counter-proliferation by other states and regional groups. We played a major role in the formulation and unanimous adoption of UN Security Council resolution 1540, adopted on 28 April 2004, which was the first to address the threat posed by WMD proliferation. It obliges all countries to introduce robust legislation to tackle the threat. We welcome work done by the UN Secretary-General's high-level panel.

We are also committed to supporting the G8's global partnership and the proliferation security initiative. We contribute £36.5 million to the global partnership, which deals with dismantling nuclear submarines; safe and secure storage of over 20,000 spent nuclear fuel assemblies; the safe destruction of Russia's chemical weapons stocks; and new employment opportunities for former nuclear scientists and engineers in the former Soviet Union. Over a 10-year period, we expect to invest about $750 million.

The UK strongly supports the May 2003 proliferation security initiative to prevent trafficking in weapons of mass destruction and related technology by states and terrorist groups or criminal networks. Export control is only as strong as its weakest link. We must ensure that multilateral export control regimes are effective and that progressive proposals are not unreasonably held back by one or two states. We must also keep such controls proportionate and simple to administer. In addition to those international efforts, we must act effectively at home.

The first line of defence is an effective outreach programme to alert industry and academic institutions to the possibility that UK technology could help proliferators and to raise awareness of export legislation. The Export Control Act 2002 includes a range of measures aimed at preventing WMD technology from falling into the wrong hands. We should never underestimate the potential threat posed by WMD, but the Government believe that such threats can be minimised through effective multilateralism and concerted domestic efforts. Counter-proliferation will remain a key priority for us and we shall continue to take the lead in promoting a strong international response.

Council Housing (Southwark)

4.1 pm

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): I am very pleased to have the opportunity to introduce an Adjournment debate. As I walked over here, I reflected that it is almost 22 years to the day since I made my maiden speech. That was on the Budget, but this debate is on an issue that is equally important to the majority of my constituents and to many others as well.

The Minister will be aware that the borough in which I live and in part represent—I share it with the Solicitor-General, the right hon. and learned Member for Camberwell and Peckham (Ms Harman), and the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, the right hon. Member for Dulwich and West Norwood (Tessa Jowell)—is the largest local authority landlord in London and the fifth largest in the country. It is not surprising, therefore, that, periodically, each of us returns to the management and future of council housing in Southwark as important issues for our constituents.

I checked the figures, as far as I could, and I believe them to be accurate. I would like to set them out to show the significance of such issues in our borough. There are some 105,000 households in Southwark, under 10 per cent. of which are owned outright by those who live in them. About 20 per cent., or one in five, homes are owner-occupied with a mortgage. Only 1 per cent. have shared ownership, but four out of 10 people in the borough live in local authority property. In my part of the borough—the old borough of Southwark and the borough of Bermondsey—the figure is well over 50 per cent., so very many more than half the people I represent are local authority tenants.

In addition to being the largest local authority landlord in London, with 42,500 properties run by the London borough of Southwark, we also have one of the largest amounts of leasehold properties—those bought under the right to buy, but where the council retains the freehold interest. The figure I was given last Friday was 12,600. Just over 15,000 properties have been sold under the right to buy, but some of those are completely freehold, rather than leasehold.

I want to put three other statistics on the record. First, the current figure from the office of the director of housing is that nearly 14,000 people are waiting either to become council tenants or to transfer within the local authority stock. Secondly, of those, 4,000 are waiting for a transfer while the others are waiting to become council tenants, so there are 9,000 people in the queue. Even though we are the largest landlord, there is still an enormous queue. Thirdly, the number of local authority properties being built is about 150, of which 100 are on the Elmington estate in Camberwell, in the constituency of the Solicitor-General, while 40 are on the Coopers Road estate in Bermondsey, near where I live. There are, of course, other developments that are not local authority developments.

That is the backdrop, and I want to put on record a few statements of what I believe the vast majority of my constituents regard as the issues. I hope to continue to engage with Ministers in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, including the Minister in the Chamber today and the Minister for Housing and Planning, in the constructive discussions that are talking place. I also hope to encourage them to continue doing the right things in the few weeks left, if the election is to take place this spring, and to ensure that those statements are on the record for whoever inherits ministerial office in relation to looking after housing in London after the election.

[Simon Hughes]

I want to say unequivocally that all the experience and information that I have confirms that the vast majority of Southwark council tenants wish to remain Southwark council tenants and therefore want what is colloquially described as the fourth option. The Government are very keen that the relationship between local authorities and their housing stock and tenants moves on. This has been well rehearsed on the Floor of the House: I have put questions to the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister, and many other colleagues have raised the issues, including the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who has regularly introduced an early-day motion on the subject.

Many have argued the case that if people want to remain conventional council tenants, they should be able to do so. I hope that that remains an option. The Minister will know that there was a ballot on one of the large Southwark estates, the Aylesbury, which is predominantly in the constituency of Camberwell and Peckham, although a small part of it is in my constituency. There was a 70 per cent. turnout—very high these days—and a 70 per cent. vote against transfer.

There was a possibility a few years ago of another estate—Tabard Gardens, which is entirely in my constituency—being transferred to the Peabody Trust, when my colleagues in the authority began, for the first time, a Liberal Democrat administration. My colleague, Councillor Beverley Bassom, who was then the executive member for housing, took the view that the tenant management co-operative that was then in place would not vote yes in a ballot for transfer to the Peabody Trust, so she stopped that process—rightly, in my view.

I hope that the Minister will accept that the fourth option for boroughs such as ours—with the overwhelming support of the tenants, the tenants' council, the representative bodies and the local authorities—can remain. That is the first and most important point that I want to make.

Secondly, I am conscious that the Government have rightly said that the immediate task is to find the money to achieve decent homes standards for all council tenants. I sign up to that; it is a laudable objective. People living in substandard council stock clearly need to be in much better homes, and I accept the timetable that has been set out. I hope it will be possible for the funding—not just of the coming financial year, which starts next week, but of years ahead—to make it possible for that to be achieved. I hope that, if there is a difficulty or a sticking point with funding from Government sources, according to the current projections, but it is possible to make up any difference through all the regeneration and other schemes that the local authority is happily exploring or proceeding with, we can achieve decent homes standards but retain the council stock.

It was a surprise to Ministers in other Departments that the decent homes programme does not require improvements that you and I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and probably the Minister, would regard as necessary. For example, a decent home on a decent estate might require a CCTV system to ensure proper security. As I understand it, that is not programmed in; I think it should be. Security and safety doors might be wanted at the bottom of a block where the concierge system might be. That should be included. Playgrounds and safe play areas for children ought to be included. I hope that we can improve decent homes standards to be able to give all the tenants on all the estates in Southwark—all local authority tenants—the opportunity to have a decent home that is also safe and in a safe, decent and respectable community.

I am keen to hear from the Minister—I hope he can be helpful—that there is now increasingly joined-up government between the ODPM and those responsible for housing, both nationally and in the Government office for London, and in other Departments dealing with, for example, leisure, safety—the Home Office—and open spaces and the like.

The third issue is a live issue, and the Solicitor-General and I share a view on this. Leaseholders who bought under the right to buy in boroughs such as ours have often had a bad deal. Some were badly advised when they bought their homes—we all have constituents who bought not knowing what the implications were and who did not get good legal advice—and some have not received a good service. My colleague, Councillor Stephen Flannery, who has just become the executive member for housing, is writing, as we speak, to all the leaseholders to apologise about the fact that people have had a bad service in the past, such as delays and inaccuracies with bills.

I have two propositions to put to the Minister. He might want to give an immediate response, but I want to feed them into the programme of government. First, a lot of people think it is unfair that an estimate for capital or other works is effectively a take-it-or-leave-it estimate once the council has put the job out to tender. Yes, people might be able to negotiate to pay in instalments; yes, Southwark and other local authorities have introduced a buyback scheme for people who discover that the cost is too big; yes, in extreme circumstances, a charge can be put on the property so that people do not have to pay and, following death or assignment, it goes to someone else who has it deducted.

However, the one thing that I have found hugely frustrating over the years—I was partly responsible for setting up the Southwark Association of Leaseholders and leaseholder organisations because of the many frustrations—is the fact that, once a section 20 notice is served, the council has put the job out to tender. So, effectively, although people are entitled to make "a reasonable response" as a leaseholder, if the council believes that the cost in the original tender is reasonable or that what is included in the works is reasonable, it is unalterable.

I propose that we should build into the legislation through a small amendment—I hope that Southwark will do this without legislation—something that will allow independent arbitration of the cost of capital or other works, so that after the council proposes, but before it disposes, leaseholders can go to an independent body and say, "We think this is too much. It is unreasonable and it encompasses other things."

I move to my second proposal. A private leaseholder in a private block for which there is a management company effectively goes out into the market, gets in some tenders and opts for one of them, but that is not possible for local authority leaseholders. Therefore, people who lease council homes from local authorities do not have the same rights and control as private leaseholders. Can the legislation be amended so that things can be handled that way round? Leaseholders would get the advice, then the council would say, "We need to put on a new roof, do security works and talk to you about new windows." Then we would have an agreed way forward.

Just this week, two reports were submitted to Southwark council about the Aylesbury estate, which the Minister may have etched in his political memory because it is the estate where the Prime Minister went to look out over the blocks and talk about the new Britain that would come under new Labour. The people on the Aylesbury are always hopeful that what was promised will be delivered; they are still hopeful, although it has not been delivered as quickly under this Government as they would have liked. They deserve to be looked after.

The northern half of that part of Walworth where the Heygate estate is, which the Minister will probably know from his travels around London, is to be demolished and replaced. The council is absolutely committed to providing at least as many affordable properties as before. Everybody who was on the Heygate will be able to return to an affordable property there, and everybody who wants to remain a council tenant will be able to do so. I have signed up to that, as it is a good scheme.

The southern half of that middle part of Walworth is the Aylesbury estate, which is one of the largest estates in London. The reports show, happily, that some concerns that were cause for alarm are not borne out. One report states that only the five and six-storey blocks on the Aylesbury, built using the large-panel system, need to be strengthened and that all other blocks, both higher and lower than that level, do not require any changes. Work also needs to be done to ensure that people in those blocks do not use gas and that they are transferred to an electricity supply.

Aylesbury New Deal for Communities—an organisation I support, which covers the whole estate—is working to ensure that the quality of life there improves. I hope that the Government will support Aylesbury NDC by providing the money needed to do the work that has clearly been identified as necessary. The report is not alarmist; the buildings are not about to fall down and there is no cause for panic, but work must be done on certain blocks to ensure that people are safe and feel safe, and the Government should respond positively to that.

When I was elected, which was around the time that Lord Heseltine's urban development corporation in London was set up, there was huge development along the river: wharves were converted to luxury flats and there were many new builds, shared ownerships and other property developments. However, there is still more than a bit of a tale of two cities. Things are fine for people on the lowest incomes who are happy to stay in council property, or people who are happy irrespective of their income. There is council property, but not enough. We need more.

People whose income means that there is no limit to what they can spend on accommodation can be offered places such as those at Butlers wharf, but for those whom we often refer to as ordinary, decent, working people—those who aspire to go up the ladder a bit, who want to stay in a borough such as ours, who love the inner city, whose families are there and whose children go to local primary schools such as the one I went to this afternoon—we still do not have enough suitable property.

We need to ensure that our council housing is of the highest quality. I ask that we should be allowed to continue to build more good-quality council housing, but that—I accept that the Deputy Prime Minister has been alive to this issue—we do not keep losing stock out the other end through the old Conservative right-to-buy policies, which meant that the best stock went, and was often sold on and lost. We must continue to have good-quality, rented, affordable housing so that Southwark can become a mixed community of the sort that people can be proud to come to and stay in, not least because the housing is of good quality.

I am grateful for the Government's work so far, and I think that we share the same objectives. I probably have the largest number of council tenants of any English Member of Parliament, so I hope the Minister understands that this is a hugely important issue whether it is election year or not. I also hope that the investment, support and work with my local authority will continue.

4.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) on securing the debate. I assure him, his constituents and all Southwark council's tenants that we are committed to delivering decent homes for all.

The hon. Gentleman may not know this, but I visited the Aylesbury estate last Thursday—not that part that is in his constituency, or I would, of course, have informed him accordingly—and I conducted, for the first time, a street audit regarding an organisation called Living Streets and what can be done when local issues affecting people's lives are addressed, as well as how changes can be made by the community, the local authority and other partners to improve the quality of life on the pavements, along the shop fronts, in the streets and among traffic. I may say some more about that.

The hon. Gentleman began with a good summary of the position in Southwark—the number of houses in council ownership and so on—and I want to put that description of Southwark into a national context, because it is helpful to see its relevance. There are 4.1 million social homes, which are a tremendous asset in financial terms—worth around £400 billion—and an immeasurable asset to the community and the country. However, the impact of decades of neglect and under-investment left us with a £19 billion backlog of repairs in 1997. We responded to that huge challenge by radically changing our approach to housing policy, building in far greater flexibility and greater capacity for investment in that housing stock because of the scale of the problem.

[Phil Hope]

The results of that radical change since 1997 have been dramatic. We have reduced the number of non-decent social homes by no fewer than 1 million and we have increased the proportion of vulnerable households in the private sector living in decent homes to 63 per cent. That is important to us. We have massively increased investment: local authorities have invested more than £13 billion in bringing their homes up to a decent standard and a further £5.3 billion—£1 billion being £1,000 million—has been levered in from the private sector through transfer. On top of that, local authorities' plans suggest that they will invest a further £11 billion in their stock by 2008. That is a huge investment in our local social housing stock.

We are on track to meet our target that, by 2010, everyone living in social housing will have a decent home and that 70 per cent. of vulnerable households in private accommodation will also have a decent home. By the time that we meet our target, we expect that local authorities and housing associations will together have spent no less than about £42 billion on ensuring that their tenants live in decent homes.

That target is not merely about bricks and mortar—a point the hon. Gentleman made. It is about individuals, families, the young and the old, and their right to live in a secure and stable environment. That is absolutely right. The spending of that £42 billion by 2008 is a crucial part of our commitment to create safe, sustainable communities. Last month, the Deputy Prime Minister launched "Homes for All", the Government's five-year plan that sets out the way forward for housing. Decent homes and the decent homes target are, of course, an integral part of that plan. I am confident that we all agree that the decent homes strategy is tremendously important to our communities and neighbourhoods.

I will now talk about Southwark specifically. The hon. Gentleman rehearsed some of the facts. For example, 44 per cent. of Southwark's homes do not meet the decent homes standard. Southwark is considering what is achievable with the resources that it has. It may be viable for Southwark to deliver most, if not all, decent homes using the borough's resources. That is, of course, for Southwark to determine. It is the responsibility of the London borough of Southwark to work with tenants to develop a strategy for the council to achieve its decent homes target and to close the funding gap.

Other London boroughs with a large housing stock have taken on that challenge. The London borough of Lambeth, for example, is also one of the country's biggest landlords. The council's option appraisal—the appraisal of the various options for improving the stock in Lambeth—has just been signed off. I stress that we need Southwark to do the same. I do not for one moment underestimate the size of the challenge facing Southwark. As the hon. Gentleman said, it is one of the largest landlords in the country, and the largest in London, with responsibility for more than 45,000 properties.

There are options and choices, and I shall mention one route that might be appropriate for Southwark. If retention is not an option, the arm's-length management organisation option is one that will deliver additional resources to deliver decent homes while keeping the stock in local authority ownership and ensuring that tenants retain all existing rights. That is important, because it is not the popular understanding.

As there has been much misleading campaigning about that option, not just in London but elsewhere, I want to be clear about the fact that ALMO programmes are not a means of privatising housing by the back door. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, where tenants opt to have their homes maintained by an ALMO, those homes remain the property of the local authority. That is an important point. The option, therefore, is not only not privatisation—I will keep saying that until people finally understand it—but it offers tenants an improved service, with many council housing departments making particular efforts to raise their performance so that the ALMO can achieve the necessary two-star rating and attract additional Government funding to help it to deliver decent homes. Southwark is in that position. So, we have opportunities and options.

Separating management and maintenance functions enables councils to focus their efforts more directly on the strategic management of their stock, while the ALMO focuses its efforts on delivering the highest standards of service to tenants. Those high standards are delivering results. This year we will see the first ALMOs bring all the council stock that they manage up to the decent homes standard.

So, I understand why the hon. Gentleman mentioned what he called the fourth option—a different option for investing in housing. That does not exist, but ALMOs do, as does the option of retaining the existing stock. I hope he recognises that ALMOs are an option that merits attention.

Simon Hughes: Of course I recognise that point. I have never disputed it. The issue is what the tenants want.

Phil Hope: Indeed.

Simon Hughes: If tenants prefer one option to another, I hope the Government will support that option.

Phil Hope: That is absolutely right. To start that debate with tenants, Southwark needs to engage in the options appraisal process. Southwark has started some of the necessary steps to make that process work and is working closely with the ODPM and the Government office for London to come up with a strategy to take forward the options appraisal process.

Given the hon. Gentleman's point, the important aspect is that effective tenant engagement is critical to the options appraisal. He is absolutely right about that. Tenants are at the heart of the options appraisal process and the need to engage with them to seek their views on future management of their homes is vital to our policies. All local authorities are obliged to draw up communications strategies that set out in practical terms exactly how they intend to involve tenants and other stakeholders.

We go further than that. We also ensure that tenants are properly equipped to make informed decisions about the options open to them. We recognise that it is fundamental to tenants' rights that they can access impartial information without bias to any option. That is why we encourage local authorities to use an independent tenant adviser to ensure that tenants have a clear picture of the process.

Our community housing task force, which brings together expert advisers from a range of social housing backgrounds, provides advice and support to local authorities on all aspects of options appraisal, including how best to inform and consult with tenants. Tenant engagement does not stop once a decision has been made: tenants make up about a third of the governing boards of transfer housing associations and ALMOs, which broadens tenant participation to estate and neighbourhood level.

The hon. Gentleman raised one or two points other than the specifics about decent homes. I want to address them. First, on the wider questions of security, safety, playgrounds and play areas, he will be aware that the Government have adopted a public service agreement—PSA 8—which is about liveability and ensuring that we have cleaner, safer and greener communities. That is my shorthand for it.

That PSA target requires not just one but nine Departments to work collaboratively. We have established an inter-ministerial departmental group made up of Ministers from each of the relevant Departments—the Home Office, the Department for Transport, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the ODPM, which is in the chair, and others—to consider what we can do to bring together the various strategies that affect a local community.

When I did the street audit that I mentioned, it was clear to me that a vast number of organisations are affected. I did a short walk from St. Peter's church to Walworth road and back to the bottom end of the Aylesbury estate. We are considering issues surrounding crime, policing and community support officers, as well as waste management and litter clearing. We are also considering questions of shop frontage, roads up and down the Walworth road, crossing the road safely and access for people with disabilities or who have buggies.

Those issues have to be tackled using a joined-up approach or this simply will not work. We are promoting such street audits as a good way of engaging local councillors, MPs—I am sure the hon. Gentleman would enjoy undertaking one of those activities—and, in particular, local residents. I was on the Aylesbury estate with local residents and two young people who are year 6 pupils at the local St. Peter's school. They were very articulate and they pointed it out to us that people of a certain height can see certain things, but that those who are slightly smaller see other things on the streets with regard to their lives and what would make those streets a cleaner and more pleasant place to be. This is an effective process.

We are publishing three new guides. We have already published the first, on town centre management. It joins together all the resources and powers available to local authorities and other partners to make town centres better. There will be a second guide, on managing residential areas, to be published, I hope, in June—depending on events that the hon. Gentleman alluded to—and a third, on parks and open spaces, to ensure that those are properly managed and delivered.

We are alive not only to the specific issue of decent homes and the long-term future—working with organisations such as Aylesbury New Deal for Communities, which is doing a magnificent job—but to the everyday management of the street, which is important when people walk out of their front door, through the parks and into the town centre and the shopping centre. What is life like for local people and how can we make it better? I am delighted that, as the hon. Gentleman said, the board of Aylesbury New Deal for Communities is at the forefront of taking forward new proposals to improve quality of life on the estate.

The issue involves not only decent homes, but putting together a comprehensive package of improvements for local residents. Southwark has started to make progress, which is encouraging. That means that Southwark's tenants should all be living in decent homes by 2010. I hope that the hon. Gentleman can use his influence in the council to ensure that members of the council remain committed to the stock options appraisal process. He can use his influence among tenants to ensure that there is positive engagement with what is an important agenda.

It being twenty-nine minutes to Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 23 March 2005

[MR. FRANK COOK in the Chair]

Women in the Criminal Courts

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Ainger.]

9.30 am

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I am pleased to have drawn this debate on the day after the recommencement of the Fawcett commission on women and the criminal justice system, which I chair. The commission was re-launched by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary last night, and we also saw the launch of our new document "One Year On".

The first phase of the Fawcett commission was set up by the Fawcett Society as a result of concerns about the treatment of women in the criminal justice system. It is a system largely designed by men for men, and it continues to be a man's world. That is something about which it is possible to feel ambivalent, because at its root is the fact that 90 per cent. of all crime is committed by men, as is about 95 per cent. of all violent crime. It is reasonably well known that about the same percentage of senior judges are men.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I stand second to none in my admiration for the work that my hon. and learned Friend does in the House in this regard, but does she accept that there can be a gender bias against men in the courts, particularly in cases involving child custody?

Vera Baird: I do not accept that there is a bias against men in such cases.

David Taylor: Or can be.

Vera Baird: Nor that there can be. In a small percentage of difficult cases, the parties can become polarised. My hon. Friend will be aware that there is a new Bill on that very topic, and I am a member of the Committee that is scrutinising its drafting. I think that he will find some of our suggestions to improve it helpful.

I return to the criminal courts, and the treatment of women—the topic of the debate. It is not surprising, given the figures that I quoted, that women have been treated as an add-on, an after thought, an also-ran; they are tacked on to the end of the male system as if they had no distinct or separate needs. Indeed, that was the finding of the first phase of the Fawcett commission. In the year prior to March 2004, we gathered a great volume of our own evidence, and we also drew together existing research on adult women in the criminal justice system in England and Wales.

We found a common theme, with systemic disadvantage being faced by women in the courts, whether as victims, offenders or as practitioners. To address that disadvantage, our primary recommendation was that public bodies should have a duty to promote gender equality, and we are delighted that the new Equality Bill contains provisions for exactly such a duty.

The diversity of agencies that work in the criminal justice system makes a firm argument for such a duty. The Prison Service, the courts, the Crown Prosecution Service, the police, the National Offender Management Service and a range of other services all come together to form the criminal justice system, and it is difficult for each organisation to ensure that it has no gender bias. It is imperative that they work together to end it. The Fawcett commission felt that the need for a gender duty was pointed up strongly by the criminal justice system.

Our findings were published in March 2004, and they received widespread attention both domestically and internationally. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), the former Home Secretary, described it as "a unique and invaluable contribution to the debate on the reform of criminal justice".

So far as we are aware, it is truly the first study undertaken in the United Kingdom on women and the criminal justice system.

The Fawcett Society lobbied the Government and the courts to make the necessary reforms, and we monitored progress on our recommendations. We then produced our report "One Year On". We had found systemic disadvantage, but that was in March 2004, when our money ran out, so all we could do was say, "Everything is terrible, but I'm afraid we have to leave the job now." Happily, we can now express our gratitude to the Esmée Fairbairn Foundation and to the Barrow Cadbury Trust, which have allowed us to continue for two further years. "One Year On" launches this new phase.

In our view, there are two key strategic challenges for the Government in connection with women and the criminal courts. First, there is an overwhelming need for a coherent and structured approach to addressing violence against women. Secondly, there is a similarly powerful need for all agencies to take responsibility for stopping the ongoing horror of self-inflicted deaths and injuries in women's prisons. These two areas are closely related.

Violence against women is an issue of fundamental human rights that includes, among other offences, rape, sexual exploitation, trafficking, domestic violence, forced marriage, crimes in the name of "honour" and female genital mutilation. These offences have a terrible impact on the lives of women and girls and are far more widespread than is commonly thought. The most recent British crime survey shows that almost half of women have experienced domestic violence, sexual assault or stalking. Violence against women also has a wide impact on society. Government research estimates that domestic violence alone—just one of the strands of violence against women that I have cited—costs the country £6 billion a year, rising to £23 billion if the human and emotional costs are taken into account.

Our report on victims and witnesses who are women in phase 1 of the commission highlighted the "post-code lottery" of services for victims. We have found in our review "One Year On" that provision is still pretty patchy. We are therefore throwing our weight, such as it is, behind the call from Amnesty International and the Women's National Commission for a comprehensive strategy cutting across all Departments to tackle violence against women.

[Vera Baird]

We also need to develop a more sophisticated understanding of the relationship between women's victimisation and their offending. Our courts categorise people as either victims or offenders, ignoring the considerable overlap between the two. Good research by the Fawcett gender and justice policy network shows that a disproportionately high number of women in prison have a history of suffering violence, abuse and victimisation. Those are features of people's lives that tend to lead to self-harm, too. It is a shocking fact that death and self-harm are a matter of routine in women's prisons. We are deeply concerned about the systemic failure to protect vulnerable women in the state's care. Since we reported in March 2004, there have been a further 12 self-inflicted deaths by women who were sent to prison by the courts. The Government committed themselves in the 2004 spending review to funding radical alternatives to custody for women offenders—that was the turn of phrase—which was a welcome move. However, the provision must be resourced properly if it is to be effective.

The third approach that we took to women, the criminal courts and the broader justice system was to consider their experience as workers in the criminal courts. We strongly believe that improving the treatment of women practitioners will lead to better treatment of women victims and offenders. Since we reported in 2004, it has been a difficult time for those in the prison and probation services, because of the changes taking place and the merger of what, even to the most casual observer, are the two completely conflicting cultures of the probation and prison services. However, we welcome the progress being made and Government proposals to set up the judicial appointments commission and to make reforms to the police service. We hope that both sets of proposals will help to improve diversity.

These are the general ways in which we considered the position in 2004. Specifically with regard to the courts, women's lack of representation at senior level in the judiciary was the most obvious thing that jumped out at us. The system of appointment varied across the judiciary, and still does. It is much more transparent and open in the lower parts of the system—for example, in the magistrates courts and tribunals—where the work force are consequently more diverse. The independent Commission for Judicial Appointments has found systemic bias against female and ethnic minority candidates in the appointment system, and the evidence that we collected suggested the same.

Our male-dominated criminal courts have affected the experience of women who come before them as victims, witnesses or defendants. We found—this is not new to insiders—that rape victims felt that they were the ones on trial, rather than the defendants, and they blamed the attitude of the judiciary in large part for that.

David Taylor: My hon. and learned Friend outlines the case comprehensively. Is not the judicial system disfigured by a pernicious stereotype of women? Where women are offenders, are they not doubly disadvantaged, because they are measured by whether they fall short of some idealistic expectation of good womanhood, as Helena Kennedy has said? Is that not a problem in the legal system?

Vera Baird: I can perceive that it may be a problem in society more widely, but there is much in what my hon. Friend says. There has been a huge domination by males in the judiciary, and consequently there is a canteen culture that can confirm out-of-date stereotypes of women. That makes it difficult for those in the judiciary who, with the best will in the world, intend to be independent and neutral, to shed those biases when they come to do their work. I thank my hon. Friend for making that point.

We found in our research that special measures to help vulnerable witnesses, introduced as long ago as under the Access to Justice Act 1999, were not being implemented properly in court. Those special measures are opportunities for vulnerable witnesses to give their evidence in a sheltered way, such as from behind a screen, by television link or, ultimately, on video; that way, they would not have to go into court at all. However, we found that these measures were not being implemented consistently, and that they were still regarded rather as measures for children, not adults.

We found also that lengthy court processes could lead to the withdrawal of vulnerable victims. As for domestic violence, lengthy court processes provided the opportunity for further violence and intimidation to occur. Domestic violence has the highest rate of repeat victimisation of all crime, at 50 per cent. Specialist domestic violence courts have been established to try to improve victim safety and ensure an integrated approach. I shall return to those specialist courts later.

In our research inquiries, we found widespread concern that the courts were becoming increasingly punitive against defendants, particularly women. In 2002, 12,650 women were sent to prison. Last year, the figure was about 500 more. The majority of those women are no risk to the public, and the single most common offence for which women are imprisoned is shoplifting. Almost 40 per cent. of women in prison had attempted suicide at some stage in their life prior to going to prison—a much higher figure than for men in prison and for the general female population. The growth in the female prison population has much outstripped the growth in the male prison population. On 19 March, the number of women in prison stood at four thousand, eight hundred and thirty-something.

The average sentence that the courts give a woman is 39 days. That is insufficient for any rehabilitative process to commence. It is insufficient for any courses to be gone on, or for women to address their offending in any way, and of course they are not required to do so; all that they are required to do on short sentences of that sort is cool their heels until they are released. It is, however, quite long enough for women to lose their homes, to lose their jobs, or to have their benefits disrupted for their children to require a different sort of care. Their lives, as I shall describe, are often chaotic in the first place, and are thrown into even deeper chaos by the time that they come out of prison.

Nothing is gained by short sentences, especially as two thirds of women who have been sentenced to prison for non-violent offences reoffend within two years.

Short sentences do the women damage and, given the disruption to their children's lives, are bound to knock crime into the next generation. Nor do they do us any good, because they simply do not work.

In the course of our research, the Law Commission examined partial defences to murder, which is particularly relevant to women who kill a domestically abusive partner. They often go to court facing that charge with no appropriate defence available to them. They have not killed because they lost their self-control as a result of the provocative behaviour of their male adversary. Usually, they act in fear rather than in anger. If they have acted in self-defence but have gone too far, perhaps by stabbing—the most common form of domestic killing of an abuser is stabbing him, having run away from him into the kitchen and seizing a knife from the draining board—they are guilty of excessive self-defence, which carries a conviction for murder, not for manslaughter.

To be fair to the Court of Appeal, it has stretched case law in this area, through famous cases such as Sara Thornton and Emma Humphreys, until it has almost cracked, and it cannot cope with such cases much longer. There is an urgent need for the law to be reviewed.

Furthermore, although the Court of Appeal has stretched case law, which is to the benefit of women in the appalling position of having to strike back against an abuser who has often been violent to them for many years, these developments are not very well known. They are not, for instance, statutory. Given that the understanding of the relevance of domestic violence to the way women react in such situations is relatively new, we have a real fear that several women are in custody or have been convicted of murder who should not be in that position, and we are anxious to persuade the Government to assist us to review those cases.

One year on, is there a great deal of change in the courts, Mr. Cook?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would be remiss in the exercise of my duties if I did not ask hon. Members to bear in mind that in establishing this parallel Chamber, the House decided that the Chairman should be addressed as Mr. Deputy Speaker when the Chair is occupied by one of the four senior members of the Speaker's Panel of Chairmen.

Vera Baird: I cannot apologise enough. The fact that I am familiar with the Deputy Speaker day to day—not in the way that your facial expression suggests, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but as he is my next door parliamentary neighbour but one—has lent me to be inappropriately over-familiar in my mode of address. I am sorry. I thought that I had done something absolutely terrible, and I have.

One year on, have things changed in the criminal courts? Perhaps unsurprisingly, there is little change in women's representation in the senior judiciary from a year ago. There are, of course, the one woman in the House of Lords, to whom we all cling as a sign of light at the end of the tunnel, two women in the Court of Appeal and 10 women in the High Court. A very pleasing development that we must make a point of noting is the appointment of Linda Dobbs, the first black and minority ethnic woman to be appointed to the High Court.

Despite changes to the system of appointing judges, which are already ticking over, the independent Commission for Judicial Appointments and our research still found cases in which comments had been made about women's dress sense or their marital status when their appropriateness for an appointment was being discussed. There is a deeply embedded cultural problem in the system, which will be hard to crack, but the Government's document welcomes increasing diversity in the judiciary. We make recommendations in our paper "One Year On" that are very similar to those made by the Government.

We would add that part-time work as a judge will be important in ensuring that women play a fuller role, and we hope that that will be given greater emphasis as the Commission for Judicial Appointments develops. Largely as a result of pressure from the commission, High Court judges, like circuit judges, now have to attend training on serious sexual offences before they can hear rape cases. Only two years ago, High Court judges had no training whatever on those offences, but in the last year, we have seen research on section 41 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 about judicial attitudes. That section attempts to restrict occasions when previous sexual history can be given in rape trials to discredit the complainant, and research into its efficacy was carried out by the Criminal Bar Association; it was problem based and merits a good read.

Contrary to the research's conclusion that section 41 should never have been passed and has made no difference, it shows some very good thinking by a small number of judges about the relevance of previous sexual history. It shows that they have taken on the spirit of the section and that they require their own thinking to go through the hurdles and over the fences in order to prove a sexual history. They looked again at the measure's relevance and said, "I would have let that in before, and section 41 has made me think differently." The overwhelming bulk of judges do not think like that and the way they approach problems is, frankly, a disgrace in this modern time. I recommend anyone who takes an interest in the issue of women and criminal justice to read the research, by Neil Kibble, to understand the depth of cultural attitudes, and the extent to which they still prevail in our modern judicial system.

We have genuine worries about the calibre of judicial training because there is a problem persuading judges that there is a distinction to be drawn between their preserving their independence, which is imperative, and their need to understand complex modern issues such as domestic violence and rape. Any attempt to teach them modern attitudes to these offences which they can take into account in their judicial functioning is seen by them as an assault on their independence, which it should not be.

As to defendants, intermittent custody has started to be implemented since the commission first reported; we considered it in the new report and found problems for women. The pilot study showed that when and if it is rolled out, the fact that there are only 19 women's prisons, far fewer than there are men's prisons, means that women will be required to travel longer distances. There is evidence that it is extremely difficult and expensive for women to get to intermittent custody locations for the weekend. None the less, it is imperative that women, especially, should be given that opportunity so that they can keep their jobs and stay with their families for the rest of the week.

[Vera Baird]

The Government will have to bite the bullet and pay the costs for women travelling to intermittent custody. If that is positive discrimination, it is based on the fact that women live further away from the prisons than men, that overall they are poorer than men and that many women who go into custody, intermittent or otherwise, have been convicted of crimes that are linked to poverty. It is a problem, and we invite the Government to consider it.

A single community order will replace all current community sentences in April, with the aim of allowing such a sentence to provide a tailored package for the individual needs of the offender. That will work for women only if the National Offender Management Service tailors community provision to be women-specific, of which it does very little now.

We were pleased that last night, in launching our report, the Home Secretary announced £9.1 million over the next four years for community provision for women offenders to replace custody. It is clear that the detail has not been fully realised, but we are pleased that for the first time, as we requested, attention and money are being given to women-specific sentences. That was the thrust of the report.

It is likely that poor mental health contributes significantly to women's involvement in crime. We have found that vulnerable women whose psychiatric condition is giving courts concern are often remanded in custody—put into that dangerous location—specifically to obtain psychiatric reports on their state of mind. That seems short-sighted and wrong. We believe that local psychiatric services and voluntary services have to be brought together with local courts to provide fast-track psychiatric assessment and appropriate community treatment packages. That should be done as a matter of urgency.

We make some specific recommendations in "One Year On", which I commend to the Minister. We are convinced that the gender, race and disability duty should apply to the new judicial appointments commission. I cannot see any reason why it should not. Could the Minister confirm that? We also recommend that the Sentencing Guidelines Council should take account of diversity issues, including gender, when it drafts guidelines on sentencing for the court, and that the Home Affairs Committee, which scrutinises its work, should likewise take account of diversity, including gender.

As the new public duty to promote gender equality will not apply to the judiciary—there is an express exclusion—can the Minister confirm that it will apply to the Sentencing Guidelines Council so that gender can be taken into account when the judiciary is sent guidelines? We think that where the defendant has caring responsibilities, they should not be remanded or sentenced to prison without a report on the impact of that incarceration on their dependants. We should like to see that become a rule of law. We think that where the defendant appears to the court to have mental health problems but does not justify admission to hospital, they should not be remanded or sentenced to prison without a medical report on the impact of incarceration on their mental health.

In view of the problem that we have raised about intermittent custody, we believe that it and the new community orders should be monitored carefully to ascertain their impact on women offenders and the impact on families. We support the call I mentioned, which was first raised by Justice for Women and Southall Black Sisters, that the cases of women currently in prison serving murder sentences for the killing of violent partners should be reviewed, because we have real fears that many of them are there wrongly.

I return quickly to the issue of specialist domestic violence courts. Research carried out by the Government shows that they are improving the treatment of victims, increasing effectiveness and promoting information sharing. We visited a very good example of a domestic violence court in west London. We wonder what is to happen to these courts. There have been five pilots—in west London, Derby, Leeds, Wolverhampton and Cardiff. The Leeds one is five years old. The Derby one is now 18 months old. They all differ but they are all grounded in some pretty straightforward principles.

The police identify cases at the earliest opportunity to ensure that they go to the special domestic violence court. In west London, it meets every Thursday. None of these centres meets every day. Overnight arrests and remands in custody are bailed or remanded again by the ordinary courts to the domestic violence court, once the offence has been identified. District judges are trained specifically in domestic violence. There is great reliance on professional district judges, as everyone seems to think that they are preferable to lay magistrates for these cases. They build up a body of experience and do not consequently have the sort of light attitudes to domestic violence that other judges, who are less well trained and less well versed in the complexity of these issues, may have. Yet these district judges are capable of being fair to defendants.

In addition, Crown Prosecution Service representatives are experienced and trained so they are particularly able to make early applications for special measures such as screens. Pre-trial reviews are held early to fix a trial date. They deal with all the issues, including child care and transporting the complainant to court, and trials are fixed within 28 days if possible. A specific case progression officer monitors all cases to spot and to try to iron out glitches causing unnecessary delay. The specialist court also has copies of any civil orders against a defendant in relation to domestic violence.

A domestic violence police officer is invariably available by the time of the trial, and they are always present whenever the complainant is. The witness services make special provision for the complainant to be brought into the building separately and looked after in every way. They facilitate a court familiarisation visit if she wants to get a sense of the surroundings before the court date, and the probation service is also available to help. In most cases, a system of domestic violence advocates, who are essentially befrienders from the voluntary sector, look after the interests of a domestic violence complainant from the start. In normal courts the notification of bail sometimes goes wrong, but in the special courts care is taken to send bail decisions and conditions to the complainant.

These are the principles according to which the courts operate, and they have led to much quicker hearings. That means that there is less opportunity for intimidation or for women who may be ambivalent about giving evidence against their partner to change their minds. The courts have also reduced the number of hearings, of which there are typically seven or eight in a normal court for the simplest domestic violence case, to 3.5 on average in west London, and a similar number elsewhere. That is obviously helpful, and the figures for repeat victimisation in the west London court, which were at the national average of 50 per cent., have dropped to 32.7 per cent.

What do the courts cost? According to the Government's own evaluation, not much, and I am sure that they have read the bottom line. The courts involve a remarshalling of existing resources rather than the provision of new ones. The evaluation of the five pilot specialist domestic violence courts expressed positive views about them and pointed to the improvements. However, that was in January 2004 and nothing has happened since. In our manifesto at the last general election, we said that we would consider the effectiveness of special domestic violence courts. Now that we have considered them, can we have a commitment to roll them out nationwide?

I return briefly to the Fawcett Society's theme of the two challenges facing the courts and the criminal justice system. They are the need for a coherent strategy on violence against women, and the need to stop vulnerable women, who are often victims of violence at an earlier stage, from going to prison where they deteriorate or from where they sometimes do not emerge. We urge the Government to consider those challenges as two sides of the same coin and to examine closely the courts' role in failing adequately to protect the first cohort in general and the second cohort by too readily sending them to prison. We invite the Government to rise to those challenges.

10.3 am

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): First, I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) both on securing the debate and on what she said. I also pay tribute to the commission on women and the criminal justice system, which the hon. and learned Lady so ably chaired on behalf of the Fawcett Society, which has made an extremely valuable contribution to the debate in many ways. I hope that she feels that that contribution has gone some way to informing the debate and moving it forward.

There has been a small but perceptible shift in attitudes over recent years. There is more understanding of the parameters of the debate, certainly in Government—I acknowledge the role that they have played—and, more widely, in the legal professions. There is a recognition of the need to take further action on these issues; what is disappointing is the glacial movement on many of them. The problems have been identified, but it has sometimes been more difficult to find the solutions.

I shall not repeat everything that the hon. and learned Lady said because that would be pointless, but I agree with the basic structure of what she has said today and in her reports. There are three broad areas in which women encounter the criminal justice system: as victims of crime or witnesses to it, as offenders and as workers within it. That is a useful framework in which to set one's comments.

I shall deal first with women as victims of crime. The hon. and learned Lady is right to identify the great concern about women who are subject to violent crimes, including domestic violence, rape and sexual assault. Although such matters are dealt with better than they were at one stage, they are still often not addressed coherently, and the performance of courts and investigating authorities throughout the country is patchy. The hon. and learned Lady rightly drew attention to the value of specialist courts such as the domestic violence courts dealing with this issue, and it is right that they do. However, most people do not have access to them; even if we rolled out the programme in the way that she suggests, it would still be a considerable time before women in my constituency, for instance, had the benefit of such a court. We need to see these courts as "beacons of excellence"—to use the Government's phrase—in the treatment of domestic violence, but we must not forget the need to examine the performance of other courts, including lower courts, on these issues.

The reports also bring out the fact that there is a huge disparity in police attitudes. Some police forces have gone a long way from where they were a few years ago in dealing with complaints of domestic violence and in investigating allegations of rape. Others, unfortunately, are still fairly antediluvian in their attitudes and seem not to have the mechanisms to provide for a successful intervention. We should recognise that the police service is still seen as a masculine domain. Going into a police station—if one can find a station that is open, which is unlikely in my constituency, although I know that there are stations that are open—is still intimidating for many people, but particularly for women. The likelihood that they will then face a male officer is a great concern. One hopes that he will not have preconceptions and prejudices, but it is perhaps more likely that prejudices will exist.

Having gone through the investigative process, we then have the court process. In many ways, that, too, is not very friendly. The Fawcett Society reports bring that out, and I do not propose to cover the same ground. However, there is a failure to recognise the particular difficulties that many women have in attending court when they are family carers, or to provide for them in any sensible way. I have often brought up the closure of small courts, which has an effect on victims and witnesses. It has a disproportionate effect on those who do not have their own transport and have family commitments of which they cannot easily divest themselves. They face a barrier if the nearest court is many miles away, and is not accessible by public transport. We need to address the fact that few courts take seriously the difficulties involved in providing child care facilities for those with younger children. Many of the support systems for victims of crime are still inadequate. The continuing follow-up, following the conviction of an assailant, is insufficient to provide the support that people need.

The numbers of women in our prisons have increased significantly, although they still represent a small proportion of the prison population. In 1993, there were

[Mr. David Heath]

1,560, and in 2003, 4,461. As the hon. and learned Member for Redcar says, that is due largely to crimes not of violence but of acquisition, normally shoplifting. Many are serving short sentences, whose effectiveness in preventing recidivism is dubious. In their cases, it is clear that prison does not work.

The effect of prison on the individual and her family, however, can be considerable. There is a disproportionate propensity among women prisoners to self-harm and suicide. That should worry us. The innocent families of women who are sent to prison are hugely affected: they are subject to stigma and privation as a result of the women going away, and can find themselves in considerable difficulties as a result of the imprisonment. As there are few women's prisons, their geographical distribution is extremely skewed, so in many cases women are sent to prisons that are a long way from their families.

All that suggests that, first, the courts should more often use dispositions that do not involve a custodial sentence—they are more effective—and, secondly, early intervention is a more satisfactory answer for an offending female, so it should be resourced and used more effectively.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. Gentleman to increase the volume of his delivery. I am partially deaf, and I need to hear what is being said.

Mr. Heath: I must apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Perhaps I was not speaking sufficiently in the direction of the microphone. It is unlikely that I was speaking quietly. I shall increase the volume a little, but I do not want to bellow.

Women prisoners also have a propensity to mental health problems. That suggests that mental health provision to women's prisons should be increased. It is certainly inadequate at the moment.

Taking all these factors together, it is demonstrable that short-term prison sentences are often not the answer to women's offending behaviour. Courts do not always—particularly in the cases of women from abroad—take into account the circumstances of offenders who find themselves under duress, and the effect of that on their behaviour. It worries me that there is a substantial population who have effectively been trafficked here, and who are required to commit offences. They are really the innocent victims, rather than the perpetrators, of criminal offences.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): I am following with interest what the hon. Gentleman is saying. It is probably wrong to criticise the courts about this, because if one goes to the average women's prison and ascertains the proportion of women who are there for drug importation-related offences, there is no point in criticising the judges for putting them there for sentence. If that is to be an area of criticism, it must lie with Parliament for having made absolutely clear that those sentences have to be imposed in tariff fashion.

Mr. Heath: That is a valuable intervention.

I turn now to women working within the criminal justice system. The hon. and learned Member for Redcar gave a clear exposition about the deficiency in numbers of women working in the criminal justice system. That is so in the case of judges, chief constables, chief probation officers and chief Crown prosecutors. In all those professions, there is a gross deficiency in the number of women represented at senior levels. In the case of the police, there has been a welcome advent of women chief officers, and there are now a few scattered around the country but, of course, not nearly enough to represent the population as a whole.

Women in the police say that there are still distinct institutionalised discriminatory processes within the service, despite the best endeavours of those who are trying to institute equal professional practices. There is still a distinct propensity to divert able women officers into particular specialisms, which often do not have the highest status, and therefore act as a bar to senior promotions. That is unfortunate because there should be no differential: some of the most effective police officers are women who have had the opportunity to use all of the specialisms available within their profession. That fact remains, and the situation is probably the same within the probation service, although the present financial constraints of that service mean that is difficult for all probation officers to meet the demands that are placed on them.

Within the legal profession, there is an extraordinary pyramid that has been illustrated time and again. The majority—59 per cent.—of law graduates are women, and 50 per cent. of lay magistrates are female. At the bottom end, as it were, there is no discrimination, yet that pyramid tapers towards the top end. There is, at long last, one female Law Lord, but no more than that, and there is a gross under-representation of women at the level of High Court judges and QCs within the Bar.

Underpinning that taper is a pay differential, which has still not been satisfactorily explained to me, both within the solicitors' profession and the Bar. There is also a wastage of able women at the level of pre-partnership in solicitors' firms, and a similar wastage at the Bar: some women face difficulties in reaching the level of silk. Only 8 per cent. of QCs are women, yet the hon. and learned Lady is a very fine advertisement of the value of women QCs.

I know that such matters are being addressed in rhetorical terms, if nothing else. I hope that the new judicial appointments commission will do much better. However, it seems abundantly clear that until we achieve a degree of parity in the legal profession, we will have a one-sided, one-gendered profession that will not serve the country as well as it might.

I look forward also to the first woman Lord Chancellor. Now that there is no bar, as the result of the passing of legislation in another place, there is no obstacle in the way of the hon. and learned Lady as the first woman Lord Chancellor. I look forward to her undertaking that role in the near future. But there we are: even in the House we have difficulties recognising the fact that there should be equality of treatment in the legal profession at the senior level. The Equality Bill, so ably championed by my noble Friend Lord Lester of Herne Hill, will do some good in that respect, as the hon.

and learned Lady said. However, despite the improvements in recent years, there is a still a long way to go.

10.21 am

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): It is a pleasure to participate in this debate. I suspect that I shall give the Minister ample time to respond, and I am sorry that there has not been more participation. I welcome this opportunity and congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) on securing the debate. I was aware of the Fawcett commission's work; indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) was involved in it prior to taking her place on the Front Bench, and I know that she found it particularly valuable. I certainly found the conclusions interesting and useful.

The issues that the hon. and learned Lady highlighted—which I am delighted to hear will be considered further in work by the commission—are absolutely the right ones. Women confront a series of problems in the criminal justice system, whether as victims, defendants or participants—I adopt the same model as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath)—that need to be addressed.

It is sensible to start with women as victims. One of the problems with the debate is that it is difficult to know the extent to which the much-needed reforms introduced by the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 will work in practice. That legislation may provide compelling improvements in the way that women are treated as victims in the criminal justice system.

I certainly acknowledge, from personal experience, that the courts can be a difficult and hostile environment for victims at the best of times. That is particularly so if the offences of which the victim comes to give evidence have major emotional and physiological content. In truth, that is often so in the sorts of case about which the hon. and learned Lady talked. I do not think that that is necessarily a gender issue, and in some cases the problem applies to men who come to give evidence. However, in the order of things, it is women who are principally put in that position.

The lack of facilities in court for people to be found a place to sit before giving evidence, the delays that are inherent in the criminal justice system—all practitioners and judges try to eradicate those delays, but they continue to plague us—and the difficult task of balancing the right of the defendant and his representatives to cross-examine with the right of the victim to be protected from intrusive questioning are all difficult matters. My experience is that much can done without any statutory change at all, simply when people are much more sensitive to the underlying issues. There I agree with the hon. and learned Lady.

It is unfortunate, but although we often see wonderful examples of good practice in court that create an atmosphere in which justice can be done and the victims can feel that they have been treated properly, we are still confronted by plenty of examples where that does not seem to happen. That seems to be due to ignorance, although on some occasions it is possibly due to prejudice. However, I suspect that ignorance underlies it, which raises issues about judicial training, and potentially the question of providing continuing training for advocates in areas that are slightly removed from advocacy but that relate to proper conduct in such cases. There are some fertile areas for exploration in relation to these topics.

As the hon. and learned Lady knows, in the domestic violence legislation we have provided for some changes in the law in practice in court. It is too early to say how that will work out. However, these are positive steps and we welcome them. The Government were right to take them, and I hope that they produce some benefits.

The second area about which I wish to speak is that of women as defendants. The hon. and learned Lady put forward an astonishing statistic about the average period of imprisonment that women undergo. I believe that there is universal agreement that very short sentences are entirely useless—whether for women or men—so that statistic raises serious issues as to why that average stands as it does. However, an average is an average; it would be necessary to examine carefully how it is working out in practice.

As I said, there is a universal view that short sentences—under 12 months spent in custody—allow for no opportunities of constructive rehabilitation and training. What, therefore, is going on? I suspect that what is happening—as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome highlighted—is that, as a consequence of societal changes, the number of women going through the criminal justice system has been increasing. Although it may be true that the majority of these women are being imprisoned for shoplifting offences—I suspect that that must be for persistent repeat offences, because it is unlikely that someone would be imprisoned for a first time offence of that nature—there has also undoubtedly been an increase in the involvement of women in violent offences. I suspect that that increase has taken the criminal justice system largely by surprise, and that it has been unable to respond adequately—people have been flapping around searching for a solution.

The hon. and learned Lady rightly highlighted the fact that in some instances one cannot distinguish between victim and criminal. In many cases—this applies to men as well—people who are victims of crime are also perpetrators of crime. However, in the context of violent crime, I have no doubt that that correlation exists in relation to women. Indeed, one of the reasons why more women may be involved in violent crime in general—such as girl teenage gangs on the street—may be that there is a greater incidence of violence against them. We do not know. The Fawcett commission may be interested in examining that area, because it is certainly an area of societal change. It may reflect a greater sense of empowerment in women generally, so that they stray into more male areas. It is a worrying phenomenon, and I suspect that the courts are unable to cope with it and do not know what to do about it.

Vera Baird: We always assumed in the Fawcett commission that although we were studying women, and expected to find that they were at the sharp end of features of the criminal justice system, our findings would have application to men as well. We hope that some of our recommendations will play out in the area of male involvement.

[Vera Baird]

I also want to reassure the hon. Gentleman that when the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) withdrew from the commission, she was replaced by the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), who serves us very well.

Mr. Grieve: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Lady for reminding me of that—I had temporarily forgotten it. I well remember the circumstances in which my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham started to work on the commission. I know that she was delighted to participate in that work.

In relation to women as defendants, there is also the question of prisons. The truth—I think that it applies to the custodial system generally—is that the variability is astonishing. I know that the commission visited Holloway. I remember discussing it with my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham, who was horrified by the conditions there. Against that, not so long ago I visited Send prison near Guildford, and I was impressed—although I am always hesitant when talking about the prison system, because changes seem to happen in it very quickly. There were opportunities for drug rehabilitation at Send. In excess of 50 per cent. of its inmates were foreigners, most of whom were serving prolonged sentences for offences linked to drug importation, but despite having to cope with that situation, it provided a humane regime for the women incarcerated there; there was a great deal of hope in the atmosphere. The trouble is that such examples are all too rare.

The link between self-harm in women and imprisonment, and the problems associated with women's prisons generally, as well as the fact that many women prisoners have serious mental health problems—that applies to male prisoners, too—are important issues. It is also the case that many women who commit offences that bring them to public notice, as opposed to merely the notice of the courts, experience degrees of demonisation that are often unjustified, and that they experience them because they are women. That is a societal problem with which we have great difficulty in grappling. Given all those circumstances, I am unsurprised that mental health problems are prominent.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar highlighted the fact that considerable progress has been made with regard to practitioners in the system, including Law Lords, members of the Court of Appeal, and High Court judges. The criminal justice system often operates at a lower level than that, and it is now unusual to find a court where there is not a female Crown court judge sitting, along with other colleagues.

However, there are serious problems in the recruitment of women to the judiciary, and they are rather more complicated than has sometimes been acknowledged. In recent years, there has been a tendency to look at career structure, and to identify as the key obstacle the desire of many women to take a period off work in which to have children, but I am coming to the conclusion that that is not the real problem. The real problems were highlighted in a recent meeting of the all-party group on the Bar that I attended. The first is the number of women who are deterred at an early stage from pursuing careers in advocacy or the solicitor profession. Recruitment statistics suggest that there is a large input of women, but many leave the profession within three or four years of starting in practice. Secondly, what has always been underestimated is that the problem for women who take time off to have children is not that period itself, but the period when they have returned to work—as my wife, who is a barrister who has returned to full-time practice after having had children, points out to me. That is potentially the busiest time of their careers, and it is when judgments are likely to be made about whether they are suitable for appointment to the judiciary, if that is their chosen career option. It is the time when the ambition of many women filters away; they do not put themselves forward for promotion when plenty of them are worthy of being appointed.

These are complicated issues, and I very much hope that the judicial appointments commission will address them. We have welcomed its creation, and I hope some changes will flow from it. We must encourage—subject, of course, to the overriding consideration of merit—a wide pool of talent, and we must ensure that women are represented throughout the criminal justice system. That is essential; it applies not only to advocates and judges, but, as the hon. and learned Lady said, at every level, whether that be the police or the National Offender Management Service. We all know that in those areas, particularly in the police, there has often been a culture that many women may not find congenial in terms of participation. There are some big issues to address.

In conclusion, I welcome what the hon. and learned Lady has said. I am particularly pleased to hear that there will be an opportunity for the commission to do further work; I did not know that. I congratulate her on securing the debate and on putting her points forward, and I look forward to hearing the Government's response from the Minister.

10.35 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): First, I congratulate my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) on her contribution in steering the Fawcett Society's commission on women and the criminal justice system, which covers such vast ground that it has been useful to have a proper, quality, in-depth look at its results and conclusions, and to hear such a warm welcome for many of its findings.

I want us to pay tribute to the commission's work, but I do not want to give warm words of welcome only; I want to consider what action might be taken in several areas. We know that reform in the criminal justice system can be fairly gradual and slow, but good steps forward are being taken. However, there is still a long way to go toward an equal and fair justice system for all that is more sensitive to the needs of certain groups of society, particularly women—the largest group in society. It is important to set that work in the wider context of what the Government are doing on women's policy in general. We want to ensure that there is an improvement in gender equality in all areas of policy and work, and we must keep at the forefront of our minds the basic principle that all people must be equal in the eyes of the law and that we must therefore have fair approaches to achieve equal opportunities.

My hon. and learned Friend talked about the positive duty being put into the Equality Bill to give the promotion of gender equality a statutory footing much the same as the existing duty on race equality. That will go a long way toward delivering some of the more general aspirations of the commission's recommendations on duties on public bodies. We need to work out the implications for each public body, particularly those in the criminal justice service. I would like to consider them one by one and write to my hon. and learned Friend about that, and about how the measure will apply to the Sentencing Guidelines Council and other bodies. That is an important issue: how in generality we can say these things, and how they will work out in practice.

We should always remember the difficulty that the criminal justice system has had in dealing with domestic violence. Of course, that crime affects both men and women, but women are disproportionately afflicted as victims. Everybody has the right to feel free from crime and to feel that when a crime takes place it will be dealt with justly by the criminal justice system. We must make significant changes regarding domestic violence, particularly to aid women who have been victims; there are major steps that we can take.

We need to be much more determined to tackle the issue; the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 is the biggest overhaul of domestic violence legislation for at least 30 years, and is a crucial part of our wider strategy to prevent domestic violence by protecting and supporting victims and bringing perpetrators to justice. The Act ensures that both civil and criminal law offer the maximum protection to all victims to stop violence recurring and to bring offenders to justice. The Act is clear and straightforward and will significantly aid women. For example, it makes breaches of non-molestation orders a criminal offence, so that the police have clearer powers of arrest when attending incidents, and will extend the eligibility of non-molestation and occupation orders so that victims can make an application for protection even when couples have never married or lived together.

We need to make it more widely known that common assault is an arrestable offence, to ensure that police can get perpetrators away from the scene of a crime so that violence does not escalate. In the courts, we need to ensure when sentencing that restraining orders can be imposed for any offence, so that victims can have immediate protection and will not need to make a separate application to the civil courts, as used to be the case. Cases would be held in a criminal court without the restriction order, and people would not have to be accompanied over the road or to another side of town to the county court to get the restraining order in place.

We need also to enable courts to impose restraining orders on acquittal for any offence, if they consider it necessary to protect the victim. Again, that will mean that victims will get more immediate protection without the need for a separate application to a different court. These are specific and detailed but important changes to the law that start to shift the balance in domestic violence, and will make an appreciable difference to many women who are the victims of domestic violence crimes.

There are other measures, too. My hon. and learned Friend mentioned the specialist domestic violence courts, which the Fawcett Society's commission has been keen to see not only properly evaluated but rolled out more across the country. That initiative has so far seen seven specialist domestic violence courts across England and Wales, which are being evaluated. The term refers not necessarily to a free-standing building or a particular jurisdiction, but rather to a better and more tailored specialist way of dealing with domestic violence cases in the magistrates courts. Common features include the better identification or flagging-up of cases to facilitate clustering or fast-tracking them through the system, the pre-trial hearing aspect mentioned by my hon. and learned Friend—the use of that opportunity for pre-trial reviews for better progression on the case—and better multi-agency working between the different public sector bodies that can help to find solutions.

The key to the successful operation of specialist domestic violence courts is the availability of good advocacy or a support worker who can help a victim to navigate their way through what can sometimes be a complicated spaghetti of statutory and voluntary support, to make it clear and help them to walk though the process. We have evaluated that and have found that the specialist courts enable the development of best practice and can improve victim satisfaction and inter-agency co-operation, as well as increased public confidence in the area in which they are based, and reduce the number of cases that do not need to proceed to a hearing. It has also been evident that some of the specialist domestic violence courts often result in more community sentence punishments, which are more rehabilitative than the custodial approach.

We are convinced of the benefits of specialist domestic violence courts coupled with dedicated support for the victim. I am pleased to be able to say that earlier this month, in conjunction with the Home Office, an extra £1 million has been announced for next year to develop more specialist courts, supported by the advocates. We hope to have 25 such dedicated domestic violence courts by the end of 2006—a step in the right direction. We all want to see more done at a quicker pace, but the investment in public services really makes a difference. It is a classic example of where money and resources can benefit our criminal justice system.

We want to develop the first integrated domestic violence court where the criminal and family aspects of cases are dealt with in one court, and we want to pilot that by the end of the year. That will be an innovation in the way that our justice system works. In addition, we refer sentencing issues in domestic violence cases to the Sentencing Advisory Panel, working with the Home Office, to develop a register of civil orders so that the courts and the police will know about previous non-molestation and occupation orders.

Good progress on domestic violence has been made across the board, but more work still needs to be done. I want to continue to work with the Fawcett Society and my hon. and learned Friend in developing policy. Women are concerned about the effect of domestic violence on children and it is important to recognise that all too often children can be victims of domestic violence, as a result of witnessing crimes. We have tried our best to introduce changes and improvements so that better consideration is given to a child's needs under the criminal justice system. I cannot refer to all the matters that we are focusing on, but I wanted to highlight that aspect.

[Mr. Christopher Leslie]

My hon. and learned Friend categorised the experience of women in the criminal justice system by referring to their work as practitioners or in the judiciary as defendants or offenders, and as victims and witnesses. Historically, women have faced barriers to justice, but recently changes have been made to the rules and procedures of courts to bring about improvements. For example, women are routinely cross-examined less frequently now about their previous sexual history in sexual offence cases because of changes introduced under the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999. There is still some way to go, but that was a positive change in the law.

Given the special nature of sexual offences and sensitive evidence, victims of sexual offences are automatically eligible for special measures. In other words, the protection that is provided for the victim or witness makes it a little more palatable for them to participate in the court process. That applies to younger witnesses, too.

Vera Baird: The Minister has hit on a topic that adds force to my argument that a holistic approach should be taken towards violence against women. He is right: special measures are available automatically to a victim of sexual abuse, but not to a victim of physical, domestic abuse. Such measures must be applied for and are ordered only at the court's discretion. People at the CPS are experts in such cases and they make applications early to specialist domestic violence courts so that women can be assured of protection. However, outside that, when women are close to the hearing, they do not know whether they will receive protection. In itself, that is obviously a deterrent to their sticking with the case, and it is a prime example of when we must consider domestic violence across the board and reconcile the two different approaches.

Mr. Leslie: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend. The application of special measures is a rapidly developing area of public policy. We have been discussing it in respect of a wider number of cases, including antisocial behaviour cases, when people often need to be encouraged to come forward to give evidence. We must bear in mind the wider principles of public justice being carried out in a public forum, but more can be done more quickly. I ask her to watch this space for announcements on such matters.

Mr. Heath: I entirely agree with the hon. and learned Lady and I am interested to hear the Minister speak in agreement. I tabled amendments to the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill, as it then was, in the terms set out by the hon. and learned Lady, but they were rejected by the Government. If there has been a change of heart, I welcome it.

Mr. Leslie: I want to study carefully the recommendations that are being made and ensure that we can find a way to reconcile them with some of the other principles of justice. There has been a shift of culture within the criminal justice system generally and a wider acceptance of the benefits that special measures can sometimes bring to the justice system, such as screens for witnesses and better assistance for them in the court room.

The Office for Criminal Justice Reform has been working on a victims and witness delivery plan. It was published some weeks ago and provides better directions to local criminal justice boards on how to improve services. It sets out seven national priorities to cover minimum standards for victims and witnesses, and principles with which both sides of the House will agree. The substantially resourced and funded initiative known as "No Witness, No Justice" has also begun to change the culture of the criminal justice system, as different Departments that do not necessarily talk to one another are joining things together to ensure that, from the point of reporting a crime through the court process, going to prosecution and ensuring that a good case is put in the court, witnesses are navigated and helped through the system. That is valuable and to be welcomed.

I would not want to neglect some of the good that we in the Department for Constitutional Affairs are doing, even in our little corner of the system. For instance, our target is to install video links in 75 per cent. of magistrates courthouses by 2006, and we are ahead of schedule in that roll-out. There will be separate waiting areas: that may seem basic and obvious, but it is vital so that a witness does not necessarily have to sit next to the defendant before going into court. It can be an intimidating process and it is amazing that witnesses sometimes have to do that. We are aiming to cover all magistrates courts by 2008, and we are on target for all Crown courts too. Witness liaison officers are being appointed in magistrates courts to be a more welcoming presence at the entrance to the court. A number of these changes are very positive, but more needs to be done, and we must keep our foot on the accelerator.

The other aspect of my hon. and learned Friend's comments, based on the Fawcett Society's report, covered women working within the criminal justice system. Women have historically experienced under-representation, not just in the judiciary but as practitioners in general. Although it is not now true in the magistracy, where about half of magistrates are women, it is regrettably still true in the professional judiciary, where women make up just 23 per cent. of district judges in magistrates courts, 10 per cent. of circuit judges, 10 per cent. of High Court judges, 5.5 per cent. of Court of Appeal judges, and just one of 12 Law Lords. There have been notable changes in recent months, but much more can be done.

I do not have too much time to go into the improvements that can be made. However, at the Women Lawyers Forum held on 5 March, my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor announced the outcome of the recent consultation exercise on increasing diversity in the judiciary, and set out a consequent programme of work that is now being taken forward. Some strands of that work, such as improving information and communication about being and becoming a judge, and the introduction of career breaks for salaried judges, are being introduced immediately. Other areas of work need further consultation because, for example, any change would require primary legislation or detailed exploration with the judiciary or other stakeholders. That is why we are getting on with it, talking to them and ensuring that we can make those changes.

Turning to the Court Service itself, more than 66 per cent. of staff are women, and 43.6 per cent. are in higher management grades. Although only 28 per cent. are senior civil servants, we recognise that it is not just at the level of the players in the courts themselves, but at that of those who support and administer the courts, where better equality is needed. We are doing our bit there too. The Bar Council has published figures showing that 44 per cent. of barristers in employed practise are women, and that 48 per cent. of barristers in self-employed tenancies are women. There is a general shift but, as the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) said, the question is what we can do to break through that ceiling and ensure that women have the opportunity to progress to senior level. We need to work much harder to ascertain what those factors are and to tackle them one by one. We must not let these obstacles arise.

There has been a universal welcome for the creation of a judicial appointments commission that is independent and much more transparent in how it appoints the judiciary, and we hope that it will be established around this time next year—on 1 April 2006—and will get under way in earnest. The Constitutional Reform Bill will, we hope, become an Act any time now.

We will undertake all judicial office appointments from 1 April 2006, when the work will be transferred from the Department for Constitutional Affairs. The judicial appointments commission will be tasked to improve the overall diversity of the judiciary in gender and ethnicity under a specific clause in the Constitutional Reform Bill.

Of course, the overriding criterion for appointment is merit, and we would not want to depart from that. I was glad that the Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs recommended that the Bill be amended to ensure that the judicial appointments commission have a statutory duty to seek to increase the diversity of those applying for judicial posts, subject to that criterion of merit. Improvements have been made, but there is more that we can do. I look forward to the work of the judicial appointments commission.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar also talked about the experience of women in the criminal justice system as offenders. She particularly noted that female victims of crime can also be offenders, and that offenders can be victims. Sadly, there can be a cycle, and we often find the same people in the criminal justice system on either side of a case.

I note in particular what my hon. and learned Friend says about prison policy. That is not a direct part of my portfolio in the Department for Constitutional Affairs, but we take particularly seriously issues such as the experience of prison life and the stresses and burdens that it can create. I am particularly worried about the propensity for suicide and self-harm in prisons. We need to do much more work on suicide prevention, and need to focus on women, among whom the preponderance of suicides in prison is much greater.

We are also pleased that the Fawcett commission has broadly supported the women's offending reduction programme, which aims to tackle the factors that affect the reasons why women offend in the first place and to reduce the number of women who end up in custody by ensuring that community-based services and interventions are tailored better to meet women's needs.

Some of the approaches from the beginning to the end of the criminal justice system can be improved to make us more sensitive to the issues that affect women and to their different experiences in the system as victims, witnesses, defendants and offenders, and as practitioners in the judiciary.

We want to ensure that we aim at all times for a justice system that is fair and balanced for all. That must be our objective. It is good news that the Fawcett Society has secured extra funding to continue its work. The Home Secretary helped to relaunch the "One Year On" study, and I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will continue in her work to keep pushing public policy makers to ensure that we attend to these issues as regularly and as routinely as possible.

Pensioners (York)

10.59 am

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Every year, the Labour Government introduce new measures to improve the welfare and the standard of living of pensioners. In the Budget last week, the Chancellor made two announcements that are particularly important to pensioners: first, the introduction of a national scheme of free local bus travel and, secondly, the introduction of a £200 payment to reduce the effect on pensioners of council tax increases. Both new initiatives will be widely welcomed by pensioners in York.

The free bus pass is a great deal better than the £40-worth of travel tokens currently available from City of York council—reduced from £50 last year by the Liberal Democrat-led council. The Government's £200 payment towards council tax is worth an additional £2 a week to York pensioners and is a considerable improvement on last year's £100 payment. It is badly needed in York, because City of York council increased council tax by twice the rate of inflation this year. It was one of the largest council tax increases in the country and it should not have happened: the Government increased the city council's grant by more than twice the rate of inflation, so there was no need for a large tax rise to be passed on to local people.

The Chancellor's initiatives are good moves by a Labour Government, but I want the Government to go further and to do more to help poorer pensioners to claim their entitlements to extra money from pension credit and council tax benefit. Angela Barham, the information officer and benefits adviser at Age Concern York, says that council tax benefit has a poorer take-up rate among York pensioners than any other benefit. I have a proposal for the Government that could, at minimal cost, do a great deal to increase take-up of council tax benefit. I suggest that when the council writes to pensioners in York to distribute the Government's free bus passes, it should also circulate claims information and claim forms for council tax benefit and pension credit. In addition, I should like the Minister to consider the feasibility of creating a single claim form or claim line for those benefits to make it simpler for pensioners to claim them.

On 12 January, I put my name to the Council Tax Benefit (Entitlement Information) Bill, a private Member's Bill to change the law to require each local council to write to every pensioner in its area or to undertake door-to-door visits to all pensioners, or both, to inform them that they might be entitled to council tax benefit. The Bill was due to have its Second Reading on 4 February, but was unfortunately blocked by hon. Members who opposed it. I propose that the Government take up the idea behind the Bill and implement it in relation to council tax benefit and pension credit to promote take-up of the benefits. The information officer at Age Concern York said that the Government's take-up campaign on pension credit had been highly successful, but some people who are entitled to it are still not claiming it, and even more do not claim council tax benefit to which they are entitled.

Let me explain why it is important to do more to help poorer pensioners. Unlike Margaret Thatcher, I believe that there is such a thing as society. Society imposes on its stronger and wealthier members the obligation to support those who are more vulnerable than they are. Of all the vulnerable people, those who most need support are elderly people on low incomes. Unlike younger people, the elderly do not have the opportunity to work and save, they are likely to be on a fixed income that does not rise at a pace with earnings or with the rise in living standards, and their savings—if they have any—diminish with the passage of time.

I have always argued that the Government should treat pensioners as a priority. I spoke about the needs of the elderly when I first spoke in this House, in my maiden speech 13 years ago. If we think back to that time, when the Conservatives were in power, we are reminded how much better off pensioners are today, under a Labour Government. The Conservatives broke the earnings link for the basic state pension, abolished free NHS eye tests, and dismantled the state earnings-related pension scheme. They mis-sold pensions, encouraging many people to opt out of viable and successful final salary pension schemes and instead to put their money into personal pension plans, which have yielded nothing like the benefits of the pension schemes that they were in originally.

The Conservatives took pension rights away from employees when they privatised companies. Think of the bus employees superannuation trust scheme—the bus pensions scheme: bus workers who had spent a lifetime paying into a pension scheme suddenly found that the pension would not be paid on their retirement. It took a Labour Government to restore their pension rights. The Conservatives tried to do the same with the railway pension schemes when they privatised British Rail, but I introduced amendments to the legislation that eventually made them back off.

In the whole of their 18 years in office, the Conservatives raised the basic state pension by more than inflation only once. They did so to compensate in part for their introduction of value added tax on fuel. That sums up their approach. The Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), who was a leading member of the Cabinet in those days, recently wrote in an introduction to the Conservative party's pensioners' manifesto:

> "How a country treats the older generation is a test of its values."

It is indeed, and one need only look back at the Conservatives' record in office to see their values in practice and to realise that they do not value the welfare of pensioners.

One might compare the Conservatives' record with Labour's. A great deal has changed. First, we have provided above-inflation increases to the basic state pension. When Labour came to office, the basic state pension for a single pensioner was £61.15 a week; it is now £79.60 a week—£5.45 a week more than the rate of inflation increase. For a couple, the pension has gone up from £97.75 to £127.25—£8.75 more than the rate of inflation increase. I remember when pensioner campaigners led by Jack Jones demanded a £5 and £8 increase in the basic state pension. That, and more besides, has been provided by the Labour Government. Those increases are received by 17,520 pensioners in my constituency.

Secondly, the Labour Government have brought in winter fuel payments—originally £50, then £100, then £200, or £300 for older pensioners. Under the Conservatives, there was a winter fuel payment, but pensioners had to wait until there were seven consecutive days of below-freezing temperatures, which practically never occurred. When it did, pensioners got about £1 a day for the cold period—but by that time pensioners had turned down the heating. They did not know whether the cold spell would last four, five, six or seven days, so when the payment came through, paltry though it was, it was too late. In York this year, 19,755 pensioners received their winter fuel payments.

Thirdly, the Government have introduced free television licences for the over-75s. Some 6,525 households in York are entitled to free licences. Fourthly, the Government introduced the minimum income guarantee to raise, as a right, the income of poorer pensioners to a satisfactory level. However, that provoked complaints—with some justification, I have to say—from people who during their working life had saved or paid into a private pension scheme and who found that because they had been prudent they did not receive the minimum income guarantee. The Labour party listened to what they said and, fifthly, introduced the pension credit as a supplement to the minimum income guarantee, to extend the benefits of that guarantee to people with modest savings or smaller private pensions. Some 4,265 people in York now receive pension credit; on average, they receive £36 a week on top of the basic state pension. Then, sixthly, the Government decided to uprate the value of the pension credit in line with earnings, not prices, which is the normal uprating for benefits. In that way, the basic minimum standards that the Government have introduced for pensioners will keep pace with the growing increase in living standards in the country as a whole.

Seventhly, last year the Government introduced a £100 payment towards the cost of council tax for pensioners. Now, of course, that has been increased to £200. No one should be fooled by the Conservative promise to make payments of "up to £500" towards council tax. People should read the small print: up to £500 does not mean £500, and for many pensioners, it would mean much less than the guaranteed payment that they will get from the Labour Government. The truth behind the small print of the Conservatives' promise is that they will give bigger payments to better-off pensioners living in larger houses. Furthermore, of concern to me and to the Minister, who also represents a constituency in the north of England, is the fact that under the Conservative proposal bigger payments would be made to pensioners in London and the south-east than to poorer pensioners in the north. That is wrong; it shows that the Conservatives are unreformed and up to their old games on pensions.

Eighthly, the Labour Government restored free eye tests on the NHS for pensioners who need them—free eye tests were, of course, taken away by the Conservatives. Some 26,300 pensioners in my constituency and the surrounding area had free eye tests on the NHS last year. Ninthly, the Labour Government introduced health checks by their general practitioners for all pensioners. Tenthly, they introduced a regime of free flu injections: 75.3 per cent. of people aged over 65 in York have had their free flu injections this winter, one of the highest take-up rates in the country. Eleventhly, the Labour Government removed charges for nursing care in care homes. Twelfthly, we introduced a national half-price travel scheme some years ago to ensure that pensioners in all parts of the country had the benefit of a travel concession. Finally, in his Budget this year, the Chancellor has announced that it will become a free local bus travel scheme.

So, there are dozen benefits—or a baker's dozen of benefits—that the Labour party has brought to pensioners in my constituency and throughout the country. We have changed the incomes and quality of life of pensioners in York. In the past, old age was always closely associated with poverty. If we look at the Seebohm Rowntree surveys of poverty in York 100 years ago, in the 1930s and in the 1950s, we see a strong correlation between age and poverty. The group most likely to be living in poverty was the elderly. Pensioners had to choose between heating and eating, but that is no longer the case. A recent report by the Institute for Fiscal Studies shows that, for the first time in Britain's history, pensioners are now no more likely to be living in poverty than other age groups. That is not an argument for the Government to change the priority that they give to pensioners; still less is it an argument for this country to change the Government, because the Conservatives are the only possible alternative. Instead, it is an argument for maintaining the focus and priority on working to improve the security and welfare of pensioners.

There are still poor pensioners who do not claim their entitlements, which is why I am proposing new measures to boost the take-up of council tax benefit and pension credit. That is also why I back the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions in his continued support for radical pension reform. He is right to identify that the poorest pensioners are women. In the 21st century, it is a scandal that, on average, single women pensioners have an income of £24 a week less than men, and that only 16 per cent. of women now retiring have a full basic state pension in their own right. It cannot be right in this day and age that the welfare of women pensioners depends on the work record of their husband. That problem must be tackled and I congratulate the Secretary of State on saying that the Government will tackle it.

The second big problem for the future, which I want the Government to consider, is that of private pension schemes going bust. The Government rightly have a responsibility to help those who face that terrible problem—people who have paid into a pension scheme throughout their working life, but find that the promised pension is no longer available. I congratulate the Government on establishing the financial assistance scheme to help some of the pensioners in that position, which they have decided to base in the city of York, at Monks Cross.

I urge the Government to continue to seek ways to maintain defined-benefit pension schemes— final salary schemes, in common parlance. I asked my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions about the proportions of employees in defined-benefit schemes. Since the Labour Government came to power, the proportion of public sector employees in such schemes has increased by 5 per cent.; at the same time, the proportion of private sector employees in defined-benefit schemes has declined by 5 per cent. That has happened against a background of private employers trying to pull back from their obligations to their employees in retirement. I am pleased that the Government have not only sought to maintain defined-benefit schemes for people employed in the public sector, but have increased the number of people in such schemes.

[Hugh Bayley]

The public sector schemes will need further reform, however, if we are to maintain the principle of the defined benefit—of final salary or the best of a number of years' salary being the basis for the pension. I wish the Government as a whole well. The Department for Work and Pensions is not the only Ministry involved—Education Ministers are responsible for education schemes, and so on. I wish all the Departments well in their work to reform their schemes and to maintain them as viable final salary or defined-benefit schemes, because it is important for employees who have worked for the Government or a public agency in the expectation that they will receive a pension based on their salary, and it sends an important signal to the private sector.

Unless we as a nation start saving more than we have saved hitherto during our working lives to support ourselves in ever-lengthening retirements—fortunately, we are all living longer—we will not escape the problem that the Labour Government faced when they first came to power of large numbers of pensioners living in poverty. We need both to tackle the immediate problems of people who are already retired on low pensions and to reform pension schemes so that in future people retire with a reasonable retirement income.

11.19 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) on his good fortune in securing the debate and on how he set out his concerns and ideas. He is well known in the House for his interest in the welfare and well-being of pensioners, not only those in his constituency—it is natural that he takes an interest in them—but pensioners throughout the country. As one of my hon. Friend's successors as a Minister in the Department for Work and Pensions, I know what an excellent and assiduous job he did to look after pensioners' interests, so I was not surprised that he chose this subject for the debate, but I was impressed by how he advanced his arguments.

As a fellow northern MP whose local city council is controlled by the Liberal Democrats, it strikes me that Liberal Democrats seem to be pretty much the same wherever they are. When they get the chance to do so, they do not always deliver what they promised. My hon. Friend's example of his Liberal Democrat council cutting the value of travel vouchers contrasts starkly with the Chancellor's approach of introducing free travel across the entire country. That is the difference between Labour delivering on its promises and the Liberal Democrats saying anything to get elected and then doing appalling things when they get control.

I welcome the chance to take forward some of the ideas that my hon. Friend has raised. He will remember that a Minister's ears immediately prick up when we hear of a proposal that can be realised at minimal cost. His idea of including letters about free bus passes and claim forms for council tax benefit and pension credit with other literature that has to be sent to individual groups in society—in this case, pensioners—has got to be worth looking into.

As my hon. Friend knows, the Government, more than any before them, are committed to reaching out to all those who may be entitled to a range of benefits and services to try to ensure that they get them. We have an extensive ongoing strategy to encourage all those who may be entitled to help with their council tax to apply for council tax benefit, particularly pensioners, who, as my hon. Friend made clear, are the group most likely to be missing out. That is why we launched a campaign in the lead-up to last year's council tax billing round to ensure that procedures were in place locally to encourage people to apply. In addition, we have issued new versions of the posters and flyers called "Cut your Council Tax—Find out if you should be paying less", which should engage the interest of people who perhaps would like to pay less. We have already sent out the council tax benefit flyer with the winter fuel payment letters to around 12 million people in around 8 million households, many of whom will be in my hon. Friend's constituency. Council tax benefit already makes a valuable contribution in providing financial security for nearly 5 million households responsible for paying council tax, but we remain concerned about those who are not taking up their entitlement and we recognise that we need to do more.

The latest available figures are somewhat out of date—they are from 2002–03 and therefore pre-date the introduction of pension credit and the big take-up campaigns that followed. We hope that there will be significant improvements in the next few years. It is estimated that up to 2.4 million people, up to 1.8 million of whom may be pensioners, are missing out on council tax benefit. There is clearly a lot of work for us to do to ensure that the people who have an entitlement to that additional assistance get it. We must also ensure that they are able to get it in the simplest and easiest way, without having to jump through too many hoops.

Encouraging people to take up their entitlement to benefits such as council tax benefit is very much at the heart of our agenda. We have learnt a lot about how to do that through the pension credit take-up campaigns and the work of the Pension Service local service. I was most encouraged to hear the comment from my hon. Friend's local Age Concern branch about the effectiveness of the campaign in his area. One often hears when things go wrong; it is nice to hear when things are going well and to receive a little bit of praise. I hope that he will convey our appreciation to Age Concern York.

In recognition of the recent high levels of council tax in some authorities and their likely impact on those on fixed incomes—I have taken on board the points that my hon. Friend made about fixed incomes often implying poverty in particular age groups—we are making a one-off payment of £200 to each eligible household containing someone aged 65 or over. That is a significant amount of money, which will make a big difference to those in receipt of it. However, we also know that the oldest and poorest pensioners are likely to be disproportionately affected by the rise in cost-of-living expenses. To help with those additional costs, we are making a further one-off payment of £50 to those households containing someone aged 70 or over in receipt of pension credit guarantee.

The free off-peak travel will be tremendously popular among those who receive it for the first time, particularly if they have had to put up with using vouchers in the past—vouchers are inevitably a form of rationing travel rather than encouraging it, because vouchers of a fixed value always run out. That will be a valuable improvement in pensioners' opportunities to travel and get around. It is important that they can do that and not be stuck at home. I hope that when local authorities contact pensioners about the concession they will use the opportunity to promote council tax benefit and other benefits. I would be happy to have further discussions with my hon. Friend about how we might ensure that that happens.

I should like to say a little about progress on our Link-Age strategy, which is an attempt to join up services and provisions for pensioners, ensuring that pensioners are assisted more holistically across Departments and local authorities. The strategy aims to remove duplication and ensure that our older citizens receive not only their cash entitlements, but the vital services that so often determine an individual's quality of life. The scheme is good news, because it means that more people with an entitlement to pension credit and council tax benefit, as well as other benefits and services, receive assistance.

There is an example from my hon. Friend's constituency that might interest him. A pensioner living in his constituency received a visit from a local Pension Service representative and was found to be entitled to pension credit of an extra £51.32 a week. He received a backdated payment of £2,800, which he had not expected. I am sure that that came in handy. That pensioner was a chap who did not think that he might be entitled to any extra help. In that way, the local service, the joint teams and Link-Age can help to get to people who just assume that the extra help available that they hear about is not really for them.

Hugh Bayley: My hon. Friend was kind enough to ask me to pass on thanks to Age Concern York. I would also like to thank the Pension Service staff in York, who have spearheaded the campaign and achieved good results by working with local agencies such as Age Concern. There really is a partnership and it works.

Maria Eagle: I am happy to hear that from my hon. Friend and hope that he will pass on those remarks to the local service, because it is nice to hear praise. It should be passed to the people who deserve to hear it.

On the wider front, the local service continues to work with partners such as primary care trusts, Age Concern York, Older Citizens Advocacy York and the energy efficiency unit, in bringing together the different types of assistance available to make a real difference to people's lives. Those organisations have arranged a series of joint events, one of which my hon. Friend may recall attending in September last year. I am sure that he found it worth while—I have not heard that he did not—and he might be interested to know that it generated 117 pension credit applications.

My hon. Friend gave a figure for the number of people receiving pension credit in his constituency, but the figure that he quoted was the number of households. The actual figure is 5,141 individuals. His figure was lower, because in some households there are two pensioners rather than one.

Such initiatives are important in ensuring that all our pensioners can receive the assistance that we want them to have, so that they can live their lives with dignity, without having to worry about poverty in their old age.

11.29 am

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

Reserve Forces (Iraq)

2 pm

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): I start by paying tribute to the men and women of the armed forces around the world, whether or not they are reservists. Their courage and dedication to duty in the most difficult and trying conditions is paramount in our minds.

I had the privilege of serving in the Royal Naval Reserve for more than a decade and, other than the annual training deployment, I was not mobilised. Today, young men and women in the reserves expect to be called up regularly for a substantial period, of which my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) is an excellent example. It is critical that policymakers do not forget that although those people are volunteers, we should acknowledge the disruption to their lives and the consequences of their mobilisation.

In 1996, the previous Government recognised the changing pattern in maximising the effectiveness of the reserve forces, and they started to allow them to engage more freely in the operations of the regular forces. In 1998, the incoming Government acknowledged their manifesto pledge to conduct a strategic defence review of the armed forces and the Territorial Army was restructured away from its original cold war role to support the armed forces in rapid deployment missions abroad. It has become involved in the type of peace-keeping operations that characterised the post-cold war period: for example, the RNR lost its minesweeping role.

Although there was little change to the size of the RNR and the reserve Air Force, there was a significant reduction in manpower in the Territorial Army—from 57,000 to about 40,000—which, with hindsight, was possibly a mistake. The defence White Paper in 2003 did not announce major changes to the reserves, but it acknowledged their growing importance and made several recommendations regarding support and financial assistance for reservists and employers. One purpose of the debate is to explore whether that has gone far enough and has adequate vigour.

There is no doubt that the retention of the reserves gives a number of distinct advantages: a reservist is cost-effective and costs about 20 per cent. of his regular counterpart. Equally important, with the decline of national service and conscription, is the fact that the reserves provide a link between the armed forces and the wider community. In the aftermath of 9/11, a further role with responsibilities in civil defence contingencies was added.

It was a good decision to use the reserve forces as civil contingency units; 9/11 changed the world as we know it for ever. There are, however, questions whether those units are properly equipped and have all the resources they need. There is also the question whether some personnel could be double-hatted. To be fair, the Ministry of Defence has vigorously rejected those concerns, but they still exist and it would be helpful if the Minister told us the position.

Last December, I had a golden opportunity to visit Iraq with the Select Committee on Defence. It was obvious straight away that the reserve forces play a major role there, providing 15 per cent. of the forces. The very efficient female private driving my car told me that only a year earlier she had been a beautician in Belfast. She joined the TA for a bit of variety and now finds herself in the middle of the Iraqi desert. That example was commonplace; reservists have a wide range of responsibilities and make a first-class contribution. They are fully engaged in activities well over and above their expectations.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Will my hon. Friend recognise the outstanding role played by the Royal Auxiliary Air Force as well as those of the Territorial Army and the Royal Naval Reserve, to which he belonged? Is it not notable that No. 600 (City of London) Squadron Royal Auxiliary Air Force, from Northolt in my constituency, sent a range of different specialists to fill gaps and provide essential skills, without which the service could not have functioned effectively?

Richard Ottaway: I do recognise their contribution. To pick up on my hon. Friend's point, I realise that whole operations may not be able to take place without the contribution of the reservists. When talking about the reserves it is easy to think primarily of the TA, but it is essential to include the Royal Naval Reserve and the Royal Auxiliary Air Force. That is why I use the word reservists as much as possible.

Since 1999, 30 per cent. of the TA's total strength has been mobilised for operations in support of the Regular Army. The majority of them have served in Iraq, but a large number have been mobilised voluntarily as individuals to serve in theatres of operations from Afghanistan to the Balkans. The mobilisation culture has transformed the TA post-cold war. Once seen as the weekend warriors, the TA and other reservists are now largely accepted as an integral part of the armed forces by regular servicemen.

When I was in the Gulf, I visited HMS Marlborough and met key Royal Naval Reserve personnel serving on board. They were playing a full part in the operation of that ship and in protecting the oil platforms essential to the survival of the Iraqi economy. The phrase "one Army"—and, dare one say it, "one Navy"—has been coined and is much used by the Ministry of Defence; that is supported by the announcement that each regular infantry regiment will have a TA infantry battalion attached.

All that is illustrated in the excellent publication by the directorate of reserve forces and cadets entitled "Future use of the UK's Reserve Forces", which also starkly points out that everyone who joins the reserves should expect to be mobilised at least once—a far cry from yesteryear. The crunch lies in the section entitled "Frequency of mobilisation", from which I shall read as it puts the case far more succinctly than I possibly could:

"The Volunteer Reserve Forces are not an infinite resource. Their availability to fulfil the roles set out above depends upon their levels of recruitment and training and upon their availability for mobilisation. The attitude of Reservists, and of potential Reservists, will in turn be influenced by the attitudes of both their families and of their current and potential employers."

It could not be better put. It goes on to say that, of late, mobilisations have resulted in "a maximum cumulative total of one year out of three",

but that it believes that to be unsustainable, so it is now considering an aggregate of 12 months over five years, which it considers far more reasonable. I am sure that everybody will agree. It is important that the director of reserve forces and cadets recognises the difficulties.

All that prompts several questions. Are we treating reservists properly? Are we rewarding them properly? Could we operate without them? As the answer to the latter question is increasingly likely to be no, the first two questions deserve serious scrutiny. A clue to the answers lies in the recruitment and retention of reservists. In his appearance before the Defence Committee, the Chief of the General Staff, General Sir Michael Jackson, acknowledged that the reserves are below their establishment level of 42,500. The latest figures indicate that TA numbers are at 38,320, including the non-deployable university officers training corps of 4,800, leaving the TA with a deployable 33,530—way below the required number. General Jackson acknowledged that he has concerns about TA recruiting. With the greater use of reservists in the front line, up to 20 per cent. of the Army could be reservists in future wars. We have a serious problem that has to be addressed.

As the director of reserve forces and cadets recognised, the attitudes of families and employers are critical. I, like others, was concerned to read reports of TA veterans of the Iraq war being sacked by their employers in Britain while on active duty. That is a worrying development and could severely undermine morale in the reserves. It is one thing for them to risk their necks, quite another to risk their jobs. An employer cannot refuse to allow a reservist to go when called up and it is a statutory offence to sack the reservist if that happens. However, that is only a right and the Government have left it to the individuals to pursue their cases. One of the problems is that reservists have to take legal action on their own without any financial or legal support from the Ministry of Defence. Cases of reservists using up all their savings are not unknown. Will the Minister set out what plans he has to give greater support to reservists who have lost their jobs?

There is also the problem of reservists injured on duty. In one particularly high-profile case, Mr. David Corrigan damaged his knee while on active service as a paramedic with the Parachute Regiment. He has had a number of operations and incurred considerable personal expense. He has had to leave the TA and give up his job with the ambulance service. Because he was no longer on active service, the Army stopped paying for his treatment. Mr. Corrigan has been shocked at the difference in treatment between TA soldiers and their full-time colleagues.

Mr. Corrigan's Member of Parliament, who happens to be the Prime Minister, has written to the Secretary of State for Defence calling for TA members who served in wartime to be treated as regular soldiers. The Prime Minister's agent said that Mr. Corrigan had been "treated very badly. His case has raised the whole issue of how TA members are treated when they return from serving in wartime."

I welcome the Prime Minister's intervention to try to remedy a medical wrong. It would perhaps be described in some quarters as opportunistic, and this case illustrates what a childish response that is to addressing today's problems. At least Mr. Corrigan will be able to recover 50 per cent. of his expenses under a future Conservative Government. Given the high profile nature of the Prime Minister's intervention, will the Minister tell us whether medical treatment can be made available to reservists who suffer injury when on active service?

The important point is that if reservists are to be treated like regulars and the principle is established, they should have the same rights and protection. The irony is of course that reservists have had the greater disruption to their lives and have a greater need of the services than some existing servicemen. That is not only the case in health and employment protection. Questions are being raised about military pensions. A long-serving TA major who launched a High Court battle for the right to a military pension after 1,100 days of active service has had to reject the unbelievable contention by the MOD that he was casual labour. Will the Minister assure us that that defence will no longer be used and give us an insight into his thinking on the issue?

Employment rights, health care and pension rights are all important issues for the men and women who serve the country in the reserve forces. They know what danger is all about. The question is, do their Government recognise that? I said at the beginning that the reserve forces are a cost-effective option for the Government, but with their numbers down and difficulties with recruitment, the MOD has to take a hard look at its approach. All that goes to strategic commitment.

In the recently published report on future capabilities by the Defence Committee it was perfectly clear that financial constraints are behind the tensions and stretch now being experienced in the armed forces. The reservists in Iraq are a sharp reminder of that. If there are cuts in ships and aircraft, and reductions in infantry, sooner or later something will have to give, and there will be gaps in capability. That will create a risk that need not have been taken if there had been more careful planning. As the First Sea Lord said, we have now got into the business of coping with risk upon risk. The cuts have been caused by the high costs of new equipment, which is being introduced in a haphazard and poorly planned way. These gaps will have to be filled by men and women who must be supported at all costs. The reserves will play an integral part in doing that, and we ignore them at our peril.

2.15 pm

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) on securing this debate. I am interested in the topic under discussion, although I have no personal experience of serving in the military or the Territorial Army. However, I have the privilege of representing Monmouth, and I think that the hon. Gentleman mentioned that he was recently on board HMS Monmouth. Am I right?

Richard Ottaway: Marlborough.

Mr. Edwards: I apologise for my mistake, but if the hon. Gentleman were to have the opportunity to go on board HMS Monmouth, I would encourage him to do so. I have been on board the ship several times.

I have an interest in the debate: Monmouth is the regimental headquarters of the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers, which is the senior reserve regiment in the British Army. The hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) always disputes that; however, although it is not the oldest regiment in the Army reserve, it is the senior one, and it is the only regiment in the British Army that has two "Royals" in its name. There is not sufficient time now to go into the history of the regiment, but if any Members want to visit the regimental museum in Monmouth, they will find it very interesting.

When we had the strategic defence review, many Members wanted to save their local TA regiment. The Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers was not only saved, but its role was enhanced, although there was a minor reduction in one of its bases in the midlands. Good representation, and the case that it makes for its important role in serving the Army and in having engineering expertise, helped to protect it.

The regiment provided the largest reserve force deployment in Iraq. About 40 of its members were deployed in Operation Telic 1, and about 140 in Operation Telic 2. I had the great privilege of attending its medal ceremony a few months ago, when His Royal Highness the Duke of Gloucester presented medals to all those who had served in Iraq. Their role there was largely threefold. First, they contributed to the post-conflict infrastructure: they were involved in developing new water and sewerage systems, and in establishing electricity supply and restoring power in general, and they helped in the reconstruction of what became known as Aldershot bridge. Secondly, they performed a humanitarian role: in the post-conflict situation in Iraq, they supported communities in the Basra area. However, that role was curtailed by the need for force protection, and the regiment was also greatly involved in that.

The hon. Member for Croydon, South has made some important points about support from employers for the TA. I would have been appalled if any employer had discriminated against someone who had served in the reserve forces and had been deployed abroad. However, there is a concern about that. It is my understanding that reservists cannot be deployed more than once in three years, that the norm is about once in five years, and that the general feeling is that that norm should be adhered to. Many of the families of those who serve in the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers are worried that, as members of the regiment served in Iraq more than a year ago, they might be deployed again next year. If the Minister can give an assurance that that is not the case, I am sure that they would welcome that. Members of the regiment are aware of the responsibilities that they take on when they join, and they want to use their skills to the best effect.

Richard Ottaway: It is important just to draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that a cumulative period of 12 months in five years is what is being proposed, and that that could result in more than one deployment in that period.

Mr. Edwards: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for clarifying that. If that were to increase the pressures on people and the chances of them being deployed in difficult situations such as those in Iraq, the representation to which I have just referred would need to be seriously listened to.

Brigadier Ian Cholerton, who heads the Army in Wales, gave a briefing at Westminster a couple of days ago to Welsh Members of Parliament. I asked him to give that briefing after I heard a similar one that he gave at the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers' headquarters in Monmouth only a few weeks ago. He gave a very good briefing to the Secretary of State for Defence, and I asked if he could give a similar one to Welsh Members of Parliament on Monday.

Unfortunately, not many hon. Members from Wales could attend, but the brigadier talked about the future structure of the Army in Wales and the central role that the Territorial Army will have. It has the expertise, especially in engineering, and it is a great honour to be the Member of Parliament for the constituency in which the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers is based. I am an honorary associate of the regiment, and I am happy to do anything that I can to represent its interests and those of its families.

2.21 pm

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): I draw the attention of the House to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests as a serving officer in the Territorial Army.

I was fortunate to be granted an Adjournment debate by the Speaker about a year ago, shortly after I returned from Iraq and when that experience was fresh in my mind. By and large, I have said what I have to say, and that is on the record. That brief was not dissimilar from the one that I gave to the Chief of the General Staff conference on 2 December 2003. I made it clear in the Adjournment debate that I was broadly happy with the way in which things were going for the Territorial Army, although I had one or two reservations, which I shall talk about briefly again.

Undoubtedly, the measure of the effectiveness of the Territorial Army is that its soldiers—the reservists—should be indistinguishable when compared and serving with their regular counterparts. I am broadly satisfied that they are, which is a credit to them and to the regulars with whom they serve.

I did, and do, have a reservation about the extent to which we are using reserves in medium-sized operations of low intensity. The ordinary citizen—the taxpayer—is entitled to ask how we can do with a smaller Regular Army and fewer infantry, but expect to call out reservists more often. By and large, however, it is undoubtedly true that the reservists welcome the opportunity to serve and enjoy doing so. That is largely why they join.

Many of us will have participated in debates on the reserve forces. My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) called for the much greater use of the reservists, and argued for ways in which we should make them more useable. We have done so, and we are using them, so it is difficult to complain on that account.

If members of the reserve forces were in any doubt about the commitment that they were making when they joined—if they believed, perhaps, that they were joining the boy scouts—they will have been disabused of that belief by now. Members of the reserve force now know exactly what their membership entails, so there should be no particular problem on that account. There will, however, be a considerable problem when it comes to employers and careers.

When I joined the reserve forces, we did not have to worry about our jobs, because we would be mobilised only when there was the danger of the first Russian shock army advancing across the north German plain. We did not have to worry too much about returning to our jobs, because we would be packing our bergens when our wives were reading the Home Office leaflet about how to build a nuclear shelter under the stairs.

I always wondered how many people would leave their wives in those circumstances, packing their nuclear, biological and chemical warfare gear into their bergens and leaving their families exposed in city centres. Mercifully, we were never faced with the reality of finding what would have happened in those circumstances.

We now have the new policy of show and tell, if I might paraphrase it in that way. Reservists must now inform their employer and authorise their military unit to communicate with their employer about their reserve liability. Undoubtedly, that will be a disincentive for employers to employ members of the reserve forces due to the consequences of that liability. For the mobilisations that we had with Operation Telic, it worked tremendously well, and by and large, employers have been supportive. However, we have yet to see how that will roll forward in future, and whether they will continue to be as supportive.

The burden can be shared by a larger reserve force. The larger the reserve force, the more the burden of mobilisation can be spread, and the less frequently the same individuals will be called. At the moment, my fear is that we are dipping into a pretty small pool, and the water is getting muddier. We must be particularly aware of and concerned about that. It is all very well asking for larger reserve forces, but when they are as under-recruited as they are at present, that prompts the question of how we shall achieve that.

When I joined the Territorial Army, I did it for the money. It was fun, but when I joined the officer training corps at university, I think it was £13 for a weekend, which was money well worth having in the mid-1970s. I am not so sure that in today's society, with relatively high employment and wages, that is the incentive or the attraction that it was, and we must start to look for more innovative ways of recruiting and retaining reservists. There are opportunities, but I wonder about the extent to which the training available, and the qualifications that reservists—and any military personnel—can acquire through courses, can be encouraged to be recognised in civilian life. For example, modules for certain courses could be, by arrangement with certain business schools, made eligible as part of the modules for a master of business administration. More technical and vocational training could be recognised as a contribution to a corresponding civilian qualification. That would provide an incentive for personnel to go into the military and to stay there; at the same time it might also provide a more tangible benefit for employers. That is worth investigating; I know that the Ministry has been considering that, and I hope that that continues and gingers up.

My principal concern is that of tour length. The policy when I was in the Gulf was that reservists were mobilised specifically to serve with a particular formation, and their tour length would be that of the formation. If the formation was going out for a four-month tour, reservists did a four-month tour. The general policy for augmentees, such as staff officers who were mobilised and sent out to a headquarters formation, was that they would do six months. Generally, the tour lengths were four or six months: four with the regular formation going into a roulement or six months for augmentees. Can the Minister tell me, either in his summing-up or by correspondence, whether that policy has changed?

My concern is that if one moves beyond that six-month barrier, and extends tour lengths beyond six months—I know that the liability that one signs up for is one year in any three at present, although there are proposals to change that to one year in any five—that makes it more difficult for employees to return to their careers and to pick up the threads of a civilian life. My advice to the Minister is to stick as close to the six months for the maximum tour length as he can get away with.

I was interested in the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) raised in respect of providing some legal back-up to the statutory rights of personnel. It is all very well to give someone a statutory right, but to tell them, when they come back and find that they have lost their job, "Sorry, mate, you're on your own," is not a proper response. The point about legal back-up is worth considering. It will be interesting to see how my employers react to my mobilised service at the first opportunity that they will have to do so on 5 May. However, I suspect that if they choose to sack me that will be for other reasons.

2.31 pm

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) on securing the debate. Although we suffer a little from few Members being present, we all appreciate the way in which he has brought this matter to the attention of the House. There is very little in what he said with which we do not all agree. We have benefited considerably from the broad experience and knowledge of the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), who provided even more support for the humane, reasonable and sensible suggestions that have been brought to the Minister's attention.

At this point, I am uncertain whether this may be the swan-song in office of the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, the hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin)—an office that he has held during an interesting and perhaps difficult period for the Ministry of Defence. I wish him all the very best. We have met regularly in the Committees considering the Armed Forces (Pensions and Compensation) Act 2004 and other legislation, and although he was probably working under the considerable constraints of the Treasury and others,

[Mr. Colin Breed]

I often felt that he sympathised with our views, even if he ultimately did not agree with us. Perhaps on this occasion, at the twenty-third hour and fifty-ninth minute of his ministerial career, he might give some indication that he has sympathy with some of the things that we are saying.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I was trying to resist, but could do so no longer. I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments. I thought that he was going to talk about a compensation scheme because he, among others, argued in Committee that we should make the armed forces a special case. He will have noticed from various recent announcements, and will see in the written statement that I will make tomorrow, that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor agreed that, provided the personnel in question stay within the armed forces, compensation payments in the new scheme should be tax free.

Mr. Breed: I am delighted by that confirmation. No one would say that that is not a good thing. However, many of us think that opportunities in respect of certain aspects of the compensation arrangements were missed during our consideration of the Act, which will come into force from 1 April. Some of those omissions will perhaps be exposed by some of the cases that have been mentioned and some that I will mention.

It is right to pay proper tribute to the courage, commitment and professionalism of our armed forces and particularly, in this debate, to our reserve forces. I pay a warm tribute to the reserve forces for all that they do. I sometimes think that their role is not well publicised in the media. They are so interchangeable with the full-time personnel that that they are sometimes indistinguishable and therefore do not receive additional recognition. As has been said, however, they are a vital part of the UK's armed forces. The reserve forces consist of men and women who give considerable amounts of their time, and in some cases even their lives, on behalf of their country. The operation in Iraq has involved the largest call-up of reservists since the Suez crisis in 1956. Since January 2003, some 11,000 reservists have been mobilised to support the operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, and considerable numbers remain there today.

Regrettably, the violence in Iraq persists—we see that on our television screens fairly regularly—and more countries are considering withdrawing their troops or are doing so. Future operations, especially in peacekeeping, peace enforcement and reconstruction support, will be manpower intensive. The work cannot be done by the vast quantities of technological equipment that we now have; it requires men and women to do it. It is clear to me and to all hon. Members that the pressures on our reserve forces will increase. That will have serious implications, not least for training periods, recruitment and the treatment of reservists when they return home in terms of employment and job security, as has been amply demonstrated.

There are increasing demands on all our armed forces. The current manning levels have resulted in a growing dependence on the use of reservists to meet our commitments abroad, which in turn places greater pressure on them, and then we see that they are not up to full strength either. At the beginning of the year, the Under-Secretary renewed the compulsory call-out of reservists to support operations in Iraq. At that time, we were told in the House that some 2,350 reservists were called out in the previous year. The decision to use the TA and reservists to an increasing extent on the front line raises the question of the extent to which the Ministry of Defence is compensating for a basic lack of manpower in the British Regular Army.

The Government's decision to cut manpower in the Army has been questioned on a number of occasions. As we have said repeatedly—I firmly believe this—our troops are the best piece of kit in the British armed forces and we must ensure that they are properly trained, highly motivated and well equipped. The pressure on reserve forces was highlighted a couple of years ago, when the members at an armed forces reservist field hospital were told that they would have to stay in Iraq while the personnel from both regular field hospitals came home.

As has been mentioned, the length of operations and the time between them for reservists should be carefully considered, because any additional pressure will have a detrimental effect on the morale of the TA and on recruitment. I was struck by what the hon. Member for New Forest, West said about the periods for which people are away. I, too, think that six months should be the maximum. When we think of how businesses operate today and the speed with which they move when it comes to their customer base, technology, systems, mergers, acquisitions and so on, we see that even six months can be quite a long time to be away from one's post. When people return, they have to assimilate into that company or business again. There may be new personnel and new systems to deal with as well as all the other issues, not the least of which is the experience of spending six months in a place such as Iraq.

The standard of training for our reserve forces is very important. This month, a newspaper report instigated an investigation of a case in which British troops were sent on guard duty in Iraq without bullets because they were not fully weapons trained. I am sure that that was a relatively isolated incident, but it showed that there is pressure to put people into posts for which they might not be fully trained. They might be required to undertake the last part of their training on deployment.

It is, however, clear that there are continuing problems with training and equipping our forces in Iraq. We want no corners to be cut in training because it is so vital to the expertise that we deploy and the safety of those who undertake such work. We must also ensure that reservists are treated in a similar fashion to regular soldiers in the British Army, not only because that is right, but because they cannot be seen to be indistinguishable when they are required to undertake the same job and might face even greater pressures because they have to return to civilian life. Those men and women deserve to have the same rights as soldiers in the Army, if not better.

A month ago, a case went to the High Court concerning the right to a military pension. There were times during the passage of the Armed Forces (Pensions and Compensation) Act when pensions for reservists were highlighted. The hon. Member for Canterbury

(Mr. Brazier) was particularly exercised about the subject and cited a significant number of examples. We will see more such examples if the Government continue to rely more on reservists to fulfil certain functions. More claims will be made for a military pension and it is something that should have been tackled under the Act.

The case in the High Court could be a landmark case; its outcome will certainly affect many TA members. The major who took his case to court had been a member of the TA for more than 34 years. He claimed that, under European Union law, he should be treated no less favourably than full-time members of the armed forces, who have pension rights. Although he was a part-time soldier, he was not—in his words—"casual labour". I am sure that we support that argument.

In the Prime Minister's constituency, we have the high-profile case of David Corrigan. When I read that the Prime Minister was writing to the Secretary of State for Defence saying that TA soldiers should be treated the same as regular soldiers, I thought it strange that he could send those people to war, but could not decide whether they should be treated the same as regular soldiers. I am not certain how that works, but if the Prime Minister felt that the case was proven and he wished to support it, it should not have been difficult for the Secretary of State to answer in the affirmative. Can the Minister say how that case is being considered now?

The increasing pressure on reserves to participate in ongoing military operations in Iraq will have an effect on the retention and recruitment of reservists. Let us consider the relationship between businesses and their employees who are members of the reserves. Many years ago, people would have proudly put the fact that they were TA reservists on their CV. It would have been positive information for an employer to consider when men or women applied for jobs. It would have provided a real character reference, but I wonder whether people would include that information on their CV today. It might be difficult for the employer to assimilate. We must accept that businesses are under much pressure—I do not mean usual business competitive pressures, but pressures in respect of their employees. We are all aware of the terms of maternity leave and paternity leave, and now reservist staff must be taken into account. Businesses today tend to function with the staffing required for the job in hand—there is very little slack. More and more companies take on contract staff, preferring not to employ the staff themselves but to use an agency to provide the number of staff required at any one time. The opportunities for what I might call the ordinary business to employ people in the usual way are becoming fewer.

If more businesses are being required to consider such leave patterns, it will change their view of whether they want to employ people in the reserve forces; it will become more and more difficult. The Government have to recognise that they cannot continue to pile additional pressures on businesses without there being a reaction. The Minister might like to give us some idea of how the Ministry of Defence is approaching the problem, which will not go away. Businesses are not suddenly going to say, "We will be only too pleased to see many of our staff disappear for six months at a time." If we are going to rely more upon reserve forces, a lot more work will have to be done with employers.

Finally—I think that this is the undercurrent of what has been said so far—the Government have made a positive decision to create a reserve force that will be deployed far more than was thought possible some years ago. It will become an integral part of our forces and we will make much greater use of our reservists. That will require the Government to take a different approach and to consider those men and women in a different light. We did not see much of that in the legislation on paying compensation, but I hope that such debates as this will begin to change the MOD's mind about how it treats those whom we want to attract to the reserve forces, because in the years to come they will become more necessary and we will be more reliant on them.

2.47 pm

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): I, too, congratulate my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) on bringing the subject to the attention of the House. Not only did he serve in the senior service, but he is a now member of the Defence Committee. He brings a lot of experience and thought to our debate. He raised the subject in a non-confrontational way in an attempt to mark out not only the role of our reservists—many of whom, as we speak, are serving in the line of fire—but some of the problems that they will face in future.

I add to the comments of the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed), who speaks for the Liberal Democrats, by saying that this is notionally the Minister's last appearance at the Dispatch Box. I genuinely wish him all the best. We have not always agreed, but he has worked hard in his post, and his work for veterans and veteran organisations is much appreciated.

I do not know what the Minister will do when he eventually stands down. I believe that the right hon. Member for Airdrie and Shotts (Mrs. Liddell) has been promised the post of high commissioner in Australia—assuming that the Labour party returns to government—and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, the right hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), has a promissory note for South Africa. Governor of Gibraltar might have been the kind of largesse that an old Labour Government or an old Conservative Government might have bestowed. However, we wish the Minister all the best.

My hon. Friends and others have attempted to put the core of our debate, the service of reserve forces in Iraq and the challenges and problems that they face, in some sort of historical context. You would expect me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as someone who started his working life as a military historian, to appreciate what has been the traditional view for more than 100 years, and especially in the Regular Army, of reserve forces and particularly of the Territorial Army. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), who is no longer in the Chamber, rightly noted that the reserves are also drawn from the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force, but the bulk today come from the TA, and the regulars often regarded the TA as a bit of a joke.

At the beginning of the first world war, Field Marshal Lord Kitchener disparaged the TA as a town clerks army, but they contributed more than 50 per cent. of the soldiers who served in the first world war, and more people served in the TA than in the Regular Army or Kitchener's Army. I would hazard a guess that the situation was nearly the same in the second world war, too. So, that town clerks army provided a massive amount of manpower, which was used physically to defend the United Kingdom and on many operations.

[Mr. Keith Simpson]

It always used to be thought in the Regular Army that an attachment to the TA was the kiss of death, and becoming adjutant of a TA battalion was the equivalent of being appointed a junior Minister at the Department for Work and Pensions: it was not necessarily the most exciting appointment. Of course, General Mike Jackson is living proof that that is not true. He was posted to outer Siberia, as it were, when he became adjutant of the 10th Battalion, the Parachute Regiment in Scotland—if he could survive that, he could survive anything. As we know, he ultimately became Chief of the General Staff.

The Regular Army has always had an ambivalent attitude to its reserves, and I suspect that the same is true in the Navy and the Air Force. That ambivalence comes down to two things. In the past, reservists were part-time soldiers; the reserves were seen as a drinking club or something that people joined for money. It was thought that reservists wanted to wear the uniform and that they sashayed around, but did not do real service. Their medal ribbons were thought to be for 25 years' undetected crime, rather than for real service. Secondly, whatever limited money the regular armed forces had, it sometimes had to go to the reserve forces, and the regulars always felt that they could use the money better.

There is no doubt that a major change has come about in the past 10 years. That is because the old wartime generation has gone, and the cold war generation is on its way out. It is also because of the nature of the operations in which we are now involved, as well as the basic line taken by the strategic defence review and, more recently, by a whole series of add-ons to that review, culminating in the defence White Paper.

I am not saying this as a purely partisan point, but it is fair to say that the Government are having to claw back from the strategic defence review in many respects. Colleagues on both sides of the House felt that the territorial and reserve forces had been cut too much. The basic line, certainly as far as the Army was concerned, was that if push came to shove, and it was a choice between money for the regulars and money for the TA, the TA would have to take the cuts. We now recognise that those cuts went too far, not least because of the need, during so-called peacetime, to deploy the reserve forces on a scale never before seen in our history, as several colleagues have mentioned.

The deployment of our reservists in Iraq, whether in the Army, the Navy or the Air Force, points to a major sea change in our attitude towards reserve forces. Potentially, reserve forces can now serve three times over; it used to be said that they were twice a citizen, but they are now at least three times a citizen. First, they may be mobilised to take a direct role in operational, active service, in formed units or as individuals. Secondly, they are likely to be deployed as back filling—to use old terminology—allowing regulars to be deployed on operations. Finally, we should not forget that some are now organised in the civil contingency reaction forces—engaged in what used to be called home defence—and they will play a major role in the unfortunate event of a serious major terrorist incident in the United Kingdom. Those three roles overlap—sometimes literally. In some cases, TA soldiers have been told that they form part of a civil contingency reaction force, and they have been mobilised to serve overseas. Our reserve forces experience overstretch as well.

In thinking about the role that our reserve forces play, we should also bear in mind the fact that, traditionally, they have been a recruiting ground for our regular armed forces, just as the Army Cadet Force and the university cadets have been. A significant number of reservists who have served with the regular armed forces have transferred across. That pool of what I might call generically manpower—so, womanpower as well—is spread pretty thinly. We call upon those people to fulfil a number of functions. Hon. Friends and other hon. Members have rightly pointed out that many members of the reserve forces are proud to serve alongside members of the regular armed forces, integrated with them. Many of them also enjoy being deployed on operational active service—that is one of the reasons why they joined the reserve forces—and not only because of the excitement; they like the physical recognition in the form of a medal that proves that they are not just Saturday night soldiers.

Given the momentum of operations, even if those in Iraq eventually wind down, and given that the defence White Paper has made the assumption that expeditionary warfare will continue on the current scale, the situation cannot continue indefinitely; we will require our reservists.

Drawing together the points that my hon. Friends have made, the Ministry of Defence faces a number of challenges, to use the awful Sir Humphrey, civil service terminology. Let me rehearse them. First, as my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) said, there is a feeling that, ironically, if the regular armed forces are overstretched and are having to be supplemented by the reservists, ultimately the reservists will be overstretched as well. He and others posed the interesting question: if we reach the stage at which we almost run out of deployable reservists—if operations continue in Iraq or elsewhere—how will we man our reserve forces?

Historically, in peacetime the armed forces have always been undermanned and overstretched. A number of tools are used to get round that problem in relation to overseas operations such as Iraq. The first is to employ people who are not British citizens. We have done that frequently and we are doing it now. The second is to offer higher pay and rewards of various kinds, not only to recruit people but to retain them. The third is the use of honours, awards and recognition. I shall come back to that. Finally, one can substitute mechanical means for people. I suspect that the MOD has considered the full range of options for our reserve forces.

The problem is that the kind of operations in which we are now involved are, as the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall said, manpower intensive for the Army. In such circumstances, far from needing fewer men we need more. For various reasons, we have not reached the same stage as the United States, where the national guard is undermanned by 42 per cent. It is having incredible difficulty recruiting people, largely because of what is called the mother factor. Mothers do not want their sons and daughters to go to Iraq, where the large scale of the casualties—fortunately, we have not experienced this—does not balance the financial rewards for serving in the national guard. I am not referring simply to money; joining the national guard is frequently a way to receive education on the cheap. As my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for New Forest, West said, one way to recruit and retain members of the reserves is by ensuring that the training and skills that they receive through serving in the armed forces can be recognised in civil life, as is the case with the regular armed forces.

I conclude by bringing together a number of points relating to the future rather than to the past. As I said at the beginning of my speech, the nature of reservists' integration with the regulars means that they have a higher status than ever before. Is that status recognised by the Ministry of Defence and the armed forces? The most senior rank for any reservist is a two-star rank, as is currently held by Major-General His Grace the Duke of Westminster. What a marvellously 19th-century ring that has about it: cool Britannia and new Labour appoint Major-General His Grace the Duke of Westminster as the first two-star reservist officer. Life is full of contradictions. That rank is a central staff administrative appointment. Does the Minister know the highest rank or command position that a TA or reservist officer holds in Iraq outside an administrative unit—in a combat arm unit? I suspect that it is difficult to get much beyond the equivalent of lieutenant-colonel in all three services. One way to encourage reservists with the necessary qualifications and experience is by giving them the opportunity to hold high field command or staff positions beyond administrative ones. There are arguments against that, but it is an important idea.

The MOD has made good progress, but the training and resources given to the TA and other reserve forces should be absolutely comparable to the regulars, particularly if we wish to deploy them on overseas operations. I salute the progress made by the Government, but all hon. Members present have made the point that if we expect reserve forces to continue to be used on such a scale, we cannot afford to have any anomalies in their pay, allowances, pensions or the medical treatment that they receive if they are wounded while serving on overseas operations.

The role played by the reservists over the past five years has been outstanding, and they are a credit to our country. We should also praise employers who not only allow reservists to leave their jobs, albeit under legal constraints, but are prepared to employ members of the reserve forces in the first place. As the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall pointed out, many employers employ only about six to eight people in an integrated team. If one man or woman is taken out for six months from such a company, as opposed to Tesco or Marks and Spencer, it is hard to bear. Reservists are a credit to us all, and this debate has shown our appreciation.

3.5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I congratulate the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) on securing this debate and welcome the contributions of the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) and my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards), who I know takes a close interest in such matters. I fully endorse the praise that has been given to our forces in this debate.

I hope that the Chamber will understand, however, if I begin with a rather more sombre reflection. I know that the whole House will wish to join me in paying tribute to the late Baroness Strange, who sadly died earlier this month. She had been president of the War Widows Association of Great Britain since 1990. She pursued her agenda vigorously, but also with charm and persuasive argument. Over the years she helped to secure a wide range of benefits for our war widows. Most recently, during the passage of the Armed Forces (Pensions and Compensation) Act 2004, she helped to ensure that widows whose spouses had died before 1973 did not lose their war pension on remarriage. Baroness Strange was a larger than life person, and was held in great respect and affection in both Houses. Her absence will be a sad loss for us in Parliament and for the War Widows Association of Great Britain. All our thoughts are with her husband Humphrey and the family at this difficult time.

Mr. Keith Simpson: I am grateful to the Minister for making those comments. I am sure that all hon. Members would agree that Baroness Strange was a quite outstanding lady. Those of us in the corridors of power who were gripped by her knew exactly what she wanted, and frequently she got it.

Mr. Caplin: The mobilisation of reservists in January 2003 to support United Kingdom operations in Iraq was the largest call-out of the reserve forces since the 1950s, as has been said. The initial phase saw 5,200 reservists mobilised in sufficient time to participate in the war-fighting phase of the operation. They served in formed reserve units and sub-units, and as individual reservists in both regular and reserve units. The latter use—to bring units from peace to war-fighting complement—has always been a traditional role of the reserve forces.

Reservists performed many varied and essential roles, from cooks and drivers, to intelligence analysts, amphibious engineers, infantry men and some unique to the reserves. In all, they constituted more than 10 per cent. of the UK ground forces deployed in Iraq. Many were called out at short notice, and it is to their credit, and that of their families and employers—I share that view with the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson)—that they met that challenge. The contribution of the reserve forces to that stage of the operation cannot be overemphasised. Without the support of those forces, we would not have been able to achieve the success that we did.

Since the war-fighting phase of Operation Telic has drawn to a close, the reserves have had a continuing role in supporting British forces in Iraq. The United Kingdom is committed to Iraq for as long as the Iraqi Government judge that the coalition is required to provide security and assist the Iraqi security forces. Therefore, just as reservists were mobilised during the war-fighting phase of the operation to fill a variety of roles, now they fill important roles in intelligence, and as linguists, medics and members of the civil and military co-operation group, which specialises in reconstruction tasks.

[Mr. Caplin]

Reservists from the RAF have filled many roles, including as meteorological officers, medics, aircraft ground crew and force protection personnel. The RAF's No. 2 Force Protection Wing has been deployed to Iraq and includes reservists from two Royal Auxiliary Air Force squadrons. The wing's role is varied, but one of its key functions has been to train around 250 Iraqi policemen. With nearly 3,000 local employees and contractors passing through the airport's vehicle checkpoint each day, it is vital that those people see Iraqis running their own security. The senior Iraqi police officer, Colonel Imad Abass, who is commander for the directorate of border enforcement at Basra international airport, recently said:

"It is very good for local people to see Iraqi police occupying the entrance of the airport, organising and controlling things by themselves. It is very good for us and the Iraqi people."

The Royal Naval Reserve has provided logisticians, intelligence analysts, medics, linguists, and mine and amphibian warfare specialists, and RNR sponsored reservists crewed the strategic sealift ro-ro vessels that took so much of our heavy equipment to the Gulf. In particular, we were able to draw on the expertise of one RN reservist who in civilian life worked in Arabian oilfields, and who provided invaluable advice on the pitfalls and possible booby-traps in Iraqi oilfields. Another, a manager of a UK port, was able to set up the new port facilities at Umm Qasr. That demonstrates the invaluable contribution that reservists make.

The process by which individuals are identified and selected to be mobilised has evolved since Operation Telic 1. For that stage of the operation, the numbers required and the time scale in which we needed them resulted in us exercising less discrimination in our choice of who to mobilise than we do now. The attitude of the individual and his employer towards mobilisation could be given less weight in a large-scale compulsory call-out.

In short, intelligent mobilisation is the process of identifying willing and available individuals for specific appointments through dialogue between an individual, his or her employer and the unit, and then up through the chain of command. I accept that during Operation Telic 1 that process was less intelligent, but it has become progressively more so. I can confirm to the House that all reservists being called out for Operation Telic 6 have said that they are willing to be mobilised.

In continuation of the policy of using reservists to augment the regular forces in Iraq, I announced on 14 December last year a further call-out of reservists for the UK's area of operations. That will consist of approximately 900 reservists, with a view to deployment from April onwards, and is part of a natural roulement of UK forces that takes place in May. They will undertake a range of activities including force protection duties, medical and logistical support, and providing individual reinforcements to units of all types. The increase from 700, the current mobilised figure, to 900 is due mainly to the replacement of a regular field hospital with a Territorial Army one. That rotation has been long planned. It demonstrates that the reserves are now fully integrated into the overall force structure, and their flexibility and utility. The matter is very much normal business, as far as the reserves and the rest of the armed forces are concerned.

The skill and dedication that the reserves have shown while carrying out their duties in south-east Iraq is reflected in the success that we have achieved in that region. In recognition of the reserve forces' contribution, a number of personnel have been recognised in the operational honours lists; the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk referred to that. They included Kingsman Michael Davison from the King's and Cheshire Regiment, who won a military cross, and Staff Sergeant Anthony Wyles from the Corps of Royal Engineers, who won the Queen's gallantry medal. Only last week it was announced that reservists were to be awarded an MBE and a military cross for services in Iraq, and a George medal is to be awarded to an individual serving in the Congo. Such men and women exemplify the spirit and quality of Britain's reserve forces.

Sadly, we have suffered some deaths in action, namely those of Private Smith of the 52nd Lowland Regiment; Corporal Pritchard of 116 Provost company; Fusilier Beeston, also of the Lowland Regiment; Sergeant Nightingale of 150 Transport company, which was attached to the 27th, Regiment Royal Logistic Corps, in Iraq; and Private Kitulagoda of the Royal Rifle Volunteers in Afghanistan. We are indebted to all of them and to their families for the efforts that they made on behalf of the United Kingdom here and abroad.

I want to deal with some of the issues in relation to the Reserve Forces (Safeguard of Employment) Act 1985, which was mentioned by all Members here. Reservists who are called out into permanent service benefit from employment protection under the legislation, which, unless history is playing tricks on me, was passed under a Conservative Government, as was the Reserve Forces Act 1996. Under section 1, an employer is required to take back into employment former employees who have completed their call-out service. Should an employer fail to reinstate a reservist in accordance with the Act, reservists may apply to a reinstatement committee, which will hear the case. The committee can order the employer to reinstate the reservist, pay compensation or both. Failure to comply with an order of the committee is a criminal offence, and the employer may be fined on summary conviction. I am afraid that the Act confers no powers on the Ministry of Defence to take measures against employers who fail to reinstate a reservist.

We also provide advice to our reservists when they return. On demobilisation, as the major will know, reservists receive a briefing about returning to civilian employment. I do not intend to comment on whether he will need a reinstatement committee later this year or next year.

Each reservist is also provided with a copy of joint service publication 532, headed "Guidance for Reservists Returning to Civilian Employment: Procedures to Secure Reinstatement". In co-operation with the regional reserve forces and cadets associations, we have also introduced the regional directors of the supporting Britain's reservists and employers campaign to provide advice and guidance to employers and reservists on reinstatement issues. We also have unit employer support officers to boost our capability further in this area. The MOD's SaBRE campaign team also has a helpline.

I believe, and hope, that the House will recognise that we are doing the very best that we can when our forces return from mobilised service.

Mr. Breed: Does the Minister recognise the fact that there have been problems recently with some reservists' jobs ceasing to exist and those reservists being made redundant? There is a feeling that the redundancies were created as a way of getting around the legislation.

Mr. Caplin: I was about to deal with the figures, but I spotted the hon. Member for Croydon, South first.

Richard Ottaway: Can I persuade the Minister to go a step further? What people need is advocacy support. I welcome what he just said about the package of support, but these people need someone to represent them. We are not talking about large numbers. It cannot be a significant sum. The Minister has legal departments at his disposal. It would be good if he went the extra step and provided advocacy support.

Mr. Caplin: I entirely recognise the hon. Gentleman's point, but we must reflect on the fact that a member of the armed forces returns to their civilian employment once we have demobilised them. Their employment with the MOD ceases. SaBRE and the unit officers that we have put in place do offer the sort of advocacy that he suggests. I suggest that he visit the local SaBRE director in south London or in the London region who might be able to explain SaBRE's advocacy role better.

I said that I would deal with the numbers for which the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) asked. I must begin by rejecting the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Croydon, South that large numbers of reservists have had to apply to the reinstatement committee to get their jobs back. That is simply not true.

More than 10,900 reservists have been mobilised to support Operation Telic. Since February 2003, a total of only 24 applications have been made under the Reserve Forces (Safeguard of Employment) Act, eight of which have been referred to a reinstatement committee. The reservists won four of those cases and lost three, and one case is outstanding. Those are not huge figures in the context of almost 11,000 mobilised members of the reserve forces, but I accept that there is more work to do. I intend to talk later about some of the measures that we are introducing to deal with these issues.

Questions were also asked about pensions. All members of the reserve forces have access to the pension scheme when they are on mobilised service—I thought that that was well understood—which includes the reserve forces pension scheme. Reservists may well have their own occupational scheme, so they are free to continue to contribute to that if they want to do so.

I cannot comment on the case cited, but let me make two brief points. Any reference to casual labour, which the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall mentioned, has a technical meaning in employment law. Those who have studied the matter will be able to explain that in greater detail than I can. Casual labour means intermittent employment, so it is certainly not meant to indicate unprofessional behaviour or a lack of respect for reservists. Appropriate pension provision is in place for such service, which would include contracting into the state second pension scheme, should that be required.

Iraq is not the only place where reservists have been deployed. They continue to support operations in Afghanistan, the Balkans, Sierra Leone and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The reserves have consistently provided between 10 and 18 per cent. of United Kingdom manpower in the former Yugoslavia since NATO operations commenced there in 1995. I had the pleasure of meeting a significant number of reserve forces during my visit last week to Kosovo and Bosnia.

All the deployments reflect the Government's policy on the use of reserves as outlined in the 1998 strategic defence review: having a more capable, usable, integrated and relevant reserve force to support their regular counterparts in operations overseas. That policy has implications for reservists and the Government beyond the bounds of military planning and operational commitments: it has a fundamental impact on our people. For reservists, it requires a mindset that views mobilised service as a likely consequence or at least a very real possibility of his service, rather than as a theoretical commitment relevant only in a dire emergency. The reserves community already recognises that and has continued to adapt to it over the past decade.

The Government, too, recognise that we have a duty to support reservists at home and abroad and we must acknowledge the impact that operational deployments can have on those affected—the individual, the family and those around them, their employer, of course, and the reserve forces as a whole. The effect on each of them must be managed in a way that is fair and which will preserve the reserves as a sustainable military resource in the long term.

Unsurprisingly, operations in Iraq have taught us some important lessons. The mass mobilisation prior to the war-fighting phase showed that the system could generate a large number of personnel in a short time, but highlighted the practical problems that arose. It was a military necessity that the action was taken but we would in future wish to give 28 days' notice of mobilisation whenever possible. It will not be possible in every case, but the policy is a significant step forward in minimising the disruption associated with mobilisation.

The hon. Member for Croydon, South asked about welfare medical support, which is important. When mobilised and deployed, reservists are treated in the same way as regular personnel. We continue to examine and refine the aftercare which reservists can access when they return. As with regulars, the mental stresses that can arise from deployments are more widely recognised and better understood. All personnel are briefed on post-traumatic stress reactions and sources of support are made known to them. A reservists welfare study has recently been concluded and several recommendations covering support to reserves at home and abroad are about to be implemented.

I want to deal briefly with the case of Corporal David Corrigan, which was raised by the hon. Gentleman. I apologise for Corporal Corrigan's treatment, which fell far short of the usual standards that we expect. We accept that owing to initially incorrect advice, Corporal Corrigan did not receive his entitlements and we are keeping in regular contact with him to put the matter right. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was representing his constituent in the letter to the Secretary of State.

[Mr. Caplin]

The new armed forces compensation scheme comes into effect on 6 April. The House will be aware of some of its provisions from recent coverage, but for members of the reserve forces in particular, these new terms are much more favourable. They allow the value of a reservist's civilian earnings to be taken into account when determining payments. Therefore, a doctor who is injured while carrying out his military duties as a private soldier in the Territorial Army will not be compensated simply as a soldier but according to his civilian job, where his ability to continue that employment is affected.

A number of reservists who are deployed in Iraq have suffered financially when their civilian earnings exceed their military pay. The system currently in place to make a financial award to a soldier is far from straightforward. It places an additional burden on what can already be a difficult time for soldiers and their families. The values of the awards have been fixed since the system was first introduced, and have gradually eroded over time. The system was outdated and needed an overhaul. I am glad to be able to announce that the new regulations will be laid before Parliament this afternoon.

The new awards are much more advantageous to the reservists, from a practical and a financial point of view. We have abolished the complex and invasive reservists hardship award, and the system of tiered payments according to rank. Instead, there will be a single award, applicable to all ranks from private to general, and capped at £200,000. The system of awards to employers has also been reformed; it makes it simpler for them to claim, and it allows them to do so for the full additional cost of replacing a mobilised reservist, up to a cap of £40,000. I hope that the House will join me in welcoming the introduction of these new arrangements, which significantly enhance the financial support on offer.

Mr. Edwards: Does my hon. Friend acknowledge that recruitment to the reserve forces has been a problem, and does he feel that that the new pay, allowances and compensation will help to rectify it?

Mr. Caplin: I very much hope so. We consulted properly on them, and they will be the subject of annual review.

Our proposals demonstrate the Government's commitment to supporting the reserve forces, and back up the words about minimising concerns that arise over mobilisation with actions. However, no amount of support—practical, financial, or in any other form—can eradicate the disruption that mobilisation causes to our reservists' personal lives. They continue to volunteer for service in such circumstances; that is at the heart of the volunteering ethos that sustains the reserve forces. I recognise the sacrifices that our reservists make, and we must not take them for granted. Mobilisation at the maximum frequency allowed by the Reserve Forces Act 1996 is not a sustainable demand.

That is why we recently published the "Future Use of the UK's Reserve Forces", which introduced a provision to mobilise people for not more than one year in five, unless there is no viable alternative, as the hon. Member for Croydon, South mentioned. I hope that Members have the chance to read that document. It summarises the effect on our people of our policy on the use of reserve forces. It also demonstrates the steps we have taken as a result of recent deployments, including in Iraq, to refine and improve our arrangements to support them.

The structure of the reserve forces must also be designed to support the demands of future operations. The principles of having usable, integrated and relevant reserve forces were developed in the 2003 White Paper, as the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk acknowledged. It stated that we will continue to use the reserves, not only for large-scale operations, but to reinforce some specialist capabilities, such as medical and logistic support to smaller-scale deployments. That will require ever-closer integration between the regular and reserve elements of the services. Generating genuine readiness, and being properly prepared in the right time scale, are the keys to this integration.

Most reservist units are held at low states of readiness at present. Better to meet the demands of future operations, some sub-units and individuals now remain at higher states of readiness than parts of the regular forces. That applies in particular to certain logistic, medical and other specialists, reflecting the need for them to be able to respond rapidly, as their services will be among those most likely to be required.

Such has been the contribution of reservists to operations that we intend to integrate them even further into force structures. For example, while the TA will remain broadly the same size as it is today, there will be some adjustments to its capabilities to meet new requirements and to best support the Regular Army on operations.

The final structure will be validated, in close consultation with the reserves community, over the coming months. However, rebalancing or restructuring should not be taken as an indication that reservists will be mobilised more frequently. Although we plan to continue to use reservists to support operations, we do not expect routinely to mobilise the high numbers of the start of Operation Telic in 2003; that was an exceptional situation. The frequency of mobilisation is also limited by law in the Reserve Forces Act, as well as by the one year in five policy, which I have outlined this afternoon. The outcome of restructuring is simply that the reserve forces are better structured to support their regular counterparts.

I want to conclude by making two points. It would be remiss of me not to thank the hon. Members for Mid-Norfolk and for South-East Cornwall for their kind words on my personal future. More importantly, I restate my praise for the job that our reservist soldiers, sailors and airmen are doing in Iraq; conditions may be tough, but they are more than equal to the task. I know that the whole House will join me in offering them our thanks for the manner in which they are doing their job in the service of our country.

Housing Strategy (Merseyside)

3.30 pm

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I originally intended this to be a rather more far-ranging debate and hoped to secure a one-and-a-half hour slot, but as I have only half an hour, the Minister will forgive me if I concentrate more narrowly on the concerns that affect my constituency, while still sticking entirely to the topic as advertised.

The Government have a vision for housing in this country that is laudable in many respects. It centres on the concept of sustainable communities, to which we all hope to belong. Part of that vision is to avoid unnecessary encroachment on to green belt and greenfield sites, which would take away from sustainable communities the countryside that surrounds them. An equally laudable objective is to revive cities—to encourage people to live in cities as well as to shop in them and visit them for recreation. City centres are, as a result of a number of Government initiatives, being gradually repopulated, and I support that.

The Government wish to reduce the distances that people have to travel to work, which is surely a sound environmental objective. They share with everybody in this country a laudable concern about the lack of affordable housing and they want to do something about it. They also have it in mind to tackle the scandal of empty homes that could be filled, and the correlative problem of unwanted homes in communities in which there is no demand for them. They are homes in communities where employment has gone and the community is in a state of relative decline.

During my time in Parliament, I have investigated those topics. I served on the Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, which considered the problem of empty homes in detail. We went to Bootle, Burnley and east Manchester, and I found the whole experience informative and thought provoking. We studied and assessed what regeneration schemes based on housing actually achieved. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett), who is likely to retire in the next few weeks, on his work in ensuring that those topics are firmly planted on the political agenda of all politicians.

I have had a long-term personal commitment to regeneration, even outside the confines of my constituency. I served on Sefton council, where my votes and those of my party were crucial in ensuring that Bootle received city challenge status. At the time, the Labour representatives had reservations about that, because they viewed it as top-slicing money from other local authority budgets. I supported city challenge and neighbourhood renewal schemes in my constituency and elsewhere, and I have seen genuine success emerge from them—perhaps not as much success as was envisaged when they started but, by and large, they were worthy schemes that achieved genuine benefits that permeated into people's everyday lives.

I am delighted to see money spent on deprived areas, but have always been slightly anxious about the fact that when money is too tightly focused, as could have been the case with city challenge until some latitude was shown, it is not best spent and is pumped into one patch of land. Then, the aim can become to use up funds, rather than to use them most efficiently to secure the best benefits for the area. In common with most people who have studied regeneration, I accept the need for targeting and ensuring that the jam is not spread too thinly, but if there is insufficient flexibility, targeting can become a weakness in a scheme—leading to a situation in which the funds are present within a targeted area, but the projects are not.

There is a theory that housing development can lead to regeneration. I do not depart from that theory because, in part, I agree with it, but it can be pushed too far. The most extreme example was the Hatton Garden area in Liverpool, where there was a presumption that if lots of council housing were built, the area would be regenerated. That missed the fact that the net effect would be to produce high rates of council tax, which acted as an economic disincentive for businesses to come to that area, with the result that one might have housing in the area, but not employment. That theory must be examined and, in some ways, contested.

There is also a theory that the prime housing problem in the north is one of managing decline—that housing stock is the same throughout the north and that in most areas of the north all we really need to do is to lose a few houses so that the number of houses matches the number of people. It is similar to the concept that the north-west consists of Burnley writ large. However, that is not the situation in large parts of the north-west, and certainly not in large parts of Merseyside.

In my constituency, we have had something of a mini-economic boom. Unemployment is at its lowest for some time, having fallen rapidly since 2001—it is a happy coincidence that I was elected then. Many of the jobs in my town are in the care and leisure sectors and are relatively low waged. However, there is pressure on housing, which leads to high prices. As unemployment has fallen sharply, house prices have risen sharply. There is a genuine shortage of affordable housing, but that has been masked in some ways.

Those who read The Times assiduously for housing articles might have seen one weeks ago about an organisation called Green Pastures, which does a lot of work for the homeless in Southport. It buys fairly elderly detached and semi-detached properties of a substantial size and converts them into flats, mainly paying for the cost of purchase via housing benefit. The scheme has made Green Pastures a substantial landlord; I pay tribute to its work in bridging the gap between people needing houses and getting them.

However, the current situation leads me to review and reflect on the Government's overall strategy—not so much its goals, but its implementation. Planning policy guidance note 13, as it affects us, is a two-edged sword. As in many places outside the pathfinder areas, it is interpreted locally as a housing limit—a limit on the number of new houses that can be built. In one sense, I am not unhappy with that because it prevents the demolition of lots of lovely old Victorian houses in Southport and their replacement by sometimes, but not always, elegant retirement homes, sold at an appreciable cost. To be sustainable communities, towns need balanced populations. If the houses in Southport attract only elderly people, there will be a problem in future.

The way in which the housing market moves does not necessarily reflect what the community requires. I recognise that there is a need for flat accommodation because of the number of marriage break-ups and single people looking for homes, but, crucially, that limits the number of new builds for family homes. There are exceptions to the rules, however, as the Minister's civil servants will readily anticipate. Even in Southport there are brownfield sites, but not large ones: they tend to date back to the era in which people would start businesses in their back gardens and then extend a little beyond them and start garages or printing businesses or whatever. Brownfield sites can be released, but site assembly is expensive for building interests.

[Dr. John Pugh]

We really need an influx of affordable housing; we need a mix and we need flexibility. That is what the house builders say and what common sense tells us, but we have PPG13 to deal with. The problem is not that we cannot build affordable housing on new land, but that to build sustainable estates with a variety of houses, we need the latitude to build a mix of affordable and other kinds of housing.

The other solution open to my constituents is to go into the pathfinder areas. I am sure that there is an inherent logic that makes people investigate that possibility. It is meant to be there; I understand that. However, the arguments against it are quite strong in Southport within Merseyside. First, it is environmental nonsense to make people travel any further to work than they need to. Secondly, the expense of a lengthy journey time is often unaffordable for people on low wages. Thirdly, in the pathfinder areas, we are finding prices increasing appreciably: I am told by reliable people that some houses in the pathfinder areas are being bought as investments by firms, building societies and so on because they can see a real prospect of their increasing in value. That is not the objective of the pathfinder initiative.

Across Merseyside in general—this point is well encapsulated in the recent Heartlands debate—mass demolition further reduces the housing stock in many areas and means that those houses that are available rapidly become more expensive. To put it in a personal context, a gentleman who worked for the council came to me the other day with his wife and child. They were unable to find a house in Southport that they could afford. They were asked to go to the pathfinder areas and look at property lower down in Sefton, towards Liverpool. They explained that would mean the man giving up his job. The housing department said, "Well, that's really what you ought to do." When somebody who has a job has to move and render themselves unemployed to get a house, we have to investigate whether general regeneration is taking place or people are being shuffled along without achieving any positive economic or personal effect.

It is not true that jobs follow housing. Normally, housing follows jobs. There are problems with that, but there are equal problems with the expectation that jobs will follow housing. Most people come to the obvious conclusion that what is required is that we strike a sensible balance. I query whether we are likely to achieve that.

In my constituency the Southport partnership, which has done a great deal of good regeneration work, believes that the most significant break for the economic expansion that has taken place in the town in the past few years is the availability of housing. I have been convinced not only by the partnership, but by speaking at great length with the Housing Corporation, which is entirely sold on the idea that there is a problem. At some point, the Housing Corporation wishes to present further details of its analysis to the Minister and her civil servants. The issue has been brought up when we have discussed the regional housing strategy and it has been reflected in many other boroughs across Merseyside. In addition, it has been accepted by the Government office for the north-west. I am not saying that we have got to the stage where, a little like the emperor's new clothes, the housing strategy for Merseyside is not what we would take it to be, or that it is not achieving the objectives. I am sure that the Minister can cite statistics that prove all sorts of genuine and real benefits from it. However, I do not think that we will maximise the benefits unless we have greater local flexibility.

That is not the view of an isolated, oddball MP for an atypical constituency. I am sure that the hon. Member for City of Chester (Ms Russell) could make an identical speech, although she would refer to Chester rather than to Southport. If one were to speak to the leader of Liverpool city council, as I have done recently, and to analyse the problem as I have presented it, I do not think that he would have any difficulty in recognising the problem and acknowledging that to solve it a degree of flexibility is required in the Government strategy. The Government should not simply have a global strategy for the United Kingdom but should implement it properly in particular areas, and not in a doctrinaire way. One of the Government's favourite clichés at the moment is "one size fits all", and Ministers have used that expression time and again as they have sought to introduce novelty and diversity into areas of public service. Sometimes, they put things the other way round, saying that we do not live in an age when one size fits all. If I had a fiver for every time a Minister has used that expression, I would be a very rich man indeed; it is a cliché of the times.

What I am saying, however, is that one size does not fit all in terms of housing need in the north-west; it is certainly not fitting very well in Southport. Given the Heartlands controversy, it is probably not fitting very well across Merseyside either. I therefore ask the Minister to think about my comments, to acknowledge that I am coming at the issue not with a set of anecdotes behind me, but with the support of the regional Housing Corporation and a good number of councils, and to respond.

3.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Yvette Cooper): I congratulate the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) on securing this Adjournment debate and on raising some important themes relating to housing and, in particular, the relationship between the housing market and the local economy in Merseyside.

Local authorities and regional housing and planning bodies have to address a set of challenges. They have to respond to housing need—one of our most basic human needs is to have a home—but they must do so in a way that supports communities, not dormitories, and that recognises the relationship between the local economy and the local housing market. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that housing and the local economy are closely linked, but often in complex ways. Housing has a big impact on the local economy. Businesses will not invest in places where the work force do not want to live. Equally, a tight housing market can make it difficult for people to move to where the jobs are, which can cause recruitment problems for businesses. Low housing demand can also have a big impact on an area's wider economic performance. We need to address housing and economic strategies together. That is why we have investment in the growth areas in the south-east. That means that we can invest in the housing that is needed to respond to economic growth. It is also why we have the housing market renewal programmes—the pathfinders—to work in areas of low demand in various places around the country.

I agree that it is wrong to suggest that the north is simply a region of low demand while the south, and particularly the south-east, are regions of high demand. That is simply not the case and such an approach is far too simplistic. In many areas in the north, such as Yorkshire, as well as in the north-west and the north-east, house prices have increased considerably and there are areas of high housing demand. Equally, some areas, including parts of Merseyside, have been plagued by serious problems of low demand. That is why we have the housing market renewal pathfinder based there. The hon. Gentleman is right that we need to strike the right balance in our approach to the local economy and housing development.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the pathfinder is about managing decline, but that does not need to be the approach. In fact, the approach of the pathfinders should be about ensuring that we have the right mix and the right choice of housing for local people and about responding to a changed economy. The pathfinder areas are often those in which housing developed in response to particular social and economic circumstances—certain kinds of housing were required, often reflecting particular industrial patterns of development and particular lifestyles. Those forms of housing are now out of date because people want different things with a different mix of housing in the area. Pathfinders can help to stem the flight from the cities and support regeneration. At the same time, they can reduce pressure on housing hot spots. That was certainly the approach taken by the Merseyside pathfinder, and it has been used to deal with pressure on housing hot spots such as Southport.

Sefton borough council is revising its housing strategy with the help of the Government office for the north-west. We believe that local authorities need to take a strategic approach to their housing priorities. The production of a housing strategy is an important part of developing a wider approach to the local economy and housing needs, but it needs to involve other stakeholders through consultation and partnership. It will allow local areas to provide a proper framework for making sensible decisions. The regional housing board is reviewing its strategy and has already asked for views through an issues paper published earlier this year. A new draft strategy will be issued for public consultation very shortly, which will provide an opportunity to address many of the specific issues raised by the hon. Gentleman about his constituency and Sefton.

Dr. Pugh: I attended one of the consultation sessions—I was probably the only Member of Parliament present. A number of groups were arranged to discuss various topics. Strangely, when people came to decide what topics they wanted to discuss, the largest grouping—two large groups—wanted to discuss affordable housing. They wanted to discuss that rather more than the classic objectives that pathfinder projects initially set themselves.

Yvette Cooper: The hon. Gentleman is right. Although he would not expect me to anticipate the contents of the housing board's new strategy or the Government's response, I agree that one issue that has emerged from the consultation process is widespread concern about the extent of the shortage of affordable housing in some parts of the region. The problem is not confined to rural areas; it appears to be affecting urban areas such as parts of Sefton. The board and the Government will clearly need to take that into account when developing the new strategy and making investment decisions.

The hon. Gentleman will know that in the period 2004 to 2006, Sefton's allocation from the regional housing pot was £26.2 million. Yesterday, we announced the allocations to be made to the regional housing boards and said that over the following two years £500 million would be available to the north-west for affordable housing. We have substantially increased investment in affordable housing since 1997 because we recognise its importance to the housing market across the country. The individual allocations will need to be discussed within the region. The timetable suggests that they will be set out during the autumn of this year, but further discussion will clearly be needed.

At the same time, the North West regional assembly has started work on reviewing the spatial strategy with a view to submitting a new draft to Ministers in September. Again, although it is too early to say what will be in the draft spatial strategy, it will give us a key opportunity to address many of the questions on the future of the housing market in the region. It will also allow us to look much more closely at sub-regional housing markets, in recognition of the fact that different areas may face very different problems. Those problems need to be addressed not only through the housing board allocations but through the regional planning process.

As part of the preparation for the spatial strategy, the regional housing strategy and the consultation discussions to which the hon. Gentleman referred, reference has been made to the relationship between the housing affordability problem and the extent or appropriateness of different restrictions on overall provision. Such matters are complex because the over-supply of housing in some parts of the region, where building has outpaced increasing demand, has led to areas of serious low demand. It has not been a managed process. Many areas of low demand are being dealt with through pathfinders, but require substantial investment to turn the communities around. At the moment, they often contain street after street of boarded-up homes. That is partly because the housing market has not responded to different demands for choice and overall pressures on demand and supply in the area. If a new housing estate is built offering people alternative housing, and nothing is done to improve the existing stock, people might move from one area to another, which can have a detrimental impact on members of the community who are left behind.

[Yvette Cooper]

Such issues need to be considered extensively as part of the work on the regional housing strategy and the regional spatial strategy. The Government have issued new guidance for public consultation entitled "Planning for Mixed Communities" to replace the relevant parts of the national advice in PPG3. Responses to the guidance note are invited until 15 April. We believe that a sustainable community needs a mix of decent housing of different types and tenures to support a range of households of different sizes, ages and incomes. That must include the provision of affordable housing to meet local needs.

The draft advice suggests that when drawing up development plans local planning authorities set out what affordable housing is in the context of local income levels, house prices and rents; the proportion of affordable housing that will be provided throughout the plan area; the proportion of affordable housing that will be sought on residential sites above a certain size; and the size and type of affordable housing that would be required. The fact that we are considering issuing revised advice on the issue shows how seriously we take it.

We must always bear in mind the fact that markets change over time, and so do local housing markets. Such change is often a response to local economic, social and community changes, but the triggers for a change in a local housing market can often be unexpected. For example, an estate that has problems with crime can be caught up in a vicious cycle when people want to move away because the problems in the environment were not tackled quickly enough, or improvements in a local school can attract people to the area and increase demand in its housing market.

Dr. Pugh: I am grateful to the Minister for allowing me to intervene because she enables me to put on record my thanks for her constructive and helpful response. No one wants the Government to change their overall objective. All we want is the strategy to be reviewed in the light of evidence presented. Given what the hon. Lady has said, I do not think that the Government will object to that.

Yvette Cooper: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that such matters need to be taken into account. As he said, we have set out our clear objectives. The opportunity for him to discuss local issues further will be provided by the regional housing strategy draft, which will be put out for consultation very shortly. The consultation period will be relatively limited, so I urge the hon. Gentleman and his constituents to make representations to the Government office for the north-west as rapidly as possible. All factors need to be taken into account. It would not be appropriate for me to respond definitively about how the balance needs to be struck in his area, because that is the role of the regional housing strategy and the local Sefton housing strategy. There is certainly plenty of opportunity for further debate.

Future Energy Markets

4 pm

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): I am extremely grateful to you for choosing this subject for debate this afternoon, Mr. Deputy Speaker, particularly as it follows the Chancellor's announcements in his Budget speech about the intention to hold an energy services summit in the coming year.

I begin by declaring a couple of interests. Future energy markets have interested—perhaps obsessed—me since I entered Parliament in 1992. I have been chairman of the all-party group on warm homes for most of the time since then and I have had a continuing involvement in trying to determine how we address fuel poverty. Lately, I have had a personal interest in the subject in that I have taken it upon myself to try to turn a derelict shell in the middle of Nottingham into a property that I will live in and which, I hope, will generate 50 per cent. more energy than it consumes. I should add a caveat: I will tell the House whether it does that once I have completed the project.

What fascinates me in broader structural terms is our extraordinarily impressive Government targets. Under the Warm Homes and Energy Conservation Act 2000, we are committed to eradicating fuel poverty entirely in the United Kingdom by 2016. Under the Kyoto protocol, we are committed to reducing our carbon dioxide emissions by 12.5 per cent. from 1990 levels by 2008 to 2012. The Government's own targets also commit them to supplying 15 per cent. of domestic energy needs from renewable energy sources by 2015.

Those are admirable targets. The difficulty is that, according to current trends, we are unlikely to meet any of them. Last year's figures, which we have just seen, show that carbon emissions increased by 2.2 per cent. We know from answers given by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister that only 16 per cent. of the current UK housing stock has a SAP—standard assessment procedure—rating of 60 or more. That percentage must comprise new housing stock that has been built to new housing standards, but the overwhelming majority of existing housing stock is fuel inefficient, if not fuel poor. We must work out how to address that problem against the challenges of climate change.

Last year, I spent quite a lot of time visiting energy suppliers and asking them their views on their responsibilities towards renewables and reducing carbon emissions under the Government energy efficiency contribution. The most difficult thing for me to deal with was that I could not find a single energy supplier with a business plan based on selling less consumption. We know that we must reduce our energy consumption nationally and globally by making the connection between energy consumption and carbon emissions. Yet there is no company in the land with a plan for doing that. The explanation given by the suppliers is simple: they tell me that they cannot make money out of selling less. If the Government want them to do that, we will have to change the nature of the market so that they can create markets that will supply energy services rather than energy consumption.

I drafted a private Member's Bill as a presentation Bill that sets out some of the ways in which we could do that, but I want to explore with the Minister today the precise way in which we could reconfigure our thinking on energy markets to engage with the really big challenges that the 21st century will present to us. It is worth turning the clock back and considering the perspective of Thomas Edison when he invented the light bulb. His intention was not to sell electricity, but to sell light. We need to take that concept on board and to create energy markets for the future that sell, not energy consumption, but home warmth. If companies can make money out of households consuming less, they will be encouraged to invest in long-term products that make our houses more energy efficient and, in all probability, energy generating.

At the moment, we do not have such rules. I have spoken to Ofgem about its relaxation of the energy market rules. That has been helpful in principle: the relaxation regarding the contracts that can be offered to customers has meant that companies can consider engaging in longer-term contracts and avoid the one-month trap that enables a customer who does not like his supplier to chop and change. That aspect of the market that we created initially meant that companies were willing to do a lot about the delivery of low-energy light bulbs, for example, or to invest in and make available at low prices things such as draughtproofing and loft insulation. Some of them went further, and were willing to go into broader conservation measures that reduced heat loss, particularly if those measures were targeted at the fuel poor.

I congratulate the companies that have done those things. However, we are still scratching the surface of the problem. When I try to raise the issue with companies, they tell me that, in principle, they are not reluctant to go down that path, but they find either that there is little interest or that they have no lever if they try to offer such a service to the public. More particularly, they say that it is not the role of electricity suppliers to act as the Government. If we want to change the nature of the market, we should take a lead. The companies are right to ask us to do so.

The examples that are always quoted are properties that are in multiple occupancy, which figure disproportionately among the most fuel-poor properties in the UK. When energy suppliers have offered the owners of those properties different energy systems or more thermally efficient energy packages, the owners have, by and large, told them to get lost, assuming that their only interest is to sell products. The owners' interest is in running the properties as a rental business for an income, so why on earth should they be interested in a package that will cost them money? I understand the dilemma in which that leaves the energy companies.

At one level, we have to give a lead that probably involves raising the thresholds that we set for the energy efficiency of all rented properties. I cannot see a coherent case for constructing or supporting housing markets that are based on access to properties that are of extremely poor quality in terms of their thermal efficiency. That would run completely counter to the Government's target of eradicating fuel poverty in the UK's housing stock. If we changed the thresholds and set a different SAP rating of 60 or 70, that would be a start. Then, those who sought to sell or let properties would know that they had to meet the new thermal thresholds that provide decent housing conditions for every household in the UK.

Next, we should ask how to reduce the carbon consumption of our existing housing stock. If we are looking for an example of how best to do that, we would be hard pressed to find one much better than Woking. I never thought that a revolution would begin in Woking, but it has set out a model for the UK that the rest of us should stand in awe of and applaud. In the past 13 years, Woking has reduced its carbon emissions by 77 per cent. It has plans to come off the national grid: there will be a local generating system using renewable sources and micro-combined heat and power. Energy-generating lamp posts have already installed: the lighting comes from beautifully designed solar lamp posts with wind-generating capacity. No one objects because the design of the generating system is stylish and inconspicuous and as a network it is phenomenally successful.

We are going to have to rethink our expectations about the ability of every building in the United Kingdom to generate a proportion of its own energy consumption. We will have to consider this as part of the design requirements of new buildings. We will have to follow the Japanese example: if we want a market for photovoltaic roofs, the best thing is for the Government to give a lead and make a commitment that there will be 1 million installed in the UK, as there are to be 1 million installed in Japan. We need to take the same lead as the German Government, who have created a market in which they are the purchaser of renewable and sustainable energy systems. That has given Germany its current lead over us in the global market for renewable and sustainable energy systems: the UK has about 4 per cent. of that market, whereas Germany has 15 per cent. Germany has that lead because its Government have created a market in which German technology suppliers have been able to test, pilot, install and go into production on a significant scale. In doing so, they have reduced unit costs, thus making the technology viable on the open market, whereas we in the UK are still stuck looking for research rather than creating new markets.

One of the saddest things for me was that in 2000 the Prime Minister made a commitment to set aside £5 million to pilot sustainable energy systems targeted at the fuel poor. The money was set aside in a Department of Trade and Industry budget, but not a penny has been spent. The Government have not taken the lead in delivering those pilots, which the nation desperately needs. We have relied on the Wokings of the country and places such as Leicester, which have taken the decision to go out and look for their own renewable and sustainable energy systems.

I would like the Minister to address a number of issues, not necessarily in his reply to this debate, but perhaps by committing to taking them forward in the energy services summit's discussions. As a country, we will have to work out how we respond to the EU directive on energy services. It would be helpful to have some guidance on how the Government see themselves doing that.

We need to consider changing some of the rules governing energy services. One of the major obstacles is that someone who installs a self-generating system in their own home and has a two-way metering system that supports the re-absorption of any excess energy capacity generated—so that it can be fed back into the system as clean, carbon-free energy—receives only a fraction of the energy supply price as a buy-back price. The reason for this is that market rules have large charges added on to the buy-back price for access to the supply and distribution system. In reality, those are nonsense charges because most of that energy does not need to go back into the national grid.

[Alan Simpson]

The experience in Woking led to the conclusion that its CHP systems were 90 per cent. efficient in generating energy because the transmission was local. The same energy, if fed into the national grid, has an efficiency of about 20 per cent. The energy is spun round, the charges for access and use of the system are all added on and the cost to society amounts to about five times the buy-back price. We therefore need to change those rules to narrow the buy-back price so that it reflects what it would constitute as energy gain in a local energy system. If suppliers were able to buy back from themselves at a more competitive rate, the whole set of commercial interests would change.

So far, the only company that I have been able to find that is interested in a self-generation or a local generation system is Powergen. I pay tribute to Powergen, because it is willing to pioneer that system. However, all the energy suppliers must become part of the same game. We need to recognise that there is no coherent case for a national extension of the gas network to more remote communities: that would be colossal in its capital cost and questionable in its energy security, given our reliance on future gas supplies from outside the UK. However, if we were able to examine the possibility of micro-generation systems at a community level and to remove the ceiling on energy supply for domestic purposes, the market would change.

My final point relates also to local suppliers. There is a bizarre rule that companies that can acquire an exempt licence for energy generation can generate 50 MW of energy, but are allowed to supply only 1 MW of that for domestic purposes—that amounts to energy supply for about 1,000 households. If we removed that ceiling, the prospect of introducing sustainable energy systems for whole communities, in urban as well as remote areas, would be transformed.

I believe that this issue is the most important part of the energy agenda for the 21st century. We all know that oil will run out, that there will be problems in gas transmission supplies and that coal cannot be compatible in the long term with the climate change challenge that we face from Kyoto. We have to offer ourselves a different view of sustainable energy markets. If we do so, it will also be the greatest gift that we can offer to emerging nations, which have their own energy needs but which must be freed from the burden of meeting those needs by taking the same polluting path that we did in the past century. I hope that the Minister will accept and meet that challenge, not only domestically, but as a gift to a century that will need sustainable energy supplies.

4.19 pm

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) on securing this debate on the importance of promoting energy conservation, which is a key issue. The UK faces not only the global threat of climate change, which every nation has to deal with, but the fact that we will become a net energy importer as from next year. Indeed, at least statistically we became a net importer of gas from December 2004. Although the position will vary from month to month, certainly by 2006 we are likely to be a net importer of oil, too.

There are considerable implications for this country because we must look to the security of our energy supplies for the future. We must consider the need to reduce our consumption of energy. We certainly do not want to waste energy, because much of it will be imported. That puts a premium not only on dealing with climate change by addressing energy efficiency—that is why the Government published the energy efficiency strategy last year—but on ensuring that we develop new technologies and new means of producing energy that do not damage the climate. We need to ensure that, as we move towards 2050, we are developing a low-carbon economy that is prosperous. We need to ensure that our manufacturing has enough energy, that our homes are lit and have enough energy, and that we are not damaging our climate.

Security of supply, which is coupled with the need to prevent damage to the environment, will come about through diversity of energy sources. We have a range of energy sources. At the moment, fossil fuels are a component of that range. We will need to consider other ways to develop the range of fossil fuels without damage to the environment. That puts a premium on the issue of sequestration. Research is being done on that, and we are looking into a range of other areas, but as my hon. Friend said, renewables will also be a key component. We are not talking only about great wind turbines, whether offshore or onshore, but about micro-generation issues. He is right to talk about some of the innovative work that has been taking place on micro-generation and CHP. He drew attention to the innovative and laudable Woking initiative. The Government have been watching that with a great deal of care and are very engaged and interested in it.

We need to consider ways in which the generation of electricity can be more local and low-carbon. For that reason, as from this June, we shall set out a new consultation on how we develop a micro-generation strategy to move towards the vision that my hon. Friend outlined. From my point of view, there is no reason why, certainly within our lifetimes and probably within about 20 years, most homes should not generate most of their energy themselves, whether through solar photovoltaic panels on the roof, perhaps coupled with a small wind turbine, or through something similar. There is every reason to believe that we can move towards energy being generated so locally that we are generating our own energy in our own homes. Whether we reach a stage at which no one has to pay an electricity bill, I cannot say, but it is not impossible that we will do so, and what we are talking about is not that far away—it will certainly happen well within our lifetimes.

We are now seeing the growth of new micro-generation industries, which we want to continue to encourage. Together with the micro-generation strategy, which we are developing, we shall also launch in June a new strategy to consider low-carbon homes.

All the issues are linked. The question is how we develop the right planning regulations so that we can create new homes and new developments while ensuring that the expansion in housing in the coming decades does not damage the environment. We need to ensure that homes are more energy efficient and that we encourage the development of better fuel sources. We must also recognise that the issue is not only about new housing. As my hon. Friend said, many of today's homes are fuel inefficient. They do not have enough insulation or other ways to safeguard the energy and heating that they use. That is why the Government have placed burdens on a number of energy companies—we do not dispute that—to provide insulation and energy health checks for homes, as many companies are now doing.

In recent weeks, I have met chief executives and chairmen of energy companies to talk about how to address the key problem of fuel poverty, and how that can feed into the points that my hon. Friend raised about energy efficiency. We have reduced the number of people in fuel poverty—defined as those spending more than 10 per cent. of their income on fuel—from more than 5 million to 2.25 million, if I remember the figures correctly off the top of my head. That is a massive achievement for the Government. However, electricity and gas prices have risen over the past year. That is partly because of changes on the UK continental shelf and the fact that our oil and gas supplies are starting to deplete—it will take 30 years, but we will become a net energy importer. We are importing more and are therefore dependent on broader energy markets. Our energy prices are rising, and that will probably bring about 200,000 people into fuel poverty in England alone over the next two years if we do nothing about that. The meetings with the energy companies were intended to try to do something about it.

The methods identified by my hon. Friend—ensuring that our homes are better insulated and that we reduce the amount of wasted energy—are precisely the ways to deal with fuel poverty. The fuel poor can often switch suppliers or receive benefits to reduce their bills, but we must also address energy companies' beliefs that their future will be secured just by selling more energy. In the long term, they and we know that that will not be how they continue to make profits. We want them to make profits well into the future and still be around in 50 years' time, but we must change our approach to energy.

We must move away from the idea that all our energy will be generated in large power stations that are located in one or two parts of the country and pass energy along transmission lines. We will move towards more localised energy and more micro-generation, but we will also need large energy plants, and they must be less polluting and give out fewer carbon emissions. Energy companies must be able to operate in a market in which they can make money generating electricity.

There will always be a demand for more energy; even with an increase in energy efficiency there will be more demand because, I hope, we will become more prosperous. The problems are how to ensure that that energy is provided by renewables in a way that does not damage our environment, and how to ensure that companies can make profits by creating more energy-efficient homes. Initiatives such as the emissions trading scheme are important because they make companies consider ways to reduce emissions.

Alan Simpson: Will the Minister also consider granting renewables obligation certificates for micro-generation? That is how we will start to alter the market rules that favour precisely the developments that he is talking about.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: At exactly the same time as conducting our review of micro-generation and solar PV, we are considering how the renewables obligation operates and the issue of ROCs. We have a tremendous opportunity over the coming year to consider our whole energy strategy, ensure that we look after the interests not only of the consumer but of the environment, and produce an energy system that works for the whole country. My hon. Friend asked whether ROCs would be considered. The answer is yes, but we must be careful, because some ROCs are too big for micro-generation—we may need roc-ettes.

It being half-past Four o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 24 March 2005

[MR. EDWARD O'HARA in the Chair]

The UK and Africa

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): I shall start, if I may, with the good news, because what most people see of Africa is bad news. What we see on our television screens and read in the newspapers tends to be bad news, but the news from Africa is not all bad. The great event, the importance of which one can never overstate, was the transfer of power in South Africa 10 years ago from the apartheid regime to a democratic Government. There is now a peaceful democratic society in South Africa, a vibrant civil society, a free press, free elections and all the other things that we expect of a modern democracy.

The people of South Africa are not without their problems, as they would be the first to admit, but who, standing here 15 years ago, could have predicted a peaceful transfer of power from the odious apartheid regime to a democratic Government, and that, 10 years on, it would still be a peaceful democracy? Indeed, it grows in strength with every passing year. As South Africa is by far the largest economy on the continent, it is a rather large piece of good news that it has stable government and now plays an important part not only in the community of nations on the African continent, but in the world community.

Let us consider the holocaust that Rwanda went through 10 years ago. Who could have predicted then that today, under President Kagame and his colleagues, there would be stability in Rwanda and a degree of prosperity? The people of Rwanda have gone a long way—again, they would acknowledge that they still have a long way to go—to heal the wounds of that terrible atrocity. Which country in Europe or, indeed, anywhere else could have got over such horrors in such a relatively short period? So there is good news from Rwanda, too.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, I was in Rwanda recently and I endorse everything that he has said about Rwanda's development and overcoming the horrors of the genocide. However, does he have concerns about the possibility of Rwandan activities in the Democratic Republic of the Congo? Can the British Government, who are a considerable donor to the Rwandan Government, exert pressure in that direction?

Mr. Mullin: Yes, we have some concerns and we frequently exert what influence we have with the Government of Rwanda to impress on them that they must not become re-engaged in Congo. There have been accusations, but I am not aware of evidence that they have recently got re-involved in Congo, certainly not militarily. One must acknowledge, of course, that they have an interest. There are perhaps 10,000 ex-Forces Armées Rwandaises/Interhamwe still inside the Congo who from time to time make raids into Rwanda and Burundi. Many of those people are responsible for the atrocities that occurred 10 years ago, so Rwanda has a legitimate interest in resolving the matter, and we are trying to help with that, too.

Let us stick with good news for a moment and consider what has happened in Mozambique in the past few years. Starting from a very low base after a vicious civil war, partly fuelled by the apartheid regime in South Africa, Mozambique has established a fledgling democracy and a degree of development—prosperity is probably too strong a word—that one could not have predicted seven, eight or 10 years ago. Indeed, Mozambique has just had a second successful democratic election.

Let us move on to west Africa and consider Ghana. It, too, has come a long way in the past decade or so, having got off to a rocky start, certainly under Nkrumah and later under Jerry Rawlings. It, too, has stable democratic government and it plays a leading part in the affairs of west Africa.

Botswana, which has been well run since its independence, benefits enormously from mineral wealth, particularly diamonds. As we all know, mineral wealth can be a curse rather than a blessing in Africa, but it has been properly managed in Botswana, and a stable, modern democracy has been created, an example from which other countries in Africa would do well to learn.

Malawi and Tanzania are both extremely poor countries that have been through rocky periods but are moving in the right direction towards development. They both have Governments who care about the welfare of their people and are committed to sensible economic and social policies.

Togo was not an example of how to run an African country. It had had the same leader—a military man—from, I think, 1968 until this year, a record for the whole of Africa, if not a particularly glorious one. When he died suddenly, there was an attempt to impose a regime under his son to serve out the remainder of General Eyadema's term. However, the other regional powers in west Africa swiftly got together and made it clear to the Togolese that that was not acceptable in modern Africa. The coup—if that was what it was—was quickly "uncouped". That would probably not have happened a few years ago, and it is evidence, if evidence we seek, that the democratic ethic is becoming entrenched in new parts of Africa.

Not much good news has come from Sudan over the years, but there is one fairly large cause for hope. After years of painstaking negotiations, in which the international community has played a part, between the north and the south, a comprehensive peace agreement has been signed. It allows for the sharing of the mineral and oil wealth of the country, and for a coalition Government that will lead in due course to a democratically elected Government commanding the confidence of, if not all, most people in Sudan. That is an important development and a window of opportunity, but the jury is still out. I shall not make too much of it because 2 million people died in the civil war between the north and south in Sudan. If the comprehensive peace agreement between north and south works—it is still in its early stages—it will become a template for a settlement in Darfur where bad things are still happening.

[Mr. Mullin]

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): It saddens me to have to disagree with the Minister, having agreed with the earlier items on his list, but does he not accept that the difference between Darfur, where every kind of atrocity is being committed—not least by Government jets and armed helicopters—and the south of Sudan is simple? In the south, the rebels were sufficiently well armed to fight Government troops to a standstill so they had to negotiate, whereas the wretched people of Darfur have nothing to fight back with and are experiencing partial genocide.

Mr. Mullin: I go along with most of what the hon. Gentleman said and I do not wish to overstate the latest development in Sudan, because it is good news only compared with what it follows; a civil war in which, over 20 years or more, 2 million people died. However, if the agreement is properly handled—it remains to be seen whether it will be, so I shall not make too much of it—it could form the basis for a settlement in Darfur and perhaps other regions in Sudan.

The hon. Gentleman will know that talks are being held in Abuja—they have been postponed for now but I expect them to resume in the not-too-distant future—aimed at bringing a political settlement to Darfur. Only a political settlement and some form of devolved administration that gives the people of Darfur a say in how their region is run will solve the problem.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Will the Minister kindly clarify exactly what Her Majesty's Government are seeking for Darfur at the Security Council? The African Union has a very limited monitoring mandate and is grossly under strength. Everyone accepts the need to increase the strength of the African Union to a considerably larger force, but do the Government want the Security Council to give the African Union in Darfur a peacekeeping and peace-enforcing mandate, and are the Government willing to help to provide the financial means to ensure that that mandate can be delivered?

Mr. Mullin: The British Government have already made a large contribution to the African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur; we stand ready to increase it and to do more. If we were convinced that the mandate was the problem we would certainly be willing to consider extending it but there is a good deal of discretion within the existing mandate which, from time to time, the African Union forces are exercising. The key issue is to get African Union forces on the ground in sufficient numbers to make an impact, as they are beginning to do. There are just over 2,000 there now and that force will obviously have to be increased. With other members of the international community, we are managing some of the logistics. That is broadly our policy.

I think the hon. Gentleman understands that the African Union force is the only game in town and it must have a mandate robust enough to enable it to impose some order. We will be sympathetic to any proposals for change, but there is considerable discretion in the existing mandate. [Interruption.] I thought that the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) was seeking to intervene, but it was just an involuntary twitch.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I was just adjusting my trousers. [Laughter.]

Mr. Mullin: There are some countries on which the jury is still out: Sierra Leone—Britain has made a major investment in rebuilding that shattered county, but it remains in a very fragile state; Ethiopia, which for the first time in many years has a Government who are genuinely concerned about the welfare of their people—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Mullin: The danger of my referring to all these countries is that every time I mention one, someone will pop up like a jack-in-the-box and we will be sidetracked into a debate on a particular country.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh) (LD): The hon. Gentleman mentioned Sierra Leone. I have asked questions in the House on the situation regarding the return of refugees from Guinea to Sierra Leone and Liberia following the war. Does the Minister intend to mention the progress in returning refugees from Guinea to Sierra Leone and Liberia?

Mr. Mullin: I was not planning to go into that matter, as the debate is about Africa as a whole; it is a rather big continent. Some day we will have a debate on Sierra Leone and we will go into that kind of detail. The hon. Gentleman is right to flag up the issue.

Mr. Bercow: I am rather worried about the Minister, specifically about his Foreign Office timidity on the subject of Darfur. There is a marked difference between his response to my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), in which he suggests that, broadly speaking, the mandate is adequate and that there is plenty of flexibility for its interpretation and implementation in Darfur, and the answers given by the Prime Minister a few minutes ago to the Leader of the Opposition, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) and to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), in which the Prime Minister suggested that the British Government were indeed pushing for a much stronger mandate. I think the hon. Gentleman is wrong, but for him to be out of line with his own Prime Minister is a risky course, which he would do well to avoid.

Mr. Mullin: The hon. Gentleman is right; it is an extremely risky course but I said—perhaps he did not hear me—that we would be sympathetic, should the need arise, to stiffening up the mandate and other aspects of the resolution. We take one of the tougher lines at the UN in relation to Sudan.

Sticking with the countries on which the jury is still out, I mentioned Sierra Leone and Ethiopia. In addition, after 24 years of pretty rotten government in Kenya there has been a peaceful transfer of power to an Opposition-led Government. There have been some disappointments of late, as hon. Members will be aware. I hope that they will not feel obliged to intervene to demonstrate their knowledge of those disappointments. There has also been a lot of progress, in particular the extension of primary education across the whole country and the sacking of quite a large number of corrupt officials, including about 40 judges in one sweep. However, more progress needs to be made.

I next turn to one of the most difficult countries of all, Nigeria. It has suffered decades of misgovernment mainly under military regimes. We now see, after an extremely bleak period, a window of opportunity. There is no doubt that the political will to make a difference exists at the top under President Obasanjo. He has an effective Finance Minister, a Nigerian lady who was brought in from the World Bank. Among other things, she has started publishing the federal revenues that are doled out to the 36 states. That has had a wondrous effect. People in the states are starting to ask what is happening to the money that comes to them from the centre. Only yesterday, President Obasanjo sacked his Education Minister for corruption. There appears to be renewed vigour. Nigeria has serious problems and I do not want to gloss over them in any way; nor do the Nigerians. But we see a window of opportunity now that did not exist before.

Thirty years ago in Africa, there were just three democratically elected heads of state. Today there are more than 30. The bad news remains; there is a wide and growing gulf between the standard of living and development in Africa and just about all of the rest of the world. As I said earlier, mineral wealth has so often proved to be a curse rather than a blessing and has fuelled civil wars and instability. Africa's problems are to some extent a colonial legacy, although that is fading.

The big issue is corruption and misgovernment on an awesome scale. Zimbabwe is only the latest and saddest example. It has led in some cases to the implosion of entire societies and we are presented with the relatively new phenomenon; the failed state. In the case of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, it is a failed state the size of western Europe. Somalia has seen a catastrophic failure, resulting in the exodus of almost the entire educated class, leaving the rest in chaos.

Liberia is now the subject of the largest current UN peace mission, on its third international intervention. I wish that I could say that I saw light at the end of that particular tunnel, but I do not. The problems are compounded by the rampant spread of HIV/AIDS, which threatens to engulf even well run societies. The result is that Africa today is in many respects going backwards. Hundreds of millions of people exist on less than $1 a day. Tens of thousands of children die every year before the age of five from preventable diseases. There is, as we see now in Darfur, the ever-present threat of implosion.

There is also the growth of the culture of impunity that says that however badly people behave and whatever atrocity they commit, there will be no consequences. We are determined to challenge that. An opportunity arises in the case of Darfur, where we have an opportunity to bring to justice those who have been responsible for the catastrophe that has occurred there.

Mr. Brazier: rose—

Mr. Mullin: If the hon. Gentleman will contain himself for a moment, I shall finish my point and then give way.

It is important to challenge the culture of impunity that has grown up in parts of Africa and in other parts of the world, just as we are challenging it in the Balkans. Increasingly, Africans are demanding that as well.

Mr. Brazier: The Minister said that those who are responsible for the atrocities in Darfur should be brought to justice. Can there be any doubt that the Government in Khartoum is responsible for sending helicopter gunships to strafe women and children?

Mr. Mullin: All sorts of people are responsible, but certainly some members of the Government in Khartoum, and many local tribal and militia leaders. There has been a United Nations investigation and, as the hon. Gentleman will know, some 51 people are alleged to be among those most responsible for what has happened. Although their names have not been disclosed, they have been recorded, with a recommendation that, eventually, they be tried by the International Criminal Court. We hope that that will happen.

Mr. Bercow: I welcome the Minister's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury, subject to one rather important caveat. I did not much like his use of the word "eventually." Although I think that there would be a general acceptance that the immediate priority is effective peace enforcement, does he agree that it is imperative to bring the suspected culprits to trial before the International Criminal Court as soon as possible, and that the alternative of justice delayed, through some special tribunal, would be justice denied at great expense, as the painful and expensive experience in relation to Rwanda eloquently demonstrates?

Mr. Mullin: I accept that those responsible need to be brought to justice as soon as possible, not least because we want to discourage others from carrying on down the same wicked road. As the hon. Gentleman also says, the first priority—the two are probably connected—is to restore some semblance of normality to the lives of the people in Darfur. Those are not necessarily contradictory ambitions.

What is to be done? I think that we all agree that we cannot stand idly by in the face of some of the terrible things that have happened in Africa; neither can we rush in and impose our own solutions without local consent. We have to work with those Africans, of whom there are many, who care about the condition of their people, and we have to help them to find African solutions to African problems. That is the basis of UK policy, and it is part of the rationale behind our Commission for Africa.

One of the main purposes of the commission is to drive Africa and African issues up the agenda of the G8 and the European Union, of which we will have the joint presidencies this year. It is early days, but I am glad to say that the report of the commission—on which the majority are African—has been well received. The proof will be in the eating, and we shall work vigorously to ensure that Africa is a priority for the G8 and the EU. In that context, I welcome yesterday's European Council statement, emphasising the EU's commitment to African development.

[Mr. Mullin]

The issues are easy to enumerate and are set out clearly in the report of the Commission for Africa. First, the key issue is governance, besides which everything else pales. Unless proper democratic, transparent and accountable systems of government can be established, we cannot hope to deliver development for the people of Africa. I can put it no better than Kofi Annan, the UN Secretary-General, did at the AU summit in Addis Ababa last year. I was present at that meeting at which he said, in the presence of a number of dictators, whom it was pleasant to watch squirming in their seats as he did so:

"This new spirit of democratic empowerment in Africa must find a home in every African country. For that to happen, politics must be inclusive, and a careful institutional balance must be preserved including regular free and fair elections, a credible opposition whose role is respected, an independent judiciary which upholds the rule of law, a free and independent press, effective civilian control over the military, and a vibrant civil society.

This institutional balance cannot be achieved without the peaceful and constitutional change of power. There is no truer wisdom, and no clearer mark of statesmanship, than knowing when to pass the torch to a new generation. And no government should manipulate or amend the constitution to hold on to office beyond prescribed term limits that they accepted when they took office."

Those remarks were made in the presence of just about all the leaders of Africa. When Kofi Annan sat down, the chair of the AU, former President Chissano of Mozambique, pointed at some of the biggest offenders and said, "And we all know who he was talking about, don't we?"

We sense that there is, in most parts of Africa, a renewed commitment to good governance and democracy. We are particularly encouraged by NEPAD, the New Partnership for Africa's Development, which is pioneering the concept of peer review, where countries voluntarily open their books and political systems for inspection by senior Africans. About 20 countries have volunteered so far, starting with Ghana, the report on which is not out yet but will be published shortly. The object is to try to drive up standards in the countries that are being inspected and set examples for other countries that still have a long way to travel.

Some time ago, the Prime Minister launched the extractive industries transparency initiative. Transparency is a vital component of good governance. A number of countries have signed up to that initiative and I encourage more to do so. The object of the initiative is that countries with mineral wealth should be open about what happens to the proceeds of that wealth and that the multinational companies with which they are dealing should be open about whom they are paying in respect of it. That would make a big difference in some of those countries that have been cursed, rather than blessed, with mineral wealth on their territory. The other big issue is that countries have to show resolve, as the best African leaders do increasingly, in tackling corruption.

Secondly, on conflict resolution, the long-term solution is not for the UN or Europe—former colonial powers—to send military missions to sort out problems that re-emerge as soon as they are off the scene. We are attempting to get to that position in Darfur, but I must be frank and say that this is a long, difficult and frustrating process. We want to build up African peacekeeping capacity through the African Union, because that is the only way forward in the long term. We are willing when asked, and we have been asked, to provide logistical and other support, which we do in Darfur. But the initiative has to come from the African Union, and that is generally accepted as the way forward.

Thirdly, debt relief should not be unconditional. In the heavily indebted poor countries initiative, so far 27 of the 42 that qualify for debt relief have had some debt relieved. They are expected to enjoy debt relief worth about £70 billion, a substantial amount. We all accept that many countries in Africa—not only in Africa—have in the past stored up debts that are completely unsustainable. They paid off the capital years ago, but the interest keeps mounting up indefinitely. They are spending more on repaying debts than they are on education, health and the welfare of their people. That is something that we all strive to avoid.

Beyond HIPC, which covers only the most heavily indebted, poorest countries, other countries have unsustainable debt. One is Nigeria, which has a national debt of £34 billion, most of it stored up during the years of military government. We think, although not all our international colleagues agree, that given the window of opportunity provided by the apparent political will that now exists in Nigeria to deal with some of their long-term problems, we need to look sympathetically at the problem of Nigerian debt. We intend to do that, but we have to take our colleagues in the Paris Club with us.

The fourth issue is trade justice. We are moving the barriers that undoubtedly exist to prevent African countries from exporting their goods into the developed world. There has been some progress in reducing or phasing out EU and World Trade Organisation agricultural subsidies, but we can and should do more. We intend to use our presidencies of the G8 and the EU to drive forward progress on fair terms of trade for developing countries.

At the same time, African countries could do rather more to remove internal barriers to trade. Trade between African countries accounts for only about 12 per cent. of the continent's trade at the moment compared with Europe, where trade between EU countries counts for 50 or 60 per cent. The East African Community is beginning to show the way with its proposed customs unions, and we hope that other areas of Africa will do likewise.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the great problems in Africa is the structure of transport and trade arrangements? Basically, the transport structures are all linked towards taking goods out of Africa, particularly raw materials, and exporting them to Europe or north America. The lack of transcontinental railways and roads is obviously a serious handicap. Should not the emphasis be on investment into some major infrastructure programmes to that effect?

Mr. Mullin: Yes, that is a factor, but there are others—many of them bureaucratic. Many Governments interfere too much in what is a matter for the free market. It pains me to say it—I see that that brought a smile to the face of the hon. Member for Buckingham—but that is probably more of an obstacle than infrastructure. All over Africa, one can see the infrastructure decaying. Billions were spent on putting it in but it has not been maintained.

The big issue with infrastructure is ensuring that it is properly maintained. I remember travelling in 1976 on the Tanzam railway shortly after it was opened. Someone remarked that the railway would probably close after the last Chinese engineer left. It did not, not quite, but it went downhill considerably.

In Nigeria I was told of a steelworks in which £4 billion to £5 billion has been spent and which will never produce a single ingot of steel. Nigeria has quite a good network of railways, but no trains run on them. Although I have no doubt that there are infrastructure problems, and there is something in what my hon. Friend says about the colonial infrastructure being geared towards taking stuff out of Africa, I think that there are other, bigger problems.

Mr. Chidgey: The Minister has touched on an extremely important point. Billions of pounds have been invested in trying to create an infrastructure throughout Africa, for various reasons, whether for the requirements of colonial powers or anything else. However, the real issue is the maintenance of that infrastructure. I speak with some knowledge, as the Minister knows. Is it not the issue that, with the agreement of our partners in Africa, we need to put in a place a system whereby we can produce the human resources with the skills to maintain and protect those huge investments? Without the human resources to look after them, it is almost a waste of time.

Mr. Mullin: Yes, the hon. Gentleman is right. I am grateful for his support, because I know that it comes with a degree of personal knowledge from his past incarnation. He is right about capacity building; I intend to speak about that in a moment.

I turn now to the fifth element in the "what is to be done" aspect of my contribution; overseas aid. Some people put that at the top of the list, saying that much more money is needed. That is true, but it needs to be spent wisely and properly, and must be properly accounted for. However, it should not be at the top of the list; governance, without doubt, should be at the top. Without governance and transparency everything else fails.

We inherited an aid budget that was 0.27 per cent. of GDP and falling; it is now 0.36 per cent. and rising. The value of our aid to Africa has more than doubled in real terms over the past eight years and by next year will exceed £1 billion a year. These days—this brings me on to the point that the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) made—we tend to concentrate on capacity building rather than on projects or infrastructure. For example, we focus on training the police, the army and civil servants, and on setting up systems for revenue collection. The aim is to give Africans the capacity to address their own problems rather than to have someone else do that for them.

I often think that the most useful aid that we can offer a poor country is to help it to set up a customs and excise or revenue system to raise some money for the state, so that the state has money to spend on health, education and the welfare of its people. At the moment, in many countries in Africa that have no resources, the only function of the Government is to stop things happening. It is only when those countries have resources that they can do something for the welfare of their people. The state then gains respect and the democratic process becomes entrenched because instead of stopping things, the state can make things happen. That is, therefore, one of the most useful things that we can do.

For example, in Angola, Mozambique and one or two other places, Crown Agents help to run the customs and excise. That has greatly improved revenues, done wonders for getting rid of corruption and provided the state with some money that it can use for the welfare of its people.

In conclusion, I am under no illusions—no one who has any knowledge of Africa will be under any illusions—about the enormity of the task that we face. However, the one thing that I have learned in the nearly two years that I have done this job is that there is no shortage of good, capable, honest Africans of integrity at every level. Our role is to help the good guys and to discourage the bad guys. We have led the way on debt relief and on tariff reform, and these days our aid is targeted firmly at the poorest people in the poorest countries. I believe, without wishing to sound complacent, that we can hold our heads high.

3.8 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I welcome this debate and the fact that the Minister started on some positive notes. However, I do not agree with his analysis on Sudan and will return to that point later. I shall echo one of his points and introduce another.

I join the Minister in welcoming the end of apartheid. I speak as someone whose relatives in South Africa have been involved in politics for three generations. Before the war, one of my great-grandfathers was engaged in fighting the rise of the nationalists in Parliament. One of my cousins was beaten up as a student by nationalist thugs and later, as a business man, led the first delegation to visit the African National Congress in exile. His company also sponsored the first black students into white universities.

One example that I hoped would be on the Minister's list was Zambia, another country with which I have a close family connection, and which, a few years ago, joined the club of countries that had passed the one really critical test of having made a peaceful transition from a Government to an Opposition as a result of a vote of the people. That is an important yardstick, one which many sub-Saharan countries still have to pass.

The Commission for Africa's report has been long in the making, and is much heralded. I welcome most of it. Its analysis is mostly very strong, reflecting the breadth of experience of most of the commissioners and of the excellent secretariat. Considering one or two of the commissioners chosen, one might say that it was a little on the bold side to have ensured such breadth. It is difficult to look into the causes of bad governance without considering the role of someone such as Meles Zenawi, the Ethiopian Prime Minister, or President Mkapa of Tanzania. The Minister mentioned Tanzania; let us remember President Mkapa's recent statement:

[Mr. Julian Brazier]

"I don't see Zimbabwe as an illustration of bad governance, I don't buy it".

Human Rights Watch commented on Zenawi's regime in Ethiopia:

"Police and security forces have harassed, illegally detained, tortured, and, killed members of the political opposition, demonstrators and suspected insurgents".

Nevertheless, despite our qualms about one or two members of the commission, the report was extremely detailed in its examination of the problem and provides a clear and grim analysis.

The problems of Africa are difficult to overstate. The Prime Minister is right to recognise it as a blemish on the entire globe that, while every other continent has been advancing, the four horsemen of the apocalypse have been loose in Africa for a whole generation. In terms of gross domestic product, Africa's share of trade has dropped from 6 per cent. to just 2 per cent. in the past generation. Average yearly income in a typical sub-Saharan country is about £86. Of course, those figures only concern people while they live, but to the millions of people who died in Congo, the 2 million who died in southern Sudan and those dying today in Darfur, they are irrelevant.

As for those not exposed to the dangers of war, the big three—HIV, tuberculosis and malaria—are carrying people away on a scale that makes the tsunami seem a sideshow. Overall life expectancy is falling fast. It is 38 in Mozambique; in Tanzania, it has fallen from 49 to 43 in a few years.

With the greatest respect to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, given the importance of the challenges faced, I wonder why we are debating the issue in Westminster Hall rather than the Chamber, and why we are doing so just as Parliament is packing up on the final day of term. But it is encouraging to see the number of colleagues from all parties who are here.

Mr. Bercow: There is usually something of a telepathic understanding between my hon. Friend and me, and today appears to be no exception to that general principle. Is my hon. Friend aware that, only an hour ago, I asked the Leader of the House why we could not have a debate on the Floor of the House about international development, instead of one of these periodic debates that convention dictates we must have, whether we need it or not, on defence in the UK? We ought to discuss the whole range of international development issues on the Floor of the House. They are incredibly important, especially in light of the publication of the Commission for Africa's report.

Mr. Brazier: On one point I do not join my hon. Friend; I think that the issue of defence is important, too. However, it is extremely sad that a day was not found on which to debate this subject on the Floor of the House. There is no point in over-egging the pudding, but the plain fact is that although the Prime Minister has told the world's media and his Ministers that the issue is vital, Parliament's involvement in it has been sidelined once again.

We endorse nearly all the recommendations of the commission. We do not need any persuading on debt relief; it was a Conservative Chancellor who started the worldwide campaign on it. We are committed to matching this Government's overseas development funding and the planned growth towards the 0.7 per cent. target, year by year, in relation to overseas development spending. We believe that could be spent better.

As a party committed to fair trade, we also need no persuading about the importance of opening up developed world markets to third-world countries. Along with putting in place infrastructure in those countries, that would be the single greatest thing that could be done to bring prosperity to them. The Minister mentioned assistance with tax-gathering, and we recognise that there may be a need for a transitional period of protectionism in certain key sectors, not least because it is much easier for a developing country to raise money through tariffs. After all, we had a customs system for centuries before we had income tax.

The report is nevertheless thin on implementation. Almost all its thrust is directed towards what donor countries should do and takes only a facile look at the issues to be addressed by the African countries themselves. Of course the right words are there—accountability, transparency, democracy—but there is little assessment of how the countries will be helped to achieve those goals. The report rightly states:

"Effective states—those that can promote and protect human rights and can deliver services to their people and a climate for entrepreneurship and growth—are the foundation of development. Without progress in governance, all other reforms will have limited impact."

However, the report's proposals are weak. It suggests that we should leave the answers to such problems to the people of Africa themselves. The Secretary of State for International Development said that "it is the peoples of Africa who will hold their Governments to account, who will ask questions about where the resources have gone and who will provide the pressure on Governments to crack down on corruption."—[Official Report, 14 March 2005; Vol. 432, c. 25.]

In some cases, of course, that is happening. The Minister was right to mention some encouraging examples and to quote Kofi Annan's speech. However, it is absurdly optimistic to think that that is the whole answer, or even part of the answer in some countries. Does anyone seriously believe that the terrorised, brutalised and half-starved people of Zimbabwe can possibly hold Robert Mugabe peacefully to account?

Actually, some people do believe that. Thabo Mbeki, who sadly has not brought to bear the same brilliant mind and communicating skills as his illustrious predecessor, said recently:

"I have no reason to think that anybody in Zimbabwe will act in a way that will militate against elections being free and fair".

Mr. Bercow: More chance of pigs flying.

Mr. Brazier: My hon. Friend is quite right. We all know what happened. Mugabe's thugs were guarding the ballot boxes, there was mass intimidation of opposition candidates, food was distributed only in the areas where his supporters lived, and the Movement for Democratic Change regions were deliberately starved. Yet the regional power declared that the elections were likely to be free and fair, and has not denied it since.

If it is not the people, who should judge such countries? The Minister mentioned the peer-review mechanism in the New Partnership for Africa's Development. There are one or two hopeful signs from that, but the membership of the panel includes a number of people who are themselves part of the problem.

Yesterday there was a most touching series of presentations by delegates from Darfur, organised under the chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short). My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) and I, along with hon. Members from other parties, attended those presentations. The message of those delegates was that the monitoring force in their area was not impartial; not only that, but it was far too small to do much about the problem anyway.

I do not pretend to have an easy answer to Darfur, but I was deeply depressed to hear the Minister's comments on it. Let us review the facts about Sudan as a whole. For a generation, the Khartoum Government carried out a programme of genocide—that is not too strong a word when 2 million people have been killed—in southern Sudan.

My father-in-law worked for Kofi Annan when he was the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. He was responsible for establishing the de-mining desk at the United Nations and he once told me that he took a personal decision to campaign for the abolition of anti-personnel mines only, not anti-vehicle mines, largely because he had visited southern Sudan and heard the testimony of the very brave people there. They were desperately resisting the Khartoum Government, and they told him that people like them had no chance at all against the Khartoum regime without anti-tank mines. Such mines are the only way of stopping an enemy who has all the kit.

Of course, we must all make the right noises about the decision of the Khartoum Government to go to the table. However, the fact is that they failed to beat the rebels in southern Sudan, and completely failed to achieve their military objectives. They had finally to accept the negotiations. In Darfur, there is no parallel at all. The people of Darfur have virtually no weapons or means of protecting themselves. They are getting very little protection from the monitoring force, which has a very limited mandate.

Mr. Mullin: The hon. Gentleman is over-egging the pudding. The various rebel movements in Darfur have been responsible for quite a number of the ceasefire breaches. They were responsible for attacks on eight convoys, including those on the Save the Children people, who were killed. I do not wish in any way to condone the activities of the Sudanese Government, but the situation in Darfur is a little more complicated than the hon. Gentleman is letting on.

Tony Baldry: Before my hon. Friend replies, will he and the Minister take it that when we took evidence directly—many hon. Members here today were present—from the leaders of the AU monitoring force, they told us, in terms that will appear in the Select Committee's report, that 80 per cent. of violations of the ceasefire were by the forces of the Government of Sudan?

Mr. Brazier: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for his helpful intervention. He could not make the point more clearly.

Mr. Mullin: If the hon. Gentleman reads the report of Mr. Pronk, the UN Secretary-General's representative, he will find that in the latter months of last year, he was reporting that most of the ceasefire breaches were coming from the rebels.

Mr. Brazier: My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury has more recent information. We can move from the complexities of what is happening on the ground to a simple, single point. When the Minister talks about identifying 51 people as potential war criminals, as though there were a single group of bad people out there—

Mr. Mullin: The UN identified them.

Mr. Brazier: The Minister mentions the UN's list of 51 people. Let us be clear about the matter. One can argue either way about whether a particular group of gunmen is funded by the Government, or is working under direct orders from the Government. However, when a Government use their air force to bomb women and children, there can be no doubt at all that the Government as a whole are guilty, not one or two people. It is simply ridiculous to pretend otherwise. It is the doing of the Khartoum Government. I have no doubt that there is plenty of freelance brutality too, as there is in so many conflicts, but the Government in Sudan are the main players.

Let me come back to the issue of governance. Developed countries should be offering a clear way forward on governance, helping developing countries out of decades of corruption and dictatorship, but a couple of the choices of commissioners whom I mentioned earlier make me think that, in trying to clear out the Augean stables, Hercules has turned to King Augeas himself for advice on the task. There is nothing neo-colonial about saying that the downtrodden people of Africa cannot be expected to hold their Governments to account in every case. In some cases, where there are developing democratic structures, they can be expected to do so; but in many other cases, they cannot. I am happy to go along with the Chancellor of the Exchequer who, by implication, suggested that it was time that we stopped apologising for our colonial history. He recently said:

> "We should talk, and rightly so, about British values that are enduring, because they stand for some of the greatest ideas in history: tolerance, liberty, civic duty, that grew in Britain and influenced the rest of the world."

If the use of aid as a lever to achieve good governance—in some cases, bypassing the Government of a country where we do not think that the money is being spent properly—is neo-colonial, then I make no apologies at all for being regarded as neo-colonial.

Jeremy Corbyn: Should not the hon. Gentleman give some regard to the massive wealth that every European country has made out of Africa since colonisation started, from the slave trade onwards? Do we not owe the African people as a whole some kind of debt for the wealth that we enjoy which was stolen from them?

Mr. Brazier: I do not accept the parallel with the rest of Europe; for example, I make no defence at all of the record of the Belgians in the Congo, which was indescribably bad. I am proud of the fact that our country abolished the slave trade, and put considerable blood and treasure into the exercise of abolishing it. I am also proud that many countries in which Britain had an involvement wanted to maintain close links with our country; for example, many of them enjoy being members of the Commonwealth and their parliamentary procedures are modelled on those of Westminster. We should be proud of those things. Everybody accepts that some atrocities were committed in imperial times, but I think we can be proud of the British record in many respects—it is certainly head and shoulders above that of most of our European counterparts.

Mr. Bercow: Wilberforce was a good Conservative.

Mr. Brazier: My hon. Friend reminds me that Wilberforce was a good Conservative.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): From Yorkshire.

Mr. Brazier: The hon. Gentleman is right; however, I will not pursue his point, as I am conscious of the fact that a lot of other people want to speak.

A donor country can sometimes be of use in pushing perspectives on which the recipient country might require advice. Last week, we had an excellent debate in this Chamber on a Science and Technology Committee report on the use of science in international development. It was extremely critical of the Government. During that debate, we had an interesting discussion about how much pressure donor countries should put on their developing counterparts to make more use of technology, and it is telling that that all-party Committee takes a very different view on that from the Government.

I do not want to go over the same ground again, but I do want to give one example from the report. It quoted the Royal Society of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene as saying that satellite-based monitoring of rainfall could be used > "to feed into flood and famine warning systems and crop yield modelling. However little emphasis is placed on this research, as it is not of direct use to individual farmers".

The Select Committee report made the point that the Royal Society of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene had evidence that, because the Department for International Development had relatively few people with scientific training on the ground, a recipient country might not recognise the value of the research being offered to them. There is no point in saying that it is patronising to claim that we do have a role to play in showing them that that can be of value to them.

As we are unable to ensure good governance, we have to ask how we are able to ensure that the extra £13 billion in aid—that is the sum that will be distributed under a Government of either complexion over the next few years—will be disbursed properly and well, and will bring real benefits to the people concerned. It would be a tragedy if much of this aid were to be found in the bank accounts of corrupt elites.

One of Africa's most respected independent columnists, Uganda's Andrew Mwenda, puts the problem very succinctly. If in 2015 we look back on the African commission and see another doomed venture,

> "After so many failed high profile initiatives, people in the west are going to write Africa off as a continent where even God's intervention cannot save the black person from misery".

That was his concern.

The report has generated great optimism, but it would be tragic if the worthy plans that come out of it do not achieve everything that they should. If they are to achieve what we all want to achieve—if they are to reverse the trend on that continent and to get it moving in the same direction as the rest of the world—we must find ways of bringing better governance to the many countries from which it is still absent.

Oxfam expressed its concern thus:

> "Without really creative and energetic thinking about what happens next, the Commission's final report could too easily end up being another worthy analysis that does not translate into real action for Africa."

It is incumbent on us all to ensure that that is not the case.

Prosperity will come from developing the structures necessary for good governance, free and fair trade and the rule of law in the many African countries where they barely exist today. The Minister ended with an excellent quote from Kofi Annan, but it is not the UN—great organisation though it is—but we, as the donors of aid, who can use aid as a lever to achieve good governance where it is needed. Kofi Annan is absolutely right, but it is the Governments of countries such as Britain who must press for change. The African people themselves, who want to see an improvement in their way of life, will get the opportunity to play their part as those democratic structures develop.

3.32 pm

Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie) (Lab): I very much congratulate the Government on their initiative in setting up the Commission for Africa. I also congratulate that body on having produced a quite superb report, and I shall talk about three areas of it.

The report is incredibly useful; indeed, I think that it is the best analysis that I have ever seen of the problem. It is presented in a penetrating way and although it is long, it is incisive. It shows us what can be done, and there is no doubt that it can be done—it is simply a question of political will. Above all, the report demonstrates the interlinking of the developed and the developing worlds. We talk about aid to Africa, but we have been a burden on Africa as a result of several policies: our present trade policy, our failed promises on aid and our quite unrealistically niggardly attitude to debt. All those things have to be put right, and the report is right on that.

The three areas that I want to talk about are HIV/AIDS and reproductive health, agriculture, and governance and Parliaments' role in it. First, I unconditionally praise the section in the report on reproductive health and HIV/AIDS. For much of the past year or so, I have been involved with our all-party group on population, development and reproductive health, and we have been concerned about the divorcing of HIV/AIDS from reproductive health. In its policies, the United States deliberately distances reproductive health from HIV/AIDS so that there is a scandalous inhibition on the provision of condoms. HIV/AIDS is overwhelmingly a sexually transmitted disease, which means that it is an issue in reproductive health. It is simply impossible to deal with issues such as the transmission of the virus from mother to child without seeing them in a reproductive health context.

I am delighted that, partly because of the work of the all-party group, the Department for International Development has recognised the importance of that link. It costs lives. HIV/AIDS has tended to compete for the money that would otherwise go to reproductive health. DFID has recognised that they should be integrated. That suggestion has been made in what will be the lead document for world policy. I am delighted about that. The document states:

"African governments must prioritise sexual and reproductive health within their vision of health systems and integrate HIV and AIDS treatment and care into it as set out in the UN's New York Call to Commitment."

I am pleased that I was in New York when that policy was formulated by the joint work of UNAIDS and UNFPA. Such guidelines are now in black and white.

I praise the section on agriculture. It shows that, for the first time, we are listening to what Africa says about agriculture. The Africans whom I have met have always regarded agriculture and its under-performance as top priority matters. Several quotes have already been attributed to Kofi Annan and no doubt there will be more. In 2004, he said that his top priority was the appliance of science and technology to agriculture. In the meantime, however, this country has been running down our science-based agricultural resource services. The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) alluded to that when he referred to what the Science and Technology Committee said.

We must now start building up resource services again in response to the huge need in Africa. If I have to fault the millennium development goals, which are a major step forward, it is that we have interpreted them mainly as social services. But what do we do about education? What do we do about health? Those are important issues, but sufficient emphasis is not placed on wealth creation and directly cutting poverty by, for example, ensuring that people have enough to eat. If DFID Ministers are asked what they have done to meet the millennium development goals, their replies rarely mention their action in agricultural matters. That is hard to understand. It has been said frequently—and in the report—that the major economic driver in Asia and south America was an agricultural revolution that has not occurred in Africa. The report puts that right, not only in the specific section on agriculture, which starts on page 237. The matter is infused in the report in, for example, references to improving the infrastructure of roads, irrigation and access to markets.

At last we are listening to Africa. Through the African Union, NEPAD and the regional economic communities, heads of state and Ministers have expressed their recognition of the crucial role played by agriculture. President Obasanjo of Nigeria, the chair of NEPAD, believes that agriculture will provide the engine for growth in Africa. He has said that improving agricultural performance is at the heart of improved economic development and growth. Its role in poverty reduction and in the restoration of human dignity can never be over-emphasised. In sub-Saharan Africa, agriculture contributes at least 40 per cent. of exports, 30 per cent. of GDP, up to 30 per cent. of foreign exchange earnings, and 70 to 80 per cent. of employment. Accelerating growth in agriculture is therefore critical to sustaining growth.

The neglect of agriculture has had some grim consequences. In Africa, food dependence on outside sources has grown. Conditions in the countryside have led to urbanisation on a scale that developing countries cannot cope with.

The figures for Lagos are unbelievable. Lagos is increasing by 10 to 15 per cent. a year. Many members of the International Development Committee will have visited it, and the thought of that metropolis growing by 10 to 15 per cent. a year is simply horrifying. It is growing at that rate because of the neglect of agriculture, attention to which would keep people working on the land.

The report also recognises that irrigation has been neglected. People turned away from large-scale dams. Perhaps they were right to do so, but that does not mean turning away from community-based irrigation. The report shows just how much sensible irrigation could achieve.

The report also refers to the depletion of the soil, and to the fact that no expertise has been applied to reverse it. It also highlights the huge damage done by war and conflict.

Mr. Brazier: The hon. Gentleman is making a powerful point, but I urge him to think back to the Science and Technology Committee report, which we debated last week. It made it clear that part of the reason why we are not being as effective as we should is that DFID employs far too few scientists and technologists, and far too little of its work points in that direction.

Tony Worthington: I agree. Some of those with a scientific background are no longer employed in posts where they can use that background. Something very strange has occurred: agriculture has become very unsexy for DFID, northern development agencies and non-governmental organisations. There has been a decline in investment in agriculture and in the natural sciences. African agriculture is now in crisis, as the Commission for Africa recognises, partly as a result of that. We must put that right, but first we must reverse the decline.

I am delighted by the appointment of Gordon Conway as DFID's chief scientific adviser. Mr. Conway used to be director of the Rockefeller Foundation, and he has a first-rate background in agriculture. He must urge DFID to reverse the decline in the number of agricultural personnel employed at DFID that the hon. Member for Canterbury mentioned.

[Tony Worthington]

It simply makes no sense to say that the most important issue for Africa is climate change, when the most important thing for wealth creation in Africa is agriculture. It therefore makes no sense to deplete our agricultural research institutes. The list of closures is long: East Malling, Wellesbourne, Kirton, Rothamsted, and Silsoe, which is likely to be closed this year. We are simply losing science-based jobs through those closures. The number of staff employed at the Natural Resources Institute, which is now based partly at Greenwich university, has been reduced from about 550 some 20 years ago to 107 at the end of last year. The age profile is rising all the time, and we are losing in a field in which we have been in the lead. We should be tackling that.

Another reason why we should take a lead in agriculture is the approach taken by other nations, particularly the United States, in helping African agriculture. The United States increases dependence on it through the style of farming that it encourages, the sale of seeds, and dependence on fertiliser and so on. We have the right attitude in putting the interests of smallholders first. I hope that the Minister will reassure me that what the Commission for Africa report states is policy becomes DFID's policy and that we will reverse this decline.

Finally, I draw hon. Members' attention to page 155 of the report and the issue of governance. I believe that the UK Parliament and hon. Members present in the Chamber can take credit for this. It says:

"Parliaments in both developed and other developing countries should establish partnerships to strengthen parliaments in Africa, including the pan-African parliament."

For years, analyses of Africa have emphasised that governance is key, but they have then gone on to talk about the Government themselves or the lack of capacity in ministries. It beats me how one can talk about governance without looking at how the Parliaments function. Parliaments are at the apex of civil society. If they are not working—and in many cases in Africa they are not working very well—forget about governance. The question of Parliaments working effectively has been the missing ingredient, and we have to do something about that. We, personally, can do something about it.

Following the announcement of the Commission for Africa, the parliamentary Labour party international development committee, which is chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley), set up a sub-committee to consider how Parliaments and parliamentarians in the developed world could help development in Africa. We produced a document on that, which we submitted as evidence to the Commission for Africa, explaining how Parliaments could assist in the developing world.

We then went a little further and asked what were the next steps that should be taken. Reference has been made to this already; the Prime Minister said that the most important things in the world are Africa and climate change. Where are the debates on those in the House? How much time do we devote to international development? That was mentioned by the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). It is a little incongruous to say, "This is the most important thing in the world and we shall lead the world on this", when our Parliament does not tackle the issues.

We produced two pieces of evidence for the Commission for Africa. One concerned what Parliaments could do, and the other concerned the next steps we should take to alter our Parliament in order to be more effective in contributing to development. I am delighted that the Commission for Africa has picked up on that:

"Parliaments in both developed and other developing countries should establish partnerships to strengthen parliaments in Africa, including the Pan-African Parliament. For maximum value, these should go beyond short exchanges, conferences and study visits to become longer term, practically focused partnerships, based on mutual learning, for example in areas such as consultation with all their constituents".

That is what we should be about in this place, and some all-party groups are already doing that.

When I look back over the 18 years I have been here, I note that some of the best work done has been done recently by all-party groups, such as the one dealing with Africa through its report on AIDS, and the all-party group on heavily indebted countries. I referred to what we have been doing on the relationship between reproductive health and AIDS, which is very valuable work, but there is no encouragement for it. It is something that people do in their spare time, as it were; there is no support for that sort of activity.

In our Back-Bench group, we have said that we should look at the way we conduct ourselves in our support for development. I am delighted to say that the Leader of the House saw the work that we were doing, valued it and has now set up a working party, which will take those ideas forward so that we can change the shape of this Parliament and its relationship with the developing world. I am delighted to say that my hon. Friend the Member for City of York will take over that group and chair it during the next Parliament, so that it does not fall away. Those are issues of very great importance. There will be a body in our Parliament that is dedicated to implementing that part of the Commission for Africa report.

I want to talk about an area where I hope that there will be partnerships: the issue of corruption. That presents a real challenge, which needs work in this country as well as elsewhere. I was in Nigeria last week and I was delighted to hear that President Obasanjo is leading the way on accepting the extractive industries transparency initiative—I think that those involved should have stuck with "publish what you pay", which was a snappier title. It will now be backed by oil companies such as BP and Shell. We knew that, but I was delighted to hear that it is thought that Chevron will back it as well. If at last the people of Nigeria can know how much revenue is coming from the oil industry into their country, they can start tackling that issue. That is one kind of partnership: Government to Government. However, corruption is so endemic in Nigeria that other partnerships will need to be set up with parliamentarians so that we can identify ways of ridding Nigeria and other countries of corruption.

I shall give some examples of how corruption affects Nigerian politics. As the Minister said, many of the parliamentarians are very good people who could do much to bring the benefits of democracy to Nigeria, but they are utterly trapped in a system that breeds corruption. It is no use simply blaming the politicians. It is a question of working with them to help them break free of corruption. Let me give some examples. One of the things that we forget about African parliamentarians is just how much it costs them to stand for election and carry on in office. The parties have no ideologies or distinctive philosophies. If someone asks the People's Democratic Party, "What do you stand for? What kind of education do you want?", they get a blank response. If they ask the Alliance for Democracy, "What kind of education do you want? What kind of philosophies are driving you?", they get a blank response. The other party is the same.

Mr. Chidgey: I agree absolutely with what the hon. Gentleman is saying about the lack of ideology. It is not currency in African culture—or it has not been in the first generation of the post-colonial era. However, is not one of the problems for African politicians the existence of an expectation among the people who support them—a family, tribal and village concept—that the big man who is elected is there to look after them? They expect to be looked after and the politician needs the resources to do that.

Tony Worthington: That is absolutely right. The politicians are known as walking wallets. They are seen as opportunities to gain resources. One politician that I talked to last week boasted to me that he had just provided 1,000 scholarships for people to learn IT skills, because that is what the firms wanted. He was aiming to get 5,000 scholarships, which he would personally pay for. Where does that lead in the end? It certainly excludes anyone who is poor. It is totally unsustainable. He said that in the context of a woman who had come up to him and asked, "What have you done for me since you were elected? Don't tell me about your 1,000 IT scholarships." Politicians are trapped. I asked one politician how much it had cost him to stand for election and get elected. He said $500,000. One either brings that to the party oneself or one needs a godfather. There is a spectacular case in Nigeria involving one of the state governors who has reneged on his godfather and is not delivering the contracts as he was supposed to. People are trapped.

The Minister himself referred to perhaps the most spectacular example. The Minister of Education has been sacked after he was caught by the anti-corruption commission. He was bribing other parliamentarians to pass his education budget. He was alleged to have distributed $462,000 to pay the people on the committee to pass his budget. I do not think that any of us have ever received such an offer, but that is what one gets when there is a political system with no values and in which no issues are debated. It means that one's Parliament is run on the basis of money and access to money. Those are the issues that we should be working with in partnerships, in whatever form we can, to try to create little islands of transparency to start driving corruption back. I do not think that those parliamentarians can do that alone.

Jeremy Corbyn: Would my hon. Friend not accept that the transparency that he talks of should also apply to foreign-owned companies, which engage in those practices in many African countries and, because they gain so much from it, fuel a great deal of the corruption?

Tony Worthington: That is what I was referring to. One of the major ways in which we can tackle corruption is by the "publish what you pay" initiative. It is a criminal offence to bribe a foreign official; we have taken that step forward. But it is difficult to see how we can get good governance without paying much more attention to the issue of transparency and building partnerships of parliamentarians that will tackle those issues. Once again, I am delighted with the Commission for Africa report. It will be the bible for development in Africa for years to come. The Government set up the Commission for Africa; they must work with us to make sure that the report is implemented.

3.57 pm

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh) (LD): I begin my contribution on a personal note. Unless we have all got it terribly wrong, it is very likely that this will be the last occasion on which I have an opportunity to speak in this Chamber, as I am standing down at the next general election. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I am pleased to hear those comments of appreciation, even though they are somewhat muted. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] However, it is appropriate that, on this occasion, I am speaking on Africa from the Liberal Democrat Front Bench, because it is almost exactly a quarter of a century since I was brought face to face with the reality of the plight of Africa. That helped to motivate me to seek a place in Parliament to give voice to my concerns. Almost exactly a quarter of a century ago, I lived in the rainforests of west Africa for long periods, directing teams of engineers, surveyors, geologists and the like. We were building things such as 300 km long trans-national highways connecting the hinterlands of four or five countries to coastal ports.

In that part of Africa a quarter of a century ago, one came face to face daily with the despotic rule by terror of the indigenous Governments. The opponents of those Governments were regularly cast into jail and allowed to starve to death. One was working in countries in which there had been a buoyant cash-crop export surplus and the usual things—soft fruits, cereals, coffee, tea—were sent to the markets of Europe, yet the people were starving and the children dying from disease and malnutrition. Those countries contained about a third of the world's bauxite resources, huge supplies of iron ore and huge riches in diamonds, gold and other precious metals, which, as the Minister alluded to, had become a curse in the development of those countries.

Yet with all that wealth, people were so poor that empty Coca-Cola tins and plastic water bottles were used as currency rather than the currency of the country. There was no problem with litter. Everything that was produced in the west had a purpose, use and value. We were working in countries in which the economies had collapsed to the extent that the shadow exchange rate against the US dollar was 1,000 per cent. higher than the official exchange rate for that currency, hospitals had no running water or electricity, doctors had no drugs, schools had no books and shops had nothing to sell. Hardly a week went by without one of my African workers asking me for the day off so that he could bury a dead child.

[Mr. David Chidgey]

The plight of those people and the tragedy of Africa would have left a scar on anyone's soul, let alone their conscience. The real tragedy is that it has taken a quarter of a century for the west to wake up to the tragedy of Africa. Having said that, I see signs of change and I welcome the initiative of the Government in producing the report, although I have some comments to make about it. I also very much welcome the initiative of NEPAD, to which the Minister alluded, and the founding of the African Union. The Commission for Africa report is in many ways a response to those African initiatives.

Governance and Governments in Africa are changing. Those despotic rulers, the so-called big men of Africa, who created tribal power bases and ruled through patronage, corruption and fear are literally dying out. Old age is taking its toll. There is a new generation, and as the Minister noted, many more countries are trying out—it is only trying out at the moment—the democratic process. In the second generation of post-colonial governance, Governments are much more likely to be founded on democratic principles, if not quite democratic practice just yet.

However, the process is moving forward and there is encouragement, particularly in the south. I had the opportunity to visit South Africa a while ago, and in the post-apartheid era it is amazing how that country has blossomed. It has become a powerhouse in the region, with a burgeoning economy. One might say that they have more freedom of speech than our country, as in South Africa civil society is vibrant, flourishing, blooming, and exciting. That is tempered, however, by the great tragedy of AIDS in that country.

Through my connection with Africa, one salutary experience in recent years was my visit to the HIV/AIDS hospice in Soweto. We all know about Soweto; we know the unique way in which Soweto as a community has developed and is governed. The inhabitants are coming to terms with the pandemic of HIV/AIDS among their community, and they are training their own care workers with resources so limited that it is unbelievable, but doing so with great dignity, passion and a sense of community. They are helping themselves to care for their sick and dying family members, community members, neighbours or whoever. That will stay with me. The dignity of humanity knows no bounds, and we can learn a lot in different situations.

In the north of Africa, another beacon of hope is the political process in Senegal and its development in the past decade or so. It is a country that I knew well in my previous aberration. The democratic transfer of power to President Wade in the presidential elections was a great signal of hope for that part of Africa. In a complete break with tradition, and probably for the first time since independence, the defeated Government party—defeated by President Wade—was not demonised; instead, the President set up a state-funded office for the Leader of the Opposition. That is probably unique in African politics, but then I have a great deal of regard for President Wade and his vision. We should pay him further tribute, because he was one of the founding fathers of NEPAD, although President Obasanjo of Nigeria is the chairman. I am proud that President Wade has occasionally called me his friend, because he has set forth a beacon of light for the development of democracy in Africa that I hope many will follow.

In many ways, the Commission for Africa and its report are a response to the African initiative to develop a partnership with the west through NEPAD. I welcome it, and I do not take anything away from the commission for what I view as a response rather than blue-skies thinking, but it is a great pity that while this country has grasped the nettle, has decided to work with Africa, has recognised its responsibilities and has accepted that we must work in partnership through NEPAD, our colleagues in the United States Administration view the matter differently. It is a great pity that the United States does not support NEPAD but instead has, I believe, put all its weight and influence behind the millennium challenge, which is in fact an investment vehicle linked to American commercial interests and overseen by the Heritage Foundation, which many Members know is somewhat right of centre. Some might say that it is right of Attila the Hun, but perhaps that is an exaggeration. Nevertheless, it is founded on neo-conservative principles—hardly what we mean when we talk about partnership with Africa. It seems more a return to past colonial periods of exploitation and extracting wealth from African resources. That is not a sign of partnership.

So the question for us is, is the Commission for Africa report an adequate or realistic response to the challenge that Africa offers? It is worth assessing how well it has been received. Other Members have mentioned some of the responses. I shall quote from the responses of the President of South Africa, Thabo Mbeki, Peter Hardstaff of the World Development Movement and Adrian Lovett of Oxfam.

In response to the report, President Mbeki stated:

"It must translate not into a lot of paper, but into a firm, serious programme of action . . . There is a lot of work contained in here . . . My own sense is that everybody is very keen to achieve actual, measurable progress."

How true that is.

Peter Hardstaff, who is the policy director for the aid group World Development Movement, with which I am sure we are all familiar, stated:

"This has been said many times before . . . The UK government and other rich countries have to actually start taking action on these issues of trade, increasing aid, cancelling debt."

My final quote comes from Oxfam's Adrian Lovett, whose name was mentioned earlier. He stated:

"In the long term, history will judge this report not just by its content but by its capacity to deliver genuine change . . . This report can be a rallying call for a generation that will no longer tolerate the obscenity of extreme poverty in Africa—or it could end up gathering dust. It's now up to world leaders to make that choice."

In that context, it is reasonable to ask our Government for a commitment to set out the process by which they propose to use the presidency of the G8, and of the European Union, to get western leaders to sign up to the process and start an action programme to implement this valuable and well constructed report. I am far from convinced that the proposed small secretariat of just two people in an office that will probably be somewhere in London will have anything like the muscle that will be needed to push through the progress that we all want.

I shall now deal with three specific areas. I wish to speak briefly about the problems of money laundering, the arms trade and aid tied to privatisation, which I do not believe that other Members have commented on yet.

On money laundering, no one would argue that corruption is not a curse for Africa or that Africa does not need to take a lead in its eradication—with help from us. In that context, the United Kingdom has a definite role to play. We must recognise that our financial institutions have been a magnet for stolen wealth deposited by corrupt African dictators for more years than we can count. I shall give a couple of examples.

The late Sani Abacha, the dictator-ruler of Nigeria from 1993 to 1998, apparently stole more than $1.3 billion from his country. That money found its way into British bank accounts, but only $30 million of it has been frozen. I understand that requests from the Nigerian Government for help in obtaining the return of related financial documents—and of the money, which clearly belongs to the people of Nigeria—have been constantly frustrated. We have a role to play and the Government have a responsibility, if we mean what we say in the report—that we should put into practice the actions necessary to help restore financial probity on that level to the Government of Nigeria.

Mr. Mullin: I entirely agree that we have a duty to assist African Governments to recover assets looted by former rulers. However, it depends on the production of evidence, and I am sorry to say that such evidence is not always forthcoming. Much rhetoric surrounds the sums alleged to be in this country, but evidence to demonstrate it does not always exist. Some of Abacha's money has been found here, and has been taken. More than $100 million has been found in the Channel Islands, and about $500 million has been found in Switzerland. Action is being taken to return that money, but it requires evidence; and it requires the country's institutions—in this case, those of Nigeria—to co-operate with ours.

Mr. Chidgey: I am grateful to the Minister for that intervention. I do not disagree; it is not a straightforward, easy exercise. However, because of the scope, the power and the sheer size of the financial institutions in the City, the United Kingdom needs to take the lead. I accept that we need to go through the process, but we cannot preach good governance to African countries—which needs transparency, openness and honesty—when our financial institutions exercise opaqueness as a skilled art.

Mr. Mullin indicated assent.

Mr. Chidgey: The Minister nods. He knows what I mean. If we want to be taken seriously by the African Governments that we are dealing with, we must take the lead in Europe by showing that we are no longer prepared to be complicit in helping dictators to steal the resources of the countries that they are supposed to be governing.

Most people realise that the global arms trade has a massive human impact. It fuels and sustains conflict, destroys lives and impedes trade and the delivery of aid. I understand that in 2003, 15 African countries were affected by conflict, which resulted in millions of people being killed. In that year, UK arms sales to Africa totalled some £200 million. Weapons exported from the United Kingdom in 2003 and since are now in use in conflicts in 10 African countries.

It is time that we started to respond to the call that Members are making for an end to subsidies for arms sales. We should take the lead in establishing an international arms trade treaty, and start to think seriously about setting up strongly binding end-use undertakings for arms exported by the United Kingdom. I find it frankly embarrassing that my country should be selling arms to 10 of the 13 countries engaged in conflict in Africa. We must be able to do more than that.

Finally, I raise the subject of aid that is tied to privatisation. As other hon. Members have mentioned, one of the great scourges of Africa is the lack of clean water and sanitation, particularly among the impoverished millions in urban and rural communities. Water-borne diseases such as diarrhoea, cholera and typhoid carried in unsafe drinking water and poor sanitation, and malaria spread by inadequate drainage, together kill tens of millions of Africans every year.

How can it be right for so much of the UK's aid for projects to improve water supply, sanitation and drainage to be tied to a requirement to privatise existing public utility providers? It is not as if privatisation has been a resounding success in sophisticated economies such as that of the United Kingdom, let alone those of developing countries. I cannot imagine any circumstances in which tying aid for water supply and drainage projects to privatisation could do anything but severely impact on programmes for poverty alleviation. I cannot see how privatising a public utility in a developing country will ever help alleviate poverty. I will give one example. In 1997, a British firm and a French consortium were engaged through aid to privatise Jakarta's water supply system. As a net result, water prices increased by 82 per cent.. How did that help the millions of the poor, who already had a desperate need for access to clean water?

Hugh Bayley: There are parts of developing countries, clearly, where there is no capacity for water to be provided by a private supplier. If one waited until aid became available to provide public sector water schemes throughout the developing world, one would wait 200 to 300 years before people got clean water. Just as there is a bad example in Jakarta, there have been good examples where private water suppliers have dramatically reduced the cost of water to poor urban slum dwellers and have improved the quality of water. Such suppliers have reduced the cost in relation to the private water sellers who had come along with a donkey and a barrel, and produced water that is more accessible for women, cleaner, safer and much cheaper.

Mr. Chidgey: That is an interesting point. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that, in my experience, where public water supplies have already been established—dating back perhaps 50 years—and the growth in population in urban areas has far surpassed the capacity, the requirement of international funding institutions such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank for a cost-benefit return on the investment to be shown, particularly in relation to sanitation, has precluded the development of safe water supply and safe sanitation. That is because people cannot afford the connections that they would have to such systems.

[Mr. Chidgey]

There are other sides to the coin and that is why I raise the matter. I have been to such places and I have seen that happen; people have disconnected, because they cannot afford the cost. We are talking about people on very low incomes, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows.

Hugh Bayley: I think we agree that in some cases a private supplier is appropriate and in others it is inappropriate. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that provided people in the country concerned make the decision whether to use a public or a private supplier, we should leave them free to do so—as long as it is their decision, not ours?

Mr. Chidgey: I think that we have a meeting of minds. There is great strength in the argument that the hon. Gentleman puts forward. Such people should be responsible for how they fund—and attract funding—for the basic assets that they need. My strong concern is about their having projects and funding mechanisms forced upon them.

It is time for the United Kingdom to start considering how we can couple the aspirations set out in the Commission for Africa report with the visions set out in NEPAD. We need to work in partnership for the future. It is particularly important that we concentrate on trying to create capacity in the developing world. The infrastructure is one thing, but, as we have commented earlier in this debate, creating capacity of skilled, educated and employed populations is the key to future economic growth. If we can help developing countries do that, they can start, with their skilled populations, to contribute through the tax base to economic growth, rather than have the majority of the population eking out a living through the shadow economy. That is all too often the case at present—and has been for too many decades.

4.19 pm

Mr. Tony Colman (Putney) (Lab): Before I make my brief contribution on the UK and Africa, I hope that you will allow me a point of personal explanation, Mr. Deputy Speaker. A number of hon. Members have approached me in recent days, saying that they were sorry that I was standing down at the next general election. I hasten to say that I am not. It is subject to the decision of the electors of Putney, but I hope to be returned as the Member for Putney in the next Parliament.

The reason for that thought is that my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Coleman), whose constituency is the neighbouring one to mine, and who has a name similar to mine, is stepping down, sadly, after many years of experience in local government, in which he was leader of Hammersmith and Fulham council, and worked in local government not just in London but around the UK. He had a serious car accident in 1997, fully recovered from it, and had severe health problems in June last year. Sadly, he will not stand at the general election, but I, subject to the wishes of the electors of Putney, will return here after the election, whenever it happens.

Mr. Bercow: We all admire the hon. Gentleman's doughty, fighting spirit, but unless I am much mistaken the admirable Justine Greening, the prospective Conservative party parliamentary candidate in the constituency, might have something to say on the matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Edward O'Hara): Order. I think that hon. Members are lapsing into electioneering.

Mr. Colman: I think that we are; it was not meant to be that way, as I was trying to pay tribute, as I should hope hon. Members of all parties would, to an hon. Member who has had severe problems with illness in the past eight years and who will be retiring from the House. I see hon. Members nodding, as they share my concern that he must leave before his wide experience has been used.

I shall now talk about Africa and the United Kingdom. It has been a great privilege to serve on the International Development Committee in this Parliament, and I particularly thank the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), who has chaired the Committee so well for four years. We have done tremendous work to keep the Department for International Development and other Departments that have involvement with Africa with their feet held to the fire, if I may phrase it in that way.

My personal peak in the extraordinary experience of learning about Africa was landing at Hargeisa airport in Somaliland in February 2004 and being welcomed almost as conquering heroes. It was even more amazing to walk down Hargeisa high street and meet some of my constituents, who greeted me and pointed out how well they thought I was doing as an MP. However, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you may feel that I am electioneering in saying that, too.

What was remarkable was the $400 million that had gone into Somaliland since 1992 through the hawala remittance system. I am pleased to see—I received the information today—that the Department for International Development is launching its UK remittance products survey next Thursday, to follow up the work that it has done on that important way in which Africa helps itself, through migrants who have left. Like other hon. Members I worked in Africa in the 1960s, and, as the Minister has said, Africa has gone backwards, not forwards.

Jeremy Corbyn: Before my hon. Friend leaves the subject of Somalia, may I ask whether he has an opinion on recognition or otherwise of the Government in Hargeisa? What does he think are the chances of reunification of Somalia?

Mr. Colman: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point. My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) led a debate here, which was apparently the most viewed debate ever in parliamentary history, on the future of Somaliland.

I hope—I have made this clear many times—that the good governance that is represented in Somaliland will be taken into account, in whatever way the overall Somalia Government proceed. I hope that the Minister for Africa, who is in his place, will ensure that that view, which was expressed by hon. Members of all parties on the International Development Committee, is supported.

My reason for participating in the debate was to provide a new element to it. Others have spoken about the Make Poverty History campaign and the issues of governance, increased aid, debt relief and trade justice. I should like to support those concepts and I noticed the words used by the Prime Minister, at the Dispatch Box at lunchtime, when he said that 2005 should be Africa's year.

My concern is what I believe to be the missing chapter in the Commission for Africa document, about the role of the private sector, which is to deliver. It is in paragraphs 129 to 142—"What business should do". That is three pages out of 461. It largely ignores the role of venture capital and private equity in delivering for Africa.

My guru on this issue is Alan Patricof, who is a co-founder of Apax Partners. He was vice-chairman of the commission on capital flows to Africa and a member of the United Nations Development Programme commission on the private sector and development. In a recent Financial Times article, he said that there needs to be "a pool of semi-permanent capital for investment in African businesses that does not have to be serviced or amortised regularly from the start."

The problem is, according to Alan Patricof:

"Equity capital for growing small businesses is not available today in Africa; only loans are."

We need new instruments.

May I introduce the House to the work of the African Venture Capital Association? It consists of 35 venture capital funds that work in Africa, one of which is Commonwealth Development Corporation/Actis. The AVCA managing director is Barbara James, working from London; the chair is Mark Jennings, from South Africa; the vice-chair is Aziz Mebarek from Tunisia; and Rotimi Oyekanmi from Nigeria is AVCA director. That group seeks to ensure that there is a way forward in dealing with the need for the money to be there. The views that I am expressing are my own, not from that association, but it is important to take it into account. It intends to make a major submission to the Commission for Africa before the 31 May deadline.

The association points out in particular that only $750 million of the $25 billion a year that is recommended by the commission is clearly earmarked for the private sector. For the investment climate facility, the sum is $550 million over seven years and for the Africa enterprise fund it is $100 million. For political risk insurance provided by Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency the figure is $80 million, and for the UNDP growing sustainable business initiative it is only $20 million over five years. I say "only"; these are new funds, but the needs are great. I strongly believe that, as we saw as a Committee in India and China, if we want to deliver on the millennium development goals, business must be a key partner. The goals cannot be delivered on simply through Government.

I was very concerned that one particular recommendation was not covered. Perhaps that is because it relates primarily to a UK matter. I am talking about the concept of tax incentives for investors—particularly African diaspora investors—in African businesses and in private equity in particular. Such incentives would be similar to tax incentives given to UK taxpayers who invest in UK venture capital trusts and community development finance institutions, and similar to tax incentives given to individuals who give charitable donations to African causes. I have spoken to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, and it is a shame that that recommendation was left out of the overall view of how we go forward.

The key is what happens between now and the Gleneagles summit. Last week, I spoke to the excellent director of the United Nations Industrial Development Organisation, and he was concerned that the private sector should be able to be brought into the discussion in early June. He is putting a proposal to the Foreign Office and to DFID for a conference to be held in early June, at which we could get entrepreneurs and business people from Africa to take the report to pieces and expand the three pages into something more substantial that can go to the Gleneagles summit in early June.

May I add my other four points? Obviously, the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) made his. Mine are more about things that I would have liked to see in the Commission for Africa report, but which were not there. First, I am surprised that there is no supermarket code of practice for the supply of farm products from Africa to UK supermarkets. A lot of effort goes in to ensure that UK farmers are subsidised—all the way up to the hilt, as we know. I read today that Oliver Walston is receiving almost £200,000. That is quite legal, but the subsidies are enormous. Nothing is being subsidised in Africa. It would be rather nice to have a commitment that 50 per cent. of the raw foodstuffs sold in UK supermarkets should come from Africa by 2015, and perhaps the goal for processed food could be 2025. Such a commitment from the UK retail supermarket industry could be achieved, if the NGOs decide to take this on alongside the Government, and would revolutionise agriculture, feeding both Africa and Europe.

Secondly, the extractive industries transparency initiative has been mentioned again and again. Why not encourage resource extraction out of Africa to a level significantly higher than at present, but ensure that the royalties from that larger amount are earmarked for achieving the millennium development goals? We could track the new money.

Thirdly, if we are building our schools, hospitals and infrastructure in the UK through public-private partnership and they will be fit for purpose for the next 30 years, why cannot that be done for African countries if they wish it? It could be guaranteed by World Bank loans and the Export Credits Guarantee Department, with local companies doing the construction and local people running the schools and hospitals that are built.

Lastly, this is United Nations year of microcredit. I pay tribute to the all-party group on this and to Phyllis SantaMaria of PlaNet Finance plc, who has acted as our key adviser. Commercial banking systems need to be available in all African countries, operating, of course, under local regulatory controls. However, as the Chief Secretary to the Treasury said at a meeting that the Minister and I attended last night, we need to ensure that Governments get off the back of private companies wherever possible to enable entrepreneurialism to take place.

[Mr. Colman]

My experience of the African economy at market level is that it can take off. I close my remarks by returning to Alan Patricof. He says:

> "With help from rich countries in building up the support systems for small and medium-sized enterprises... these enterprises could grow rapidly and provide the employment... the efficient products and services and the tax revenues to support sustainable, non-aid dependent economies in Africa."

I believe that we need to have more aid. We need to have trade justice and we need to have debt relief. Alongside that, we need to unleash the entrepreneurialism that is available in Africa and could deliver the employment and the future for it to achieve the millennium development goals.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We have reached the last hour of debate and four hon. Members still wish to speak. I understand that the Minister may seek leave to have the last five minutes in which to respond.

4.32 pm

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Colman), with many of whose remarks I agree. Being conscious of the pressure on time, I will do my best to break the habit of a lifetime and be relatively brief.

The observation has been made that there is an important role for private sector funding. I agree. Nevertheless, it falls to me to put the other side of the equation. It is incredibly important that there is a substantial additional infusion of Government funds in the form of development assistance. I am delighted that after some considerable effort on my part, and highly effective efforts on the parts of my hon. Friends the Members for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), those on the Opposition Front Bench have matched the Government's commitment to seeking to meet the 0.7 per cent. UN target.

It is right that both the major parties agree at least on the extent of the commitment required. We may differ about the detail of how it should be channelled and the role of the NGOs, but I genuinely believe that it is a healthy state of affairs that we can agree on the need for such extra resources. It is part of what I call the mixed economy of support for the poor in the developing world. If we are to have any chance of achieving the millennium development goals, there can be no doubt that more funds are needed.

We are well over a century behind the target date for realising those goals. If memory serves me correctly, they are supposed to be achieved by 2015. On the eradication of extreme poverty and hunger, universal access to primary education, the reduction of child mortality and the improvement of maternal health—to name but a few—we are a long way behind, as the International Development Committee pointed out as long ago as November 2003. The thought that it might be 2150, and in some cases 2165, before those goals are met is frankly unacceptable; it is a betrayal of the people who need our help on a bigger scale and require it without delay. I hope, on a non-partisan note, that I have made that point sufficiently clear.

It is imperative that our trade policy reinforces rather than detracts from our aid policy. It is an oft-commented on scandal, but it can scarcely be said often enough that the trade polices pursued by the European Union and the United States are morally wrong, economically counter-productive and, ultimately, politically dangerous. When I say politically dangerous, I am not suggesting that weapons of mass destruction will be unleashed upon us by poor developing nations resentful of the behaviour of Britain, the EU and the US. However, one does not have to be a socialist—I am proud to be a Conservative—to recognise that if poor countries find their condition exacerbated not by accident or policy error but by the knowing, deliberate and calculated trade policies of the richest countries on earth, that is bound to spawn a reaction of terrible resentment and hostility that not only is their condition not being eased, but their plight is being deliberately worsened.

We have to change our policies. In 2003, Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development agricultural subsidies totalled $312 billion. That is a huge sum, and 15 times greater than OECD aid to Africa. That puts the situation in perspective. For any significant sum that we in the rich world contribute in the form of development assistance, we take vastly more away.

It is sometimes suggested that the west is practising policies of forced liberalisation. My objection to the policies of the EU and the US is that they are not fair. We preach free enterprise but practise protectionism on a grotesque scale. In terms that are not remotely justified by market economics, we want to export our goods at knock-down prices to the struggling local markets of developing nations, but we are not prepared to take their goods into our markets. That is the equivalent of playing a game of football and insisting that one side is entitled to 11 players, including a healthy goalkeeper, but the other team is allowed only five players and is banned from having a goalkeeper. That is how I would most graphically illustrate the point.

Action is needed in the dairy, sugar and cotton sectors. I am suspicious when I am told that there is a commitment to the elimination of export subsidies. I will believe it when I see it. The evidence over the years is that, in terms of EU and US trade policy, one has to read the subtext and the get-out clauses; their commitments tend to contain caveats inserted deliberately to suit the interests of those countries and, in the process, to damage those of the developing world. [Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) want to intervene?

Hugh Bayley: I entirely agree with the case about trade injustice that the hon. Gentleman is making. However, I wonder whether talking about African football teams with only five members is the best analogy, because one thing that Africa excels at—and we should celebrate it—is producing footballers. An African team of five would probably beat a British team with 11 members.

Mr. Bercow: I am always happy to be educated by the hon. Gentleman. I will go away and, together with my indefatigable research assistance, devise a superior way of illustrating what is nevertheless a valid point.

There is also an issue about the economic partnership agreements between the EU and the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries. The International Development Committee is studying that subject at the moment. We can see that an argument can be made for such agreements and a number of us felt that Commissioner Mandelson intended, and will go on intending, that they should be development tools. The problem is that some of us are not so far convinced that those economic partnership agreements will have the necessary development focus and priority. So far, there does not appear to be any clear alternative for ACP countries to opt for if they are not entirely persuaded of the merits of those agreements. It is incredibly important that the bodies concerned do not repeat the process of opening up the markets of the countries concerned to subsidise western products, without giving a proper opportunity for those poor countries to trade their way out of poverty and build their domestic capacity.

On governance, I strongly endorse what the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) said. Parliamentary involvement in development has been a continuing theme in his work in the House. We should do all that we can to support reform movements and to bolster civil society in developing countries. We should also try to find a way—whichever party is in office—of using the talents of senior former parliamentarians. I have often floated the idea that we should establish a panel of ex-parliamentarians with an interest in international development, who are willing to make available their talents, campaigning skills and use of advocacy to assist freedom-loving opposition forces faced with bestial Governments, to try to propel those opposition forces into a stronger position than they inhabit at present.

I think that I can make that point without being accused of indulging in any special pleading or self-interest. I certainly do not have myself in mind for any such role, partly because, like the hon. Member for Putney, I am seeking re-election, and partly for the relevant reason that I am too young and cannot possibly afford to retire. I certainly do not envisage a role for myself in that context. I have in mind great parliamentarians from all parties, ranging from the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie and the former Member for Chesterfield, Tony Benn, to people from my party who have left the service of the House and have an interest in international development. Together, such people could bring considerable skill to bear on the problems faced by opposition forces in developing countries.

I am sceptical about the African peer review mechanism, but one does not want to damn it completely. I can see that an argument can be made that it is at least a start, but it struck me, and I think it struck others, on a recent visit to South Africa by the International Development Committee, that the fatal flaw of the peer review mechanism is its voluntary character. Some 20 countries have been put forward for review, and it is heartening to hear that there will shortly be a report on Ghana. Is it not, however, a damning indictment of the mechanism that the countries that most need its scrutiny will not be subjected to it, because they will not consent to be candidates? There is the absurd situation in which Ghana is reviewed and examined, but Sudan and Zimbabwe are not. Surely we can find a better way to address the issue.

On conflict, the Minister will not be surprised to know that although I greatly respect him, I do not much like the balance of his remarks on Darfur. I have always felt that he errs on the side of suggesting at least a broad moral equivalence between the two sides of the conflict. If the Minister tells me that that is unfair to him—

Mr. Mullin: It is unfair to me.

Mr. Bercow: I am sorry that the Minister says that it is unfair to him, but I have to judge in the round and too often I have heard him saying, "On one hand—and on the other hand," and continually drawing attention to breaches by the rebel forces. However, the rebels are simply not starting from the same position as the Government forces. My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury powerfully enunciated the argument earlier. The rebels do not have helicopter gunships and Antonov planes at their disposal, and they do not have the allied forces of the Janjaweed militia to do some of their dirty work. Pincer movements take place on a regular basis between the Government forces on the one hand and the Janjaweed militia on the other. The rebel forces' violence is to be deprecated, but it comes from a much lower base and it is obscene that the Government of Sudan are not subject to an arms embargo. The arms embargo impacts only on the rebels, and damagingly so.

The people of Darfur have suffered too much for too long and too little has been done about it. In that context, I would like greater clarity at the heart of Government on securing peace. I am concerned that the terms peacekeeping and peace enforcement are used as though they were interchangeable; they are not. There can be a peacekeeping force only if there is a peace agreement to enforce. At the moment in Darfur, none such exists. There has been a rather tenuous ceasefire, but there is not a peace agreement, so the concept of peacekeeping is not appropriate. What is required is a peace-enforcement mandate and an African Union force that is sufficient in terms of numbers of troops and logistical capacity to ensure that the peace sticks. There is not yet sufficient focus within the Government on that important requirement, and that needs to change.

Other hon. Members want to speak, so I shall finish with an observation about human rights in Africa. The hon. Members for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) and for City of York took part in a debate that I initiated on the reform of the United Nations on 19 January. I remember the date for the good and personal reason that it was my birthday. Among other things, I focused in that debate on the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, which has become an abysmal laughing stock.

In what was otherwise a thoughtful and interesting report by the UN high-level panel on reform of the United Nations system, I was disappointed by the floated suggestion that membership of the commission should perhaps be made universal: everyone would be allowed to be a member. That seemed to be ducking the issue. There is an important challenge: membership of a human rights body within the UN should be determined not on the basis of automaticity, or on the strength of geography, but as a result of behaviour. Countries that behave properly should qualify for membership. If the most bestial oppressors are represented on a human rights body, their main goal will be to criticise others and to protect themselves from criticism. That is not acceptable.

[Mr. Bercow]

I welcome instead the United Nations Secretary-General's suggestion that what should be established is a smaller and leaner human rights council, perhaps as a principal organ of the United Nations. We must improve governance and expose human rights abuses and ensure that developing countries, with assistance from us as necessary, respect the human rights of their citizens and observe democratic values. That is right in itself and crucial to the long-term and sustainable development that all hon. Members present want.

4.49 pm

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I shall restrict myself to 10 minutes so that the Chair of the Select Committee and my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) can speak before the Minister replies.

I welcome the debate. I also welcome a great deal of the Commission for Africa's report. Its analysis is interesting and I am disappointed that the media have not picked it up in more detail since its publication about a week ago. The general, fairly obsessive response was that the situation is all down to governance in Africa. That is certainly one aspect, but not the only one.

It is important when taking part in any debate on Africa to have some understanding of the history of the continent—I intervened on the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman on that point. Africa has given the world a great deal of wealth and knowledge. Indeed, all human activity probably descends from the Rift valley in Africa. We should have some regard to the fact that African civilisations were there long before the Europeans arrived, and that the impact of Europeans on Africa has been one of brutality, with the slave trade, colonialism and the distortion of all the indigenous economies and agricultural systems that were there.

I shall not talk at great length about African history or anthropology; I am not qualified to do that, but I think that we should have some respect for the history of the place with which we are dealing. Too often, when dealing with anything to do with Africa, there is the western arrogance that it is up to us to sort it out, when really it is up to us to repair our relationships with Africa and to put them on a fair and equitable footing. We should not act as colonial or neo-colonial masters, and I see that the Minister agrees. That is promising, indeed.

Mr. Mullin: Do not hold your breath.

Jeremy Corbyn: That is all right.

The issues facing African people are enormous. I shall not quote all the figures because that would take too long, but the stark reality is that there is an enormous infant mortality rate. I find it frightening that several million children a year could probably be saved by the expenditure of no more than $1 a head on anti-malarial drugs and other basic medicines. In a world in which education and the development of the whole person is so important, as many as 40 million African children are without adequate schooling or, in some cases, have no school whatever to attend. Illiteracy rates are not falling; indeed, they are probably rising in a considerable number of African countries.

I do not excuse the corruption, bad governance or inefficiency of the Governments of Africa, but one must look at the big picture, which is that Africa had no control in the 1960s, 1970s or 1980s over the price it paid for the oil that most countries had to import. There are not many oil-producing countries in Africa. The vast increase in oil prices in the 1970s had a big effect on all African economies, most of which had had a period of sustained growth since independence, which collapsed in the 1970s. Then in the late 1970s and 1980s, the collapse of commodity prices—cotton prices went down 70 per cent., cocoa prices 80 per cent. and coffee prices 70-odd per cent.—meant that every African country was faced with the loss of income from its primary exports and had to pay a great deal more to import basic requirements such as oil and manufactured goods. It is hardly surprising that a debt crisis ensued.

I absolutely support the campaign for a programme of complete debt write-off for sub-Saharan Africa, but one must be cautious of two things. First, unless we consider the conditions under which the debt was engaged, it will simply come back in five, 10 or 15 years. Secondly, we must consider whose debt we are writing off; we will subsidise some people who have a lot of ill-gotten gains. Debt write-off must be more targeted and scientific. I know that that is used as a headline feature, but one must consider it carefully.

I could talk about a lot of individual countries and issues, but there is not time for that, so I shall be brief because I want the Minister either to reply or, in the immortal words of all Ministers, to "write to the hon. Member at some point in the near future". That will keep him busy over Easter.

As the Minister knows, I had the good fortune to go on an Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation to Angola last year, which was a salutary and fascinating experience. The country has been through 30 years of war, with 4 million people—more than a quarter of the population—displaced. It has low life expectancy, high infant mortality, and an education system that can barely cope. I met teachers who worked three shifts a day in primary schools to try to provide some kind of basic education. I absolutely admire those teachers, especially if one thinks of our own primary schools and education system. Pupils there get three hours a day in a bookless school without desks or chairs, and that is the sum total of their education. It is surprising that those kids manage to learn anything at all, and it is a tribute to their teachers that they do. We must be realistic.

I welcome and support a lot of what is going on in Rwanda, and endorse the DFID Rwanda urban poverty programme, which I hope the Minister can assure me will continue. Although Angola will be a wealthy country in future, I hope that the current discussions about restructuring its finances are going well. I should like to hear from the Government that they will stay with Angola and support it in its development, so that it ends up with great improvements in future.

I shall be brief, because there is no particular order to my points. The great lakes region of Africa has seen death rates and genocide about which we could only have nightmares. Three million people have died in the recent war in Congo, and about 1 million died in the genocide in Rwanda. Others died in Burundi and neighbouring regions. It is an horrific situation, by any stretch of the imagination. Although some of the grist to the mill—the fuel for the war—is the world's thirst for oil, manganese, gold, tin, copper and the coltan for mobile phones, the corruption that goes with those interests leads to the support of rebel armies and militias. It is a very dangerous situation.

We should also be aware that all the countries neighbouring Demoractic Republic of the Congo have, at various times, happily sent large numbers of forces into Congo, and we must consider the trading arrangements of those countries. They have no gold, coltan, tin or other minerals, but they export those materials. We must therefore ask questions about how they get out of Congo, and who benefits from the ghastly war that is going on in eastern Congo.

I was in Rwanda with Peace Brigades International last month, and talked to civil society representatives. I admire them and support what they are doing. I feel for the people, and the genocide that they have suffered. I admire the size of the DFID aid programme for Rwanda, and the commitment towards its redevelopment. I intervened on the Minister earlier, and say to him again that we should be slightly cautious about giving large amounts of budgetary aid, rather than programme aid. We must ask how much of such budgetary aid might end up being spent on arms, and foreign wars and adventures such as the ghastly conflict in eastern Congo. I know that my hon. Friend probably agrees with me on that, but I want to emphasise the point.

The other country that I want to mention is Uganda, which is part of the great lakes region. Uganda has been a byword for genocide since Idi Amin, and the west often looked away when he was doing the most disgraceful things in Uganda. He went, after the Tanzanian intervention, and there was a brief period of elected Government under Milton Obote, but since then, there has been a long period of rule by President Museveni. He is a popular figure, whom all the international financial institutions appear to love. Everybody appears to love him, and says that everything is going well in Uganda.

I have had discussions with people from Uganda, and have been reading the Human Rights Watch report on the situation there. It is concerned about a number of things, particularly the 2002 anti-terrorist Act, which allows the state to define terrorists as "opponents of the state". On that basis, considerable numbers of people have been detained or treated very badly. They should not be in that position. The President proudly claims that in the last 10 years, 2 million fighters have been trained in a country that is not that big.

I again raise the question of the very large amount of budgetary assistance that we give to Uganda. I have no problem with support for health, education, housing, social progress, employment or training—none of us would have problems with that, because that is surely what DFID and international development is all about. However, I do have a problem with that money being used to purchase arms from this country or from anywhere else, which are then used in internal control, internal oppression or in adventures elsewhere.

In this debate on Africa, we must be aware of what history has done to Africa, and what we can do to try to assist at present. One obvious step is to write off debt, and another other is for there to be a very large increase in aid for Africa. However, I want to make one further and final point. Unless we go down the road of trade justice with the farmers and producers of Africa, all the problems that exist now will continue to exist. If it is completely untenable for those farmers to produce coffee, cocoa or sustainable foods locally because either food from the United States is dumped on the market—which is actually a subsidy to US farmers—or people cannot buy any processed goods from Africa because they are too expensive due to the trade barriers, we will continue to consign poor people in Africa to a life of poverty. Moreover, instead of living in rural poverty, they will live in shanty-town poverty, with all the violence, corruption, drugs and everything else that that such a society breeds.

We have a big responsibility for what happened in Africa in the past, but I do not condone any of the corruption that occurs. The current emphasis on Africa is wholly welcome; perhaps it will be the beginning of a corner being turned and things will start to improve for the poor people of Africa.

5.1 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) was kind enough to make reference to my chairmanship of the International Development Committee, and I would like to take the opportunity to thank him, the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington), my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) and the other six members of the Committee for all their phenomenally hard work during this Parliament. I hope that we have done our duty by the House and produced reports of some intellectual rigour. I warn the Minister that our report on Darfur—a unanimous report—will be published this Wednesday and that it will make sobering reading.

Today, like yesterday and tomorrow, 8,000 people in Africa will die from HIV/AIDS, 7,000 people in Africa will die of hunger, and 6,000 children will die from water-borne diseases. Their lives will be lost today, and similar lives will be lost tomorrow. Our television and newspapers try to report the immediacy of big events, but it is far harder to describe and communicate the persistent, unremitting daily grind of the raw, chronic poverty that one sees in Africa.

Some 20 years ago, shortly after being elected to the House, I went to Ethiopia, along with the hon. Members for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett) and for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood). We were a small all-party team that was got together by Oxfam, concerned that the world was not taking sufficiently seriously the famine of biblical proportions that was then raging in northern Ethiopia.

[Tony Baldry]

In this Parliament, 20 years later, I returned to Ethiopia twice—once with the International Development Committee and once with the British Red Cross on a trek across the Simian mountains to raise money for the Ethiopian Red Cross and to help fund water-borne projects for schools. In some ways the country has greatly improved. Mengistu and his thugs have gone and Prime Minister Meles is trying hard to deliver. However, there are still the same grinding poverty, huge numbers of children not in school, rapidly increasing infection rates of HIV/AIDS—thins disease—and farmers desperately trying to eke a living from ever-poorer soil and coffee prices that are decimated.

The original Commission for Africa report is a somewhat shiny book. I submit that it is our collective responsibility to seek to translate its conclusions into a glowing reality. At the core of the report is the concept of "obuntu"—of our interconnectedness each with each other and nation with nation. In response to the tsunami disaster, the people of Britain clearly demonstrated their sense of that interconnectedness. Every year, the thousands who help organise events for Comic Relief, which this year raised some £70 million, show their commitment to others.

Following the commission's report, no one can feign ignorance of the full facts. The analysis, statistics, shortcomings and needs are all there. There is page after page of analysis. Africa does not need any more analysis; it needs action. To act is our clear moral duty, and not to act would be intolerable. For far too long the symbol of Africa has been an African child dying on our television screens. The needs are undisputed. As the report says:

"What Africa requires is clear. It needs better governance and the building of the capacity of African states to deliver. It needs peace. It needs political and economic stability to create a climate for growth—and a growth in which poor people can participate. It needs investment in infrastructure and in the health and education systems which will produce a healthy and skilled workforce as well as a happy and fulfilled people. It needs to trade more, and on fairer terms than the rich world has allowed to date. It needs more debt-relief. It needs aid of a better quality than at present. And it needs a doubling of aid to pay for this."

The report also makes it clear that there can be no more piecemeal approaches to Africa. It is clear that Africa needs the lot now—on debt, trade and aid. If it does not get that, it will be a disaster. The report puts it rather more elegantly:

"The actions proposed by the Commission constitute a coherent package for Africa. The problems they address are interlocking. They are vicious circles which reinforce one another. They must be tackled together. To do that Africa requires a comprehensive 'big push' on many fronts at once. Partners must work together to implement this package with commitment, perseverance and speed, each focusing on how they can make the most effective contribution."

How can people born in debt die owing more than on the day that they were born? For poor countries in sub-Saharan Africa, the objective must be 100 per cent. debt cancellation as soon as possible. A pathetic 2 per cent. of world trade emerges from Africa. What Africans need is the power to decide and an end to dumping. They need an end to export subsidies by 2010 to be agreed by the WTO at the meeting in Hong Kong later this year and an immediate end to cotton and sugar export subsidies. We need common agricultural policy reform in all that is just. The Commission for Africa observes:

"Agriculture is the activity from which the vast majority of the poorest Africans make their living; by contrast agriculture is not of great economic importance to most developed countries, accounting for a few per cent of national incomes, or less. Yet the agricultural sectors of many G8 and EU countries are the most heavily subsidised and protected in the economies of the industrialised world. Rich countries spend around US$350 billion a year on agricultural protection and subsidies—which is 16 times their aid to Africa. The European Union is responsible for 35 per cent of this, the United States for 27 per cent. and Japan for 22 per cent.

These policies have a harmful effect in both the poor and rich worlds. Taxpayers and consumers pay heavily to support their farmers—though, ironically, it is not small farmers in the EU and US who benefit: they get only four per cent of the subsidy, with more than 70 per cent going to the 25 per cent richest farmers, landowners and agribusiness companies. The result is that the EU subsidises sugar beet at such high levels that it is grown in Europe in places where it is economically irrational and inefficient to do so. And in the US subsidies to just 25,000 US farmers, who are paid twice the world market price for cotton, threaten the livelihoods of more than 10 million people in West Africa who produce the crop for a third of the price."

Can that situation be right?

We should extend the "everything but arms"-type access to all low-income African countries, and there should be greater regional integration. Europe should take the lead on that. I am glad to say that, at a conference held in the Guildhall last week, the Trade Commissioner, Peter Mandelson, said that Europe should start taking the lead. On the international finance facility, he said:

"If the United States, Japan and others do not want to take part in the International Finance Facility, I hope Europe will take a lead".

I also hope that Europe will take a lead, but I also hope that Europe will take a lead in trade reform.

That leads on to volumes of aid. The reality is that the most vulnerable and poorest receive the least help on the planet: $25 million, which is the proposed increase in aid from the world's seven richest countries, equates to 0.01 per cent. of our GDP. For any citizen of the G7, that is the equivalent of paying for half a stick of chewing gum a day. That is hardly a great sacrifice, particularly when we remember that every cow in Europe receives twice as much in daily subsidies as the overwhelming majority of people in Africa live on each day.

Of course improving governance and enhancing capacity is crucial. As the report observes:

"The issue of good governance and capacity-building is what we believe lies at the core of all of Africa's problems. Until that is in place Africa will be doomed to continue its economic stagnation."

The report has to be translated into action at the G8, however. It will be no good if we just receive a motherhood and apple pie communiqué from the G8 at Gleneagles. Between now and then, it behoves us all to use whatever contacts we have with other G8 countries to generate momentum behind the will to put the commission's proposals into action.

I make my final point, so that the hon. Member for City of York has ample time to get in. What we have seen from the US recently, with its proposal for the World Bank, does not encourage me. I draw hon. Members' attention to an answer that the Committee received from DFID last November:

"The UK considers it important that any new World Bank President should have a strong background in development issues and command respect and support from the membership. The UK favours a more open and consultative process than has occurred in the past for the selection of the President, whereby Bank membership are consulted on possible candidates with the Board the making final decision."

We would all say hallelujah to that. It behoves the US and other G8 members to see that they too enjoy some interconnectedness with the rest of the world. We should all play as one team, rather than having one country seeking to impose its agenda on the rest.

5.12 pm

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Africa's destiny lies in the hands of Africans, especially African leaders. If they do not end corruption, deal with conflict in their continent and establish better standards of governance, Africa's development will continue to falter. However, if African leaders rise to that challenge, as some most certainly are doing, it will be essential that the west works with them, so that they can deliver the development that their countries so desperately need.

We have heard a number of good speeches this afternoon about the policy issues. However, I should like to pick up where the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) left off and talk not about policy, but about the process. I want to talk about what we do as politicians between now and the summer to try to ensure that the G8 and, later in the year, the EU under the UK presidency deliver by way of commitments from rich world Governments as much as possible on the excellent policies outlined in the Commission for Africa's report.

When the Prime Minister launched the report at the British Museum on 11 March, he was asked by Mike Wooldridge from the BBC whether the Government would implement all its recommendations. Journalists are a fairly cynical bunch, especially about our Prime Minister, but many of them were taken aback by the simplicity and clarity of his answer. He replied with one word, "Yes". Yes, Britain would implement all the recommendations in the Commission for Africa's report.

That commitment from our Prime Minister simplifies the political challenge that we face. We have a commitment that our Government are behind the commission's recommendations. The challenge that we face is to move public opinion, politicians' opinions in other G8 and EU states and the opinions of the leaders of Government in those counties behind the report's recommendations.

As chair of the all-party Africa group I suggested in February to my colleagues who chair and lead a number of international committees in Parliament—including the hon. Member for Banbury, who chairs the International Development Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington), who chairs the all-party overseas development group, my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd), who chairs our delegation to the Council of Europe, my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall), who chairs the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association UK branch and a number of others—to write to the Prime Minister to set out what we believed the UK Government should commit to in response to the Commission for Africa's report.

I have circulated the letter to a number of friends in Parliaments in other countries. I know that a number of my co-signatories have done the same. I have had an encouraging response. Charles Rangel, a leading member of the US Congress, a veteran representing Harlem in New York state and leader of a black caucus, has written back in supportive terms. André Rouvière, a French Socialist, and Jérôme Rivière, a French deputé from President Chirac's party, are both keen to work on the agenda, as is Axel Berg, a Social Democrat in the German Bundestag.

I have raised the commission's work at meetings of Socialist International, the Parliamentary Network on the World Bank and the NATO Parliamentary Assembly. One of the commissioners, Tidjane Thiam, came along to speak to the NATO Parliamentary Assembly about the commission's work. I raised it also at the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe Parliamentary Assembly.

Politicians in other G8 and EU countries are now beginning to cotton on that Britain is absolutely serious about making Africa the foreign policy priority during the G8 and EU presidencies. Between now and the summer, all of us—the Minister, the Government, we politicians and our colleagues in other Parliaments—need to continue to work to seek to tease out from other rich world Governments how they will respond to the commission's proposals.

France is generally supportive. It is increasing its aid and backed the UK proposal for an international finance facility. It has floated some proposals for innovative financing mechanisms for development, such as a levy on airline fuel. We need to reciprocate and look seriously at that proposal. It has the merit of being reciprocal; if two countries agree to it, planes that fly from one country to another also fly on the return route, and the burden would be shared equally by countries that were to agree to such a proposal. We need to move France on the subject of trade policy, particularly trade in agriculture.

Germany is not so strongly on board on the Africa agenda. It has concerns about the cost of increasing aid. Chancellor Schröder, for the first time, made some important commitments about supporting the international finance facility in his speech in Davos. We should build on that. Germany is probably the key to shifting France on trade policy and the common agricultural policy. Italy is a poor aid donor, and is not committed to meeting the EU target of 0.3 per cent. of GNI by 2006. However, the Italians are enthusiastic Europeans, and we ought to set the European Commission to work on them, and they do support us on the international finance facility.

In President Bush's first term, the United States agreed a large increase in aid. As the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) said, there is a big problem in how it is directing that aid through the millennium challenge fund, which offers a bilateral approach to aid.

[Hugh Bayley]

There needs to be more multilateral co-operation with the United States, as well as trade reform on cotton and agriculture more generally.

Like France, Canada is supportive in principle of the international finance facility, and a strong supporter of 100 per cent. multilateral debt relief; it said so at the G7 Finance Ministers' meeting. It is committed to doubling its aid by 2010; although, I have to say, from a low base. There is a problem in that it says that the 0.7 per cent. UN target is a pipedream; pressure needs to be applied on that.

Unfortunately, although Japan is a big aid donor, it does not see Africa as a priority. Only 8.6 per cent. of its official development assistance goes to Africa, and its overall aid budget is declining. However, it has an interesting proposal for a new fund at the African Development Bank to support self-sufficiency in agriculture. We also need to have conversations with Japan about trade in agriculture, and the reduction of food subsidies.

Russia is not a major donor, but it will chair the G8 meeting next year, and we need to talk to it about how its agenda will address Africa, so that the decisions made this year are followed up. I do not have time to talk about our presidency of the EU, but I will say that we need to work in a similar way with the European Commission and individual member states.

Let me finish by saying that if the UK is going to be persuasive, we need to show that we are implementing the policies that we are proposing, and which we are urging on others. I was therefore pleased by the Prime Minister's unambiguous statement at the launch of the commission. Earlier this year, the all-party group on Africa wrote to all Cabinet Ministers to ask what their Departments were contributing to the Government's overall strategy on Africa in 2005. We received a lot of very detailed and informative replies, which we will publish in full. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office will, of course, be heavily involved, as will DFID; but, interestingly, so, too, will many Departments that one would not necessarily think would have a clear and strong interest in Africa.

The Department for Culture, Media and Sport sponsors important research through the Natural History museum with partners in Africa on the disease vectors for river blindness, bilharzia, malaria and other tropical diseases. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is doing important work on illegal logging and supports the renewable energy and energy efficiency partnership, which was set up after the Johannesburg sustainable development summit in 2002. The Ministry of Defence supports a number of peace-training operations in Kenya and Ghana.

I thank each of the Secretaries of State for giving time to provide a full account of the work of their Departments. What we learned overall is that UK policy is more joined up than I had expected. I would like to thank the Prime Minister's foreign policy adviser, Sir Nigel Sheinwald, for explaining how officials and Ministers work together on a cross-departmental basis. There is a high degree of co-ordination in the three priority areas of trade, aid and debt, but there are still problems in some areas, particularly corruption and financial crime, and unemployment of health professionals, which we will highlight when we publish our report after Easter.

A number of African development plans have been launched to the sound of trumpets and with great optimism, but they have failed. They failed in part because of failures of leadership in Africa, but also because of a loss of concentration by the west. If the Commission for Africa is to deliver real change for the continent, we must maintain our concentration over the coming decade, so that we can ensure that what is recommended is delivered.

5.24 pm

Mr. Mullin: We have had a good debate, which has been enriched by the fact that just about everybody present has personal experience of Africa and a long-term commitment to Africa and African issues.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) and my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) who are departing this place for another life in the near future. Both of them, but especially my hon. Friend, have taken a long-term interest in international development. They will both be missed. I wish them well in their next incarnation.

I especially welcome the commitment from the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) that a future Tory Government would sign up to increasing our overseas aid to 0.7 per cent. of GNP. It always warms my heart to hear Conservative spokesmen promising to increase public spending. We are grateful to hear that there is consensus on that most important issue.

I welcome the almost wholly positive comments about the report from the Commission for Africa. Everybody understands that there is more to reports than just the words on the paper: there has to be a connection between words and action, and those hon. Members who made that point were right to do so.

Obviously, we have taken the initiative, but we are not acting entirely on our own, and we have to take others with us. In our different ways, we have to do everything that we can to galvanise our partners in the EU and especially the United States to ensure that there is delivery. That is also true of our partners in Africa, who have a big part to play.

I shall draw all the comments that have been made about the work of the commission to its attention, and particularly the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Colman), who said that insufficient attention had been given to the potential role of the private sector.

I may have misunderstood him, but I think that the hon. Member for Eastleigh said that there would be only two secretariat staff—

Mr. Chidgey: Two leading members of the secretariat.

Mr. Mullin: In fact, there are 20 staff, and the commissioners, too, will be vigorously promoting the report. The hon. Gentleman may rest assured that they will not all fold up their deckchairs and go home.

The hon. Gentleman implied that we were selling a lot of arms to Africa; we are not. All arms sales are strictly regulated. I am sorry to say that most of the arms in Africa come from the ex-Soviet bloc countries, and efforts are being made to reduce the number. Such British arms sales as there are tend to involve equipment for United Nations peacekeeping missions and the like. On money laundering, the hon. Gentleman was right to say that we must be more proactive than we have been. I certainly accept that, and so we will.

On Darfur, the difference between us is not as great as one might imagine. I accept that what has happened is overwhelmingly the responsibility of the Government of Sudan—a point that we have repeatedly made clear to them. However, I repeat that there are two parties to the dispute. It was the rebel attack on Al Fashir in April 2003 that triggered the latest catastrophe. The rebels—in recent months, although not before—have been the main offenders in keeping the conflict boiling. They have not been negotiating seriously at Abuja. When I saw them the other day—they may be the same people whom hon. Members met—we impressed on them the need to negotiate seriously.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) mentioned budgetary support for Rwanda and Uganda, and we certainly make large contributions to both. He said that we had to watch carefully to ensure that money was not misused for military spending and on military adventures in the Congo. I can assure him that we take a close interest in the military spending of both countries and we have, on occasion, withheld or delayed payments to underline the point.

As I said in my opening remarks, we have a good story to tell. We have commitment at the highest level from the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We shall ensure that Africa and African issues remain high on the agenda of the EU and of the G8 during our presidency.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 5 April 2005

[SIR NICHOLAS WINTERTON in the Chair]

Door Supervisors

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watson.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): The first debate in Westminster Hall on this, the last Tuesday of this Parliament—perhaps I am anticipating it, but I think not—is on the registration of door supervisors, initiated by the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley).

9.30 am

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): It is a pleasure to speak on such an important issue, and I hope that the debate gets the national publicity that it deserves—although, as you said in your opening remarks, Mr. Deputy Speaker, it could well be overshadowed by other events. None the less, it is an important issue and I am grateful for the opportunity to raise it.

The debate is about the registration of door supervisors, but it would be more apt to say that it is about the lack of registration of door supervisors, because that is the crux of the problem. For a number of reasons, which I shall detail in a moment, not enough individuals are coming forward to register as door supervisors.

Under the Private Security Industry Act 2001, door supervisors need a licence—what those in the industry call a badge. All sectors of the leisure industry welcomed the Act; indeed, many of the companies in the industry helped draft it. It was a welcome piece of legislation, and its purpose was obvious—to improve the calibre and quality of door supervisors, to provide them with training, and to improve the industry. Unfortunately, the Act is not working. Not all door supervisors are registering for a licence, and those who do apply are having to wait due to delays at the Security Industry Authority.

The SIA was set up to implement the legislation and to oversee the registration of door supervisors. However, the SIA and the police have taken the attitude that their patience is exhausted at the lack of people coming forward, and rather than look for solutions they seem intent on bringing prosecutions. That will make the situation worse because those door supervisors who are prosecuted will be precluded from holding a certificate for between two and five years. The shortage will thus become worse.

The Government now face a difficult situation. Fewer than 20,000 doorkeepers have been certificated and licensed, but the Government are now implementing the Licensing Act 2003. As a result, every liquor licence in the country is due to be reissued. That comes at a time when the Government are already under pressure in respect of binge drinking. To allow a situation to arise in which pubs and clubs will be unable to find door supervisors is a recipe for chaos. It will cause problems later this year; indeed, we are already hearing of shortages and their attendant problems.

It is not a new problem. The issue has been flagged up practically since the 2001 Act was passed and its implementation dates announced. Although the closing date for the London area is 11 April—to some extent, that has always been regarded as the deadline for implementing the whole Act—the Act was in force for the best part of last year, and the first area to comply was Hampshire and the Isle of Wight. So prosecutions have been available to the police for the past 12 months, and the problems have been well documented and are well known; the Government and the SIA have known of them for two years. The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) raised the issue in an Adjournment debate in the House in June 2004. He referred to the problems being experienced in the pilot area of Hampshire and the Isle of Wight, and I shall refer to the same problems.

Recently, a leisure company called Luminar supplied me with a file of correspondence that had passed between it and the SIA. It was a substantial volume of correspondence, which dated from 2003 and detailed all the issues to which I shall refer, including delays and the problems that we are storing up for later this year caused by the lack of door supervisors. Indeed, The Publican Newspaper—the trade paper for the pub and club industry—has been running a series of articles for some time highlighting the problems that we face.

What are those problems? Why and how are they occurring? As of 10 February, the SIA had received 21,957 applications to register as a door supervisor. Of those, 17,035 were accepted as valid, 10,124 were granted and 872 were refused. The registration process started in March 2004, but only 10,000 certificates had been granted by 10 February. That is less than one doorman per nightclub, leaving aside pubs, restaurants or anything else. That is the extent of the shortfall.

Why are delays occurring? Why are door supervisors not coming forward to register? There have been many allegations that the SIA has caused delays, and, to some extent, that is true. There have been delays in issuing the certificates, or badges, as they are known in the industry. The SIA has always maintained that the average time needed to obtain a certificate is between four and six weeks. Obviously, to make the legislation work, there must be identity and criminal record checks. In reality, however, issuing a certificate can take anything between three and five months.

Let me give an example. Since this debate was publicised, a Hertfordshire company known as Bradzone contacted me to tell me about its problems. It tried to help its door supervisors to complete their application forms, which were submitted to the SIA by mid-January. The company informed me last Friday that, in the vast majority of cases, it was still waiting for the certificates to be issued three months later.

There is a great deal of bureaucracy involved in applying for a certificate. The initial inquiry must be made by the applicant. Many door supervisors are employed by security companies, but companies are not allowed to assist them in completing or obtaining the forms; individuals must obtain the forms themselves, fill them in and send them off. They can obtain a form by visiting the website or using the telephone line. Quite often, however, the line is busy and there is no facility to leave a message. The individual is simply put off. So it is difficult to obtain the forms in the first place.

[Mr. Eric Illsley]

There are also several stories of forms issued to and completed by individuals, and returned for relatively minor mistakes or, more likely, omissions. Some stories are legendary.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight referred in an Adjournment debate to a doorkeeper who told him that one of his staff had supplied a passport, a plastic and paper driving licence, a birth certificate and two household bills. His form was returned, marked "insufficient identity". Doorkeepers and the leisure industry feel increasingly frustrated by the bureaucracy of the SIA.

Another story, which is passing into folklore, is of forms being returned because the abbreviation "UK" has been used on the form instead of "United Kingdom". Petty bureaucracy does appear to be involved in the completion of the form.

The procedure is complex. The application form supplied by the SIA informs the individual that they must apply for a licence application form and booklet, complete the form, send the money and so on. It also says that the licence application form is returned to the individual part-completed. I have in my hand an application that was returned to an individual, but the only thing that has been completed is his name. Why the SIA cannot allow the individual to complete his own name on the application form is beyond me. Why can it not allow the forms to be issued in bundles or batches to door supervisory companies so that they can supply them to individuals to send back? I do not understand why the SIA insists on this part-completion, as they call it, of the form.

It is not the easiest form to complete. It is the first form that I have ever seen that asks an individual to supply his surname in four separate sections: surname, family name at birth, any other surname used, alias surname and alias given name. It is quite a complex form, which takes some understanding. I should say that the forms are intended for doorkeepers, who used to be known as bouncers. We are not giving them to Cambridge undergraduates. The nature of the industry does not lend itself to complex bureaucracy. The legislation is designed to improve the quality of our door supervisors, but we must address the bureaucracy of the system because it is discouraging people from applying.

There is also the question of cost. There is a fee of £190, which is non-refundable, to apply for a certificate. That is after an individual has completed his training course, which can cost up to £400. Altogether, the whole process costs at least £400 or £500. Again, that is for door supervisors, who probably work part-time and whose main hours of work will probably be on Friday, Saturday and Sunday nights. They will probably earn about £10 an hour, so the procedure is not cheap. This can be a disincentive to some doorkeepers, especially at a time of relatively full employment when they can seek work elsewhere.

According to the booklet, doorkeepers are disbarred from registration if they have convictions and cautions, but they can also be precluded from applying for a certificate if they have been warned about an incident or offence. The disqualifications and bureaucratic procedures have put off many doorkeepers, who probably thought from the outset that there was not much point in applying for a certificate. If they were convicted of affray or actual bodily harm years ago because of a scrap outside a nightclub when they were protecting the doors, they may think that there is no point in applying. We must consider the issue in the light of the fact that we are trying to improve the employment situation of doorkeepers.

The SIA could remove some of the bureaucracy and improve its functioning, but it is not responsible for all the delays. I referred earlier to the delays that are caused by the doorkeepers. By delays, I also mean their reluctance to apply. There is some debate as to whether enforcement of the Act will encourage doorkeepers to come forward to register or whether it will have the reverse effect. I am sure that some in the SIA, the Government and the industry believe that there will be a flood of applications once we reach the final deadline and prosecutions begin. My view is the opposite; prosecutions will discourage doorkeepers.

The industry estimates that it needs 100,000 doorkeepers to maintain the doors of clubs, pubs and other facilities throughout the country. The SIA estimates that 50,000 are needed. There is a huge discrepancy between those figures. In a June 2004 Adjournment debate, the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety referred to a requirement for 95,000. Even if we split the difference and say that 70,000 doorkeepers are required, we are more than 40,000 short at present.

After three years of the Act, which came into force in 2001 with all the attendant publicity, doorkeepers have not come forward to register. Applications have been invited in the first area since March 2004. Twelve months on, the SIA and the police have expressed to MPs in a recent meeting their impatience with the situation. Prosecutions have been occurring, but doorkeepers are still reluctant to apply.

There is a theory that doormen are waiting for enforcement before applying. I am not sure that that theory works. I cannot see the point in a doorman waiting to be prosecuted for not having a badge, knowing full well that such prosecution would preclude him from obtaining one. Doormen are not waiting for prosecutions before they come forward to register. Instead, perhaps they are being deterred for the reasons that I referred to earlier. As I said, some doormen who already have minor convictions may think that they will be precluded from obtaining a certificate and so do not apply. I also referred to the red tape and complications involved in filling in the form, and the cost.

Complaints have been made by doorkeepers about their pay. Perhaps they are waiting for a crisis in the door supervisor industry that will force pay up from the present levels. That may prove to be a problem. The leisure industry will be chasing a scarce commodity, and doormen who have the necessary certification will increase their charges unless the situation is remedied. The consumer will carry the can for that in higher door admission charges and drinks prices. I had a meeting last week with the director of a company that supplies door supervisors. He said, "We are sitting back. Later this year, we will make a killing, as our door supervisors are badged and ready to move in." That will be an added cost to the industry. The nature of the employment is that it is casual and relatively dangerous compared to some. Legislation also requires a doorkeeper to wear a badge; once he is certificated, that is a condition of keeping the certificate. In some of the more dangerous areas, the idea of wearing a badge and turning away unruly or armed youths is not exactly an inviting prospect for some door supervisors, who do not want the people whom they turn away to be able to identify them. That is another reason for doorkeepers' reluctance in coming forward.

So, for all the reasons that I have outlined, there is a huge shortfall. At the moment, it is roughly a 40,000 shortfall, on best estimates, and that is a big problem. The attitude of the SIA and the police has so far not been helpful, in my view. In the Adjournment debate last June, the hon. Member for Isle of Wight said:

"I have received the impression of arrogant, uncaring and out-of-touch officials in the SIA who are either ignoring advice or have been told to drive a policy through, regardless of the consequences."—[Official Report, 16 June 2004; Vol. 422, c. 885.]

Even in the middle of last year, the SIA's attitude was brought into question, but that is exactly its attitude at present.

On 3 March in the House we had a lively meeting, organised by the parliamentary beer club, with representatives of the SIA, the leisure industry and some security companies. It seemed to me that the SIA was convinced that the only way forward was to prosecute those doorkeepers who had not applied for certificates. I believe that that will compound the difficulties. Last Saturday, I had a discussion with the licensing officer for South Yorkshire, who informed me that that weekend South Yorkshire police were going to target the pubs and clubs in Sheffield, Barnsley, Doncaster and Rotherham. In Sheffield they contacted 200 door supervisors to check their credentials—42 were found not to have certificates and will be prosecuted. That is 42 fewer door supervisors just from last weekend.

In Barnsley, the police went to check the door supervisors. After the second had been checked, every other supervisor disappeared. There was not a supervisor on the doors in Barnsley at the time that South Yorkshire police began to mount the checks. That is not unusual. The stories date back to 1993, when every doorkeeper in Newcastle was stood down because of a particularly well-known incident in the industry. The idea of prosecutions will simply drive doorkeepers back underground. We need to look at a different way forward.

One of the things that the SIA does not appear to see is the effect on the leisure industry. The SIA has accused the leisure industry of mismanagement and one thing and another. The leisure industry owns the clubs and the pubs; it is not responsible for the doorkeepers. The doorkeepers and the security aspects are separate from the leisure industry, but it is likely to suffer the consequences.

Every town centre licence in Barnsley has a condition that the premises must employ registered door supervisors. Over this weekend, every licence in the town centre was under threat because the licence conditions could not be met—door supervisors could not be found. The innocent parties—those in the leisure industry—will suffer the consequences of closure, loss of income and everything that goes with that. That is unfair and slightly irresponsible. The SIA and the Government must get together and see whether they can find a way forward, unless they have a secret agenda to use that method as a back-door method of closing pubs and clubs in town centre areas. That is not bad for a Government who texted people at the beginning of the last election campaign, "If you don't give a XXXX for the licensing hours, vote Labour."

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): A very good point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Illsley: I still stand by that. I am a big supporter of the Licensing Act 2003, and I want it to work. I want this legislation to work as well. I very much welcome the decisions taken in the past few days, one of which is to extend the 11 April London deadline for two months. Although that is welcome, it is not enough, and I do not think that it will work. However, more people might come forward, given the publicity that this debate might achieve. The second decision was that an individual who has completed the form, made the payment and gone through the training will not be prosecuted if he is found to be working the doors but has not yet received the badge. That is a welcome move, as is the idea of a provisional certificate. I would like a moratorium on prosecutions; the police should hold back on prosecutions until we can increase the numbers coming forward and address the reluctance of doorkeepers to register. Prosecutions are counterproductive.

We should also reassess the legislation, even though it is late in the day, because it does not appear to be working in respect of wheel clampers and door supervisors. As well as extending the deadline for London, we could extend the deadline for all areas, perhaps giving ourselves until the end of the year to try to improve the number of doorkeepers coming forward. If it does not, the situation could become chaotic, especially in the summer months. The industry has an obligation to discourage cowboys who try to operate with unregistered doorkeepers, and to insist on badged doormen. The problem is that there are not enough of them about. We have to change attitudes. The SIA has to change its attitude and encourage registration. At the moment, all it wants to do is to enforce the legislation, rather than trying to make it work.

I will finish as I started, by saying that to have a shortage of bouncers and doormen at a time when we are being criticised for disorder as a result of binge drinking, and when every licence in the country is up for renewal and possible extension into extra hours, to leave the situation as it is is a recipe for disaster.

9.58 am

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) on having called the debate. The issue of door supervisors is one of enormous importance for my constituents. Soon after I was elected in 1997, I raised it in a private Member's Bill that called for the setting up of a national register of door supervisors, so I was pleased to see that measure incorporated into the Bill that set up the Security Industry Authority.

[Dr. Phyllis Starkey]

I should like to reiterate why the Private Security Industry Act 2001 was needed and why, in general, I still welcome the principle of it. Huge numbers of door supervisors are entirely responsible and do an incredibly important job. However, there were, unfortunately, a great many people in the trade who had a criminal record. Many of them were still involved in criminal activity, particularly in relation to the drug trade—either peddling drugs or simply turning a blind eye to the fact that others were doing so. In some parts of the country violence was a huge problem: door supervisors were assaulting the public rather than protecting them, in some cases causing fatalities and serious injuries.

I was drawn to the issue because my constituency has a young population, and the issue is important to them—not exclusively, because people of all ages like to have a good night out in pubs and clubs, but most of us of more mature years would recognise that young people tend to do that more often. It is enormously important that when young people have a good night out in a pub or a club, they can be confident that they are not going to be put at risk by the door supervisors, who are the very people who are supposed to ensure that the clientele do not put themselves or other people at risk.

So, there is an important principle that relates to all door supervisors. I will just point out that not all door supervisors are men. The increasing number of women door supervisors are making an important contribution to the trade. The Private Security Industry Act 2001 was of enormous importance in ensuring that door supervisors did not have relevant criminal records, had proper training, and were protecting the public and public order in pubs and clubs. That is what the vast majority of responsible door-supervising organisations support and, of course, it is also what the leisure industry as a whole supported, which is why it supported the Act that set up the SIA and why it lobbied for door supervisors to be the first section of the security industry to be covered by the SIA.

I wanted to reiterate those points, but I do concur with many of the points that my hon. Friend made about the difficulties that have occurred in implementation. I hope that the Opposition spokespeople act responsibly, like us, and do not lurch off into all sorts of expositions about how flexible licensing hours will lead to more binge drinking. As the report from the Home Affairs Committee points out today, the way to deal with that is through the planning system, through stopping drinks promotions and through having more—not fewer—registered door supervisors. To a certain extent, flexible licensing hours are a relatively minor part of the scene and it could be said that they will help to improve things in that they will stop what happens at the moment, which is huge numbers of extremely drunk people all turning out of pubs and clubs at the same moment and queueing up for non-existent taxis.

There are serious problems. I will not reiterate the points made by my hon. Friend about the delays in dealing with applications in the SIA or about the shortfall of door supervisors coming forward to be registered, although I will reiterate his point that many door supervisors have other jobs and do door supervising as a top-up on a relatively part-time basis. For those people, finding the money up front to pay for training and registration is not worth their while. It could be argued that, since pubs and clubs have to have registered door supervisors, it is for the trade to find a way round that situation. Clearly, pubs and clubs could give loans to the people who normally work for them to pay for training and then recover that money from their earnings. That is a perfectly reasonable solution. The trade must take some responsibility for helping to see us through the implementation period and for dealing with the fact that, although there are full-time door supervisors, there are many who are part-time, who will not themselves be able to find the money up front.

The points that I want to make that have not been made by my hon. Friend relate to two issues that have been raised with me by the management of clubs in my constituency and by the licensing officer at my local council. They relate to the fact that the SIA does not seem to give enough weight to the practicalities or to the reality of how the leisure industry operates. The first issue relates to the operation of large indoor and outdoor venues—pop concerts and festivals, rather than pubs and clubs. It is difficult to decide exactly who, among the people employed to run such a large indoor or outdoor event, has to be registered with the SIA. The SIA seems to think that it is a simple matter to decide whether staff are concerned with security and need to be registered or are taking the money for tickets and so on, and therefore do not. That does not reflect the reality of how these events are organised. There will be some people who are clearly 100 per cent. concerned with security, and some who are 100 per cent. not concerned with it, but there will be a whole load of people in the middle who are partly concerned with security. There needs to be some clarity and practicality about the way those individuals are licensed.

The second issue concerns the training that the SIA requires. I have been given the strong impression by people in the trade in my constituency that the SIA does not understand the skills required by door supervisors in large pubs and clubs and large pop concert venues, and it does not give enough emphasis to what one might describe as the heavy end of security or the skills required to deal with situations when they start to get—I know no other way to describe it—hairy. It is incredibly important that door supervising staff are able to bring the really difficult situations under control before they get completely out of hand. The SIA seems not to appreciate the need for the training to provide such skills, as well as the other skills covered in the training. Again, that is due to a lack of proper dialogue between the SIA and the trade.

I ask the Minister to reflect on those issues, and use her influence to ensure that the SIA is more pragmatic and practical and works with the responsible parts of the trade. However, I ask the trade to recognise that there was always going to be a problem. The fact is that a significant proportion of door supervisors will not be licensed because they have criminal records. Part of the point of the system was to get those people out of door supervising because we need a business that is respectable, respected and does its job properly, and the individuals within it need to be properly recognised, properly trained and properly paid. That is an issue that the trade, as well as the SIA, needs to face.

10.7 am

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to take part in this debate, which was opened with such characteristic passion and clarity by my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley), and I also felt that my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) got to the heart of the matter.

My late father had a way of cheering me up when I was a bit down. He used to say, "It's great to be alive. There are millions of people out there who would love to be alive today and aren't." I am tempted to paraphrase that a little this morning. It is great to be here on the morning that the general election is being called. Coming from a marginal seat, I reflect that there are thousands of people out there who would like to be here, but are not quite yet. In that context, I am delighted to make a few remarks in this debate.

I want to make a few suggestions on how we take the matter forward without repeating some of the arguments that have been made. My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central mentioned The Publican Newspaper, a very distinguished newspaper that serves the licensed trade. There is another paper that serves the licensed trade, the Morning Advertiser. They are both equally distinguished, except for the fact that I write a column in the Morning Advertiser. I shall refer to one or two suggestions I made in that column.

It is interesting that my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central mentioned towards the end of his speech the very recent extension of the deadline in London during the past few days. I reflect, as an MP from what used to be called the provinces, that it is only when an issue begins to affect London that people in the bureaucracy—and, dare I say it, the Home Office—begin to take the matter seriously. The matter has been reported in The Publican Newspaper and the Morning Advertiser, and it has been in MPs' postbags for about a year now. It is only when the deadline in London is almost upon us—within a couple of weeks—that an extension is made. That may be deeply welcome in the capital, and I am delighted that we are not going to have pubs and clubs shutting in marginal seats in the capital during the next month, but I worry a little about all the punters in the rest of the country.

A couple of measures could be taken to ease matters. They would not undermine the principles of the Private Security Industry Act 2001, which my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West rightly praised when outlining the reasons for them. She was also right to point out that an increasing number of women play quite a role in the industry and that they are helping to change the face of the industry. Where a door supervisor has bothered to take a course and make an application, the simplest thing to do would be for the SIA within days to send an acknowledgment of it. As long as a door supervisor has an acknowledgment that they have made an application and they can show it to the relevant authorities, that should be good enough to prevent prosecutions in the rest of the country; otherwise, London will be a special case.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central was describing some of the cases of delays and referring to folklore, I heard my hon. Friend the Minister from a sedentary position say, "Yes, it is folklore." However, there are many cases of delays, and the SIA admits that. The percentages are in doubt, but some people are definitely waiting more than 10 weeks. Quite a lot of people are having their forms returned for reasons, as my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central said, such as putting "UK" rather than "United Kingdom". Some people have had their forms returned on seven or eight occasions. If somebody has taken the trouble to undertake the course and put in the application, that should be good enough. I ask the Minister to consider carefully that suggestion.

I also understand that where the people on the books of agencies and security firms have made applications but have yet to receive their final registration from the SIA, there is a provision in the Act for approving agencies and security firms that have reached a sufficiently high standard to satisfy the SIA. No such firms have been approved, however. If some of the more reputable firms could acquire that status, it could help to break the logjam. I welcome the moves made in London by the Home Office, but we need some action that will help in the rest of the country.

I want to bring one further case to the attention of the House to show how passions are running high. On 7 March I received a press release, which I think other Members of the House received, from Mr. Andy Walker, the chief executive of the Federation of Door Supervisors and Security, the trade union for the private security industry. He is also managing director of Protexus Training Ltd. He made many criticisms about the operation of the Act, some of which we have heard this morning. He has a distinguished background, having served in the Army and for 10 years in the police. He was one of the first people to argue for the Act; he was a consultant to the Home Office, undertaking research into the Act in the 1990s; and he then became a consultant to the SIA. Within days of issuing a measured press release on, among other issues, the need for strong enforcement, he was suspended from his job by Protexus Training Ltd. All sorts of rumours are going round the industry that the suspension was a result of pressure from the SIA. The SIA is very tetchy about these matters, but it should be strong enough to face criticism and debate matters with its critics in the industry. It should not resort to undermining the careers of people with a long and distinguished history in the industry.

We have made some progress in recent weeks, but I say to the Minister that to make the Act work, we need more flexibility from the SIA and the Home Office.

10.14 am

Mr. Khalid Mahmood (Birmingham, Perry Barr) (Lab): I join other Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) on securing this important debate.

The issue was brought to me just before Christmas, when there were considerable concerns about it in Birmingham. I had the opportunity to meet the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety, who took some action with the Security Industry Authority and asked me to speak to the chief constable in my area to seek, locally, an agreement not to prosecute people who had made an application in the area. I welcome the help that was available from the Home Office in trying to allay a significant concern for many people. It is a major employment issue in my constituency, where more than a quarter of people are involved in work for the leisure and hospitality industry,

[Mr. Khalid Mahmood]

The need for proper implementation and the importance of that for people who act as doorkeepers at the venues in question has already been mentioned. Without the right legislation, the wrong type of people can be involved in such employment, aggravating matters instead of policing them and making them better. In Birmingham I want to ensure that doorkeepers will be properly licensed, and able to support the police in providing the service that we all want.

In general the legislation is good, but the way in which it is implemented is an issue. In Birmingham we had a good network in which the licensing of doorkeepers was established, with very effective processes. Although I can accept the present central point of registration, we need, if we are to be able to make progress in the light of some of the debates that have gone on, the devolution back to the licensing committee of the review of some applications.

Because of the nature of the job, issues of involvement in minor offences may arise. If there is a question of people who have had huge experience in the industry being struck off the central register without a real appeal I should perhaps draw the Minister's attention to the need for a bit of local common sense, so that the local licensing committee could review a matter, take a decision and pass the information back to the SIA centrally. If we are to reach the 70,000 figure mentioned by my right hon. Friend—I am sorry, I mean my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central; there is always the next term—it is important that experienced people continue and that we do not lose the experience of those who want to take the matter seriously, take up the training courses and do a job that they are proud of. We want to encourage them, because they are needed to assist the police force and the community in providing the service we want.

The only way in which we will move forward is by a common-sense approach in which local authorities are allowed to be involved again with the SIA, in producing a register and enabling people to appeal.

10.19 am

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) on securing the debate. It is an important issue, and I have learned a great deal this morning from the knowledge that has been conveyed and the issues that have been raised.

I echo what the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) said about recognising how far we have come in reaching the point that we are now at. When I was first elected—probably before then, when I went to pubs at the age of 18 or 20—bouncers had a notorious image. The industry has come on in leaps and bounds and changed completely in its professionalism and the way it operates. It is worth noting that that has changed and that we do not use the word bouncers, but rightly call them door supervisors. I am sure that we all welcome those changes.

My experience, from going out with police in different parts of the country, is that door supervisors are a critical part of the management of the night-time economy. Door supervisors in city centres work closely with the police and CCTV operators, and are often miked up with earpieces and walkie-talkies. Their contribution is a key part of managing what happens in our city centres and requires an awful lot of training, skills and trust. Working closely with others, they have become a pivotal part of that process.

We often think that the main function of door supervisors is to deal with drunkenness and disorder. Of course, making sure that people going into pubs and clubs are not drunk is a key role, but they are also responsible for dealing with under-age drinking and making sure that age limits are properly managed. That is extremely difficult. When I am out with police and they ask me to judge how old somebody is, I find it near impossible to tell a 13-year-old from a 21-year-old, but door supervisors have to deal with those difficult and complex tasks. They are also often responsible for safety issues such as ensuring that the limit of people allowed into a pub or club is managed properly, and that a record is kept of how many people go in, so that health and safety regulations are observed.

In some city centres, door supervisors provide reassurance to members of the public who may have been to the cinema or theatre, who do not necessarily want to go into a pub or club and who may feel uneasy when they see a large queue of people waiting to go in to a pub or club. The presence of a door supervisor who is in control of the situation can be greatly reassuring. Door supervisors play a key and growing role, and we should praise and thank them for their work.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central highlighted a number of problems in the system. I do not know whether they are folklore or serious issues, but let me address some of those raised, such as the point about the operation of the SIA. I hope that the Minister will address some of those points, reassure us and let us know whether they are real problems. We are told that the SIA has had difficulties with phone calls. One would think that a simple system could manage that. These days, many people request applications and forms by e-mail, or using webline and online access; why is not that service more widely available?

The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central made a good point about groups of applications from different clubs being made together. A lot of clubs are now part of networks and can manage that process. That seems to be a sensible and responsible approach in which we should ask pub and club groups to get involved. Multiple applications should be processed simply, and I am concerned about the delays.

I am also concerned to hear about what has been happening in South Yorkshire with the police and their work over the past couple of weekends. If it is true that there have been spot checks and that certificates are not in place, and that individuals face prosecution or are disappearing because they do not want those police checks, that will break down the important relationship between the police and door supervisors, which should be one of trust and working together, rather than one of mistrust and nervousness. If that is happening in South Yorkshire, it is sending all the wrong messages.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West talked about handling large venues such as pop festivals. In my constituency, for the past six years, we have had the Homelands festival in the bank holiday weekend at the end of May, to which 40,000 people come. Having attended that to see what takes place, I know that hundreds of people are involved in that organisation. For clarity, it would be extremely helpful to know which people should be registered. The hon. Lady made an excellent point on that.

The hon. Lady asked what kind of training takes place. I do not know; I am ignorant about that, but she is right to highlight the difficult circumstances in which door supervisors will find themselves. Indeed, they will be the same difficult circumstances in which police find themselves on Friday and Saturday nights, so door supervisors' training should be of as good quality, so that they can handle situations with hot-headed people. I do not know what involvement the police have in that training—I assume and hope that there is some, but perhaps the Minister can tell us.

I do not know whether, for example, the training involves taking individuals out on a Friday or Saturday night, with someone supervising, to see how they cope. I hope that the training would involve that, and that a door supervisor would not be thrown into a violent situation on a Saturday night without having experienced something similar with guidance or training.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West rightly mentioned that many such individuals have had criminal records and that being a door supervisor had been an underground profession. I hope that having a criminal record in the past would not be a barrier to individuals applying for and getting jobs in the future. I strongly believe that if individuals have served their time or been through a process, we should not rule them out because of what may have taken place four or five years ago. Again, I would welcome the Minister's comments on that.

The hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) amused us with his comments about the Morning Advertiser, but he made a serious point about London often being the starting process. However, my evidence is that London has been coping with the problem slightly better. Where the problem has been difficult is in cities where the night-time economy has grown. London has had a night-time economy for many years, but in some of the newer cities, particularly in the north in England, the night-time economy has taken off in the past three or four years. The hon. Gentleman is right to highlight the need to ensure that legislation catches up in those areas. I am not just talking about the northern cities, but about some of the cathedral cities in the south of England, which are experiencing a growing problem.

It is right that resources should be put across. With some of the changes taking place and the deadline moving in London from April to 6 June, I hope that the Minister will reflect on the possibility of changing that deadline in some other cities where there are difficulties. The hon. Member for Selby mentioned the word "marginal" only three or four times, which was extraordinarily restrained of him. Given what is taking place this morning, we wish him well in the future.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Mahmood) made a telling point. We do not necessarily need to manage the whole process from a central bank. Let us draw on local knowledge, to see whether we understand circumstances more locally, and let us have more local approvals in the system. Let us ensure both that there is a good appeals system in place and that we consider such a tricky issue from a common-sense perspective.

Mr. Illsley: I should perhaps clarify something that I obviously did not make clear. The extension of the two-month period in London is by the Metropolitan police, who will not prosecute between 11 April and 6 June. The SIA has not moved the deadline, which concerns a moratorium on prosecutions.

Mr. Oaten: I am grateful for clarity on that, but as I understand it the point remains valid. If there is a problem in London, there will be problems in other cities. We hope that the Government work with police forces throughout the country to introduce a similar delay. If the problems are as severe as the hon. Gentleman suggests, moving to June 6 will not tackle the problem. Indeed, he mentioned delaying until the end of the year.

There are two issues that the Government are considering. The first is the idea, which we support, of charging a levy on pubs and clubs that are causing difficulties. Perhaps we are slightly blinkered in assuming that the levy should go towards police costs. There is a strong case for considering other ways of using the levy to help the night-time economy; for example, through night buses and so on. The levy could also go towards processing door supervisors or the cost on individuals undergoing that.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West pleaded with the Opposition not to make cheap points about 24-hour licensing. I shall not do that, but I make the observation that with so many changes taking place that still need to bed down, is there not a case for a pause, before we move ahead later this year?

10.29 am

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): As many members of the Committee have said—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is not a Committee; this is the complementary Chamber of the House of Commons.

Mr. Mitchell: I am most grateful to you, Sir Nicholas, for correcting me.

As several hon. Members have implied, there is a spring in all our steps today. As you will know, Sir, Nicholas, the Ching Ming festival is celebrated today and that accounts for my enthusiasm in attending the debate, which has been remarkably constructive.

Turning to other matters, this may of course be the last time that the Minister and I perform together, as we have done a great deal over the past six months. That will be a sadness for me. I see her here today, supported, as ever, by her loyal and faithful Parliamentary Private Secretary, who is sitting behind her.

[Mr. Mitchell]

I congratulate the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) on securing this important debate and on the constructive and helpful way in which he opened proceedings. He and I entered the House in 1987, although I took an enforced sabbatical between 1997 and 2001, when the Private Security Industry Act 2001 was passed. Although the hon. Gentleman cannot be acquitted of the charge of having been in the House when the legislation was passed, the Minister and I were not here.

I have looked at the record of the debates on the Act, and it is clear that the Opposition highlighted the enforcement issues. The hon. Gentleman has raised many of them today, and I shall come to them in a moment. I have also toured the night spots of Sutton Coldfield—as you may have done in the past, Sir Nicholas—and together with the chief of police I have seen at first hand the valuable work that has been conducted. It has been described by all those who have spoken.

The private security industry has been campaigning for national regulation for more than 30 years, as have a succession of hon. Members, security trade associations and lobby groups. They all assert that they want the system to work but that it is currently neither user-friendly nor proportionate.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) is absolutely right that there is support for the policy across the House. She issued an injunction to the trade at the tail end of her speech, but I think that the trade completely accepts what she said, and I hope that the Minister agrees.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Mahmood) made a most helpful point in stressing that common sense should be the guiding principle. However, the Minister will have winced as Labour Members, in a devastating indictment, politely and deftly condemned not the Government's policy, but their competence in handling this issue.

I wish to bring five key issues to the attention of the Chamber. A very low number of door supervisors have applied for and received their SIA licences. The biggest question is why are they not registering? Those who have applied have often had to wait a long time before receiving their licence, and I am advised that the SIA has a backlog of 9,500 applications. The application process is complex and expensive. There is a lack of SIA licence non-compliance enforcement, and if the 11 April 2005 licence deadline is maintained, there will be only about 13,500 licensed door supervisors in England and Wales, according to figures issued yesterday. That is in an industry that employs just under 100,000 door supervisors.

The SIA has received only 23,000 applications for licences, and 13,500 licences have been issued. If the Government and the SIA do not extend the application deadline beyond 11 April—as has been said, they have done that for the London area in conjunction with the Metropolitan police—the country will have only 13,500 licensed door supervisors. That is in no way enough, and pubs and clubs would not be able to stay open, because they would be contravening their licences. That would obviously lead to more work for the police, and as hon. Members have said, less secure town and city centres. Many pubs and clubs would have to close because they would not be fulfilling the licensing criteria if they did not have door supervisors.

There are nationwide problems with SIA processing times. The Manchester Pub and Club Network attempted to delay the start of the licence deadline after doormen complained of extensive delays in getting passes approved and issued. Phil Burke, of the Manchester Pub and Club network, said:

"the Network has received a large number of calls from worried doormen forced to quit working the doors through no fault of their own because their new SIA passes are failing to arrive on time."

Stephen Thomas, the chief executive of the security firm Luminar plc, has expressed his concern over the "SIA and its performance," and an official at the Cabinet Office's Better Regulation Task Force has admitted that the Private Security Industry Act 2001 is "bad legislation" and that the SIA's performance

"leaves much to be desired."

There is also the problem of non-compliance. Many door supervisors have not even gone through the application process. This is a very serious problem, which the SIA needs to address immediately. It has been caused by several factors. First, inevitably there is the expense. It costs a door supervisor about £400 for a training course and £190 to apply for a licence.

Secondly, the SIA licence application criteria are very strict. Obviously, that is necessary in order to remove criminality from the industry. However, it cannot be correct that one can be refused a licence as a door supervisor because one has received a caution for a minor offence, but one can join the police service in some areas with such a criminal record. The application criteria should at least be no stricter than the process of joining the police.

Thirdly, the licence gives away the identity of a door supervisor and could make them vulnerable to revenge attacks, which greatly concerns the union. The licence, which must be worn by the door supervisor, must display his full name. That could lead many door supervisors to fear revenge attacks if they apprehend drug dealers or criminals in the establishments in which they are employed to ensure order.

Fourthly, the application process itself is also of concern. Many of those who have applied for a licence have complained that the process is very slow and that the SIA is inefficient in dealing with the application. One must call the SIA to receive an application pack; it cannot be downloaded from the website.

There have been many complaints that there is a long wait to get through on the telephone to request a pack. I asked a member of my staff to try to apply on the phone, and they were kept on hold for a very long time. When they tried again, a message advised them to try again later as the line was too busy, and they were automatically cut off. Another message advised them to call between 8 and 10 am. As you can appreciate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that would not be a good time for a door supervisor, who may have been at work until the early hours of the morning, to make such a call.

The application form can take some time to arrive. I am advised that it can take up to two months. Once it has been completed, it is often returned with a message that there are errors on the form but without any explanation as to what those errors are.

The industry has been trying to work with the SIA to make the process simpler and easier, but with little success. The individual door supervisor must, for example, fill out the form themselves. The form is four pages long, as the Minister will know. Their employer cannot help them. Many individuals cannot fill out the application form, perhaps because English is not their first language or because they find it confusing, for the reasons elegantly explained by the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central. Businesses and training companies that have tried to help to register security staff have been told that applications must be submitted individually and in person.

Industry associations have also suggested that the door supervisory qualifications currently held by approximately 40,000 people should be recognised at least as a provisional licence when those people apply for a licence. The SIA has also rejected that suggestion. Will the Minister reconsider this issue? The SIA argues that it sends out a 30-page booklet explaining how to fill out the application form, and so it is not necessary to relax the rules or to simplify the form. The poor uptake, however, shows that reform is necessary.

The SIA states that it takes six weeks to process an application form. That is not the experience of many people. Application forms are lost in the system, and original documents are often lost. This led to one doorman having to cancel his family holiday. One doorman in Wales applied for his SIA licence in the last week of July, and did not receive it until the week before Christmas.

Fifthly, the SIA's lack of enforcement for non-compliance is also a problem. FEDS, the trade union for the private security industry, which first told me of its concerns at the beginning of the year, believes that one of the key reasons for the uptake of licences being so slow is that many doormen are not convinced that the system will be enforced. It became illegal to work as an unlicensed door supervisor in June in Hampshire, in August in the south-west, in September in Wales, and in October in the midlands. To date, only a small number of prosecutions have been brought.

Many door supervisors do not want to waste the time or expense of becoming licensed, as they do not believe that the SIA will enforce the regulations. Will the Minister comment on that specific point? The SIA's official figures show that it has 40 enforcement and compliance officers. Does the Minister think that it will be possible to regulate an industry with more than 85,000 employees with such a number?

In our submission, the SIA must employ more enforcement officers in order to carry out its work with any credibility. It says that it will work in partnership with the police and local authorities to enforce its licensing regime. For obvious reasons that the Minister will understand, the SIA must not rely on the police to enforce the licensing regulations. Police in the metropolitan areas, where most of the country's clubs and pubs are situated, are far too busy on Friday and Saturday nights dealing with the violent and alcohol-related crime and disorder that we now see in our town centres. The binge drinking culture means that, more than ever before, the police rely on door supervisors to keep their establishments in good order; they do not want to arrest or discipline them on behalf of the SIA.

We appear to have a Criminal Records Bureau-style mess, with all the consequent difficulties that have become so familiar under this Government. The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central—a senior and well-respected Labour Member—delivered an indictment not of the policy but of the way in which it is being implemented. Her Majesty's Opposition will clearly add that to the charge sheet of this discredited and incompetent Government as we go into the general election. However, I urge the Minister to take action this day, to stir up the SIA and to deliver the message that, even at this late hour, the Government understand the scale of the problem and will take action to deal with it.

10.42 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): We do not know, but the Prime Minister may already have called time on this Parliament; however, I am certain that our constituencies will not be calling time on Labour in government. I am sure that people across the country will see the effort that we have put in over the past eight years to making a real difference.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) on securing the debate. What makes it crucial is that at its heart are the most important people—the public who use the establishments. That was clearly outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey). At one time, there was hardly any regulation of door supervisors and other door staff. I understand that only 60 per cent. of local authorities had any form of licensing scheme; and the schemes varied from one local authority area to another, particularly on training and on benchmarks on previous criminality and involvement in crime. We have moved on from a pretty dire situation.

We have also moved on for the employees involved in that sector. They are often paid cash in hand, and their rights as employees are mostly unprotected. As a former officer of the GMB, I know that that trade union has always taken a keen interest in recognising that part of our work force. Allan Black, a national officer, is responsible for that. He and the union have been working hard to get that work recognised as a professional job and to ensure that the leisure industry and others recognise that they cannot treat those people as a sort of add-on when running such establishments.

I take issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central on the role of the leisure industry. It should take an interest in door supervisors, whether they are contracted from a company or taken on individually. It is crucial that the industry takes responsibility for the people front of house who supervise the entry and leaving of an establishment and maintain good order. I am sorry, but there is no excuse; the industry must take responsibility for such people in the same way that it must take responsibility for its own staff.

Mr. Illsley: I am not sure which point in my speech my hon. Friend was referring to, but I take entirely her point that all parts of the industry must take responsibility for whatever they do. In my final comments I said that the leisure industry must ensure that it employed badged supervisors to drive out the cowboy or criminal element of unregistered door supervisors.

Caroline Flint: I welcome my hon. Friend's additional contribution, and we must make those points absolutely clear. We should consider our discussions in the wider context of licensed premises and how they are run. The hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), the spokesperson for the Liberal Democrats, made points about under-age drinking and serving people who have had one too many, and the problems that that causes. We should consider the whole package of the police, local authorities, residents and community organisations working with licensed establishments and other retailers to ensure that people can have a good night out in a safe atmosphere. It is part of the jigsaw; it is about making our enjoyment safer and more pleasurable.

It is key to ensure that people feel that organisations such as the SIA are working well. I am covering this debate for my hon. Friend the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety, but I understand that there have been some problems. The SIA has had to re-examine its systems, for example, but it is not just a question of the SIA's responsibility. In preparing for the debate, I asked some of the questions that hon. Members have asked this morning about the number of applications and why they have not come in. We must assume that some people have not applied because they are concerned that they will not be approved. Several Members have mentioned that that is not necessarily a bad thing, and it has been recognised that the process constitutes a big clearing house. That exercise is important for the public and those individuals working as door supervisors who are doing a good job, have been trained and who, whether they are working for a company contracted to an establishment or individually, want to be valued for their professionalism and integrity.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Mahmood) said, unfortunately there are some examples, illustrated by arrests, convictions and trouble caused, of individuals who should not have any responsibility for supervising establishments in our communities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) asked whether London was receiving special treatment. It is not. Recognising how huge the process is, we have introduced the system of door supervisor licensing regionally. It started with a pilot in Hampshire and the Isle of Wight, and then, starting in the south-west, it moved clockwise geographically through England and Wales. The south-west began accepting licences from 1 June 2004. The introduction of the system moved from Wales to the midlands, the north-west, the north-east, the east, the south-east and London. At each stage notice was given about sending in applications and a deadline was given for each region. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr said, our discussions with the police were about what should be done where applications have not been processed. If people have received acknowledgment of their application—everybody should get a letter stating that their application has been received and is being processed—that will satisfy the requirement if the police are trying to decide whether to prosecute. The process allows for some proportionality and discretion, which I shall discuss later, and that is exactly the same for London. I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Selby that it is not the case that we have only thought about some of those issues when they have started to affect London itself. I say that as a South Yorkshire MP.

What does worry me is the fact that people are not applying. I take on board the points that have been made about individuals who have applied, and other issues. In trying to determine whether the examples that have been given this morning are folklore, urban myths or whatever one wants to call them, it would be helpful if the names of individuals could be attached to particular cases so that we can follow them up and establish what happened. I cannot say with my hand on my heart that errors have not been made. The nature of the beast is such that mistakes are bound to happen, but we need to know whether we are dealing with serial offending—the errors are happening time and again—or one-offs due to an administrative error or whatever. I do not dismiss the anecdotes—I think of the examples that my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central gave—but it would be helpful to have names against them so that we could investigate specific incidents and determine whether they were isolated cases or something more worrying. That also applies to the comments made by several other colleagues.

As everyone knows, the date when applications could first be made and when a licence would become a legal requirement in each region were published in full in July 2003. That was 11 months before the first legal requirement to be licensed—the offence date—and a full 20 months ahead of the final legal requirement date of 11 April, which we are coming up to, for London. Regardless of some of the comments that have been made in this debate, it is clear that individuals and businesses have had a considerable amount of time in which to plan, prepare, and train to meet the regulatory timetable. However, despite that, many applications have been submitted late in all the geographical regions, and the picture is no better in London.

Training has been available for all door supervisors since January 2004. As each region came online, the SIA tried to ensure that capacity was available to cope with the estimated demand. I understand the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West made about what is included in the training. The SIA did consult during development of the training specification with individual door supervisors, company trainers, awarding bodies and associations about the specification, but I shall ensure that her comments are passed on to my hon. Friend the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety to determine whether there is anything missing.

On who should be registered, the Act describes the designated activities that an individual is required to have a licence to undertake, and they are described in the "Get Licensed" booklet. I shall ensure that the points about indoor arenas and large venues are also covered.

Training courses have been organised prior to the offence dates in most regions, but several have been cancelled due to a lack of take-up. Unfortunately, it is not until the offence date has been reached and individuals risk prosecution that the demand for training courses in any region increases. That is worrying, as it prompts the question whether some individuals and sections of the trade are operating in the spirit of what we are trying to achieve, which is a safer night out for the paying public. In each region there has been a three-month window between the date when applications could be received and the date when it became a legal requirement to hold a licence. The SIA published a target for processing 80 per cent. of licence applications within six weeks. The average since licensing began is 73 per cent. within six weeks, and 89 per cent. of all applications are processed within eight weeks. Obviously, that is not 100 per cent., but that is because some applications throw up several questions, and the SIA must be thorough in establishing what the concerns and problems are.

The SIA estimates that some 46,000 individuals will need door supervisor licences. That figure is supported by its operational experience and its police partners. As of 30 March, 50,597 individuals had requested application forms, but only 27,721 of them had returned their completed forms. That is worrying, and happened in spite of the fact that as of 30 March 45,060 individual door supervisors had spent time and money obtaining the necessary qualification.

On a more encouraging note, it is pleasing to see that in the past month applications were requested by potential door supervisors at an average rate of 500 per day. An average of 250 a day were returned, and an average of 300 newly trained door supervisors joined the qualifications database every day, having gained the necessary qualifications. However, the situation is still worrying, and we must ask why individuals do not return application forms that they have been given and why those who have received the necessary training do not move forward. I also wonder, as the daughter of publicans, why in establishments there is no discussion with door staff about why they have not returned their applications.

The SIA and its police and local authority partners have made every effort to ensure that individuals and their employers are fully aware of their responsibilities. Direct mailing, mail shots and meetings with the licensed trade have very clearly outlined the actions that individuals need to take, and the time scale within which they need to take them.

Hon. Members have posed questions about the cost of the licence. I understand that it costs £190. It can attract a subsidy of £105 from the Learning and Skills Council. The licence fee is tax deductible—that is worth just under £50—and other funding subsidies are available as well. There are several methods of assisting people with the fee, but, as hon. Members mentioned, companies who employ doorkeepers might want to look into that, to build a reputation for themselves as an organisation that has fully trained staff.

It is hoped that more people will continue to apply. As I have said, we need to reduce the number of errors. A high error rate has occurred in London applications, which demonstrates that some people are still not fully aware of how to fill in the application forms. Where those errors are minor, they are, where possible, solved through a telephone call, but where the error or omission is critical to the licensing criteria, the form or a duplicate has to be returned.

It is not until the SIA has a complete and acceptable application with a cleared payment, including the necessary supporting documentation, that they can start to process it. The processing of course includes a criminality check.

Mr. Illsley: I want to reinforce a point; I think that what the Minister has just referred to is among the examples that are passing into folklore. It is impossible to correct a form over the telephone with the SIA. People simply cannot get through.

Caroline Flint: I shall look into that issue and follow it up.

Mr. Grogan: I understand that the Prime Minister is on the way to the palace, so the moment of decision is nigh. Will my hon. Friend clarify whether she is urging police forces not to prosecute people who have submitted an application form and received an acknowledgment? Can she at least give us that encouragement?

Caroline Flint: No, I am not urging that. The issue is one that we must examine. We need to consider whether people show a real willingness to comply with the legislation. That is not an issue that I can deal with; it is an operational decision for police at force level. What I have tried to describe to my hon. Friend is how attempts have been made to assist people, and to give a proportionate response. I am not prepared to keep moving the barrier back. As I said at the start of the debate, we are concerned about the continued safety of the public.

A reform that has been made is that from yesterday the processing of applications can commence immediately on receipt of a correctly completed form, without waiting for the payment to clear. I understand that we are also looking into the question of bulk applications coming in from organisations. We have listened to the concerns that have been expressed and dealt with some of the issues raised.

However, although we listen and have carried out reforms, and although I shall write to hon. Members about some of the other matters that the SIA has taken into account, what we are doing is important for the protection of the public and we must stand firm.

Woodcraft Folk

11 am

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): This debate has resulted in enormous interest in the Woodcraft Folk and has come about because more than 100 Members of Parliament have signed my early-day motion asking the Government to restore their very modest level of funding to the national organisation of the Woodcraft Folk. I do not know whether you have personally been involved in the Woodcraft Folk, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton) indicated dissent.

Jeremy Corbyn: Obviously not. I should explain briefly what the Woodcraft Folk are. That would enlighten the rest of the world and, one never knows, it might persuade more people to join, which would be extremely useful. [Interruption.] Are they left-wing enough? We do not discriminate. The Woodcraft Folk have existed for 80 years. They were founded as a co-operative youth organisation, with a totally volunteer ethos. They seek to develop children's lives in a way that is peaceful, co-operative and at one with nature. Many of the mores and traditions of the Woodcraft Folk come from native American cultures and much of the singing and many of the activities at camps are related to that tradition.

Those of us who have been involved, or, in my case, still are involved, with Woodcraft as active parents and so on, find the camps disturbingly democratic in their operations. When one arrives at a Woodcraft camp with several dozen, if not several hundred, children, dividing them all up into clans or villages and then democratically deciding who is going to do what can mean that professors of philosophy are ordered around by children of primary school age, who decide how they should conduct themselves when doing the washing up and all the other things that have to be done there. So, they are disturbingly democratic organisations and I urge all Members of Parliament who are getting ideas above their station to spend a week at a Woodcraft camp in the summer. It would do them all a great deal of good.

The values of the organisation are, and have been, that it gives a lot of children an opportunity to do things together, to be taken seriously, to understand democratic values, and to value and respect each other. Rather than having a hierarchy, everything is conducted in circles. Some of the debates and discussions are very long, but it means that children begin to understand the responsibilities of decision making and how they conduct their lives.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not just the young people who enjoy the Woodcraft Folk, but the parents, guardians and people who look after them? They learn a lot about themselves in that kind of environment.

Jeremy Corbyn: Absolutely. I endorse that. I have been on many Woodcraft camps and one finds skills one did not know one had. One also finds that one does not have a lot of skills that one thought one had before going to the camp. The camps provide that kind of opportunity. They are good for the adults as well. The whole thing relies on volunteer work and activity. The basis of most of the Woodcraft groups was inner-city communities in the 1920s and 1930s. They were the only opportunity that many working-class kids ever had to get out of slum living and awful physical conditions and go to outdoor pursuit centres. The Woodcraft Folk own a small number of centres around the country and also use scout camps and other people's campsites. The Woodcraft Folk provided that release and that opportunity, and gave the children the values of understanding and respect for other people. We should pay a lot of credit to them for that.

The Woodcraft Folk are not a middle-class ghetto that is run around the rims of the M25 or the north or south circular. They are a national body, which links up closely with international organisations. International camps are held every year and there is a great deal of cross-fertilisation between different groups. For example, we had an enormous international camp at Newark a few years back with 4,000 children from all over the world. It was well run; it was on a large campsite and the whole thing was ecologically sustainable. The whole image was "Sust 'n' Able", to the extent that there was a bicycle-powered cinema, where a group of people sat on bicycles and propelled a generator that provided electricity for the films. Unfortunately, the people became fascinated by the films and stopped pedalling, so the electricity went out and we lost the film altogether. However, all those kids will remember that in a way that they perhaps would not remember something else.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): I certainly concur that the Woodcraft Folk are not just an urban movement. My own children attended the local group in Lowestoft, and there are still two Woodcraft groups today—one in the rural area and one in Lowestoft. Is the problem that the organisation is not as widely known as it should be? Should we not be using the modest Government grant to make people more aware of the Woodcraft Folk, rather than taking it away? My children benefited from the group, and many more could do so.

Jeremy Corbyn: Absolutely. Those who have been in Woodcraft never forget it, and it is certainly a life-enhancing experience. However, I want to say a little more about the international side of things before I go on to the issue of funding.

International camps provide a real opportunity for young people from all over the world to come together. Woodcraft attempts, through international contacts, to reduce the costs for those coming from poor countries. If African children are coming, for example, we will try to help them out in some way, but if Europeans are coming, they probably will not need helping out in the same way. The camp was an amazing experience for all those children who turned up. Likewise, the delegation sent by Woodcraft to the Johannesburg summit on the sustainable world was an amazing experience for those children. I do not think that they would have had that experience had we not had Woodcraft.

Two years ago, I attended an international camp in Finland, where there were different philosophies about how children should operate and be treated, respected and so on. That resulted in some enormously long debates about why the Soviet Union collapsed. Nevertheless, the debates were interesting and the children learned great deal. It was a fascinating experience. We should recognise what Woodcraft has achieved, why it was founded, and how children and adults alike benefit from it.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington) (Lab): I confirm what my hon. Friend is saying about the international camps, having visited one myself a number of years ago. I commend the work of groups such as the one in south Manchester, based in Withington, and the work of Angela Downing and her team, who do marvellous work for people in the city to foster the aims and values identified by my hon. Friend. We have to ensure that that work continues in areas such as south Manchester.

Jeremy Corbyn: Absolutely. I endorse what my right hon. Friend has said, because the experience of kids from inner-city Britain—who come from poor communities and get that opportunity, that bit of oxygen and that space—is fantastic. One can see those children developing during a few days of having to live and work co-operatively. That is a great achievement.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Before my hon. Friend moves on from the issue of the inner-city constituencies—there is sometimes a perception that Woodcraft Folk are more countryside-based—I want to tell him, as a fellow inner-city urban Member of Parliament, that the opportunity not only to open one's lungs but to open one's mind is absolutely unique in my experience. The work that the Woodcraft Folk do as an element of social inclusion in our city constituencies is absolutely vital and seldom recognised, but never has it been more important than it is now. Will my hon. Friend accept the fact that many of my constituents have looked to the Woodcraft Folk as a window on a wider world and have become far better people because of the Folk, as have the society and community from which they come?

Jeremy Corbyn: That is absolutely so. Many members attended the lobby of Parliament two weeks ago organised by the Woodcraft Folk. A large number of people—hundreds, mainly from the London groups, as we are in London—came to that lobby. It was young, it was exciting, it was vibrant, it was multi-ethnic, it was respectful, it was listening—all that sort of thing, which is what is so good about the Woodcraft Folk.

We tabled the early-day motion and asked for and received this debate because of the issue of funding. The amount of public money that goes to the Woodcraft Folk from local authority youth budgets and from national Government is absolutely tiny. The biggest supporters of the Woodcraft Folk are the parents and the children themselves, who undertake fundraising activities such as jumble sales, just as any other youth group does, to raise money. Help also comes from donations, particularly from the co-operative organisations, which have been generous and supportive of the Woodcraft Folk for a long time. I pay tribute to the Co-operative Wholesale Society, Co-operative Retail Services and all those who have done so much to support Woodcraft over the years.

A number of trade unions have also made donations. My union, Unison, has given money to Woodcraft at various times or helped to support specific projects, such as the international camp that we held in Newark. The Woodcraft Folk rely on volunteer work and participation and voluntary donations for most of their activities.

Mr. Pound: In the interests of further publicity, I remind my hon. Friend that there are also registered supporters, and I am proud to be one. Such a small sum of money—usually about £20 or £30 a year—is extremely good value. Perhaps a few more registered supporters would be appreciated.

Jeremy Corbyn: I would bring out my Woodcraft card to demonstrate my credentials. If I had remembered, I would have worn my Woodcraft shirt—a beautiful bottle green shirt—which would also entitle me to attend the annual gathering. We do not have conferences, meetings or conventions, and we do not meet in Bournemouth, but we do have annual gatherings, which are great fun and, again, democratic.

What brought about all the furore, including articles in The Daily Telegraph and The Independent—one suddenly discovers that many journalists were Woodcraft Folkers and are upset at the prospect of the Woodcraft Folk suffering—was the Department for Education and Skills grant. Over the years, the Woodcraft Folk have received a grant from the Department which has in part funded the work of the head office. The grant amounted to around £50,000 a year the last time it was paid, which is a small amount for a voluntary organisation.

We are in the year of the volunteer and there is nothing more voluntary than most of what the Woodcraft Folk do. We do not have paid workers, other than those who run the outdoor pursuit centres and those at head office. We are not a wealthy organisation. When the Woodcraft Folk reapplied for the grant, they were unfortunately not successful. The money will not be available from next year onwards. That is a great shame, because it will damage the work of head office and weaken the Woodcraft Folk. The failure of that application also sends the unfortunate message to volunteers that they are not likely to receive recognition from central Government.

I hope that the Minister can give us the hopeful news that the Government are prepared to consider the decision again and sit down further with Woodcraft Folk national officials—there was a meeting yesterday—to discuss how to support them in the future. Above all, I hope that the Minister will make a clear declaration that we welcome, support and admire the work of the Woodcraft Folk, in that it develops fully rounded individuals in our society.

I meet children who come to my Woodcraft Folk group. I visit other groups and occasionally show them round Parliament. They ask a lot of questions. They are questioning young people, making a contribution. Surely that is what we are all about. Some of the kids on Woodcraft camps are not easy to deal with; they are very difficult kids. They come from a difficult environment or family background, and have been given an opportunity, a space—above all, respect—by the ethos of Woodcraft. That is something that we should all encourage. I would be grateful if the Minister told us how she got on in her meeting with the Woodcraft Folk yesterday. How many letters of support for Woodcraft has she received in the past few weeks, in addition to the 100-plus signatures on my early-day motion? Above all, can she give us some hope that the Woodcraft Folk will continue to receive financial support from central Government so that their head office can continue its important work? Will local authorities be encouraged, through their youth budgets where appropriate, to fund equipment for camping, meetings, activities and all that sort of thing?

[Jeremy Corbyn]

I conclude by quoting a parent in my constituency, who has written to me at length. She says:

"Why do I bother to volunteer? The time that I have been working as a volunteer for the Woodcraft Folk I could have been being paid for the equivalent time on a teacher's salary, as that is my profession, at which I am successful and enjoy. I am increasing the amount of work that I am taking on in primary school, but I am finding it very hard to let go of what I am doing with the Woodcraft Folk, and these are some of the reasons why: there are enormous benefits to mine and other people's children; they are confident to mix with a broader range of people, and thus better prepared for their future responsibilities. They learn skills, gain insight and knowledge, develop positive attitudes . . . Benefits to the adults, parents and families: Adult members are able to develop friendships at the same time as their children, working collaboratively with other parents".

Anybody who has brought up young children will know that it is a joy and a wonderful experience, but it can be quite isolating. However, if one is in a collective organisation with other parents who are doing the same thing, one can feel good about it and develop firm friendships. My correspondent continues:

"The Woodcraft Folk could expand to include more children and parents as members. However the benefit of what goes on in the groups goes much further than to only those people. We know that the attitudes that have been developed in the groups will spread in to all aspects of the community".

I hope that the Minister will give us some good news and will recognise that we need the Woodcraft Folk. We need those values, that strength and that voluntary effort. We need that joy, and we need the recognition of central Government to develop it further.

11.18 am

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Margaret Hodge): I congratulate my old friend, the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn), on securing the debate, and all who have joined him.

Let me say something about the scheme under which the Woodcraft Folk submitted an application. In the past eight years, we have, throughout the Government and particularly in the Department for Education and Skills, massively increased our support for the voluntary and community sector and greatly expanded the funding available for the scheme. It runs in a three-year cycle: £9 million was allocated for 1996 to 1999, whereas £21 million is available for the cycle for which we have just allocated money, so we have more than doubled the funding available to voluntary youth organisations.

To pick up on what my hon. Friend said, many, if not all, the organisations offered what the Woodcraft Folk offers. I should not like any hon. Member to go away with the idea that the money was not allocated to worthwhile organisations that do the two things to which my hon. Friend alluded. The first of those is to work with disadvantaged children to ensure that they can participate in society, either through activities or by expressing a voice. That is done by Children's Express, the Children's Society, the British Youth Council, Barnardo's and a number of other organisations—I could go on. They are all organisations that hon. Members would wish the Government to support. The second is to depend on volunteers. Woodland Folk is not the only organisation that depends on volunteers. All the organisations that were successful in this year's funding round use volunteer activity to contribute to supporting youth activity and engagement, and to providing stimulating and enriching experiences for young people and teaching them the sense of civil responsibility that will enable them to participate in society when they grow up.

Let me explain how we approached this year's funding round. Through the "Every Child Matters" Green Paper, we have embarked on a radical transformation of children's services. We want everything that we do to meet the five outcomes that children told us, in a consultation exercise, were important to them. In reconfiguring services for children, we reconsidered how we should provide Government support to the voluntary and community sector. As a result, we published a funding strategy document in December 2004, which set out for consultation the principles for funding the sector on which we thought we should go forward.

First, we wanted to fund organisations that have the "Every Child Matters" outcomes at their hearts and build their services around the needs of children and young people. Secondly, we wanted to support national infrastructure, which is relevant to the Woodcraft Folk. Thirdly, we wanted to support innovation, because if we are to transform children's services, we should look for new ways in which to deliver them and to help us put children at the heart of things. Fourthly, we wanted to consider organisations' commitment to the participation of children and young people, which is at the heart of everything we do. Many of the organisations that we funded were able to achieve that.

I understand the disappointment of the Woodcraft Folk in having their funding bid turned down, but I assure my hon. Friend that that is in no way a criticism of their work. I have known of that organisation and its contribution for a long time, and of its link to the co-operative movement and the philosophy that underpins it. I welcome that contribution—as I do the contribution of other voluntary organisations working in the sector—in promoting the well-being of children and their participation in society, and in providing the sort of enriching activities that will help their development and support them in achieving their potential.

Some 160 organisations bid for funding this year. We could have run a closed shop scheme by simply asking organisations that had previously received funding to repeat their funding applications, but we consulted the voluntary and community sector—specifically voluntary youth organisations—and said that we wanted to open the territory so that all organisations could bid against the criteria that we set in relation to the "Every Child Matters" agenda. It was with that concurrence and consultation that we opened up the scheme. However, the fact that 160 organisations bid meant that there was strong competition.

We published a clear set of objectives and criteria against which we would judge the bids, including how the proposed outcomes of the work that the organisations wished to carry out linked to the "Every Child Matters" outcomes. Having published the criteria and having agreed with the voluntary sector to open the scheme to all voluntary organisations, which I think hon. Members would agree is fair, we assessed the schemes. We used a fair and transparent process to assess all bids against criteria that we made public in our application guidance.

Unfortunately, the Woodcraft Folk bid was not successful when judged against those criteria. I suggest that hon. Members read their application, which I hope they will make available to them. Again, I stress that that does not mean that the organisation does not do splendid things and does not have a very important contribution to make, but if we publish criteria, if we want an open and transparent system, and if we have a fair competition, it is inevitable that some organisations will fail and others will succeed.

By doing things this way, we were able to fund organisations that hon. Members would want us to support. UNICEF, which did not succeed in obtaining funding before through the grant scheme, received funding for the first time. So did the YMCA and organisations such as The Wildlife Trusts and Youth Music Theatre UK. I could cite others. Some organisations that did not succeed in obtaining funding are as worth while as the Woodcraft Folk.

Mr. Blizzard: Notwithstanding what the Minister says, does she accept that any voluntary body that has received a grant from the Government or from anyone else for many years needs a period of notice before that grant is withdrawn or before it is unsuccessful with another bid? Suddenly being cut off is as bad as losing the money itself. Surely phasing and timing are important.

Margaret Hodge: Having spent part of my life working in the voluntary sector, I know that one spends far too much time securing funds and then worrying about losing them. That is part of the inequality in the way in which we as a nation fund all parts of the voluntary sector. I am not quite sure what the answer is. The system is better than it was when I worked in it because people tend to receive three-year funding instead of one-year funding, which gives much greater security. When I worked in the voluntary sector, we received funding for a year and did not know until the 11th month whether we would receive it the following year. People grappled around for new money. Funding is insecure, but that is part of living in the voluntary sector world. It is tough.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Will the Minister give way?

Margaret Hodge: With the greatest respect to my hon. Friend, I will move on because I have only three minutes left in which to strike a more positive note, which is what I believe hon. Members want me to do.

As I said, the insecurity of funding is a general problem. We do, however, want to support the Woodcraft Folk. We want them to succeed, as they make a contribution, although they failed to convince those who assessed the competition that they were as good as other organisations that submitted bids.

I met the Woodcraft Folk yesterday to see how we could support their work and help them. I stress that the grant is £50,000 against head office costs of about £250,000; but funding is almost £1 million overall. So it is not a huge element in the organisation's overall funding, which I believe my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound) accepted. Most of the contributions come from families and children. No doubt my hon. Friend and others would not mind seeing their contribution doubled if it had a funding crisis.

We want to help the Woodcraft Folk by seconding a member of our staff to them for 12 months. We hope to get on with that rapidly. We also hope that that member of staff will be able to support the central organisation by helping it to look for new ways of diversifying the funding streams that it receives so that it secures long-term funding and continues to provide the experience that all hon. Members have welcomed.

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

HIV/AIDS Overseas

2 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): It is a great pleasure to have had this issue selected for debate. A number of eyes will be on other matters now that the general election has been called, but, despite the fact that we shall all be busy with other things, I hope that we shall have time to reflect on the policies that an incoming Government—of whatever persuasion—will adopt to deal with the pandemic of HIV/AIDS. I am therefore delighted to see the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) in his place. He has done such a lot as the chairman of the all-party group on AIDS in the House of Commons and I welcome him to the debate.

The subject has been debated several times in the House during this Parliament, but we cannot debate it often enough. If we debated it every week, that would not be too often. Indeed, the Minister is responding to another Adjournment debate about HIV/AIDS today. The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) will be looking at a particular aspect of the problem of HIV/AIDS—the increasing number of orphans in Africa, with all the problems that that creates.

I shall look at the raw statistics, so that we can remind ourselves of the pandemic with which we are dealing. Although everyone talks about Africa, the issue goes much wider, so I want to look at some other regions. If several other areas do not learn the lessons of what went wrong in many parts of Africa, they, too, could face the problems that Africa faces today.

Sub-Saharan Africa is the region hardest hit. Some 25.4 million people live with HIV. Last year, an estimated 3.1 million people became infected, while 2.3 million people died of AIDS. The AIDS pandemic has cut life expectancy at birth to below 40 years in nine African countries and the number of orphans is expected to double by 2010.

Let me put those numbers in context. The number of people currently living with HIV/AIDS in sub-Saharan Africa alone is nearly equal to half the population of the entire United Kingdom. In fact, even though the region holds just over 10 per cent. of the world's population, it contains nearly two thirds of all HIV/AIDS cases.

In Zimbabwe, the situation is especially bleak. Just last week, UNICEF said that one in five Zimbabwean children are now orphans. More chilling still is the fact that one Zimbabwean child dies every 15 minutes from AIDS. That means that six children in Zimbabwe will die of this preventable disease during this debate if it runs its full course. Clearly, that is an outrage that we should simply not tolerate.

South Africa continues to have the highest number of people with HIV in the world. At the end of 2003, an estimated 5.3 million people were living with HIV. Added to that grim number is the fact that HIV prevalence among pregnant women is more than 27 per cent. That means that more than one in four expectant mothers have HIV, and many of them will pass that death warrant on to their children. Unfortunately, there is no sign of a decline in the epidemic, and the most recent data suggest that prevalence is increasing in all age groups apart from one.

Although sub-Saharan Africa is the region hardest hit, it is not alone in facing the spectre of HIV/AIDS. In the Caribbean, for example, AIDS has become the leading cause of death among people who would normally be in the prime of their lives—those aged between 15 and 44. By 2010, life expectancy at birth is projected to be 10 years less in Haiti and nine years less in Trinidad and Tobago than it would have been without AIDS. We can see what is happening throughout the Caribbean.

Eastern Europe and central Asia have also seen the number of people living with HIV rise dramatically in the past few years. By the end of last year, an estimated 1.4 million people had HIV—a more than 900 per cent. increase in less than a decade. If there is any good news in these statistics, it is that most of the outbreaks in the region are still in their early stages and, if we want to do something about the situation, clearly we can. I was looking at some World Bank statistics on Vietnam, where £35 million has just been given to fight the AIDS fight. An estimated 250,000 people were living with HIV by the end of 2003 but, if that is not arrested, by 2010—just five years away—the figure will reach 1 million, which is extremely worrying.

Asia has a relatively low percentage of people living with HIV/AIDS, but I am still uncertain about whether a number of the countries are owning up to the reality of the statistics. The fact is that their populations are huge. China and India are especially worrying cases. I will mention India in a moment in another context. It has a huge population of more than 1 billion people. It has 5.1 million people suffering from HIV and that number is growing. That must be worrying. All 31 provinces in China have HIV cases. That shows us exactly what can happen in a country with a population of 1.5 billion. We must pay attention to what is happening in Africa, but we must not forget countries such as China and India; otherwise, the picture will be incredibly stark.

In Latin America, more than 1.7 million people are living with HIV. Two countries in that region, Guatemala and Honduras, are especially hard hit, with national adult HIV prevalence of more than 1 per cent. However, lower prevalence in other countries disguises the fact that serious, localised epidemics are under way. That is another point. It is the same with India. We can talk about 5.1 million cases, but they are not spread throughout India; they are in specific parts of India. That is what we must watch.

Worldwide, the total number of people living with HIV last year was estimated at 39.4 million, the equivalent of about two thirds of the population of the United Kingdom. Approximately 4.9 million people became newly infected last year alone, of whom about 640,000 were below the age of 15. As would be expected from those figures, the death rate is depressingly high. Last year alone, about 3.1 million people died from AIDS, including more than 500,000 children under the age of 15. Let me put that in context. That is like 18 jumbo jets crashing into the earth every day. If 18 jumbo jets were crashing into the earth every day, the world would want to do something about it. To take the context that I mentioned earlier, we have started the general election campaign and it will last 30 days.

During the period of the election, which we will all be fighting, 250,000 people will die because of AIDS. That is how significant the pandemic is.

Mr. Nell Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): I am listening with interest to the statistics. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the other areas that is of concern is eastern Europe? If we consider the infection rates in some of the countries of the former Soviet Union, including Russia and some of the Baltic states that are either in, or soon will be in the European Union, we cannot regard this epidemic as being far away and of no concern to us. It is on our doorstep in those cases.

Mr. Evans: I am extremely grateful for those comments. Clearly, there are no borders as far as HIV/AIDS is concerned. It does not matter where one happens to be. As I said, we concentrate on Africa and clearly that is a huge problem, but HIV/AIDS is everywhere in the world. The hon. Gentleman mentions parts of Asia and central Europe. He is absolutely right. The problem is growing. That is my fear. If I could point out today that the number of new cases, or the number of people dying of AIDS was decreasing, I would be more relaxed, but I cannot be relaxed. There is only one area in the entire world where the figures are stagnant. They are increasing everywhere else.

Between 2002 and today, the number of people with HIV/AIDS has increased. In Asia, the figure has increased to 8.2 million; in eastern Europe during the last two years the figure has gone up from 1 million to 1.4 million; in Latin America, it has increased from 1.5 million to 1.7 million; in Oceania it has gone from 28,000 to 35,000—the figure is relatively low there, but it is still increasing—and in the middle east, it has gone from 430,000 to 540,000. No one talks about the number in the middle east. In the one area where the figure is static, which is north America and western Europe—I know it is increasing in the United Kingdom—the number of women with HIV/AIDS has increased from 390,000 to 420,000. That is how stark the situation is, and that is why we should not just concentrate on one area of the world. This is a global pandemic—that is what the word means—and we have got to do a lot more to tackle it at every stage.

We know that there is no cure for AIDS at the moment, although antiretroviral treatments can extend the life of those who are HIV-positive. The World Health Organisation estimates that nine out of 10 people who need the treatments are not receiving them. That needs to be addressed. The best medicine in the world cannot work if it does not reach those who desperately need it. Even worse, if this situation continues, 5 million to 6 million more people will die of AIDS in the next two years.

As devastating as those numbers are, they will only be a teardrop in the ocean of misery unless strong action is taken immediately. That is because the devastation of HIV/AIDS goes beyond short-term health concerns; it is a long-term economic disaster for all those countries. A World Bank report released in 2003 found that AIDS reduces economic growth to the point of economic collapse. It does that by destroying human capital—the people who work—and accumulated knowledge and experience goes with it. It also wrecks the foundations of human capital—education and family—and creates millions of orphans, who are less likely to invest in education and job training for their future.

Shanta Devarajan, chief economist of the World Bank's Human Development Network, notes that in countries with severe HIV/AIDS epidemics

"if nothing is done quickly to fight their epidemic, they could face economic collapse within several generations, with family incomes being cut in half."

Moreover, the WHO points out the mutually reinforcing link between HIV/AIDS and poverty:

"In many countries, HIV/AIDS pushes people deeper into poverty as households lose their breadwinners, livelihoods are compromised and savings are consumed by the cost of health care. The pandemic also adds to the strain on national institutions and resources, and undermines the social systems that help people to cope with adversity. In the most severely affected settings there is already evidence that HIV/AIDS is eroding human security and productivity, undermining economic development, and threatening social cohesion."

Not only is HIV/AIDS devastating the current work force, but it affects future workers. The report goes on to say:

"Educational systems and education standards too are being affected as more young people are forced to leave school to take care of sick parents and look after siblings. More than 11 million African children have lost one or both parents to AIDS. The spread of HIV and the impact of AIDS are disproportionately affecting young people, and therefore the future of the global community itself."

In an attempt to examine further the future effects of the HIV/AIDS pandemic, UNAIDS recently produced a study that examined three scenarios for the future of AIDS in Africa. Each makes certain assumptions about how the world will react right now and then imagines how those decisions will affect the world in a quarter of a century. I could go through each of the scenarios, but I shall not do so. All I can say is that each is fairly grim in its own way. Even the most effective approach means that many more millions of people will contract HIV, which will turn into AIDS at a later stage. The report points out:

"There is no magic bullet: just as the causes of HIV and AIDS are complex, so are the responses. There is no single policy prescription that will change the outcome of the epidemic. HIV and AIDS is a long-wave event, and needs consistent policy responses over several terms of government. Rapidly fluctuating policy responses will do nothing to stem the epidemic. It is essential to develop both short-term pragmatic solutions and long-term strategic responses. Working on both is critical to a successful outcome."

Obviously, each of the scenarios presented can do no more than make an informed guess about the future, but remember that even the worst-case scenario 15 years ago did not predict the devastation that has been brought upon us all by HIV/AIDS. This is a wake-up call for us all.

I congratulate the United States of America on its programme for spending $15 billion with President Bush's emergency plan for AIDS relief. On 21 September, he said:

"America has undertaken a $15 billion effort to provide prevention and treatment and humane care in nations afflicted by AIDS, placing a special focus on 15 countries where the need is most urgent. AIDS is the greatest health crisis of our time and our unprecedented commitment will bring new hope to those who have walked too long in the shadow of death."

[Mr. Evans]

One area in which the US is spending money is in building capacity, which is essential. Providing money is one thing, but we desperately need to ensure that countries can spend that money effectively. I said that the US is focusing on 15 countries, but it is active in 96 countries. That is essential. It also supports other projects, through other funding, such as the Global Fund to Fight AIDS and UNAIDS.

I want to mention the "Conservative Manifesto for International Development: Action on Global Poverty", which was recently published. On page 3, it says:

"Conservatives will increase spending on the Department for International Development (DfID) by £800m over three years, from £4.5bn in 2005–6 to £5.3bn in 2007–8. This is, measure for measure, exactly the same as the planned figures announced by the Government. We will work towards meeting by 2013 the UN target of spending 0.7 per cent. of national income on aid."

That is important, because this is not a party political issue. I know that there will be 30 days of us slugging it out throughout the country, and I hope that international development will not be one of the issues on which Labour politicians will point at the Conservatives and say that there is a threat that we will cut money there, because that simply is not the case. I am delighted to read, further on in the report, about the areas in which we want money to be spent most effectively.

I am grateful to Help the Aged, which sent me its briefing on the report, which considers the impact of HIV/AIDS throughout Africa, particularly on the elderly. I talked about the number of people aged between 15 and 44 who have contracted HIV or are dying of AIDS and about the number of orphans, but we forget the price that is paid by the older generation who have to look after the orphans. We must reconsider the holistic approach to HIV. It is not enough simply to help to treat those with HIV. We must consider the orphans and the grandparents picking up the tab.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Walthamstow, who I understand is standing down at the general election.

Mr. Gerrard: Certainly not.

Mr. Evans: In that case, I will not make the comments that I was about to make—no, I pay tribute to him.

The report "Treat with respect: HIV, Public Health and Immigration" is an important contribution to the debate and what we do in this country. A lot of it deals with the immigration into this country of people who are suffering from HIV. How we deal with such people is important. I welcome the report's publication and its contribution to the discussion on how to treat those who suffer from HIV. The problem is a global one; it is as simple as that. We know that the increasing number of cases in this country is because of immigrants. We cannot wash our hands of that fact or turn a blind eye to it. That is the reality, and we must ensure that everybody is treated equally.

I also pay tribute to another person who is not standing down: the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley), who chairs the all-party group on Africa, of which I was a member. Its report "Averting Catastrophe: AIDS in the 21st century" was an important contribution to the debate and I used it when I spoke in conferences on HIV in Canada and India. The report made many important recommendations such as launching the international finance facility and pushing for a review of urgent cases of unspent funds in the European Union, to which I hope the Minister will refer. The quality of EU spending and its effectiveness worries me incredibly. Recommendation 24 states:

"Establish a unit within the DTI in partnership with experienced companies to advise other companies with operations in Africa on developing fully comprehensive HIV and AIDS programmes for both their workers, their families and the communities in which they work and where migrant labour is used also in the communities from which their workers come and return to."

I shall refer to that later.

The group also brought out another excellent report entitled "The UK Government and Africa in 2005: How joined up is Whitehall?" It considers all aspects of the issue, although it admits that the report is not comprehensive. However, it looks at the pandemic and how there can be joined-up government in all Departments.

I spoke about India. From 31 January to 5 February, I attended the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association conference study group in New Delhi, which considered all aspects of HIV throughout the Commonwealth. It is staggering that, according to the United Nations Development Programme human development report 2004,

"AIDS explains why 20 countries have suffered development reversals since 1990—exactly half of them are Commonwealth countries."

The footnote names those countries: Bahamas, Belize, Botswana, Cameroon, Kenya, Lesotho, South Africa, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia.

The report was comprehensive in its recommendations about what parliamentarians and legislatures should do. It asks for a multi-sectoral approach, which is right. It also suggests establishing a Select or Standing Committee on HIV/AIDS, which should produce a report on at least an annual basis. HIV/AIDS is so important that I hope that the incoming Government on 6 May will consider that recommendation very seriously indeed.

The report proposed:

"Investing in human capital and encouraging the retention of trained professionals, especially in healthcare."

One issue that was raised in India was the scandal of the number of doctors and nurses who are attracted from countries such as India and Africa to work in the health service here. Those trained health professionals should be retained in their own countries to deal with the problem of HIV/AIDS. I understand that some of our money is being used to train doctors and nurses in those countries, and that is all very well, but if once we have trained them they come to this country to work, that is a problem. We need to ensure that the doctors and nurses and professionally trained health-care providers are retained in their own countries.

I turn now to the issue of companies—British multinationals, basically—doing more throughout the world. One multinational springs to mind almost immediately: Coca-Cola. There is almost nowhere in the various parts of the world to which I have travelled in my relatively short time on this earth where I have not eventually seen the Coca-Cola sign. Its power in reaching out to the public in the remotest of villages is amazing. It can get its "Drink Coca-Cola" message across because its marketing expertise is second to none. It is better than many Governments in the countries in which it operates.

I was therefore interested to find out what Coca-Cola is doing in the battle to get the message across about HIV/AIDS and in helping to tackle it. It has set up the Coca-Cola Africa foundation, which is a partnership with UNAIDS specifically designed to make use of Coca-Cola's business systems. We must work out how Coca-Cola's strengths in marketplace infrastructure, local resources, marketing expertise and local community insights can be applied to other companies.

The Coca-Cola Africa foundation has supported programmes in 10 countries and assigned one of its marketing managers to work with UNAIDS. That is absolutely superb. It has rolled out projects in Kenya, Tanzania, Ethiopia, Egypt, South Africa, Nigeria, Morocco, Tunisia, Zimbabwe, Swaziland and Zambia, and plans are under way to do so in other countries. Not only Coca-Cola but the company's bottlers are involved. Coca-Cola estimates that it has 45 bottling partners in 54 African countries employing 60,000 people, so it can immediately get the message across to its workers.

I was also interested in the power of Coca-Cola's advertising and the ability to get the message across to their markets—the wider public. Celia Smith, who works for Coca-Cola in the United Kingdom, sent me a message saying:

"Our bottle trucks are regularly used for such purposes. Certainly in Africa we use our distribution networks to get information and also condoms to remote areas. Examples of where this is happening are numerous. The charity War Child have said how successfully this works in Uganda for example.

One of our South African bottling partners has led and supported a wide range of HIV/AIDS initiatives. They are a strong supporter of 'Lovelife' the lifestyle brand promoting healthy living and sexuality amongst young South Africans by offering distribution support for educational materials. The bottler is also providing both infrastructure and marketing support to Hope Worldwide, an international nongovernmental organisation running prevention programmes in Africa.

In Kenya, the Coca-Cola Foundation has been working with other partners to source, transport and place cargo containers that have been converted into Rural Health Centres for the dissemination of information on HIV/AIDS to hard to reach districts".

We have to be concerned about the hard-to-reach districts that other people do not seem to be able to get to. Celia Smith continued:

"The Coca-Cola Foundation has also partnered with Population Services International on campaigns designed to counter the spread of HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases by the distribution of condoms. The Coca-Cola Foundation is tapping into Coca-Cola's resources to store, distribute and market education materials throughout various countries. This programme is now being rolled out to every country in Africa."

That is leading by example.

I have also done some research into a number of other companies that I shall mention briefly. Barclays is everywhere in this country and, increasingly, in other parts of the world. It has its own programme that recognises that HIV/AIDS will have a potentially devastating effect on businesses, which will have a direct impact on the organisation, its employees and all relevant stakeholders. The company knows that that is in its own interests as well as its civic responsibility. BP has done exactly the same and has its own programme.

A few weeks ago, I met the HIV/AIDS director of SABMiller, the company that produces brands such as Castle Lager and Peroni. I had a lengthy conversation with him and I was impressed by what the company is doing for its work force to ensure non-discrimination and that all workers and families get educational packs. The scheme costs the company a fair amount of money. Anyone in SABMiller can be tested for HIV, and if they have got it, they will get all the necessary treatment from the company for free. That is absolutely superb. There is also confidentiality for employees so that not everyone knows that they have the condition. There is no discrimination whatever. I would like the sort of investment that SABMiller is making on behalf of its employees to be spread out.

I am delighted that we in the UK invest ever-increasing sums of money, as does the United States. However, the problem is absolutely massive. We cannot deal with it on our own, or even with the USA. We must be able to harness the huge power of companies throughout the world that operate in areas that are being devastated by HIV. That means looking at companies early on, in countries such as India and China, to ensure that they use their resources too.

I hope that the Government will respond to the Commission for Africa. The Prime Minister has already said that he will implement all the recommendations in the report, which we welcome. I hope that there will be a timetable and a proper audit, to ensure that all the recommended measures are effective.

I also welcome the Government's latest initiative—announced today, I understand—to provide £24 million to fund a trial to assess how well a microbicide gel can prevent HIV infection in women, which we now know to be the biggest killer in Africa.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): Just to correct the hon. Gentleman slightly, that money is to fund phase 3 clinical trials of one of the leading contenders for a workable microbicide.

Mr. Evans: I am happy to be corrected. We know that new infections are most prevalent among women. Everything that we can do to ensure both that women can access all the available treatments and that there is no discrimination between men and women in doing so is invaluable. The necessary research will cost a lot of money, and we should support it wherever it is conducted.

I conclude by asking the Government to ensure that their presidencies of the G8 and European Union are effective, and that they are audited, so that we can see what has been achieved. I mentioned the fact that by the end of this election campaign 250,000 people will have died of AIDS. To put that in context, let us imagine in that period the populations of Nottingham or Cardiff or Stoke-on-Trent or Plymouth or Wolverhampton being wiped out by AIDS. That is what we are talking about—that is how big the disease is.

[Mr. Evans]

HIV/AIDS is a major crisis that requires immediate attention and action. As Professor Richard Feachem correctly argues:

"HIV/AIDS is the greatest disaster in recorded human history. It is already worse than the black death in Europe in the middle of the 14th century, and the word 'already' is important because the epidemic will get far worse before it gets better, even if we did all the right things tomorrow."

He is right, but we are not doing the right things. Dr. Piot has argued that

"the AIDS pandemic needs to be recognised to be one of the most serious threats to our prospects for progress and stability—on a par with such extraordinary threats as nuclear weaponry or global climate change."

HIV/AIDS is a pandemic that is not going away. We must act now. It is far too easy to pay lip service to the problem, to pose for cameras and to make speeches. We can all do that, but the victims of HIV/AIDS need more than that. They need real, practical action to save them and their future. They deserve nothing less and nothing less will do. Fortunately, failure is not inevitable and success is not impossible. Working hard, we can overcome the disease. Millions of people around the globe are looking to us to do something and we must not disappoint them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) has sent me a note to explain why she was unavoidably delayed, which I fully accept. As she is leaving the House, I am more than happy to call her to speak for the Liberal Democrats.

2.34 pm

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park) (LD): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My excuse was lame: my wires were completely crossed—I do not know how, but they were.

I welcome this debate, so late in this Parliament. We have had many debates on AIDS and I congratulate the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on bringing the issue to the attention of the House again. He rightly says that the problem is massive. I do not think that in modern times we have ever faced such a weapon of mass destruction as the AIDS virus. It is quite extraordinary. We must not forget that what is Africa's problem today and perhaps the problem of India and south-east Asia tomorrow will be our problem the day after that. It is wrong for people to assume that this is a third-world disease—it is not. People are travelling, populations are mixing, and it will be our problem before we know where we are. Therefore, we must take great steps to deal with it, but we must take the right steps.

The one thing that I must get off my chest before I leave this place is the subject of antiretroviral drugs. I totally agree that if drugs are available in the west to keep people alive and allow them to live a healthy, productive life, they should be available to people in developing countries. There is no question about that. However, it is not a simple matter; it is not like dishing out aspirin. There is a problem with antiretrovirals.

As a medical practitioner for many years, I know how easy it is for intelligent people to forget to take their antibiotics once they are feeling a bit better—I have done it myself. They forget for a few days and then think, "Oh, golly, I've gone away for the weekend and forgotten for two days. Oh, never mind. I'm better anyway." The huge danger with antibiotic and antiretroviral therapy is that, at the very least, people will forget to take the drugs, even if the drugs are cheaper and they have access to them. If that happens, resistant strains of the virus will pop up all over the place, and the science will not be able to keep up with them.

So what do we need? We need a tightly organised health infrastructure if people are to take the drugs properly. It is in their and our interest that they are taken properly; otherwise, the drugs, which are our only weapon, will become useless. Can we have an assurance from the Government that they have discussed with their international voluntary and Government partners the question of making the drugs available only if there is a proper health infrastructure to deliver them?

I point the Minister to the really wonderful example in Botswana. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley mentioned Coca-Cola. Ever since I came into Parliament, I have been beefing on about how Coca-Cola reaches parts of the world that other things cannot reach, and asking why a big container of condoms cannot be taped on to every bottle as it is distributed. Coca-Cola gets everywhere, and the condoms should be going with it. That is a good example of industry helping in the fight against AIDS, and I welcome what Coca-Cola is doing.

When I went to Botswana, I was hugely impressed by a public-private partnership called Debswana, which includes De Beers, the Government of Botswana, Merck Sharp and Dohme, and the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, which is funding much of the cost of the drugs. They have come together for all the people who work in the diamond industry—it seems that that includes most Botswanans—and have drawn up a tight regime. The workers are rigorously tested and then have to sign a contract. If they break the contract—it requires them to take the drugs properly and attend for check-ups and testing—they are in danger of losing their jobs and livelihoods. They will no longer receive drugs through that public-private partnership and will no longer be in the programme if they break the contract. They must stick to it.

Multinational companies get such bad press. Everyone castigates big companies, saying that they never do any good, they despoil the environment, they do not uphold workers' rights, they do not obey the guidelines of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. If only such companies would say, "Okay. Everyone, everywhere we are operating, will be part of a campaign to combat AIDS." That is the first thing; I have got it off my chest. Please let us not throw millions of pounds at antiretroviral drugs that will be a waste and will make the pandemic worse.

The other thing that I have to get off my chest is the fact that the United States Government, who say that they are putting $5 billion into the fight against AIDS, refuse to fund any reproductive health programmes because of the involvement of abortion. They are withdrawing from many of them, and programmes all over the world are failing because of that. They also refuse to allow cheap generic drugs, and it seems to me that the $5 billion that they are ploughing into the fight against AIDS is going straight to the big drugs companies in the form of subsidies for antiretroviral drugs. It is an important issue. I know that my ex-medical colleagues feel strongly about it and would want me to impress on the Government the fact that we must not waste those drugs.

I want to mention how important women's health is in the whole fight. Again, the hon. Member for Ribble Valley mentioned that. If people are being treated for AIDS, it is often the man in the family who gets the treatment. If money runs short, he gets the drugs and the wife stops. In my experience, it is always the women who lose out in developing countries.

Women's health is integral. I am delighted that, following the work done by the all-party group on population, development and reproductive health, headed by the hon. Member for Calder Valley (Chris McCafferty), and the report that it published, the Government have accepted that women's health, particularly their reproductive health, is integral to the fight against AIDS. The two have to go together; we cannot fight AIDS without doing something about the reproductive health of women. Improving women's health means not only access to treatment, but better childbirth—fewer accidents in childbirth, more trained midwives and more village birth assistants. It also means better access to health care for women. It means treating intercurrent infections such as thrush, chlamydia and trichomonas—all of which make women more susceptible to the AIDS virus. It means continuing our campaign against female genital mutilation, which does such terrible damage to women and ensures that the first time they have intercourse, if it is with an HIV positive partner, they will catch AIDS for sure because of the damage done by simple intercourse.

Such measures are terribly important, combined with family planning and women's ability to limit the size of their families. Their health is dependent on being able to do that. We should also always remember that even in my family the best bits of food go to husband and children. I still have the nauseating habit of making sure that the men and the children have had enough before I serve myself. It is a sad fact, but that is the sort of mother I am—is it not beautiful? Everyone will know that a lot of women are like that. They tend to serve up the food and then have what is left for themselves. In developing counties, when one bowl of rice goes between all, women get very little food. We must tackle that. We must also tackle the fact that women inhale more smoke from burning wood. Wood is still the staple fuel in developing countries and that affects their physical health and respiratory system in a big way. We must make moves on that.

All such things, together with microbicides—the Government's work on those is terribly welcome—are important in the fight against AIDS. It is not just about antiretroviral drugs. In my view—I must say that I am a "glass half empty" person when it comes to the AIDS pandemic—we may well lose a generation of people to the pandemic. However, we need to concentrate on prevention for the next generation. That means education and male and female condoms. It is a simple measure, but the message must get through about education and the use of condoms. Please God that the new Pope will have a different attitude towards condoms, at least for the prevention of infection. We need a change of policy worldwide. It must become a sin not to use a condom if a person thinks that they or their partner are HIV-positive. Although we accept that many things must be done about the pandemic, education and prevention will still be the biggest weapon, all over the developing world.

I want to mention three other things, briefly. They are big issues, and I do not want the fact that I do not give them much time to lead the House to think that I do not consider them important. One is the number of AIDS orphans being created by the pandemic. That is building up one hell of a sociological problem for the rest of the world. Children are growing up without parents, with ageing grandparents.

I am a grandparent to six grandchildren, and the Easter holidays were very tiring, although I am a well-nourished, healthy woman. For a sick, elderly grandparent in the developing world to have to take on a host of grandchildren is quite something, and we must concentrate hard on that issue. That means considering the matter from the point of view of the orphans, but I understand that Help the Aged wants us also to consider the needs of the people who must care for those children.

Mr. Evans: Does the hon. Lady recognise that, if even one parent has died and that parent was the breadwinner, youngsters have to work to help the family to survive? We talk about the education that the youngsters need, but they are denied schooling from an early age because the family does not believe that it can be an economic unit unless the youngsters go out to work. The poverty is reinforced when one or both parents die.

Dr. Tonge: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point and it is true that children are often denied education because they need to work—something that we are not familiar with in this country. We have long forgotten, although it is not so long ago—perhaps 150 years—that children did have to work to prevent their families from starving. That goes on in probably two thirds of the world today.

Lastly, I want to put in a plea for more vaccine research. As a medic, I know that a vaccine is the only answer. We have conquered—touch wood—smallpox in this world. It should be possible, with the help of vaccines, to conquer the AIDS virus eventually. My final words in this speech should perhaps be to pay tribute to the international AIDS vaccine initiative, headed by Dr. Seth Berkley in the USA. It is a brilliant organisation which has done the most extraordinary work and has pushed and fought for more money to go into AIDS vaccine research and into the companies that will make the product when it comes on stream. There is a huge amount to do in that area, and I pay tribute to the people who have been working on it. I hope that the Government will continue to support them.

2.48 pm

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I think that it was five months ago when we met in Westminster Hall to discuss HIV/AIDS. I calculate that in those five months probably another 2 million people around the world will have been infected by HIV, and perhaps another 1 million will have died from AIDS.

[Mr. Alan Duncan]

It is clear that the HIV/AIDS emergency is the biggest threat facing humankind today. It kills 8,000 people every day. More than 40 million people are infected and for too many people lack of access to treatment turns a lifelong illness into a guaranteed death sentence. Every new HIV infection that could have been prevented is not just a tragedy but a scandal, so it is right that we debate the issues today.

We are all grateful, I think, to my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) for initiating the debate. He has a clear command of the issue and has shown continuing interest in it, as one could tell from all that he said today. I am also glad, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you were able to call the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), and I am glad that she was able to speak. We are sorry that she is leaving the House, and that was probably her valedictory speech, but we wish her well. I want also to acknowledge her long-standing interest in international development and humanitarian matters, and the contribution that she has always made to our debates and proceedings, particularly on matters of reproductive health. We have heard that clearly today with her sensible analysis of how to treat HIV/AIDS, primarily in Africa but anywhere that it might exist.

The battle against HIV/AIDS is a political as much as a medical challenge. Political will is holding us back more than the absorptive capacity of Governments of developing countries. The scale of the epidemic must compel us to act. When historians in the future examine how our generation reacted to the crisis, no politician will be able to use ignorance as an excuse for inaction. At a global level, the political response has not until recently reflected the urgency of the situation. We might as well be honest—40 million people need treatment, yet it seems that the international community will fall far short of achieving the target of treating even 3 million people by the end of the year.

Despite recent progress, there is still not enough cash for the fight against AIDS. UNAIDS has estimated that it will take some £6.6 billion this year to counter the spread of HIV, and so far only about half of that has been forthcoming. The G8 launched the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria in 2001; now it has an obligation to ensure that it is properly funded. When existing programmes come up for renewal, we must ensure that the money is there to pay for them.

The British Government have shown initiative on HIV/AIDS. I admit that, and I salute the Department's decision to earmark £1.5 billion for the AIDS fight and to include HIV/AIDS in all its bilateral activities. However, let us face it, we have to do more and there is a real problem on the ground. Treatment costs about $1 a day. Many people have to live on $. a day. So, they can either be treated and starve or eat and die of AIDS. That is not much of a choice.

The best way to tackle HIV/AIDS is through a combination of preventive education, the provision of condoms, help for universal primary health care, the extension of antiretroviral drug treatment—despite what the hon. Member for Richmond Park had to say about the dangers of not consuming those drugs consistently—and the continuing quest for a HIV vaccine.

Governments in the rich world must take strong and swift action to stem the spread of HIV; equally the Governments of countries with affected populations must demonstrate the political will to tackle the crisis. Charities, civil society, enlightened private companies, which my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley described, and the families of people affected by HIV/AIDS must all play an important role in the battle against HIV. Politicians and Governments control resources of the magnitude necessary to win the war on HIV/AIDS, however. Where the political will exists, the fight against HIV/AIDS is winnable. Places as diverse as Uganda, Thailand and Brazil have succeeded in slowing the spread of HIV through effective programmes of prevention and treatment. Those examples show that ultimate political responsibility lies with the Governments of those countries affected by the pandemic.

Uganda has shown that where there is strong, enlightened leadership, the spread of HIV can be brought under control. Equally, the South African experience shows the damage that can be done when the men at the top fail to comprehend the seriousness of the threat posed.

So far the global political response to AIDS has been focused—quite naturally—on sub-Saharan Africa. However, there are terrifying signs of a nascent epidemic in India and China, which between them are home to more than one third of the world's population. India is likely to be acknowledged as the country with the largest number of HIV-positive citizens in the world during 2005. Decisive action by the Governments of India and China could save the lives of millions of people in the coming years, but historically, at least, the Governments of those two countries have not lived up to their responsibilities to their citizens. Donor countries must assert quite bluntly that India's leadership in particular needs to wake up. If we see an explosion of AIDS in China and India, let no one say that we did not see it coming.

Mr. Evans: Does my hon. Friend agree that part of the problem with all this is that Africa was in denial for many years? It was a taboo subject, so it did not mention it, and it denied that it was happening. If China and India go down that path, they will suffer the same problems that Africa is suffering now. They can avert the tragedy of sub-Saharan Africa now if they stop their denial, have good governance and put in place proper and effective programmes.

Mr. Duncan: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Early action is effective action, and no action can be too early. With that in mind, I shall explore how the British Government should deal with Governments who refuse to take HIV/AIDS seriously. How do we use our diplomatic influence to encourage the Government of any such country to take action to help to stem the spread of HIV?

Clearly, that raises complex and difficult issues of morality and diplomacy. I do not pretend to have all the answers myself, and I approach the matter in a spirit of curiosity rather than of criticism. We need to tread carefully. Outside interference in the domestic affairs of some countries is likely to be resented and might even be counter-productive, but perhaps the Minister will agree that there is one option that we simply must not choose—the option to do nothing.

Surely we cannot stand by and watch while HIV/AIDS ravages an entire sub-continent. There is a positive precedent for action. The recent report by the Select Committee on International Development on the Department for International Development's activities in India states:

"International donors and organisations played a key role in motivating the GoI to initiate its first responses to HIV/AIDS during the early 1990s."

I am happy to acknowledge that it goes on to salute the role that DFID has played in shaping India's agenda on AIDS.

It continues:

"Early indications are that the new UPA government is taking the challenge seriously", and

"We strongly encourage DFID to do all it can to support the GoI in taking such decisive action."

I would be interested to hear the Minister's assessment of the most effective and productive ways in which the British Government can influence the Governments of affected countries to live up to their responsibilities to their people.

HIV/AIDS is inextricably linked to poverty, so the solution to the crisis is indelibly linked to the wider goals of poverty reduction. Political leaders here can do much to address that poverty. Zambia has 1 million HIV-positive people, but spends 30 per cent. more on servicing its debts than it does on health. Kenya spends $0.76 per capita on HIV/AIDS compared with $12.92 per capita on debt repayments.

As well as AIDS-specific funding at this year's G8 summit and EU presidency, we need action for faster and deeper debt relief, for better aid, and for freer and fairer trade. I hope that I get the opportunity on 6 May to implement those objectives.

The Conservative party has advanced concrete and ambitious plans for action on those key priorities. Conservatives will increase spending on DFID from $4.5 billion in 2005–06 to $5.3 billion in 2007–08. We will work towards meeting the UN target of spending 0.7 per cent. of national income on international aid by 2013. Any suggestion that we would cut spending would be a lie.

Our studies have shown that significant efficiency savings can be made in the way in which the aid budget is spent. Every penny that we save will be ploughed straight back into DFID spending. That money will lift more people out of poverty, because we will spend it more effectively, by focusing it on the poorest countries and channelling more through non-governmental organisations, and less through the wasteful EU. [Laughter.]

Dr. Tonge: I cannot resist saying this. If the hon. Gentleman becomes the Secretary of State for International Development after 5 May—if pigs fly—I shall be watching from the wings every single penny that his Government put into international development. I shall haunt him until he fulfils all of those promises.

Mr. Duncan: I look forward to being haunted by such a gorgeous and delicious ghost. When I am sitting in the Secretary of State's office, I look forward to inviting her to come and give me the benefit of her advice and experience.

As I said at the beginning, we consider international development an area of consensus. We can argue where we have differences, and there may be a difference of emphasis on free trade. We may not actually need to argue on the EU, because although the Minister laughed just now, an answer to a parliamentary question that I tabled said that his Department was not happy with the fact that EU spending was devoted too much to stability in neighbouring countries and insufficiently to poverty reduction, which is what aid should be all about. The Minister is laughing only at his own parliamentary answer.

We will also support small-scale, environmentally and socially sustainable projects rather than large-scale, prestige, big-ticket schemes. We will make free trade fairer and fair trade freer. A Conservative Government will support a multilateral, rules-based trading system overseen by the World Trade Organisation—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I know that everyone is tempted to indulge in electioneering, even in humble debates in Westminster Hall, but I must remind the hon. Gentleman that we are concentrating on Government policy on HIV/AIDS overseas and not on general overseas aid and development.

Mr. Duncan: The two are of course inextricably linked, but I accept your strictures, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We have laid down everything that we intend to do in our manifesto document, "Action on global poverty", which is available on our website for all interested readers. The policies set out in it will help secure the ongoing improvements in living conditions, which will help to stem the spread of HIV/AIDS. By combining compassion and generosity with realism and practicality, we will help end poverty and stem the spread of HIV.

3.3 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): It is a pleasure to take part in such a debate, and I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) for securing it and for the bulk of his speech. He set out the continuing challenge facing developed countries to help developing countries, and in his focus on companies at the end of his speech, he rightly challenged us to do more to work with companies and the private sector more broadly to fight AIDS.

I join the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) in paying tribute to the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) and her campaigning record. She has been a doughty champion on women's issues in general and on development. She is an opponent with whom one cannot relax, and that is testimony to her ability.

Let me join hon. Members who have spoken by highlighting some statistics that demonstrate the scale of the challenge before us. In 2004, more than 3 million people died of AIDS, and nearly 5 million were newly infected with the virus. We are seeing a reversal of the development gains that have been made in sub-Saharan Africa in the past 20 to 30 years because of the HIV/AIDS crisis. Today, nearly 40 million people worldwide are living with HIV, the bulk of them in developing countries, and in 2003, an estimated 12.3 million African children were orphaned as a result of AIDS. Sadly, we know that the worst is yet to come. The number of children orphaned by AIDS is expected to rise to 18.4 million by 2010, and a growing number of them will be double orphans—children who have lost their mother and father.

[Mr. Gareth Thomas]

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley rightly alluded to the challenges in Asia and to the real worry that we shall see in India, China and the rest of Asia what we are seeing in Africa. Indeed, if nothing were to change, India would have a larger number of people with HIV/AIDS by 2010 than any country in Africa.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) does an excellent job chairing the all-party group on AIDS and, like other hon. Members, he rightly reminded us of the challenge facing eastern Europe, with its rising incidence of HIV/AIDS. I should add that there is also a growing challenge in the number of people infected with HIV in the Caribbean. That epidemic is being fuelled by the stigma and discrimination that surrounds people with HIV/AIDS, and we must continue to challenge that.

The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton was absolutely right that political will is fundamental to tackling HIV/AIDS. There needs to be political will in developing countries, and he highlighted several countries where there has been strong political commitment to tackling AIDS. Uganda and Senegal are two clear examples, and Brazil is another. Political will is also fundamental in developed countries. As rich nations, we have to make more money available for the fight against AIDS. An increasing amount is being made available, but we clearly need to do more.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned India. As he suggested, the British Government, through my Department, have been having extensive, ongoing discussions with the National AIDS Control Organisation in India and with the new Indian Government, as we did with the previous Government. I pay tribute to the new Government for deciding to increase the amount that they make available to fight AIDS. I also welcome the appointment of the new head of the National AIDS Control Organisation, whom I met when I went to India to discuss HIV/AIDS in September and October last year. Things are beginning to move in the right direction, and we are beginning to see a step change in the fight against AIDS. As Dr. Quraishi made clear to me, however, much more still needs to be done, and donors such as Britain clearly need to do more to support that effort.

Mr. Evans: I too talked to an Indian Minister, who said that the Government were in negotiations with Coca-Cola to replicate and harness the ability that it had clearly demonstrated in Africa. If they can do that early on with a number of other companies—perhaps companies based in the United Kingdom with divisions in India—that would be very effective. I hope that the Minister will at least allude to some of the things that the British Government will be doing to contact British companies so that they are proactive in India and other parts of the world, as well as in Africa.

Mr. Thomas: I will do just that if the hon. Gentleman will bear with me. However, I wanted to answer the last part of the point raised by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton about political will. He asked what we would do if there were problems with the attitude of a developing country Government, and Burma and Zimbabwe are classic cases. There are real concerns about the growing AIDS epidemic in those countries, and there is clearly a complete absence of political will at the top echelons of their Governments to tackle the AIDS crisis. In such cases, we have to recognise that we cannot work through existing Government mechanisms, as we can in other countries in the developing world. We have to work through United Nations organisations and NGOs, and that, indeed, is what we are doing in both countries.

The UK is already the world's second biggest donor of AIDS and sexual and reproductive health assistance. I hope that the commitments that we signalled last July, when the Prime Minister launched "Taking Action", the UK's strategy for tackling HIV/AIDS in the developing world, underline still further our commitment. In that document, we set out how the UK will respond to the challenge of AIDS by promoting a comprehensive response to prevention—hon. Members rightly said that we must continue to focus on that—treatment and care. Our response will also involve addressing the social impact of AIDS, prioritising the needs of women—as the hon. Member for Richmond Park rightly mentioned—and young people including orphans and other young children made vulnerable by AIDS. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) will make strong representations on their behalf in an Adjournment debate in the Chamber later today.

We have committed some £1.5 billion of taxpayers' money to tackling HIV/AIDS over the next three years. As part of that commitment we have doubled our support to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, bringing our total support to more than £250 million through to 2008. At least £150 million of that £1.5 billion will be spent on programmes to meet the needs of orphans and other children made vulnerable by AIDS.

We have given additional funding of some £36 million over four years to UNAIDS to support its global leadership role in the fight against AIDS, and we have provided additional funding of £80 million over four years to the United Nations Population Fund to support HIV prevention and sexual and reproductive health work with women. As the hon. Member for Richmond Park said, that is not least because of the growing recognition that AIDS increasingly has a woman's face, to borrow the words of Kofi Annan. We will also use some of the £1.5 billion to increase support for research into microbicides and vaccines for HIV prevention, of which more in a moment.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley touched on our presidencies of the G8 and the EU. He rightly said that they represent a huge opportunity for us to bring the world together to make further progress on HIV/AIDS. He will be aware of the Prime Minister's commitment to putting Africa centre stage for our discussions at the G8 summit—the Commission for Africa feeding into that process.

In terms of HIV/AIDS, we will focus on two areas during the presidency. First, we will try to make the money that is available for AIDS, and further money that we want to see become available, work more effectively. In too many developing countries there are simply too many donor missions. That ties up resources as the countries have to respond to the needs of each donor mission. We need to ensure that there is much more effective international co-ordination of our support for developing country Governments in dealing with HIV/AIDS. Secondly, we want to maintain the momentum that has begun to build up around HIV prevention.

The hon. Lady rightly paid tribute to the international AIDS vaccine initiative and the leadership of Dr. Seth Berkley, whom the Secretary of State and I have met several times to discuss the hunt for a vaccine and how we can step up efforts internationally. At the Sea Island G8 summit in 2004, the Americans rightly prioritised the need to step up our efforts. It is our responsibility as the G8's host this year to take that issue forward. There have been a series of meetings building up to our summit in Gleneagles, considering how we can find additional resources for a vaccine. It is one area where we want the European Union to show additional leadership. We are in discussions with the EU about how it might do that.

We also want to secure further support for sexual and reproductive health and rights services and further financing to accelerate development of microbicides. Again, we are talking to the EU, which has shown some leadership already on microbicide financing, to see whether it can find additional resources. On 9 March in London, we hosted jointly with UNAIDS, the Americans and France a ministerial conference: "Making the Money Work: The Three Ones In Action". Its aim was to take us towards agreement on more coherent national and international efforts to co-ordinate a more effective response to each developing country Government in the fight against AIDS, as well as looking at establishing the necessary financing framework.

The key outcomes were an agreement to mobilise funding to narrow the AIDS funding shortfall, which we currently estimate to be at least $8 billion over the next three years, with some $20 billion needed annually from 2008. Further necessary work to underpin those figures has started, as well as a process of agreeing the division of labour between the various international organisations involved in the fight against AIDS. Under the UK presidency, we shall host the global fund's replenishment conference in September, which will take place alongside a broader AIDS funding meeting, building on the "Making the Money Work" event. It aims to narrow the financing gap for AIDS. By the end of 2005, we want agreement among donors and the international system on a well co-ordinated and funded plan to tackle AIDS, so that we can move forward on all the issues that I have described.

I want to deal with some of the specific points that hon. Members have raised. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley highlighted the capacity issue, which is now the biggest challenge facing developing countries in their response to AIDS. Drugs prices were once the issue, but the Department is now working on the capacity issue. It is to provide an additional £100 million to the Government of Malawi, working with them to see what we can do to increase the number of nurses and doctors. Malawi has fewer than 30 nurses per 100,000 population, compared with 85 per 100,000 in Tanzania, and 1,000 health workers per 100,000 in Europe. That gives a sense of the scale of the AIDS crisis and the capacity gap. We are seeking to increase the funding of nurses and doctors in Malawi, in order to help to persuade them not to seek employment elsewhere, including in Europe.

Dr. Tonge: I was in Malawi a couple of years ago, when there was a 40 per cent. vacancy rate for doctors and nurses. Doctors and nurses said that they were leaving not in search of better wages—they would like to stay at home if they could—but because the hospitals and health services, such as they are, were completely overwhelmed by AIDS victims, who are left at the gates by relatives. In the wards that I saw, people slept two in a bed and two under the bed; they took it in turns to lie on the bed. What we saw, in what used to be a decent hospital, was absolutely horrific. That problem must be addressed. AIDS victims could be treated or cared for in the community if there were a community nursing structure. That would help the hospitals return to normal work, and would keep the doctors and nurses in Malawi.

Mr. Thomas: I accept what the hon. Lady says. To amplify her point, of Malawi's 29 districts, 10 have no Government doctor, and four have no doctor at all. That demonstrates the truth of her comment. We are seeking not only to pay the existing doctors and nurses more money in order to retain them in Malawi, but to expand training capacity to recruit more people and to invest more in the health infrastructure. We are also looking at what we need to do in the hard-to-reach areas, about which the hon. Member for Ribble Valley has specific concerns.

Dr. Tonge: I am sorry to dwell on this point, but it is terribly important for doctors and nurses to have some sort of stimulus when they are working in medicine and surgery, and to do something other than treat AIDS victims. When I was in Malawi, they were acting virtually as mortuary attendants. There was little that they could do, and that was the major reason for their wanting to get out. If the medical and nursing staff are to be retained, someone must get the AIDS victims out of the hospitals.

Mr. Thomas: I accept the hon. Lady's point that we must not only focus on HIV/AIDS but look in the round at health care in developing countries. Over the past eight years, we have spent some £1.5 billion on developing health systems in developing countries. Clearly, it would be nonsense if we were to focus only on AIDS. We must look at the broader picture. In that context, our programme in Malawi will be helpful, not only to tackling AIDS, but to health service capacity more generally.

The hon. Members for Rutland and Melton and for Ribble Valley referred to the numbers of people needing treatment. From June 2004, there were only 440,000 people on treatment in developing countries. By December 2004, that figure had gone up to 720,000—a 75 per cent. increase—which is directly attributable to the leadership that the World Health Organisation has shown as part of its 3 by 5 initiative.

[Mr. Thomas]

Mr. Alan Duncan: Why has the 3 by 5 initiative been such a failure?

Mr. Thomas: The initiative has not been a failure. [Interruption.] Let me finish the point. It has focused attention on hard-to-reach areas and on what we need to do to increase people's access to treatment. We need to recognise the very low base from which things started. I am referring to the number of people in developing countries who were on treatment when the initiative was launched. The fact that, in only six months, there was a 75 per cent. increase in the number of people on treatment is encouraging. We have some nine months until the end of 2005. It will be pretty difficult to hit the 3 million target, but I do not think that we will be far off it, and without the initiative we would not have made the progress that we have.

Clearly, as the hon. Gentleman says, more work needs to be done by rich countries working in partnership with the Governments of developing countries to get more people on to treatment. Fundamental to that is increasing capacity in the health service. An example of that is what we are doing in Malawi, which we hope will help that country.

Mr. Evans: On the point about targets, we can talk about percentages, but the real problem is that we are starting from a low base. Since the Minister has been speaking, more than 3,000 people have died of AIDS. That puts into perspective the real problem that we face. Surely we should be far more ambitious about the targets. The approach has to be unified—integrated not only within countries, but throughout the world.

Mr. Thomas: We have to have ambitious targets. Sadly, the target of 3 million people on treatment by 2005 was very ambitious, but it has focused international attention on how we get people on to treatment. The 75 per cent. increase in only six months last year is encouraging in its general direction. However, the hon. Gentleman is right: given the numbers of people who will potentially need AIDS treatment, this issue requires immediate international attention. I hope that the financing conference that we host in September and the global fund's replenishment conference will help to lever further resources into the fight against AIDS and the fight to make access to treatment more widely available.

The hon. Gentleman rightly paid tribute to the companies that are working extremely hard to give access to treatment to their staff who are HIV-positive and, in some cases, to the communities where the companies are based. He named various companies, and I shall give two examples. Diageo pledged to provide all its HIV-positive staff in Africa and their dependants with antiretroviral therapy for life. Anglo American has launched a partnership with the global fund to extend prevention and treatment programmes to local communities in South Africa. One outcome of the conference that the Caribbean countries asked us to host on fighting stigma and discrimination relating to HIV-AIDS in the Caribbean, which was held in November, was an agreement to work with the private sector more effectively in the Caribbean to focus its attention on these issues.

The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton launched an attack on the European Union that was pretty typical of what comes from Conservatives. Although the EU needs to do more to fight AIDS and poverty, we should acknowledge the considerable progress and the huge contribution that it has made to the global fund, for example. That has helped to lever in additional money.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park touched on the importance of education. I am sure that she will have been pleased by the launch at the end of January of our increase in funding for girls' education. We shall continue to work, through the fast-track initiative, to focus on countries where the challenge on access to education is particularly severe. I have touched on the hon. Lady's concerns about vaccines and the work that we shall do to step up a gear in that respect.

The only sour note in the debate was the sanctimonious nonsense about the Tory spending plans on development, and I was surprised that the hon. Members for Ribble Valley and for Rutland and Melton chose not to mention their party's dismal record on international development issues. Nevertheless, I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley for securing the debate. It is always helpful for us to be reminded of the challenges posed by AIDS. The hon. Gentleman asked the Government to focus specifically on what else the private sector can do, and I undertake to continue to examine that issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We have finished that debate a little early, but as the initiator of the next debate and the Minister responsible for responding to it are present, we can begin it some five minutes earlier than expected.

Health Service (Northern Ireland)

3.25 pm

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): I am grateful for the opportunity to have this debate, albeit in the dying moments of this Parliament. I again raise the issue of health, having done so at the Northern Ireland Grand Committee during the draft Budget debate. However, as the Minister who then responded was not the Health Minister, I hope for better answers today, and I am delighted to see the Minister in her place.

Health service provision is a major concern for people in Northern Ireland, because it has the worst waiting lists in the United Kingdom. As I said in the Grand Committee, the Audit Office report into the Province's hospital waiting lists, which was published last year, confirmed that Northern Ireland has the worst waiting lists in the United Kingdom. The Ulster public face longer waits to access services than patients in England, Scotland or Wales.

The latest quarterly waiting list statistics for the Province indicate slight improvements in relation to in-patient lists, which have been deemed a departmental priority. However the number requiring an initial hospital out-patient appointment continues to rise, and has almost doubled since 1998 to 164,672. In England, 1.8 per cent. of the population are on waiting lists for treatment, but in Northern Ireland the comparative figure is 3 per cent.

In seeking to improve the in-patient list, the out-patient lists are suffering. We even have waiting lists to get on to waiting lists. Greater investment in the training and recruitment of health professionals is essential and I also want to see the prompt restructuring of our dozens of health bodies to streamline decision making and enhance accountability.

Although a proposed increase of 9 per cent., up to £3.3 billion, in the current expenditure of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety may, on the surface, appear generous, health service inflation continues to grow at a much steeper rate. By 2007–08, the percentage rise that direct rule Ministers have committed themselves to will be less than 6 per cent. The positive public messages from Ministers do not equate with the demands and restrictions that they are placing on senior managers away from the media spotlight.

Differential access to private health care, as well as rurality, and factors related to ability to pay, reduce the differential spend per head on health and social services. Statistics indicate that, after assessing relative needs, to provide services at a comparative level would cost 17 per cent. more per person in Northern Ireland than in England. Different levels of private health care elevate that to 21 per cent. more to achieve the same level of service. However, the Barnett formula makes no allowance for differential need.

I want to make a particular point about the quality of Northern Ireland's hospital stock, which is very poor. There is also a greater backlog of maintenance compared with that in England. Many of our hospitals are of a substantial age and require redevelopment or replacement. Imaging and laboratory equipment that is more than 10 years old needs to be replaced to improve quality, effectiveness and staff productivity, and to reduce patient delays.

Although the cost of treating the victims of 35 years of terrorism soaked up hundreds of millions of pounds from the local health budget in past years, some imagine that, because violence has significantly reduced, those extra costs are no longer being incurred. Sadly, however, apart from the many new victims requiring attention, which do not make the headlines to the same extent, the health service still has to care for the victims of the past. For instance, bomb victims still require prosthetic limbs, and many still live with the psychological consequences of terrorism. And, of course, the trauma has not stopped. I unsuccessfully sought an estimate of the costs associated with caring for recent victims of the ongoing paramilitary beatings and shootings.

I am sure that the Minister has been briefed on the fact that the local press in Northern Ireland were this morning reporting the tragedy that is waiting to happen as ambulance cover falls to dangerous levels across the Province. Union officials report that large swathes of the Province were left without sufficient cover over Easter. On Easter Saturday, the entire city of Londonderry had no ambulance crew. Staff in other divisions had to scramble around to provide personnel.

On the same night, there was no vehicle to cover the night shift in Strabane, County Tyrone, so the crew were forced to drive a minibus the fifteen miles to Altnagelvin hospital to find an ambulance. Staff from Enniskillen were sent to Londonderry to cover an area with which they were unfamiliar. A patient was transferred in a day-care vehicle in order to free an emergency ambulance. Last Saturday night in East Antrim there was only one crew covering Whiteabbey, Rathcoole and Carrick, but there should have been at least two. The depot in Downpatrick regularly takes ambulances off the road because staff are unavailable.

A major overhaul of ambulance staffing is required to ensure that each depot has the appropriate number of personnel. I trust that the Minister will address that most critical matter. I fear to contemplate what might happen were a major incident to occur while we are reliant on an unsatisfactory skeleton service.

I hope that the Minister will deal also with the question of chemotherapy drugs, which illustrates the problem of rising costs in Northern Ireland. A new regional cancer centre will open its doors at Belfast City hospital early in 2006. However, hospitals, including Belfast City, recently had to produce emergency contingency plans because of multi-million pound shortfalls. One area identified for savings was that of cancer drugs. Thankfully, an injection of cash averted the withdrawal of those vital medications, but it highlights the difficulties that we face.

Diagnosing cancer earlier, and keeping more people alive, means treating cancer as a chronic disease, with third and fourth-line drugs often being required. Experience in other countries indicates that the rapid growth in the use of chemotherapy and haematology drug-based therapies will continue. Cancer drugs are also being used more frequently for symptom control.

Chemotherapy drug costs at Belfast City hospital rose by about £3 million last year, and £1.4 million had to be found just to maintain the services currently being provided. More cancer patients are being diagnosed and treated in the Province every year. Day case and out-patient attendances at the City hospital were up by a staggering 30 per cent. in one year. We are building a new cancer centre of excellence and attempting to attract world leaders in the field to come and work in the Province, and funding is proving problematic. Cancer sufferers should be entitled to the very best treatments. It is dreadful to think that life-saving treatments may not be available to those in the greatest need because the local health service cannot afford them.

[Mrs. Iris Robinson]

Haematology patients also have concerns. A constituent of mine, Anne Aitchison, a lovely lady, has been campaigning for many years for improved local health services. In particular, she has been promoting the provision of coagulometers. Not only would those devices benefit patients, but they would save the local health service money and time. Patients currently face a trek to the hospital warfarin clinic, and they often have to wait several hours for the results of an invasive blood test before seeing a doctor.

Regular hospital attendance can swallow up a significant part of the lives of patients whose blood needs to be checked every week; it can result in the loss of a whole day from work or education. Massive resources are used in warfarin clinics. Doctors and nurses are needed to conduct expensive blood tests, and ambulances are sometimes required to collect patients, whereas the new coagulometers can be used by patients in their own homes, and involve only a small pinprick, much like blood glucose monitoring. It is much easier to use them, especially where elderly and confused patients are concerned, than to take intravenous blood samples.

In Germany, hand-held coagulometers have been provided for approximately 100,000 patients, but in Northern Ireland, where some 1.5 per cent. of the population requires oral anticoagulation therapy, they can be acquired only by private means or through fundraising. The use of coagulometers empowers patients to take greater responsibility for their care, something that the Government have been keen to encourage. They should be made more widely available through the national health service, and I hope that the Minister will consider favourably the ongoing pleas of warfarin patients.

My party has been considering general improvements that could be made to the health service in Northern Ireland, and we aim to publish proposals in a policy document shortly. There is little direct responsibility or accountability in any tier of health care management in the Province. We need transparency in spending and detailed audit trails. In recent years, a huge amount of money has been thrown at problems, and it has disappeared without trace. There must be targeted strategies with clear responsibility and accountability. Under the 1998 Belfast agreement, the Sinn Fein Health Minister acted as she pleased, regardless of the views of the Health Committee, the Assembly or her Executive colleagues. If ever a new Executive is created, there must be more opportunities for scrutiny, and Ministers must be prevented from acting unilaterally.

The Minister will know that our health care staff perform complicated procedures in pressurised environments. However, they often feel unappreciated, and are suffering a morale problem. That must change if the national health service is to retain the cream of the health professionals, who are frustrated that they cannot deliver the optimum service. Maximum use should be made of highly trained staff. It is inappropriate for specialists to perform tasks that could be done by others who are less qualified.

Despite the new general medical services contract, general practitioners struggling to find beds for their patients feel undervalued, overburdened and unsupported. They do not have enough time to spend with patients, and that sometimes results in inappropriate referrals to already crowded emergency departments. Approximately 90 per cent. of national health service patients are dealt with in primary care. That speciality must not be allowed to suffer on account of acute care pressures.

The DUP wants to decrease administrative bureaucracy, not just to save money but also to streamline decision making and create a more efficient system. We advocate that, as a result of the ongoing review of public administration, the number of boards and trusts should be slashed to leave no more than half a dozen authorities. A single body should oversee regional services, and money must be channelled to front-line services rather than being frittered away in administrative costs. However, it is essential that the expertise developed over many years should not be lost as a result of such rationalisation. A co-ordinated health care network must develop, and replication of services must cease.

Significant investment is required in order to improve efficiency in the service. We advocate increased funding, in excess of the Barnett formula, to ensure that those in the Province receive a standard of care that not only matches the best found elsewhere in the United Kingdom, but relates to need. We are talking not just about providing extra beds but about finding more staff, which will lead to an improvement in hospital services. We urge the provision of more radiographers and extra physiotherapists, occupational therapists and speech therapists, and we would like more doctors and nursing staff to be trained locally.

We should invest in areas in which improvements are most likely to result in reduced spending in future. We must think holistically about the impact of ill health on our society; that includes the costs of long-term care, benefits and absence from work. There are insufficient residential, domiciliary and nursing home places and, of those that exist, a large proportion are nursing home places, which are the most expensive. At any one time in the Province, there are 400 individuals blocking beds in Northern Ireland hospitals because the resources do not exist in the community to support them. That contributes to access difficulties at the opposite end of the hospital admission cycle. A concerted effort must be made to remove that persistent brake on the system.

We have to plan for our ageing population. People are living longer now, which means a growing demand for health care among the elderly. More patients require treatment for conditions such as fractured hips, dementia and strokes. Our health service has been consistently overstretched for a number of years. That cannot continue indefinitely without repercussions. Rapid patient turnover contributes to rising levels of health care-acquired infections such as MRSA. Patients, including the infirm or disabled, and particularly their relatives, are fearful of their even going into hospital in case they come out in a worse condition than when they went in. That is totally unacceptable in today's age.

Aside from the threat to life, those acquired infections have massive resource implications for the health service. The Government must clearly address that issue rapidly. The capacity levels at which our hospitals consistently operate also raise questions about how we could cope if there was a major outbreak of influenza or an unpredicted pandemic. We must ensure that we have and maintain a sufficient stockpile of antiviral drugs for such an eventuality. I would be interested to hear from the Minister what level of preparedness exists in Northern Ireland.

I have previously expressed concerns regarding the contracting out of cleaning services at local hospitals. There must be appropriate regulation centrally of standards of cleanliness in each trust.

Individuals should be encouraged to adopt greater personal responsibility for healthy living, particularly in relation to diet and exercise. There still needs to be greater awareness of the danger and effects of binge drinking, smoking and illicit drug use. I strongly support a comprehensive ban on smoking in public places, which should be introduced with immediate effect. Another issue that concerns the general public is the difficulty patients and their relatives have in accessing details about their condition or treatment. Those on waiting lists should be provided with the best possible indication of when they are likely to be called for treatment. Uncertainly only exacerbates their ill health. Greater health service transparency would be welcomed.

Conditions such as diabetes are rapidly becoming more common. Many such illnesses do not attract media headlines, but lead to lifelong suffering for those affected. The long-term costs are very high when people with those conditions deteriorate. I contend that early and best treatment is not only best for the patient but for our economy. Equally, new anti-TNF medications have the potential to transform the lives of the most severe sufferers of rheumatoid arthritis. Such patients could return to or remain in work if more of those drugs were funded. Let us ensure that that medication is distributed where needed, rather than on a postcode basis.

Mental health and learning disabilities have traditionally been underfunded. The child and adolescent psychiatry service in the Province requires major improvement, particularly given the large number of suicides among young people in Northern Ireland.

This Government maintain that, alongside education, health is one of their greatest priorities. The public in Northern Ireland have not seen the improvements over the past four years that they would like to have seen. It is to be hoped that whoever has responsibility for the Province's health after the election will do everything that they can to ensure that the people of Armagh, Antrim and Ards are treated exactly the same as those anywhere else in England, Scotland or Wales.

3.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela Smith): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) for raising the issue of health service funds in Northern Ireland. I apologise for not being available to answer her questions in the Committee. I am sure that she understands that I always make a great effort to answer the many questions that she asks, and am happy to do so. I hope that my colleagues were able to deal with her queries.

The hon. Lady is right to say that, like other health services, health and personal social services in Northern Ireland has had to cope with the combined effect of increasing demands, increased public expectations and the high cost of new technologies. Given the pressures, the service has responded well to those demands, and I praise the staff. On each visit I have made to every hospital, care home and other institution in the health service, I have had nothing but praise and admiration for the work the staff do, sometimes under pressures that we are doing our best to alleviate but which are not acceptable. I hold the staff in the highest regard for the work that they do.

Demand for health and personal social services varies across the UK, but we have to recognise that there are high levels of need in Northern Ireland. To start with, it concerns me that general health is worse across Northern Ireland than it is in England. The morbidity and mortality rates for major disease risks are among the worst in Europe. There is a high level of severe disabilities and I have no doubt that 30 years of conflict—euphemistically called the troubles—has had an impact on people's mental health. That is sometimes not recognised until it manifests itself in some physical way, but it is a pressure that must be recognised.

I am also concerned that injuries from road traffic collisions in Northern Ireland are higher than anywhere else in the whole of the UK, which creates additional pressure on hospital admissions. The way to tackle that is by reducing the number of collisions that take place, reducing the number of people who are killed or seriously injured. The hon. Lady will be aware of the efforts made by the Department of the Environment, and as the Minister responsible for road safety I have made a particular commitment to reduce those numbers. There have been some successes but not enough notice has been taken of the messages we have put forward.

In all those areas demands will continue to increase. There have been technological developments and medical advances but Northern Ireland will also be affected by the growth in the elderly population. There is a projected growth of 52 per cent. over the next 20 years compared with 41 per cent. in the UK as a whole.

Having outlined where there are difficulties, which the hon. Lady has done as well, it is right to outline some of the achievements. We should look particularly at the areas of improving health and reducing waiting times. I am always loth to talk just about reducing waiting lists; I do not think that people care much how many other people are on the list. It is a question of how long it takes someone to get the treatment they need.

I want to look at what is being achieved. I am sorry that the hon. Lady said that money has been wasted and that people have seen no response. I dispute that. Although there are enormous pressures, a lot has been achieved and staff work particularly hard to see the results of the investment put in. I can tell her that since 1997–98 the volume of hospital in-patient and day case activity has increased by 17.5 per cent. More people are being treated.

[Angela Smith]

Community care packages are particularly relevant when we refer to bed blocking. That is not a phrase I like to use; I think delayed discharge is more appropriate. The person in that bed would probably welcome the opportunity to be moved from hospital and have a proper care package. The phrase "bed blocking" can be detrimental to them. The number of community care packages increased by 36 per cent. between March 1998 and March 2004. The average length of stay in hospital has reduced by 10 per cent., allowing better use of hospital beds, and the throughput per bed in the acute hospital sector has increased by 17 per cent. Again, more people are being treated.

Comparing 1997–98, when we first came into government, with 2003–04, the day case rate has increased from 25.5 per cent. to 31.3 per cent. That means we have got people through hospital more quickly to allow others to have operations. In relation to general health issues, between 1998 and 2002, life expectancy has increased in Northern Ireland by 1.3 years for males and 0.9 years for females.

The hon. Lady did not mention oral health in her comments, but she has put questions to me on that before, and I know that she has interests in that area. Oral health is still very bad, but it has improved significantly for both adults and children. From 1979 to 1998, the proportion of adults without any natural teeth fell from 33 per cent. to 12 per cent. and over the past 20 years, the average number of decayed teeth per 12-year-old child has dropped from 4.8 to 2.7. Looking at the health cost weighted activity index, we see an increase in health output. People are getting generally healthier; we are moving in the right direction.

Among the key reasons have been the financial priority given to the needs of health and personal social services in recent years, as well as the financial stability of boards and trusts, and the ways in which they have operated. The hon. Lady said that she wanted the treatment of Northern Ireland to approach closer to equality with England. As to outcomes, I agree; but I do not think that the hon. Lady would agree about that in relation to financing, because current Treasury figures show that expenditure per head of population is 12 per cent. higher in Northern Ireland than in England.

Health needs remain Northern Ireland's top priority when resources are allocated across Departments. That is reflected in the increase in spending of nearly 25 per cent. in the past three years, and the planned growth of more than 23 per cent. for the next three years. That planned increase over the next three years can be compared with other Northern Ireland Departments. In health and personal social services, the increase will be 9.5 per cent., 6.8 per cent. and 5.3 per cent., and across other Departments the figures will be 6.6 per cent., 4.9 per cent. and 4.3 per cent. The financial uplifts will be £290 million, £230 million and £188 million.

Much of the increased funding will be required to meet the cost of reforming the pay and conditions of practically all staff, under "Agenda for Change", the general medical services contract and the consultants' contract. Those pay deals are significantly higher than the cost of inflation, because they are intended not only to make the health service more competitive in the job market and properly to reward the staff, who make a tremendous contribution, but to facilitate increased flexibility in working patterns and the redesign of existing jobs. The result is improvements in quantity and quality of work. Our biggest asset, in health and personal social services, is the staff we employ. I make no apologies for the fact that the increases are going to the staff, who are the people who make the difference.

The increases in funding also bring several new developments into play, including the cancer centre that was mentioned, the acquired brain injury unit, the medium secure unit, redevelopments at the Ulster hospital and the Mater advanced wards. There will be additional capacity at Antrim hospital and—I am pleased that the hon. Lady mentioned this point—the regional centre for adolescent psychiatric inpatients. The hon. Lady will know what heavy pressure there has been on that service, and I have, with officials, been considering ways to meet the very heavy demands, and to adopt perhaps broader and more holistic ways of thinking about the pressures on young people, which in some cases lead them to feel that the only way forward is to make an attempt on their life. We want to improve services and think more holistically about the range of services available to young people.

Specific resources will also be ring-fenced for a range of specific service developments, including the improvement of foster care, the introduction of improved child protection arrangements, renal, cancer and cardiology services, support for carers, further enhancement for ambulance services, which, we recognise, is needed, and additional medical students; the last point is relevant to the issue of staff that has already been raised.

The hon. Lady specified the need for capital investment. I do not know if she is aware of the moneys that are being made available through the Budget statement; however, resources totalling nearly £600 million were made available for capital developments in health, social services and public safety, for the incoming budget period 2005 to 2008. That will continue the major hospital modernisation programme set out in "Developing Better Services", alongside a range of continuing regional and local developments, including primary and community care, learning disability and residential child care. Further phases of development programmes at the Royal Victoria, Ulster and Altnagelvin sites will continue, and planning and enabling work for new hospital modernisation schemes will be taken forward; that will include the new south-west hospital, redevelopment at Craigavon hospital complex and expansion at Antrim.

On examining the figures and the spending increase I do not find it acceptable that spending that is 12 per cent. higher than spending in England does not give good or better quality outcomes for patients. I do not think that it is enough to say that Northern Ireland experiences greater pressures and that the only answer is to spend more; we are spending more. Clearly something must be done about how we spend the money more wisely. I want every penny to count, in the interest of patients. We need to undertake a critical review of the matter.

The hon. Lady will be aware of the Appleby report. We have asked Professor Appleby of the King's Fund to conduct a review of health and social care provision across Northern Ireland. Similar reviews have been carried out in England and in Wales.

The review will consider how the money is spent. It may have other terms of reference, but I am confident that it will highlight the ways in which we can use the money that we have more effectively and, if additional spending is needed, how we can use that most effectively. We need to consider current demand in relation to the funding available and decide whether we are doing the best for patients with the money available.

The hon. Lady also mentioned the structures of the health and social services, which sometimes strike me as overly bureaucratic. A point was made about transparency. The staff do the best that they can but the structures hamper them in many ways.

The review of public administration is open for consultation and addresses many of the points that have been made by ensuring that we have a structure that is commensurate with the work that is to be done and that does not overburden staff, officials and others who are trying to provide a better health service.

I hope that those two points will address the hon. Lady's questions and will show that they are being taken very seriously. We have every intention of ensuring as quickly as possible that we have the best possible structures to secure the best possible outcome.

As far as modernisation, reform and efficiency are concerned, we want the same targets for health and social services as we do for other parts of the public sector. The challenge is not simply to spend more but to spend more wisely. What is most important is the outcome for patients. Unless we achieve the necessary outcomes, we are not doing them the service that they need with the money that we have available.

The hon. Lady asked about pandemic preparations. I assure her that the Department has done a considerable amount of planning for some time and continues to do so. A supply of antiviral drugs has been obtained and currently amounts to more than 4 million, which is equivalent to the number of antiviral drugs available in the other parts of the UK.

The hon. Lady also mentioned a smoking ban, which is close to my heart. The consultation on that closed on 23 March. As she will appreciate, there has been a considerable amount of interest in the issue and a range of opinions has been expressed. We are going through all the responses to ascertain the balance, and I will report back in due course.

I do, however, urge a word of caution. There is a view in some quarters that a smoking ban solves all health problems caused by smoking. It does not. Even if we had a smoking ban, we would still need to pursue our current strategy: the tobacco action plan. Such a ban is all very well for people who smoke in public places, but many people smoke in their own homes and with children around. Smoking must therefore still be addressed, regardless of any smoking ban.

I can tell the hon. Lady that £400,000 of additional funding is being provided in the 2004–05 Budget for the ambulance service. The same amount will be provided in the following Budget.

Staffing issues are serious and have been a problem for some time. The amount of additional support that is being given through the "Agenda for Change" to provide better support, salaries and training for staff does make a difference. I am optimistic that that addresses the problem, although I do not underestimate the size of the problem. Work has been done through the "Agenda for Change" to address the sorts of problems to which hon. Members referred.

More places are also being provided for medical students. Some 81 places have been created at Queen's medical school this autumn, which is a 50 per cent. increase in the number of medical students in only two years. The hon. Lady also mentioned specialist drugs, and I assure her that additional funding is being found to try to address the increasing needs.

I hope that our discussion of a range of issues has shown that much planning has been done to ensure that we meet the demands of the health service in the 21st century, and that we are doing our very best within the Budget to meet the increasing demands that have been placed on us. We must decide whether we are spending our money wisely enough, whether we can do more and whether we can do some things better. All those questions are constantly under review to give us the best possible health service.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): We now move to the last debate, which was initiated by the hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston). I hope that I may be permitted from the Chair to wish him well when he leaves the House at this election. He has served the House well for three years as Solicitor-General, and we honour and respect his decision to leave.

Whistleblowing

4 pm

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful for your kind remarks.

First, I declare my interest as a former trustee and chairman of the whistleblowing charity Public Concern at Work. Secondly, I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office for dragging him here this afternoon. I know that he has many other important and pressing matters on his plate, but I hope to make it clear that this issue is important and affects matters for which my hon. Friend has responsibility and in which he has taken a close interest both before and since he entered the House, particularly the need to regenerate civil society.

This issue demands and deserves to be revisited at this time. I particularly want to raise the question of where it best sits in the machinery of government. I am pleased that the Government have done a great deal to advance whistleblowing, particularly by supporting the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998, to which I shall return, and by advancing the interest in Government.

It may help if I briefly explain the background to the Act. The idea of legislation on whistleblowing was first raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright), who is beside me, in 1995. A private Member's Bill was introduced the following year by my hon. Friend who is now the Under-Secretary of State for Wales. Unfortunately, the Bill did not reach the statute book because it was opposed by the then Government. However, its practical approach secured the support not only of business and other key interests outside the House, but of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in an important speech that he made in 1996.

The Act was introduced as a private Member's Bill shortly after the 1997 election by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), who is here today. He was a strong and long supporter of the measure, and it was his fortitude that got it on to the statute book; I pay tribute to him for that. With the support of the Government and the formidable help of the Minister without Portfolio, my right hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), who was then a Minister at the Department of Trade and Industry, the Act was one of the first measures to be enacted by the Labour Government.

I set out that sequence of events because it explains several things. First, it shows that the Act neither emanated from nor passed through the ordinary machinery of government as a Government Bill would. Of course, it remains central and at the cutting edge of the developing relationship between Government, business and civil society, and I believe that the interface between those different conceptual interests is especially important to much of what the Government are doing.

Where the Act has been promoted and understood as a cultural measure, it has been a success, and it retains the support of all key interests. Abroad, it has become an international benchmark and Public Concern at Work has assisted Governments in countries as diverse as Japan, the Netherlands and South Africa in adopting and implementing the same legislative approach to accountability and the public interest. In fact, my hon. Friend the Minister will be interested to know that, in Japan, the Cabinet Office is responsible for almost identical legislation, because it is seen primarily as impacting on quality of life.

In this country, because of the history that I have outlined, the 1998 Act is part of employment legislation. Therefore, responsibility for it in the Government falls on the individual rights section of the employment relations unit in the Department of Trade and Industry. The result is that the Department with responsibility for the legislation cannot readily view it as a governance or cultural measure, which I have argued is the right way to see whistleblowing. The promoters of the 1998 Act certainly saw it as an employment rights measure, but they regarded it primarily as one dealing with governance and institutional culture.

Inasmuch as the 1998 Act is a cultural or governance measure, the promotional task is undertaken not so much by the Government, who see whistleblowing as an employment rights issue, but by the charity Public Concern at Work. The charity's work has enjoyed the support of leading companies, regulators, trade unions and various Departments, particularly the Department of Health. The charity has unrivalled experience of providing people unsure whether and how to raise concerns about wrongdoing with free advice. It has also helped organisations in the public, private and voluntary sectors to reap the benefits of a whistleblowing culture. I pay tribute to the charity's dynamic director, Guy Dehn.

I am grateful that the Minister is responding to this debate, because it is becoming apparent, I hope, that he is particularly well placed—through his position in the Cabinet Office and the more important positions that I am sure he will assume after the election—to ensure that the notion of whistleblowing as a feature of governance and institutional culture will become an important part of Government policy. I do not want to overstate the case, but the Government can help and guide people when they confront a whistleblowing dilemma in their personal life or their employment. If people are concerned about fraud, wrongdoing or health and safety abuse, they need guidance. The Government need to provide that to them.

On the wider significance of whistleblowing, I can do no better than quote from Dame Janet Smith's recent report into the murders by Dr. Harold Shipman. Dame Janet concluded with a crucial point:

> "I believe that the willingness of one healthcare professional to take responsibility for raising concerns about the conduct, performance or health of another could make a greater potential contribution to patient safety than any other single factor."

Whistleblowing is about empowerment, as she makes clear when she summarises the value and dilemma that it poses:

> "The raising of genuinely held concerns about issues of public importance is to be encouraged. The public interest may be served in many different ways, such as by the prevention or detection of crime, by the prevention of accidents or by the protection of the public purse."

Barriers to whistleblowing include

> "the fear of being seen as a troublemaker or 'maverick', the fear of recriminations and a feeling of impotence grounded in the belief that, even if the report is made, nothing will be done about it."

To help to address that dilemma in the health service, Dame Janet recommends greater awareness among both the health service work force and the general public of the role that whistleblowing can play. She also recommends the increased availability of confidential guidance to those who are faced with a whistleblowing dilemma.

One simple but important way in which the Government can foster an empowering culture is to accept the recommendations set out in the recent report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life. In an authoritative review of how whistleblowing is working, the Committee emphasises that an organisational culture that encourages the raising of concerns about wrongdoing is one where the principles of public life can far more readily take root. That, it says, is because the contribution that whistleblowing can make to an organisation's internal culture is as "an instrument of good governance and a manifestation of a more open culture."

As we all know, that in turn informs trust in government.

The Committee's report "emphatically endorsed" the approach of Public Concern at Work and recommended that the leaders of public bodies commit their organisations to several key elements of good practice. Those include ensuring that staff are aware of and trust the whistleblowing avenues; providing realistic advice on what that process means for openness, confidentiality and anonymity; continually reviewing how the procedures work; and regularly communicating to staff the avenues open to them.

The recommendations are practical and sound, and they commend themselves because they will help ensure that when people face the whistleblowing dilemma they have the necessary guidance. I would be delighted to hear from my hon. Friend that the Government endorse the Committee's recommendations. I hope that he will have no difficulty in endorsing the practical approach that the Committee takes towards the role that whistleblowing can and should play in not only promoting good governance but empowering people with the confidence to inform, influence and involve themselves in events close to them.

A second recommendation that the Committee has made on whistleblowing also impacts on the work of the Cabinet Office, although it is about that part that informs and improves the role of regulation. The Committee recommends:

"All regulators should review their procedures for handling whistleblowing by individuals and bodies under their jurisdiction, drawing upon good practice."

That meshes well with the recommendations made to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in the Hampton review about refreshing—if I may use the jargon—regulatory cultures.

Today I raise the policy issues that impact on and will greatly benefit from a greater understanding of whistleblowing. The issue raised by Dame Janet relates specifically to health; another raised by the Hampton review relates to regulatory cultures; and possibly the most important issue relates to standards across public life. Conceptually speaking, whistleblowing is a fine example of civil society working successfully with business and government. My concern is that the issue is not best placed in the machinery of government while it remains in the employment rights unit at the Department of Trade and Industry. That is no criticism whatever of the DTI, but of necessity. Due to whistleblowing being placed there, it is considered to be an issue of individual employment rights.

The Committee rightly concluded:

"The statutory framework in the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998 is a helpful driver but must be recognised as a 'backstop' which can provide redress when things go wrong, not as a substitute for cultures that actively encourage challenge of inappropriate behaviour".

The Shipman report recommends that the Act be amended, and I hope that, in that context, the more general issues that I have raised about the future of whistleblowing will be addressed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): I should advise the Chamber that two Members—the hon. Members for Aldridge-Brownhills and for Cannock Chase—have sought the permission of the initiator of the debate, the Minister and the Chair to participate briefly.

4.15 pm

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): In the few minutes that I have, I would like to add my sentiments to those expressed by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is a great privilege and honour to follow the hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston). His honesty, candour and sheer decency as a fellow representative of the west midlands will be sorely missed by members of all parties and of no parties in our region. His work on this subject has been of enormous importance.

I am not certain what the hon. and learned Gentleman meant when he spoke about the important position of the Minister after the election; I do not know whether it is an indication that he is retiring and seeking pastures new or whether, if my party is right, he is taking up a Front-Bench position in the Opposition.

Perhaps the greatest whistleblower that I have had the privilege to meet and know is the Japanese ambassador to Britain. He was a senior official in the Japanese Foreign Ministry, and he blew the whistle on his Foreign Minister. She was the daughter of a former Japanese Prime Minister and an enormously popular figure in Japan. The culture in Japan—a culture that prevails in much of the world—was that anyone who cites a wrong or brings it into the open is risking their job, and in the way of these things, he ended up in London in a distinguished post for a think-tank. However, the world rights itself sometimes, and, as I said, he is now Japan's ambassador to the United Kingdom.

The case that by his actions the now ambassador raised was important. Japanese public opinion came to understand that there was a deep wrong—a malaise in the Foreign Ministry that many thought was part of the signature of Japanese culture. His act—painful and difficult for him at the time, but by his honour necessary—helped change a climate of opinion in a Japan that wanted to modernise. I would like to think that senior officials in Government Departments would occasionally speak up here, but that takes me beyond the brief.

[Mr. Richard Shepherd]

What is important is the recognition of good governance and of the fact that there is a public interest in a wider circle of people understanding the ethical basis on which Government, the administration of great companies and the actions in little businesses all help to elevate the standard of and belief in propriety across the nation. That is why people such as the hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North and my colleague and neighbour the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright) have laboured long to bring about the legislation. It is a merit that the Government supported the measure and introduced it, allied with the other great measure that complements and reinforces it: freedom of information. I hate the word "empowerment", but these measures lift a society. We are equal citizens, and we believe in an ethical, good and just society. That is the principle behind the work.

In the natural British way, we look to institutions. We have the distinguished work, to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred, of the Committee on Standards in Public Life. The recommendations are clear and worth while.

Part of the difficulty that I have encountered over recent years is the tenacity with which the Department of Trade and Industry views the measure as merely an employment measure. That is limiting and gives rise to suspicions in people's minds. The principle behind the Act, which, as I said, was supported by the Government, was to raise a standard, not to be a backstop for compensation for a wrong. People that have suffered a wrong must be entitled to some form of compensation, but we have moved on to different ground and, therefore, I want to reinforce the structural point that the hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North made. As in Japan, the matter should be right at the heart of Government. The responsibility would sit better with the Cabinet Office than the DTI.

If we are to tackle these areas of difficulty in public and private life—private individuals are affected as well, and the Shipman report echoes this message—the Minister should endorse the proposals and recommendations of the Committee on Standards in Public Life and argue within Government that this is the instrument by which they can effect the purposes behind the Act.

4.21 pm

Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): I rise briefly to do two things. First, I join the tributes to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston), who is my office neighbour. The House will be hugely deprived of his expertise. I have been inspecting his rubbish in the corridor, and this morning among the things that he was throwing out I came across a huge volume entitled "The Legislative Enactments of the Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka". Not many people, when they clean out their office, can dispose of volumes of that quality and character. He will be hugely missed, and I shall miss him as an office companion. It is entirely appropriate that he should have secured this debate on whistleblowing for what may be his swansong in the House.

Secondly, those of us who played a role in the genesis of the whistleblowing legislation never saw it as a narrow employment rights measure; we always saw it as a measure that would transform the governance of public and private organisations. In so far as it has been narrowed into an employment measure, that is understandable but regrettable. However, report after report now states that we must think more widely about whistleblowing. The Shipman report is only the latest report to say how crucial the role of whistleblowing is in the good ordering of organisations. The Government will always take huge credit for having ensured that the measure came on to the statute book. After the election, I hope that they will revisit the measure and think about how to carry it forward so that it can genuinely become the basis for a cultural revolution.

4.24 pm

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Mr. David Miliband): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright). As he began to talk about a cultural revolution, it might be time to revive some old Maoist songs, but this is probably not the occasion to do so. I feel like a pygmy in the presence of three giants of good government and legislative reform. They should all have the thanks of not only the whole House, but the whole country for the work that they have done together and separately.

I add my sorrow at the departure of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) but also my gratitude for the enormous contribution that he has made in his eight years in the House. As you pointed out, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he served as Solicitor-General and made a signal contribution, especially in respect of youth justice, in which he took a particular interest. He has also been on the Standards and Privileges Committee. Fortunately, I have never had to appear before him, but I am sure that he performed that role with distinction.

It is important to put it on the record that as a Minister and as a Back Bencher, my hon. and learned Friend worked hard to secure better compensation for vaccine-damaged children, an issue to which he has devoted enormous energy. Whether it be academia, the world of finance or the world of the law, their gain is our loss. I am sure that we have not heard the last of him.

I want to make a few points in the short time available to me. I am glad that the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) linked the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998, on which we are focusing today, and the Freedom of Information Act 2000. He is right that they go together. I share the view held by my hon. and learned Friend that the passage on to the statute book of the Act in 1998 with wide support put whistleblowing on a new footing. The background to the Act has been sufficiently dwelt on, and I will not stick with it. However, it is significant that American campaigners should have described it as "the most far-reaching whistleblower law in the world".

That is important.

As world leaders, we have no room for complacency. The legislation covers the private and public sectors and encourages employers and employees to co-operate in dealing with problems. It is a matter of good governance and good government. All three hon. Members raised the issue of the relationship between the Cabinet Office and the DTI. I hope that I will not disappoint them unduly if I say that I am not going to announce machinery of government changes now. However, I do want to address head on their central point in calling for such changes, which is that whistleblowing is not a matter of employment law but one of culture. The Government agree. The need to build organisational cultures is a responsibility of central Government, as well as individual Departments.

In such a context, we should welcome the fact that there is agitation from outside this House, notably from Public Concern at Work. I applaud the work that has been done in civil society. Public Concern at Work has worked on the issue for many years and deserves credit for what has happened. However, the machinery is less important than the commitment. I have been impressed in my short time in the Cabinet Office to have discovered just how much the Cabinet Office is doing to promulgate a culture in the civil service that we would all support. The core values of the civil service are not merely set out, but there are procedures for individual civil servants to raise concerns. That sets the broader context for the conduct of civil servants.

It may be of interest to all three hon. Members to know that nominated officers have been identified in each Department, who act in that capacity in addition to their normal duties. They are directly responsible to the permanent secretary and are there to advise individual members of staff on the interpretation of the civil service code, on how to resolve a concern related to the code and on how such a concern can be taken forward through departmental procedures and, if requested, to pass concerns on to the appropriate point in the Department if they are satisfied that the matter falls within the scope of the code. The work is proactive and it betokens the significance of the cultural changes that my hon. and learned Friend is talking about.

My hon. and learned Friend also mentioned the health service. The NHS has been working with Public Concern at Work to promulgate the whistleblowing guidance first issued in September 1999, stating that every NHS trust and health authority should have in place policies and procedures that comply with the 1998 Act. A policy pack was issued to all NHS employees—all 1.3 million of them—in July 2003, specifically tailored to the needs of individual GPs and their staff, as well as hospital staff.

With respect to the Committee on Standards in Public Life, I am happy to agree that its report is thoughtful, serious and common-sensical—practical, I think the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills said—but the extent of my enthusiasm for the recommendations cannot yet go as far as announcing the Government's conclusions on the reports. That is a matter for cross-departmental work, which is ongoing. However, we recognise the importance of the recommendations and are committed to taking them seriously. We will report back to the whole House as soon as possible.

On that note I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the tenth or eleventh time in this Parliament for overseeing business with which I have been involved. I conclude by thanking my hon. and learned Friend again for raising the issue.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Four o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 6 April 2005

[MR. EDWARD O'HARA in the Chair]

Tax Credits

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

9.30 am

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): I am delighted to have secured this debate and to be able to highlight problems that are causing misery and hardship not only in my constituency but, judging from the number of Members in the Chamber, in all constituencies. Citizens Advice Scotland sent me a briefing earlier this week saying that the problem is causing real hardship. It also said that the problem is working against both the Government's policy of social inclusion and against the Scottish Executive's policy on debt relief and debt help in Scotland. Citizens Advice has also produced a leaflet; I do not have a copy, but I understand that it is entitled "Debt Problems and Tax Credits".

I start by stating what it is that I seek to achieve this morning, and what it is that I do not seek to achieve. I say immediately that I do not seek to question the policy of tax credits. Indeed, I welcome the real help that the policy has given to many of my constituents; many hard-up families are undoubtedly better off for it. I appreciate the help that the system has given them. No; I seek to highlight what I believe to be a serious deficiency in the administration of the policy, which is causing severe hardship to a small but significant number of my constituents. That small number of people have just as much right to be properly treated by the system as those for whom there has been no problem.

I shall focus on the question of overpayment. I am not speaking of overpayments that have come about through any fault of the claimant, nor those that have resulted through fraud or attempted fraud. I speak only of overpayments caused by Revenue error. Overpayments can come about in a variety of ways. For instance, income might have risen by more than £2,500 during the tax year, but the claimant did not inform the Inland Revenue; or the claimant did not inform the Revenue of a change of circumstances; and the information supplied by the claimant could have been incorrect. Lastly, it could be caused by official error—a miscalculation on the part of the Revenue. It is on that last point that I shall focus.

I draw attention to two points. The first is that when claimants have done everything in their power to advise the Revenue of a change of circumstance or have said that they think something has been done badly or incorrectly, the system, like some Orwellian photocopier, keeps churning out awards and demands and completely ignores the contact that the claimant has made. The second is the sheer volume—

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I do not want to anticipate the hon. Gentleman, but I wonder whether he would include in that list of examples the steady stream of families that return money that they are pretty certain they are not entitled to, only to be reassured that it is part of their entitlement—and then, to their chagrin, they are landed with an overpayment assessment at the end of the year. Such circumstances are difficult to understand.

John Thurso: The hon. Gentleman puts his finger on one of the main problems that I seek to address today. I have confined myself to three examples, but I suspect that hon. Members on both sides of the House will have 20, 30 40 or even 50 examples in their caseload. The problem is that people have recognised that they have been overpaid and have sought to give the money back. In one of the cases to which I shall refer, a lady tried to repay the money by cheque and was told that there was no facility for receiving it. Ultimately, after having insisted and been told that the money was hers, she eventually spent it. Such people find themselves in hardship and debt as a result.

The second point is the sheer volume of errors, either human or computer, that now seem to occur within the system. I begin by asking the Minister some simple questions. First, is not the credit system designed to help those who are worst off and most dependent on help? Secondly, are not those people, by the very nature of their circumstances, among the most challenged? They often live in the most difficult circumstances, and the system should be a lifeline, rather than a torpedo. Thirdly, is it reasonable to expect such people to second-guess a system whose complexity is such that even trained accountants and Revenue personnel find it difficult to understand the problem at the heart of each case?

The problems first started to come to my attention several months into the 2003 financial year. There was a steady stream of complaints from those who had previously received working families tax credit. As a result of the migration from that credit to the working tax credit and the child tax credit, one or other of the two entitlements was getting lost and families were suffering. At the time, I put that down simply to a change in the system and I did my best to deal with the problems, as I am sure that other hon. Members did.

At this point, I must pay tribute to those who work on and service the hotline for MPs, because my office and I have had a phenomenal service from them. They have taken tremendous care and made a great effort. Sometimes, they have been on the telephone with my office for more than an hour at a time, and they have worked hard to make corrections and issue emergency awards to relieve hardship. In a way, it is a testimony to the difficult nature and depth of the problem that, notwithstanding their effort, I have had to refer so many cases to Ministers.

Over the past year, the issue of overpayment has come very much to the forefront of my work. In the overwhelming number of cases that have been brought to my attention, the error has occurred when claimants' circumstances have changed. For example, one partner has gone back to work, or the wife has come off maternity leave. The claimants have notified the changes to the Revenue, which has noted the additional income for the spouse who has gone back to work, but it has somehow deleted the income for the spouse whose circumstances have remained unchanged. That seems to be one of the root causes of the problem.

[John Thurso]

In a parliamentary question, I asked the Chancellor

"how many (a) working and (b) child tax credit award notices issued to couples in 2003–04 omitted the earnings of one of the partners resulting in an overpayment which the Revenue is now seeking to recover".

The Paymaster General started her answer with the helpful comment:

"The information requested is not available."

She then went on to say:

"The Inland Revenue is aware of a small number of occasions in 2003–04 when a tax credit award notice omitted the earnings of one partner. No separate records are available of precisely how many cases were involved."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 1 March 2005; Vol. 431, c. 1064W.]

On 10 January, the Paymaster General made a statement in answer to another question. She said:

"By the end of December 2004 about 78,000 taxpayers had returned Form TC846, or had otherwise been recorded as requesting the write-off of their overpayments on grounds of official error. About 41,000 requests had been decided by that date, and about 1,600 families had their overpayments written off for that reason."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 10 January 2005; Vol. 429, c. 129W.]

Pursuant to my earlier question, I asked further

"whether the omission of earnings of one partner on tax credits awards issued in 2003–04 occurred as a result of (a) human processing error and (b) a computer systems failure."

In response, the Paymaster General said:

"This error occurred when staff did not follow the correct procedure to update the tax credits computer system with more recent information".—[Official Report, House of Commons, 4 April 2005; Vol. 432, c. 1176W.]

That was the critical part of her answer, which changes the nature of the problem, from a software or computer problem, for which the Revenue had agreed to waive the overpayment, to a human error, for which the Revenue will not make payment. That might explain why, of the 78,000 taxpayers returning the form and the 41,000 requests decided, a mere 1,600 people had their overpayments waived.

David Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman endorse the view of a number of organisations campaigning on the issue that the right to recover overpayments resulting from official error ought to be ended and, rather wider of that point, that there ought to be statutory tests for recoverability, which should not operate in a framework that owes too much to the discretion of the individual assessing the case?

John Thurso: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. One of the things that strikes me most when comparing the social security system with the tax credit system is that in each case the social security system has a proper appeal procedure, ending in an almost judicial process, whereas there is no such process in the credit system. Each decision is entirely down to the choice of the particular official dealing with the case. It would be much more helpful if there were at least a proper set of guidelines or, at best, a formal system.

I asked the Minister another question. The Paymaster General referred to "a small number of people", but what is a small number? If my case work is anything to go by, the number may be small to the Treasury, but not to those who are affected by it—in fact, the issue is the biggest in my case work. I have to deal with the full range of issues, right across the spectrum, as, I am sure, does every hon. Member. However, tax credits has more files than any other item. Why are the details not being kept? I have experience of being a non-executive director of a plc and if we behaved like that, we would be brought to book by the authorities, because we would be required to keep such details and information. At the very least, we would be lambasted by a consumer organisation, and no doubt the Government or this place would be seeking to legislate.

I shall refer to the three cases that I have chosen as examples. I shall not use the names of the constituents, because I have not had an opportunity to ask them about that, and it would not be fair to use their precise names. However, I am in correspondence with the Paymaster General in connection with all three cases, and would be happy to give the Minister the names afterwards if he so wished. I was going to call the cases Mr. and Mrs. S, and so forth, until I discovered that the first two surnames both began with S, so instead I shall refer to them as case A, and so on. I also thought of referring to them as Mr. and Mrs. Caithness, Mr. and Mrs. Sutherland, and Mr. and Mrs. Easter Ross, but I shall stick with case A.

In 2003, the husband was in work. The wife notified the Inland Revenue of her return to work following the birth of their baby. Both their P60s, and seven payslips for the two of them, were handed in to the Inland Revenue office. The wife's earnings were recorded but, unbeknown to the couple, the husband's earnings were deleted. The couple took on a new housing commitment: they bought a house, and took on a mortgage based on their income as calculated in the light of the award. They did not enter into that commitment lightly, and it is not something that they could get out of lightly.

In 2004, the couple were told by the Inland Revenue that there had been an overpayment of £2,444. The Revenue admits the error, but the Paymaster General told me in a letter of 10 March that the Inland Revenue did not think that it was reasonable for the couple to believe that their award was correct when only one income was shown on the form. I have here the actual form from which it is supposed they should reasonably have deduced that there was a mistake. It has the wife's name quite clearly on one side, and underneath it says that she works 16 hours a week. The husband's name is underneath, and the form says that he works 40 hours a week. Under "total income" they have given the correct total for the two of them.

The form asks the couple to tell the Revenue if their annual income gets above a certain amount—and a figure of £7,560 is given opposite the section filled in by "Mrs. Sutherland"—as they may receive too much tax credit and may be asked to pay back the amount awarded. There is nothing in the form or in its layout to suggest that that figure refers to the combined total of the two incomes, which is stated on the form and which is, in fact, correct. The couple were, in my view, reasonably entitled to feel that they had been given a correct award. As I said, they took on a mortgage as a result of that reward, and are now in severe difficulties in attempting to deal with the situation that has come about. I do not believe that the ordinary literate and numerate man or woman on the street can reasonably be expected to find their way around a system with that degree of complexity.

The second case is of a husband who was made redundant in 2003. He informed all the relevant authorities, and he received jobseeker's allowance and a tax credit award. In May 2004, he started a new job, and all the authorities were informed of the change of circumstances. A steady flow of letters arrived from the Inland Revenue—in fact, he received seven in one day. He came to a clinic that I held in a village hall near where he lives, and produced a paper bag, from which he tipped a phenomenal pile of papers. I thought that I had problems filling out and dealing with my own tax demand, but when I saw the sheer complexity of his case, I thought to myself, "One would really need to employ an accountant to go through all of that."

The situation went on from there. It culminated, on 21 September 2004, with the couple receiving a demand for repayment of a child tax credit of £2,248.71 and of a working tax credit of £1,528.99. In a subsequent telephone call to the Inland Revenue, the couple were informed that the overpayment now stood at some £3,800—nearly £4,000—for the one tax credit, and at £2,300 for the other. Again, the Paymaster General has received details of this case. The couple are still awaiting a full explanation and clarification of their position. Between 5 February and 7 February this year, the couple received a further nine different award notices from the Inland Revenue, and on 26 February a further eight award notices were received. If the test is one of reasonableness, is it really reasonable that a constituent should be expected to deal with that volume of paperwork coming through their letterbox?

David Taylor: All this seems so familiar to those of us who were practising accountants when self-assessment was introduced. Eventually, the Inland Revenue got on top of that, and I hope that it will do so in this case. However, is it not unreasonable that of the 7 million families in the country, the 3 million that receive tax credit to the extent that it wipes out their tax liability should be provided with such impenetrable statements and that there should be no obligation to calculate separately and notify any alleged overpayment?

John Thurso: The hon. Gentleman again makes the exact point about the sheer complexity of the system. Let us not forget that that system is designed to help people who are most disadvantaged and on the lowest incomes. Although I do not for a moment suggest that they are of any less intellectual value than anybody else, such people, by their very nature and the circumstances in which they find themselves, are least likely to have either access to the professional help that is needed or the time to deal with such problems.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) made the point that the accountancy profession mastered self-assessment. The private sector is involved in that, because it is financially worth its while. However, in this matter, as my hon. Friend implies, there is little incentive for the private sector to give assistance because the people involved—the claimants who have been wronged—do not have the money or resources to pay for the relevant advice.

John Thurso: My hon. Friend has again put his finger on the button. Before I come to the third case, I should like to refer to what the ombudsman said to the Public Administration Committee on 2 December 2004:

> "If you have six different award notices and you have no real idea which of those, if any, is right, having a debate about whether you reasonably believed that that was the right figure is not helpful in those circumstances."

There is a wide opinion, shared on both sides of the House and among professionals, that there is a very real problem that has to be dealt with.

I shall touch on the third case. It involves a couple, one of whom has knowledge of the tax credit calculations through his employment; he works in a citizen's advice office. At the end of November and the beginning of December 2003, he started to telephone the tax credit office to say that he believed that an error had been made in the calculation. No adjustment was made.

On 12 January 2004, he confirmed in writing to the tax credit office his belief that the calculation had been wrongly made. He was particularly concerned not to build up overpayment, and he made five subsequent telephone calls. In the first, he was told that the case would be looked at. In the second, he was told not to worry, that the matter would be sorted out in April and that the Inland Revenue would treat it as a loan. In the third call, he asked whether he could repay by cheque, but was told that there was no facility to enable him to do that. The official responding to the fourth call said that there was no knowledge of any difficulties with the case at all. During his fifth call, made in April 2004, he was told by the Inland Revenue that it would now update its records.

It finally transpired that a zero had been mistakenly left off his recorded earnings. In August last year, the Revenue admitted that error, but informed my constituent that it did not think it reasonable for him to believe that his award was correct. In fact, he had spent five months asking the Revenue to check the calculation. Last month, he received notice of a new award and, at the same time, a demand for an overpayment of £4,779.29.

I have given only three examples, but I suspect that all of them could be replicated in the casework of other Members here. The examples that I have given represent only the tip of the iceberg of what I have in my office; some 25 or 30 other cases are currently under way, and they have three things in common. First, the claimants did everything by the book. Secondly, the error, whether human or computer, was with the Revenue and thirdly, the resulting stress and hardship has achieved the diametric opposite of the intention of the policy.

The Minister might wish to tell me how many of my constituents have benefited from the policy; I am happy to accept that and will not dispute it. He can, if he wants to, blame it all on the claimants. However, because I suspect that he is in politics for pretty much the same reason that I am—to help those who need it most—he could accept that there is a real problem causing genuine hardship for a small but significant number of our citizens, and use the power of his office to deal with it.

[John Thurso]

The test is reasonableness. Is it reasonable to award desperate and hard-up families life-giving succour one day, only brusquely to withdraw it at a later stage—so increasing their difficulties—all through administrative incompetence? Is it reasonable to issue forms so complex that trained accountants and the Revenue's own staff have difficulty dealing with them, and is it reasonable to operate a system with a fault level that would not be tolerated in any other organisation? I would say no to all three of those questions; it is not reasonable.

I end with the case of a young mother who was so desperate because of the circumstances that she found herself in that my office staff feared for her life. Finally, in desperation, they phoned the officials involved to say that that was their belief. The hotline responded magnificently; emergency aid was given and all was well. However, I wonder how long it will be before somebody in such desperate circumstances does resort to desperate measures. I hope that the Minister, having heard the cases that I have described and the examples given by other hon. Members, will realise that the problem may be small, but it is very significant for those whom it affects. Please will he think about what can be done to put right the appalling problem of overpayments and seriously consider waiving the payments in those cases in which the fault is clearly not on the part of the claimant, but has arisen from an error in the system, be it human or computer?

9.58 am

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I think that my second or third contribution to a debate in the House was on Second Reading of what became the Tax Credits Act 2002. I supported it then as good policy, and it is nice to see the difference that it has made to many families in a short time. I concur with the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) about the assistance that it is giving—certainly in North Durham—to many hard-working families, taking away the stigma of claiming benefit and allowing them to go to work. Along with the record increase in child benefit and other policies of this Labour Government, it has made a real difference in my constituency and everywhere else. I make no apology for the policy. We should be proud of it, and should champion it from the rooftops.

I am annoyed, however, when a flagship policy such as this, which is making so much difference—I meet people every day who have benefited from it, especially young women who would not previously have been able to go to work, but who now can—is damaged by administrative incompetence. When I was in local government, I was always annoyed when people got sent round the system. People such as those who have just been described should not have to go through so many difficulties to claim a benefit that should be their right.

I wish to raise four cases. When I asked for examples, my office staff said, "How many do you want?" The other issue, which I am sure many hon. Members have realised, is that officers are inundated with inquiries. They spent a lot time dealing with these cases, some of which involve desperate people. We are not talking about people who can accept that one week their income will drop by £10 or even £20. They live on tax credits and rely on them for budgeting their family income. It is unacceptable for people to be treated in this way.

David Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree, as I do, with the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) that the staff who support the MPs' hotline are top quality people with good communication skills who deal with these issues accurately? Is it not a pity that those characteristics are not more widely shared among the operational staff in the Inland Revenue?

Mr. Jones: I do, but it is sad that constituents have to come to their MPs to get an answer to these problems. When they ring the Inland Revenue they do not get the same service as we get, which is not right. They should be able to get answers to their questions and be dealt with properly. I shall give examples of people who are still waiting for replies to letters several months down the line.

The hotline has been useful, but both the Inland Revenue and the Department are not very good at replying to Members' letters about these cases. It makes it difficult for MPs because, as the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross said a few minutes ago, we are dealing with people who want help. They cannot wait for two or three weeks. I have an abhorrence of debt, which is shared by most people in working-class communities. It is wrong that such people, through no fault of their own, end up thinking that they owe the system money. I shall make a suggestion in a minute: the Minister might find it controversial, but it needs to be considered.

I want to focus on four cases, which touch on similar issues to those raised by the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross. I also want to describe how these people have been treated by the system before my office became involved. The first case is that of Mark McGough and Victoria Kerry of Catchgate. They contacted me in December 2004 when their payments suddenly stopped without explanation. They contacted the tax credit office, which told them that it was because there had been an overpayment. On further inspection the tax credit office explained that the overpayment had occurred because the calculation assumed that Mr. McGough and Miss Kerry had no income. That was totally incorrect, as they were both in work.

Their award notice clearly stated their correct income and so they assumed that the tax credit that they were receiving was correct. The information on that form was used by the tax credit office to calculate their tax credit. A mistake was made by the Inland Revenue and my constituents were not responsible for the overpayment. It could be argued that they should have raised the matter. But how could they? The notice they received was correct and stated their correct income.

I am pursuing this case because I believe that in such cases the money should be written off. My constituents were in no position to suggest that their payments were incorrect. The people who I have been dealing with are simple, hard-working and honest individuals. They have been honest with the Inland Revenue in terms of providing information. They have not tried to manipulate or hoodwink the system. They have been open and honest and have got into these situations through no fault of their own.

The second case is that of Mr. and Mrs. Hall of West Pelton. They have had a difficult time with the tax credit office. They originally contacted me in July 2004. They had received numerous conflicting claim notices, which led on two or three occasions to the withdrawal of credits with no explanation. I asked the tax credit office to investigate and in August I received a reply, stating that everything had been resolved, and that the Halls would receive regular payments from then on. However, there was no explanation of the mistaken stopping of the other payments. All that was said was that—I hate this explanation, as I did when I was in local government—the system had a failure in it. That is not acceptable. I want to know the reasons for the payments being stopped, and I think that the people concerned deserve to know them.

That state of affairs continued until December and January, when the Halls suddenly received an overpayment notice, although they had been receiving regular payments for the previous six months. The tax credit office appears confused about how that happened. It is another instance in which Mr. and Mrs. Hall have been entirely honest and up-front, and have provided the system with all the relevant information, but have been given no explanation for the overpayment. That is another matter that I am still pursuing by letter, although I have yet to receive a reply.

The next case that I want to mention concerns Miss Julie Simm, of Perkinsville in my constituency, who contacted me to say that the tax credit office said that she had been overpaid. She had supplied all the correct information about her income and her partner's income, and therefore could not understand why she had been told that an overpayment had been made. Again, the cause was error on the part of the tax credit office.The remarkable thing about the case is that, before Miss Simms received the notice, she realised that she was being overpaid and contacted the tax credit office to inform it of that. Nothing was done; it took 42 days to reduce the payments, so an overpayment was accrued.

I wrote to the Paymaster General on 19 January and received a reply last week, which is, I think, unacceptable. Her letter really just supported the system, stating, in effect—this is the traditional response from the tax credit office—"Yes, we did make a mistake, but you should have noticed it, so it is not now our fault." Well, my constituent recognised the mistake and told the tax credit office, which did nothing about it. She thus accrued an overpayment, whereas if the office had acted when she contacted it she would not have done. I do not think that she should have to pay the overpayment, just because of the inefficiency of that office. I have written to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary and look forward to a reply—which I doubt will arrive this side of the election, but may possibly come later in the year.

The next case I want to mention concerns Mr. and Mrs. Armstrong, of the Gardens, Chester-le-Street, and it is another extraordinary one. The couple have been honest with the Inland Revenue; they received their regular payments, and realised that in one month they received two payments. They contacted the tax office and said that they thought that they had been paid twice. Mrs. Armstrong was told that the two payments were correct, because of an underpayment earlier in the year owing to the birth of their fourth child.

Mrs. Armstrong accepted that explanation and used the money in good faith as part of the family budget, as, I think, anyone else would in the circumstances. Subsequently, the tax credit office contacted the couple to say that there had been an error and, therefore, an overpayment. It sent an overpayment notice, telling them to pay the money back. The hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) raised the issue of professional advice; Mr. and Mrs. Armstrong obtained such advice from Hazel Tindale of Book Keeping Services Ltd., who acted on their behalf. She wrote on 20 August 2004 and, lo and behold, is still waiting for a reply to her letter. So the Inland Revenue still ignores individuals, even when they contact professional services.

The Armstrongs appealed, but their appeal was rejected because, as the tax credit office said in its letter,

"We have decided that the overpayment was not due to a mistake on our part".

That is unacceptable, particularly as the tax credit office admitted to the Armstrongs in the same letter that they were paid twice. Clearly this was the tax credit office's mistake. Mrs. Armstrong told the tax credit office that she believed that she was not entitled to the money, so I do not know how it can reject her appeal.

I wrote to the Inland Revenue in October 2004 and again received a letter in December—two months later—from Barrie Rushton, the assistant director of customer relations at the tax credit office, who promised to have the case reviewed. However, the overpayments team refused to review the case when he referred it to them, reiterating the point that was made earlier.

Despite several phone calls from my office to the MPs' hotline to try to secure a review of the case, the tax credit office continues to say that the overpayment is the Armstrongs' responsibility, and continues to reduce their monthly payments to recoup the money. As I said, the Armstrongs did everything in their power to tell the Inland Revenue that they thought that they had been overpaid, so I repeat that the money should simply be written off in such cases.

I said at the beginning that I am proud of the tax credit. I am because it has genuinely helped many poor and hard-working families in my constituency. These cases discredit the system, even if they are in the minority, although I have lost count of the number of cases that I have in my office. I strongly suggest to my hon. Friend the Minister that we write off the money in cases where people have been totally honest and up front and have given all the information to the Inland Revenue that it requires. Overpayments have been made through no fault of their own. If we do not write this money off for these people, they will have the hardship of having their monthly incomes substantially reduced to recoup the overpayments.

As I said, these people have already suffered a great deal of heartache and frustration. They have had to ring the Inland Revenue constantly and have sometimes had to employ people to do that on their behalf, but they have got nowhere and have simply been sent around the system. It always makes me angry when one gets sent round the system time and time again.

[Mr. Jones]

I urge the Minister to resolve these issues, otherwise a flagship policy will be dented and people will continue to suffer hardships through no fault of their own.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind hon. Members that the winding-up speeches should start at 10.30 am.

10.13 am

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I have consulted my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), and I believe that only two Back-Bencher speeches remain to be made. We have agreed how much time he needs, so I hope that I comply with his requests and needs.

I genuinely wish to congratulate the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) on securing this important debate and on the manner in which he introduced it. I express my appreciation for the remarks of the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones). This is a matter of pressing importance to far too many hard-working, decent and honest families.

My wife is my constituency secretary, and hardly a day seems to go by without a telephone call from another family in desperate circumstances. It is interesting to note that so many of these cases are dealt with on the telephone because their sheer complexity is overwhelming. They would overwhelm me; I cannot cope with my tax return, and I certainly could not cope with the working families tax credit if it got into the sorts of difficulties that my constituents have so often experienced. It also takes a considerable amount of time to sort out these difficulties.

I do not know what the problem is, but I am more sceptical about the whole tax credit system than the hon. Member for North Durham. I am not sure whether the problem lies in inadequate systems, particularly in information technology, or in the poor training of staff. It has been suggested that it might simply be because the Inland Revenue is better at taking money from people than giving it away, and that it is "a culture thing". That is quite a plausible explanation. Could it be that personal lifestyles are too complex to enable such a system to function at all? We have had problems like this in the past: there was a disability issue in my first Parliament—1992 to 1997—when I was overwhelmed by complaints about the way in which that system worked, but that could be sorted out because disability can be measured relatively objectively. We also wrestled to get the Child Support Agency right. The problem is that the sheer complexity of people's lifestyles cannot comply with carefully written statutory instruments, Government guidelines and codes of conduct.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I accept that that may be true in some cases, but in some of the cases to which I referred, people's circumstances did not change at all; I agree that there may be complex changes in some cases that make things difficult for the tax office, but these are just administrative mistakes.

Mr. Luff: As it happens, most of the cases that I wish to raise—coincidentally, like the past two speakers I also have four cases to discuss, if there is time—arise from simple maladministration by the Inland Revenue. I was disappointed that the document, "Tax credits: reforming financial support for families", which was published at the time of the Budget, appears to make no mention of the problems associated with the implementation of tax credits. It is a Panglossian document. Tax credits may have benefited many families, but they have brought nothing but heartache in these four cases.

In the first case, that of Julie Brown, there has been a phantom overpayment. She has not received an overpayment but the computer thinks that she has. The result is that she received no money at Christmas or Easter. It is an absolute scandal for the poor woman. We have spent so much time trying to sort out her case, but she is at her wits' end. We are told that another emergency payment has been sent to her, but she had not received it this morning. There is also the problem that emergency payments have to be repaid, which will further confuse the system. I desperately fear for the future of Julie Brown's case. We shall chase it up in three week's time. We have been advised to do so then because no giros can be issued for the next two weeks: apparently the computer is busy issuing new schedules of payment for the next tax year, so there is no prospect of any money for Julie Brown.

Although many members of the hotline staff are excellent, and tribute has been paid to them, we sometimes find it difficult to persuade some of them that they are dealing with real human beings who are in desperate financial circumstances. I am not surprised, as they must be a bit battle weary by now with all the cases that they have to handle—we all get case hardened—but one of them suggested that Mrs. Brown should go to the Worcester tax office to sort things out. She does not have the money to go to the Worcester tax office. She survived Easter with a £10 note kept for emergencies, just in case. She could buy nothing else: no petrol, no bus fares and no train fares. It shows how out of touch some of those people are that someone should suggest that she should travel from her town to Worcester to try to get her justice, which she deserves. She has received no overpayment, but the computer still thinks that she has.

The next case that I want to raise is that of Mrs. Georgina Gadd, who received an overpayment because of an unrecorded change of circumstances, which the Gadds desperately tried to tell the Inland Revenue about. In view of the time, I shall not weary the Chamber with the details of her case, but she has kept meticulous records since February 2003, when she first applied for tax credits. She quickly became aware that there was a mistake and on 25 June 2003 she called the Inland Revenue and expressed her greatest concern that she was receiving payments to which she was not entitled. Her notes state:

"I was then reassured that the payments I was receiving were correct and that I was fully entitled to the working tax credit. I was even told that quite a few people had contacted them thinking that the payments were too much but that it was a very good tax award for families with young children. I was told to expect a further tax form in the next few days."

So a PR spin was put on what Mrs. Gadd knew was an overpayment. I have the details here: there was a succession of telephone calls, letters and formal complaints running through to 15 January 2005.

Mrs. Gadd's notes state that around that date she received a telephone call from the Inland Revenue apologising that she had not yet received a reply to a letter from September and that it was trying to sort out the complaint. The issue is to do with the nature of her husband's employment and earnings. The Inland Revenue also told her, "Why don't you get in touch with your MP? If you get your MP involved, you might actually get it sorted out." That is why she wrote to me. In a letter to me she said—and I think that she is right:

"It would appear to me that the Inland Revenue are delaying replying to my letters and even ignoring some of my letters which enclosed bank statements"— proving that she has spent the overpayment—

"until they have recouped the £1000 overpayment despite the fact that according to their own code of practice, which they have admittedly failed to meet, and which I have proved to have made substantial effort to ensure that they held the correct information, they should look into waiving some if not all of this overpayment".

That is the point that I want to make to the Minister. These people, who have striven to be honest with the Inland Revenue, deserve an amnesty. Mrs. Gadd points out that she has had no tax credit since June 2003. That is devastating for a family with one wage earner, a small baby and a two-year-old child.

A letter from another constituent arrived this morning. It is on a topical subject, but I do not have permission to name its author, so I will not do so. She is a single mother earning £14,500 a year and she has two children, one at university and the other at sixth-form college. She is struggling to keep them in education, but she hopes to send her second child to university shortly. She has pointed out time and again that the Revenue is paying too much, and she wants to know how much she is overpaying so she can accurately budget for that, but the Inland Revenue will not tell her. Her letter states:

"I did receive a reply saying I would hear in 6 to 8 weeks, then a further letter telling me that the amount I was receiving was right, but I know fine well it's not because they still had all my details wrong and had me working for the NHS on £10,384 which I was three years ago. I despair."

However, I have been onto them again after 4 hours of trying today, to be advised that their computer is not working correctly and that, although on every occasion I have advised them of my change in circumstances, my old details are stuck in their system and that the computer is not accepting my new details, so until the computer is fixed I will still be getting a payment of £257 per month which I know is too much for one child. I am very worried about all this".

Her letter concludes:

"I do hope you can help me. I am very worried about all this and could cry with frustration".

I bet she could. She has tried in every way to get information from the Inland Revenue, but none has succeeded.

We have talked about cases of overpayment—a phantom overpayment, and two actual overpayments—where people have behaved with absolute honesty and integrity, and been determined to sort things out, but where they have not received the level of service from the Inland Revenue that they are entitled to expect. However, it is also important to remember that some people are not getting the money to which they are entitled. A constituency case of mine involving Sheila Christian Brookes highlights that we have worked hard on that, too. Many interventions and telephone calls have been made, and it was shown that she was owed substantial arrears:

"We were told on 10 March that a giro was sent that day for £1,577.31, and another for £131.04", but the cheques never arrived. Apparently, they were returned to the tax office for unknown reasons, and

"they can't try to re-issue the cheque as the computer is working on the new schedule of payments for the next two weeks and then there will be a backlog of cheques waiting to go out . . . and the Hotline assistant asks if we can remember to chase her again after two weeks!"

What kind of level of service is that?

Although I am more sceptical about the whole tax credit system than the hon. Member for North Durham, I entirely agree that for many families it is working well and brings great benefits. However, I am desperately worried; these are four random cases, one of which happens to be in today's post. Along with civil service pensions, it is undoubtedly the biggest issue in my telephone call log—although not in my postbag as, typically, these cases are not made in writing. We must have a better system.

The Minister must not just boast about the families that are benefiting—although I am happy for him to do that, as an election is coming up, after all. He must also explain how the Inland Revenue will improve its systems, so that the decent, hard-working families that have been referred to today get the justice and the money to which we all believe they are entitled.

10.23 am

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), who has spoken so movingly on behalf of his constituents. I also commend the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) for his choice of subject and the reasonable and analytical way in which he spoke to it. I want to add a brief footnote to the excellent speeches that have been made.

At the beginning of this Parliament, the single biggest generator of constituency casework was the Child Support Agency. That wooden spoon has now been transferred to the Inland Revenue, for all the reasons that have been mentioned in this debate. There is no disagreement about the principle here; nobody wants to go back to the old days, when people on supplementary benefit or income support received a range of payments, but when they moved into work that life-support system immediately fell away, which created the "Why work?" syndrome. The working families tax credit was introduced before 1997 in order to address that syndrome. However, we now have a fiendishly complicated system, and many of the cases that we have been talking about involve not only the Inland Revenue as it is often firefighting with other agencies—having a dialogue about housing benefits, for example. Therefore, the Inland Revenue tax credit issue is frequently but one of a range of problems that people living in difficult circumstances are trying to confront.

[Sir George Young]

The debate has focused on what happens when things go wrong. I want to refer only to one case. Mrs. P, who lives in Andover, had her payments stopped. She came to see me, I took her case up with the Revenue, and I received a letter saying:

"I . . . understand that Mrs P is concerned that her tax credits for 2004–2005 have stopped."

Of course she was concerned, because in the previous year her annual payments were £11,316. When that income stream falls away, one is concerned. The letter went on to state:

"When claimants have been overpaid, we normally expect them to pay it back."

We then went around the course of whose fault it was, and a letter arrived on 16 March stating:

"We have decided that although the overpayment was due to a mistake on our part it was not reasonable for you to think that your award was correct . . . The award notice asks you to check all the information and contact us if any of the details are wrong. The overpayment will be recovered from you."

Not only has the income stream stopped, but she now apparently owes the Inland Revenue £10,763.17 because of an overpayment due to a mistake on the part of the Inland Revenue. I see that those letters are all printed with "Investor in People" at the bottom. I wonder whether that award will be revisited.

I think that I am right in saying—perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) can confirm this—that my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) said in a speech a few weeks ago that were our great party to be returned in the general election, we would write off overpayments that had been made by the Inland Revenue, save for those cases where there was evidence of fraud. I hope that my hon. Friend is able to confirm that, and that the Minister will then respond to the challenge of matching that commitment as we approach the general election. Clearly, many people have an interest.

In the next Parliament, we need to stand back and look at the financial interface between citizens and state to see whether there is a better way to achieve the principle to which we all subscribe. Can the interface be reduced by raising the tax threshold? Can we do more on the universal benefit front? Can the system be simplified in some way? Is there a better way of addressing the issues when things go wrong that does not involve all the palaver that we have heard about this morning? Clearly, we are not going to address these matters in the remaining stages of this Parliament. However, at the beginning of the next Parliament we all ought to stand back and look at the top-heavy, complex system and ask the basic question: is there a better way to achieve the goals that we all want to achieve?

10.28 am

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) on securing the debate. It is a measure of its importance that so many Members have turned up and spoken, notwithstanding the imminence of a general election.

As my hon. Friend said in his excellent speech, we support the tax credits policy, but the administration of the policy is often incompetent and occasionally cruel. Many hon. Members have spoken of particularly heartbreaking constituency problems, and I shall refer to just three from my constituency. Before I do so, I should like to pay tribute to the citizens advice bureaux—[Interruption.] I am glad that many hon. Members concur with what I have just said. The bureaux in my constituency—the Bideford, Holsworthy Tavistock and Okehampton offices—are doing excellent work.

One case that has been drawn to my attention by the citizens advice bureaux involves an utterly honest individual, who I will call Mr. F. I have known him for some time. The CAB tell me that by the time that the credits were awarded, Mrs. F had decided to stop work in order to care for her husband. However, in the tax credit award it was stated that both Mr. and Mrs. F were working 40 hours a week. Mr. F immediately wrote back to say that neither he nor his wife were working. The letter was not acknowledged, but working tax credits were nevertheless paid to Mr. F's account. Mr. F automatically assumed that the contents of his letter had been taken into account and that the payments were his due entitlement. He received another letter from the Inland Revenue and he again wrote back saying that he was not working.

Mr. F has also made it clear that he is suffering from depression. The Inland Revenue has said that he telephoned, but the CAB, which took up the case, has said that that is erroneous. It has said that Mr. F is unable to make telephone calls to official bodies because of his depression; that is why he consulted the CAB in the first place. Referring to the most recent telephone call that Mr. F is alleged to have made, the Inland Revenue claims that he had no intention of repaying any overpayments. Although it is instituting an inquiry into the matter, that false allegation has put Mr. F under renewed stress and may hamper his prospects of returning to work.

As I said, I have countless letters. Mrs. L wrote to me recently, saying:

"Please can you help me as the inland revenue office had made it impossible for me to survive?"

She finishes:

"I appealed against this and the response was that even though they admit they made a mistake it was not reasonable of me to think that what they said I was entitled to was correct . . . They say the overpayment was from 2003. They have never said how much I owe. I am now living on £24 per week less than the government say I can live on."

Finally, there is a letter from Mrs. G, who says:

"I don't know if you can help me but I don't know who else to turn to."

We must take up the gauntlet for our hard-pressed constituents. As my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross made clear, it is usually people who are already suffering hardship who are the beneficiaries of this policy.

The Economic Secretary and I have debated many financial, economic and Inland Revenue matters, and he knows only too well that I have often praised Inland Revenue staff for their expertise, integrity and conscientiousness. The MPs' hotline is working well, and I am grateful to those who staff it. Nevertheless, there are inherent problems with these tax credits, and they must be resolved.

I do not want to go over matters that have been discussed, and I have already alluded to cases of innocent overpayment, in which honest taxpayers make their circumstances quite clear, but are paid too much through no fault of their own, and the demand for repayment causes considerably greater hardship. However, I do want to say a few words about repayments.

I believe that paragraph 26 of the Inland Revenue code of practice on overpayments asks

"What happens if we have paid you too much tax credit?"

and that it continues:

"We may decide that you should not be asked to pay back all or part of an overpayment if you were paid too much because of a mistake by us and it was reasonable to think your award was right".

I believe that that is a direct quote from the Inland Revenue because I am quoting from a letter dated 20 January 2005, which was sent to me by Christine Nurse, the customer relations group manager at the Preston tax credit office. One of the points on which we look to the Economic Secretary for a response is what the Revenue considers to be its mistake.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Not one of the cases that I mentioned involved a mistake on the part of the individuals, who were honest and up front. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is about time the Inland Revenue applied the policy to which he has just referred?

Mr. Burnett: I agree very much with the hon. Gentleman, and I want to know from the Minister the exact criteria for a repayment and his policy on what constitutes a mistake.

John Thurso: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support. Is not the critical point the definition of reasonableness? Any reasonable human being, such as all of us here, would say, "The Revenue has made a mistake; it should waive the payment." However, the definition of reasonableness at the Revenue somehow involves it saying, "They ought to have spotted it on our form."

Mr. Burnett: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend; I concur entirely with what he has said. We look forward to hearing from the Economic Secretary in a minute or two.

I want a response to that particular point—a practical point on which so many thousands of our constituents want a response from the Minister. I should also like to know what preparation there was leading up to the introduction of tax credits, including what trials were made of the IT systems and especially whether the software was validated before introduction.

My third question is about what training was given to hard-pressed Inland Revenue staff before introduction. My fourth is about when the consumers' hotline will be improved. Finally, when will this system of tax credits function reliably?

10.37 am

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): I also warmly congratulate the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso), who presented his speech dispassionately, comprehensively and effectively. The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) gave powerful illustrations of situations in his constituency and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) made a powerful speech. My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) made a good supporting speech and underlined the importance of the situation and how it needs to be resolved. I also pay tribute to the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett). Sadly, I understand that he is leaving this place. He has made important and sensible contributions to the life of Parliament on many occasions, and I wish him well for the future.

So much legislation results in unintended consequences. However, it is fair to say that one of the legacies on which the Government will be judged is the sheer complexity and micro-management that are their hallmark: a benefits system that relies on more and more means-testing and complicated tax credits. Since October 1999, the Government have introduced five new tax credits for families, scrapped four of them and introduced two new ones. That averages out at a new tax credit for families every six months.

One result of that complexity has been the fiasco of overpayment that we have heard graphically discussed this morning. The saga began in April and May 2003, when computer system failures were responsible for overpayments to 455,000 households, and totalled £94 million. The damage has been twofold. Not for the first time, taxpayers' money has been wasted: only £57 million of the £94 million that was overpaid was recovered—the rest was written off. Administratively, the cost of dealing with the error was estimated at £10 million. As we have heard movingly and importantly, recipients of tax credits faced financial and emotional suffering as the overpayments were clawed back.

A number of organisations have criticised the Inland Revenue for both its timing and the severity of the rate at which the money is being paid back. The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux has protested and demanded action to protect poor families. Barnardo's has said:

"We are concerned that it's causing hardship for the poorest families when credits should help the Government in its fight against poverty. Coming in the run-up to Christmas, it is a difficult time for families."

That point was echoed by the Child Poverty Action Group, which stated:

"These problems have resulted in many low-income families suffering hardship. Many claimants have seen awards adjusted automatically to recover overpayment... without any explanation of how the overpayment arose, leaving some with weekly incomes substantially below income support levels".

That has been talked about graphically in this debate.

The problem has certainly not gone away. In February, The Guardian reported:

"The Inland Revenue is expected to crank up demands over the coming weeks for hard-pressed families to pay back thousands of pounds worth of tax credits due to overpayments in the last tax year."

Apparently,

"The Revenue is under pressure from Treasury ministers to prevent a repeat of the overpayments fiasco in the four years before 2003 when officials allowed claimants to keep up to £2bn of overpaid tax credits. Under the new system, based on working tax credit and child tax credit, Revenue officials have been given orders to get tough with those paid more than they are due, even when it is a result of errors by officials or a computer glitch."

[Mr. Richard Spring]

Such reports are alarming and I hope that the Minister will confirm that they are simply not true. It is regrettable that I need to ask for that confirmation, but the Government's recent record does not fill me with confidence.

That record is demonstrated in the statistics, and the experiences of those working with victims of the overpayments fiasco on the ground. First, there are the statistics. By the end of December 2004, the Inland Revenue had received 78,000 complaints about the recovery of overpayments. Most said that the Revenue should reconsider on the grounds of official error, but in the 41,000 cases so far decided, only about 1,600 families have had their overpayments written off.

Secondly, there are the experiences of those on the ground. The hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon alluded to Citizens Advice, which has been hard pressed on the issue. It has said that attempts to claw back the cash are continuing to push low income families into debt. Advice, the independent advice network based in Northern Ireland, claims that it has uncovered in the payment of tax credits. That underlines the points that have been made in this debate.

"shocking evidence of widespread errors"

It is all very well noting that the Government have made a mess of the overpayments. After all, they are ultimately responsible. The overpayments should not have been made in the first place, and they should not have been clawed back in such a draconian manner. Given that my and the Minister's positions may be reversed on 6 May, what would we do differently? I should like to suggest some constructive ways to deal with the problem.

First, and most importantly, we would offer an amnesty to all families in respect of their child tax credit repayments for 2003–04. Unless the overpayment was caused by fraud on the part of the claimant, efforts by the Inland Revenue to reclaim overpayments will cease. That will lift an enormous anxiety hanging over hundreds of thousands of families, and follows the recommendation of the Work and Pensions Committee that

"Overpayments should not be recovered where to do so would cause hardship or damage work incentives."

The aim now should be to get accurate entitlements this next financial year, rather than absorbing all the Inland Revenue's energies in trying to correct payments made in the first two years.

We would then implement a co-ordinated strategy to make the tax credit system simpler and fairer. I have three points on that. First, we would ensure that award letters explain more clearly how tax credits have been calculated. That would make it easier for people to judge whether the calculations were correct and to spot errors. I agree with the point about the sheer complexity and bureaucracy involved in trying to understand and find a path to resolve this problem.

Secondly, we would make the Inland Revenue's code of practice fairer in respect of the recovery of tax credits overpaid owing to an official error. Claimants would still have to repay erroneous tax credits if the Inland Revenue felt that it should have spotted the error in the first place. That implies that all claimants have a firm grasp on how to calculate their tax credits, which is an unreasonable proposition.

Thirdly, echoing the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire, a tolerance limit would be introduced so people do not suffer severe financial hardship as a result of previous overpayment. Will the Minister commit himself to a strategy similar to the one that I have outlined?

Whatever happens, this debate has been most useful in airing something that has gone terribly wrong and had heartbreaking impacts on thousands of our fellow citizens. Whoever happens to be in power after the general election has to reorganise this system, because it cannot continue in its present form.

10.46 am

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): I genuinely congratulate the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) on securing this debate and on the way in which he has consistently pursued questions on the tax credit system and problems, including overpayment, faced by his constituents. He introduced the debate in a measured way and set out genuine concerns about the administration of the system. I appreciate the tribute that he paid to those in the Inland Revenue who work on the MPs' hotline. I will pass his comments to them and know that they will be welcome, because those people try their best to help all hon. Members sort out the problems that arise with our constituents.

I appreciate also the comments made by the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) on the same subject. I pay tribute to his contribution to the proceedings of the House over the past eight years. I am sorry to see him go and will miss the debates that we have. I will also miss the combination of fair-mindedness and well-informed criticism that he always brings to bear on the scrutiny of the work of the Government and the Treasury.

As my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has said consistently to all hon. Members who have contributed to this debate, I invite all of them, if they have not already done so, to let me have the specific details of the cases that they have raised this morning. I do not want to pick up on individual cases, but will respond to some of the points that have been made this morning.

On the point made by the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross, cheques will be accepted by the Inland Revenue in cases of overpayment. In the very early months there were a few cases where that was not taking place, but that is not so now.

I say to my hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) that, in general terms, where a claimant is concerned that their payments are wrong and they are reassured by the tax credit office that they are correct, any subsequent overpayment should be remitted. We will go back and check such cases—we are doing so—including checking the tapes from telephone conversations that such claimants had with the Inland Revenue. Where claimants have been wrongly advised that their award is correct, I would expect any overpayment to be waived.

In respect of the point made by the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), the Inland Revenue computer is being updated at the moment, as it normally is at the end of the financial year. However, payments can still be made.

It may help the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) if I say that the Inland Revenue is simplifying the ways in which it handles claims regarding disputes on overpayments. I will say a little bit more about the new measures that are being put in place. In general, however, I say to all hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire, that if they will give me specific case details that have not already been submitted to my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, I shall ensure that they are carefully examined,, and undertake to check the progress that is being made.

Mr. Luff: I am grateful to the Minister for the way in which he has responded. It is very important if people who have been told that they cannot, at present, receive cheques can receive them. Obviously, from what the Minister has said, they are being misadvised by the Inland Revenue, and the MPs' hotline is misadvising Members' offices, too. How can those cheques be issued? What can we do, practically, to ensure that the money is available to our constituents?

John Healey: The point that was raised by the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross was that one of his constituents tried to repay an overpayment to the Revenue by cheque, but was told that that was not acceptable to the Revenue. I am making clear that it is acceptable.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's commitment to examine the cases in question, but I have raised them with the Inland Revenue and my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, and the letter that I received back from the latter—which took six months—was just the usual civil service flannel, upholding the decision about repayments. Something needs to be done urgently about those cases. I shall certainly send my hon. Friend details not only of the four cases that I mentioned, but all the rest of them that I have in the office.

John Healey: If my hon. Friend checks the record of the debate, he will see that I said earlier that I shall check the progress of any of the individual cases that he and other hon. Members raised, or any whose further details they want to submit, and reply to the hon. Members.

The hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross, to whose continuing work on the matter I pay tribute, has raised half a dozen cases relating to overpayment with Ministers and the chairman of the Inland Revenue. He suggested that I might be keen to tell him how many families in his constituency benefit from tax credits generally. The figure is 3,800. The hon. Gentleman has tabled two parliamentary questions about the numbers affected throughout Scotland, and I can tell him that 375,000 families benefit from the child tax credit there. I appreciate the welcome that he gave to what he described as real help to many families in his constituency.

The debate arises from genuine concerns about the administration of specific overpayment cases. The hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross was at pains, in initiating the debate, not to make it party political, although the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) ranged more widely and did not take such pains, so that I want to respond briefly to a couple of his points before engaging with the detail.

Nearly 6 million families with 10 million children now benefit from a tax credit system introduced since 1997, which was not in place before then. Tax credits are central to Labour's social commitment to support the efforts of hardworking families, to our moral commitment to reduce and eradicate child poverty, and to our economic commitment to make work pay. My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham said that he is proud of the tax credit system, and all Labour Members are proud of it. I am proud, too. As a result of the Government's reforms to the tax and benefits system since 1997, families with children will be on average £1,400 better off in October. The poorest fifth of families will be, on average, £3,200 better off.

As a result of Labour's anti-poverty programmes since 1997, almost 2 million children have been lifted out of absolute poverty. As a result of the Chancellor's successful management of the economy and labour market policies, including tax credits, 2 million more jobs have been created. The employment rate among lone parents has risen from 46 per cent. to 56 per cent. and the number of children living in households without work has been reduced by nearly 300,000.

Although the debate is about problems that sometimes happen, and the personal distress that is caused by overpayments, the wider context for the debate is a tax credit system that has brought substantial increases in income to families that are on low incomes; that has contributed to a large reduction in the number of children living in poverty; and that has helped to create the highest ever employment level in the British economy.

I do not underestimate the problems caused by overpayments. I have dealt with cases of overpayment myself as a constituency MP. However, it is important to examine them with a full appreciation of the way in which the tax credits system is designed to work. Some of the problems are the legacy of the well documented trouble experienced when the system was introduced in 2003. For instance, because of the early difficulties, the Inland Revenue made a large number of emergency manual payments to claimants. As it took a long time to get the manual payments on to the system, some cases resulted in overpayments at the end of the year, which now have to be recovered. There were also the much publicised early IT problems. However, most overpayments arise because a claimant's income has risen.

The new tax credits, unlike earlier systems of support, are designed to respond to changes in families as they happen. They can be adjusted to reflect changes in the number of children in the family, in working hours, in child care costs or in family income. That flexibility has clear benefits for families and for claimants. For example, the Inland Revenue can increase a child tax credit award in year when told that a new baby has arrived. That is why 230,000 families each year have their tax credit award revised in year following the birth of a child.

[John Healey]

The system is based on annual income, just like income tax. Therefore, when—for whatever reason—changes in income during a year have not been reflected in changes in the tax credit award, an adjustment may need to be made after the end of the year, just as it is in the income tax system. That might be to correct an overpayment or an underpayment, just as in the income tax system. If the Inland Revenue discovers an underpayment after the end of the tax year, it will pay it immediately in a lump sum. If there has been an overpayment, the Revenue will collect it from a continuing award, subject to automatic limits that are applied after a claimant's award for the coming year has been calculated. That is set out in the Inland Revenue's code of practice on tax credit overpayments under the heading "What happens if we have paid you too much tax credit?"

Some of the problems associated with the recovery of overpayments have arisen because of unfamiliarity with the system. The Revenue has a responsibility for that, and is trying to fulfil it, to ensure that people have adequate information and there is strong publicity about the way in which it works. However, it is inevitable and right that adjustments in either direction will need to be made in a system based on annual income. It would not be fair to those who have received the right amount of tax credit if we did not try to recover money from those who have received too much.

I have to say to the hon. Member for West Suffolk that a call for a sweeping amnesty has more to do with scoring points before the election than a serious proposal for Government. An amnesty across the board is not an appropriate way of dealing with overpayments. To say that the Inland Revenue should not be making overpayments in the first place is to show a comprehensive failure to appreciate the nature of the system and to undermine the principle of individual claimant responsibility.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Will my hon. Friend give way?

John Healey: No. Forgive me. At the heart of the many points that have been raised this morning is the question of reasonableness. The test of reasonableness is important. People need to take responsibility for checking their tax credit awards, just as they should check their PAYE code, and they should let the Inland Revenue know if anything is wrong. However, I accept that there have been particular problems in the past year while people have come to terms with the new system.

When it became clear that the Inland Revenue was, as hon. Members have said, having difficulty in dealing with requests for official error relief within an acceptable time, my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General asked it to consider the scope for streamlining the process that is used to decide whether official error relief is due. It has reviewed the procedures, in the light of a few months' experience, and I can confirm that it will change the targeting of the checks that are made to applications. That will reflect a better assessment of the types of award given in cases in which it was unreasonable to expect people to understand and to check the detail.

We estimate that that will allow the Inland Revenue to clear more than 50 per cent. of the cases quickly, and the backlog is expected to be cleared by the summer. I am sure that hon. Members will welcome that. I repeat my invitation to hon. Members to let me have details of the cases that they have raised. I trust that they will watch closely for the impact of the new arrangements over the next few months and I have no doubt that we will return to the debate if matters do not improve.

Staffordshire Ambulance Service

11 am

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): I am raising questions relating to the dreadful and tragic death of Benjamin Moston. It is a serious case, which requires serious answers from the Minister as well as from Staffordshire ambulance service, not just an apology or an internal inquiry. I should state at the outset that I have genuine respect for those who work for Staffordshire ambulance service, which generally performs a role in difficult circumstances which deserves our thanks and gratitude. However, this deeply tragic case requires much more than an internal inquiry.

On Sunday 13 February 2005, 10-year-old Benjamin Moston, the son of Mrs. Jayne Moston and Mr. David Layton of Barn Common, Woodseaves in my constituency, was showing signs of wheezing due to his asthma. He was given Ventolin by his parents, but that was having no prolonged effect. Benjamin required a repeat dose some 45 minutes later. At 6.08 pm Jayne Moston called the out-of-hours service, which is manned by Staffordshire ambulance paramedics. Her call took approximately 14 minutes to get through followed by a further 14 minutes relaying patient information together with symptoms present.

The paramedic answering the call told Mrs. Moston that someone would be with her shortly. It was explained to the paramedic that Ben was a severe asthmatic, he was wheezing and his Ventolin was having little effect. The parents believe that the paramedic wrongly categorised this call: instead of an immediate response it was categorised as a case to be seen within the hour. I understand that it was the paramedic's first shift as a call taker and required supervision. There was no supervision. At the paramedic's disposal is the triage software, which I understand was not used. However, the family have since been told that had it been used, it would also have failed them in triggering an immediate response for Benjamin's condition. I will return to the triage software later.

Also, situated four and six minutes away are a community first responder and Mr. Roger Thayne, the chief executive of Staffordshire ambulance service, who was on call. Those individuals should have been paged to respond, and it appears that due to human error this was not done. At approximately 7.01 pm, Benjamin's condition worsened, resulting in a second call which was a 999 emergency call made by Jayne Moston. The same information was relayed again about Benjamin's condition and it was made clear that a previous call had been made. Again, the first responders previously mentioned were not paged to respond. This call was taken by the call centre supervisor.

At approximately 7.15 pm, Benjamin's condition deteriorated rapidly. He became cyanosed, agitated and confused, and a further 999 call was made by Mr. Layton, Benjamin's father, informing the call-taker of Ben's deteriorating condition and asking where the ambulance was. They replied that the ambulance was in the area but could not locate the home address. This was due to its not being in the satellite navigation system, despite the road and houses having stood and been clearly mapped for many years.

At 7.18 pm, David Layton tried to attract the attention of the paramedic who was further up the street by waving his arms. The paramedic drove past and Mr. Layton had to give chase while shouting at the driver to stop. Tragically, by this stage, Benjamin had collapsed and apparently died in his mother's arms in front of his four-year-old sister and 21-month-old brother. David Layton informed the paramedic that Ben had collapsed and he was unsure whether he was even breathing. On arriving at the house at 7.34 pm, the paramedics immediately began cardio-pulmonary resuscitation—CPR. At 7.35 pm, the trust doctor arrived on the scene, but he could not intubate and asked the paramedic to do so, which he did.

It was some 15 minutes before Benjamin was attached to a monitor to ascertain heart activity and saturation levels, and some 25 minutes before any adrenalin was administered. The doctor observed by monitor that there was no electrical activity in the heart by then. It appears that the community first responder arrived at 7.35 pm after he had been paged at 7.23 pm. He is only six minutes away from Benjamin's home address. Another two paramedics and a doctor arrived at almost the same time; CPR continued and adrenalin was administered at approximately 7.45 pm.

The doctor decided that Benjamin should be taken by ambulance to Stafford district general hospital. The ambulance left at 7.55 pm and arrived at 8.08 pm. The doctor continued to give CPR in the back of the ambulance, despite an apparent protocol that at least two or more persons are required during emergency life support for children.

Benjamin was pronounced dead at the Stafford district general hospital at 8.30 pm. Mrs. Moston and Mr. Layton believe that Benjamin did not stand a fighting chance due to those errors. His asthma attack was no worse than any other he had experienced. It was simply that the early medical treatment that was required was not forthcoming.

The lives of Benjamin's parents have been torn apart as a result of the tragic circumstances surrounding his death. They constantly relive his final hour and see his frightened face asking them to help him. No parent should lose a child, and most definitely not as a result of the failure to act quickly and with expertise, as we rightly expect from our emergency services.

I said that I wanted to make some important points about the triage policy, which can be described as an emergency transport request generally made through a 999 call but which might also include calls from GPs. The prioritisation of emergency calls to ensure that immediately life-threatening cases obtain the quickest response was introduced as a pilot in 1995–96. There are three categories. Category A covers emergency calls that are classified as life threatening, and ambulance services are expected to reach 75 per cent. of category A calls within eight minutes.

Category B is for non-life-threatening emergency calls, 95 per cent. of which should receive a response within the national 14 minutes in urban areas or 19 minutes in rural areas. Category C calls are regarded as non-life threatening and non-urgent, and are a large proportion of the work of the ambulance service. In some cases, telephone advice or referral to another agency may be adequate to meet the callers' needs and may be a more appropriate clinical response.

[Mr. William Cash]

Why was not Benjamin's case immediately classified as Category A and an ambulance despatched with paramedics? This is one of the most critical questions. The answer that I will receive from the Minister goes to the heart of this tragic case. Above all, I insist on a full public inquiry and not merely the internal inquiries that have been suggested so far.

In addition, I have been told of serious allegations about other deaths, including references to impending cases at Birmingham employment tribunal, which are connected to what are described to me as "deliberate reductions in emergency care resources", and a failure to anticipate rises in demand in 2003.

I have also been told of allegations of threats and bullying to dissuade people from speaking out. I cannot verify those allegations now, but they appear to be part of the case before the employment tribunal, and in so far as they have a bearing on the question of resources, they are directly relevant to the tragic death of Benjamin Moston. In any event, I will not be satisfied with an internal review or one conducted merely by the strategic health authority. I want and demand a public inquiry in which all these matters and their interconnection, including the issue of resources, are fully investigated, and not merely an apology or internal inquiry. A child has died by error and by fault, and the parents deserve no less.

11.10 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) on taking up this issue on behalf of his constituent, and express my great sadness on hearing the details of the case. I hope that he will pass on my sincere condolences to Benjamin Moston's family. This must be a very sad time for them and I am sure that they are devastated by what has happened, as the hon. Gentleman has said.

The incident has had a profound effect on the Staffordshire Ambulance Service NHS trust, which provides the out-of-hours service in the area. The chief executive of the trust has been to see Benjamin's parents; he has formally apologised on behalf of the local NHS and offered his personal condolences. The trust has been the highest performing ambulance trust in the country for many years, but we—and it—must recognise the importance of learning from such events.

The staff of the trust are hardworking and diligent, but they would be the first to say that they owe it to Benjamin and his family to use this experience to do even better in future and, if it emerges that their performance was less than optimal on this occasion, to do everything in their power never to let the same thing happen again. But I stress the "if"; the only way to find out whether their performance was less than optimal is to carry out an inquiry and face the issues honestly, and such an inquiry has not yet been carried out. Until it is, we should not speculate about where fault may lie but should stick to discussing the facts as we know them. It would be inappropriate for me to discuss the details of Benjamin's illness at this time, but I can tell hon. Members what I know of the events following his parents' call to the out-of-hours service. What I am about to say is based on what I have been told by Shropshire and Staffordshire strategic health authority and, of course, it is subject to review in the inquiry that I will talk about later.

I am told that the call from Benjamin's parents to the out-of-hours service, at 6.08 pm on Sunday 13 February, was handled by a paramedic call handler who made a clinical decision, based on the information available, that Benjamin should have a home visit within an hour of the end of the call, which was at 6.21 pm. That is covered in the ambulance service trust's internal investigation report, and it would not be appropriate for me to comment on that decision at this time. At 7.01 pm, Benjamin's parents, worried that Benjamin's condition had deteriorated, made an emergency 999 call, and a community paramedic officer was dispatched to the Mostons' home at 7.02 pm. The parents made a further emergency call at 7.18 pm to ask where the ambulance was. The paramedic arrived at about the same time as that second emergency call.

On arriving at the scene, the paramedic found that Benjamin was in cardio-respiratory arrest and requested that an ambulance be sent as quickly as possible. The ambulance was mobilised at 7.27 pm and arrived at 7.34 pm. The ambulance trust's doctor arrived at 7.35 pm. At 7.45 pm, Benjamin was taken to Staffordshire general hospital; he arrived at 8.08 pm. Sadly, as we know, he did not survive.

I should point out that a coroner's inquest into Benjamin's death has been launched and is currently adjourned. It would not be appropriate for me to comment on what its findings might be. However, I can reassure the hon. Gentleman and Benjamin's family that the local health community has taken this incident very seriously and absolutely understands the need to look into the matter with a view to avoiding similar incidents.

The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the ambulance trust immediately launched an internal inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the incident. The initial findings of the inquiry and the detailed action plan drawn up as a result have already been shared with the family. The investigation report will be tabled at the ambulance trust's risk and clinical governance committee, which reports to the trust board. The detailed action plan is already being implemented by the trust. The plan addresses areas such as staff training and the introduction of dual paging/SMS texting and clinical policies.

I can advise the hon. Gentleman that on 1 April the trust moved to a single computer-aided dispatch system, which allows better control of the interface between the out-of-hours service and the emergency ambulance system. The strategic health authority, which is responsible for monitoring and improving the quality of health care in the area, has also commissioned an independent inquiry into the incident to determine any contributing factors and to recommend any actions that should be taken to prevent a similar occurrence.

The inquiry is being undertaken by Dr. Matthew Cooke, accident and emergency consultant at the Heart of England NHS foundation trust—formerly the Birmingham Heartlands and Solihull Hospitals NHS trust—and national A and E medical advisor, and Dr. Richard Fairhurst, medical director of Lancashire Ambulance Service NHS trust.

The inquiry is in two parts. The first will look at the out-of-hours service, which, although it is provided by Staffordshire Ambulance Service NHS trust, is in fact the responsibility of South Western Staffordshire primary care trust. The second will look at the response of the emergency ambulance service. It would not be appropriate for me to pre-empt the findings of the review, and the results will be presented to the boards of the PCT and ambulance trust in due course.

Both the ambulance trust and the PCT will respond to any further recommendations that come out of the inquiry. I am also requesting a copy of the report so that any wider issues to do with either out-of-hours or emergency services can be considered, and any lessons that can be applied nationally can be disseminated.

Mr. Cash: The Minister will know that I have called for a full public inquiry. I accept that there has to be a first-stage inquiry, but he has just said that he will call for a copy of the report—I am glad to hear that. On the basis that that report will be made available to me and to others who have responsibilities in such matters, will he commit to the idea of a full public inquiry if, on reflection and in light of the report, it is clear that those matters need to be pursued in public?

Dr. Ladyman: Yes, I am happy to commit to that. If on receiving the report there are still outstanding questions, and those directly involved and in positions of authority—including the Minister who holds the appropriate portfolio after the election—believe that questions may still be unanswered, clearly we will have to commit to further inquiries. It may well be that the hon. Gentleman, if he is returned after 5 May, will want to seek another Adjournment debate to discuss the matter in the Chamber. If I am still Minister after 5 May, I will certainly be happy to meet him to discuss the findings of the report and how matters should best be moved forward, after we have the results of the inquiry.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman would agree that there is no cover-up and no lack of willingness on behalf of the trust, the local health authorities and the NHS to learn from events. In due course everyone will know exactly what happened and how such tragedies can best be avoided in future.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the policy on ambulance service and response. He and his constituents should be aware that there is substantial progress and high performance in their area. He mentioned the various categories of response; the NHS plan has an objective to improve ambulance response times so that 75 per cent. of 999 calls to life-threatening emergencies—the category A responses that he referred to—are responded to within eight minutes. The latest information for 2003–04 shows that 75.7 per cent. of category A calls in England resulted in an emergency response arriving at the scene of the incident within eight minutes, which was slightly up from the previous year's figure of 74.6 per cent. In Staffordshire, 86.6 per cent. of category A calls received a response within eight minutes in 2003–04.

Other emergency calls, category B and C calls, should receive a response within 19 minutes 95 per cent. of the time in rural areas such as Staffordshire.

Mr. Cash: The Minister will notice that I asked why this case had not been immediately classed as category A. Had the circumstances and procedures been followed in accordance with the category A system, eight minutes—if that is the right figure—would have applied, and we almost certainly would not be faced with such a situation.

Dr. Ladyman: Clearly, that must be a key matter for the inquiry to determine. It must decide whether the triage process, as the hon. Gentleman describes it, was accurately followed, whether it is defective in some way for this particular type of condition, and whether the call should have been assigned to category A.

For the sake of the hon. Gentleman's constituents and their peace of mind, let me continue with the comments that I was about to make. In Staffordshire, 99.7 per cent. of category B and C calls are responded to within 19 minutes. That is far higher than the target, so I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts that his local ambulance trust provides a high-quality service to his constituents. If errors were made on this occasion, they will be identified, made public and learned from, and we will move forward on that basis.

Mr. Cash: Will the Minister take note of the allegations that I mentioned, which, as I stated, I cannot verify? In the light of the fact that they appear to be related to what is going on before the Birmingham employment tribunal, which is a responsible tribunal, I hope that he will take note of the situation and consider also the allegation about deliberate reductions in emergency care resources. I am not in a position to verify that allegation either, but if there is a connection between the incident and the allegations, I am sure that the Minister will want to look into it.

Dr. Ladyman: I certainly do want to look into that. I was not aware of the allegations that the hon. Gentleman raised today, so I am not in a position to verify or deny them, but I will say that threats to stop people from speaking out are absolutely unacceptable. There are procedures to protect people who want to speak out about their concerns.

I shall write to the strategic health authority and the ambulance trust to bring to their attention the official record of today's debate, and I shall ask them to ensure that their inquiries consider the wider ramifications and the possibility that there are connections between this matter and the issues that the hon. Gentleman has raised. Hopefully, we will be able to resolve these matters collectively.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept my good will. I hope that he accepts also that I am determined to ensure that everybody gets to the bottom of this. That good will is shared by the ambulance trust and the strategic health authority, which are equally determined to get to the bottom of this and to ensure that Benjamin's parents receive all the answers to the questions that they are bound to be asking, for what little comfort it will give them. It may provide some closure for this event. Once again, I pass my deepest regrets to them for this experience. I hope that they are able to move forward.

Mr. Cash: Just to wind up, as it were, I am extremely glad to hear the Minister say that in the light of the information made available to him and, indirectly, to me and other people in appropriate positions of responsibility, he will have a public inquiry should the circumstances warrant it. That is an important first step. We look forward to receiving the information that comes from the inquiries that have been set up.

[Mr. Cash]

Dr. Ladyman: I very much hope that it will not be necessary to have any further inquiries because we get all the answers that we need from the inquiries that have been set up. I look forward to being in a position to discuss these issues with the hon. Gentleman after the events of the next four weeks.

11.24 pm

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

National Offender Management Service

2 pm

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): As a member of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, I regularly meet people who work in the criminal justice system, and I am pleased to have secured this debate because everyone I have spoken to in the probation service and the Prison Service has told me of their deep concerns about the structure and implementation of the National Offender Management Service.

The concerns that I shall raise are similar to those discussed by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) and others in an Adjournment debate on 16 March, but they were not adequately addressed because of time constraints, and I hope to receive more satisfying answers today.

The aims of NOMS are laudable. How can anybody argue with the NOMS vision? We are told that it will:

"Implement the orders of the courts and supervise offenders and those remanded in custody in such a way as to protect the public . . . Provide a range of effective interventions and services that are designed to reduce reoffending . . . Give offenders the opportunity to lead law abiding, productive and healthy lives . . . Work in a way that treats offenders fairly and with decency."

Protection of the public, a reduction in reoffending and the rehabilitation of offenders—I cannot argue with any of that.

Similarly, discontent and decreasing morale among staff seem strange when one realises that there is fairly widespread acceptance of the objective of taking some responsibility for what happens to offenders once the court sentences them to different kinds of punishment.

Everybody applauds the sentiments of NOMS, but people are concerned about the organisational structure that is proposed to implement it. The current division of responsibilities between the Prison Service, the probation service and others leads to inefficient and disruptive services, as I have seen for myself during my visits to prisons and probation boards.

Nor are the existing arrangements conducive to providing services that promote offenders' rehabilitation and reduce their reoffending. No single organisation is ultimately responsible for the offender, which means that there is no clear ownership of the front line for reducing reoffending. Clear ownership is the goal that we all want to achieve, and the promotion of a single, integrated, seamless service that provides end-to-end management for offenders, whether they are sentenced to custodial or community punishment, therefore enjoys widespread acceptance and my support. The challenge, however, lies in how to achieve such integration to maximise the gains and minimise the risks involved—and the current risks are exceptional.

To explain the increasing concern felt by myself and others, it is important to put the introduction of NOMS in context. The decision to merge correctional services resulted from the review of those services led by Patrick Carter. The Carter report "Managing Offenders, Reducing Crime" found that although the Prison Service and the national probation service had achieved improvements,

"access to services such as drug treatment and education depends more on whether an offender is sent to prison or probation, rather than their individual needs".

So remedial support and action are based more or less on postcode prescription.

NOMS has been identified as a way of remedying that. It came into existence five months after the Carter report had recommended its establishment and the Government had agreed to it in "Reducing Crime—Changing Lives". That was far too quick and meant that the Government's consultation strategy was patchy and ineffective and did not reassure people in the probation service that they had a voice or that their concerns would be heard.

The Probation Boards Association vented its frustration in February 2004, when it explained that one of its initial reactions to the Government's agreement to introduce NOMS was "dismay that the Home Office appears to have taken far-reaching decisions without public or parliamentary scrutiny and consternation that those matters which have yet to be decided are offered only for 'comment or suggestion'".

Discussion with members of the probation service has provided me with a full picture of the Government's consultation strategy, and it makes that frustration perfectly understandable. In some cases, there was no consultation, and where it did exist, it involved sending just a few scant letters; there did not seem to be much of a coherent rationale behind them.

On 7 May 2004, under cover of a letter from Martin Narey, the Home Office issued information containing organisational and design proposals for consultation with probation boards and other interested parties. The overwhelming response to that consultation was critical of the brevity of the information that accompanied the proposals and the lack of any reference to local arrangements.

On 20 July 2004 the Minister withdrew the proposals and made various comments about how he saw the future of the National Offender Management Service. After that, it became increasingly difficult for the probation service and others, including me, to obtain meaningful information from anyone with any authority in the Home Office about the way forward for NOMS during the latter part of 2004.

It would appear that no clear proposals were forthcoming and no responses were available to the myriad questions that were being asked. The Probation Boards Association, representing probation boards throughout England and Wales, became so frustrated that I understand it wrote to the Minister in January 2005 expressing its view on the lack of progress and the paucity of information.

Whether those and other concerns were the trigger to action is not known, but a brief flurry of information followed, issued by the Home Office and containing various descriptions of a NOMS end-state diagram, NOMS design work and suggestions for service level agreements to be drawn up to guide the relations, including operational and budgetary matters, between probation boards and regional offender managers who had been appointed in the latter part of 2004.

I know that the probation service is concerned that, despite a number of negative responses to the consultation, the end state of NOMS is no different in essence from the proposed system that was withdrawn by the Home Office in July 2004, following consultation. That lack of transparency on the part of the Government has been self-defeating. As is mentioned in the summary of responses from the consultation exercise, there is support for NOMS in general. Much of the resulting unease and discord stems from people's disappointment that they were not fully consulted and their concerns not acted on, as well as general confusion about the lack of forthcoming answers—confusion which, as I said earlier, I fully understand.

I think that the Government would like to argue that the lack of a detailed blueprint gives key stakeholders the chance to influence the shape of NOMS at a crucial stage of its development. However, from what I have just related it is plain that that is not happening. Views are sought, but, it appears, not translated into any operational procedure or design. As a result, the view of the National Association of Probation Officers is that support for the concept of NOMS is now virtually non-existent, with key stakeholders, including the trade unions, among those who do not support it.

There is a feeling that NOMS, as currently constructed, will not work. The Home Affairs Committee, of which, as I have said, I am a member, criticised the lack of consultation in our report on the rehabilitation of prisoners. The report states:

"We welcome in principle the introduction of the National Offender Management Service, although we regret the lack of prior consultation and the failure to publish a comprehensive business case. These failures have undoubtedly created unnecessary difficulties in developing NOMS. We welcome recent signs that the Government has recognised these problems. A more collaborative approach with those working in the Prison and Probation Services will produce effective change more swiftly."

I should like to be thoroughly convinced that there will now be more thorough consultation.

I noticed that the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), referred to the possibility of a new stakeholder forum during the previous Adjournment debate. I should like more information on that, as well as details of the outcome of the meetings so far of the NOMS joint consultative council. I am glad that my hon. Friend seems to have taken on board the fact that the initial lack of consultation and the speed of introduction have led to low morale among staff affected by NOMS. The object of inspiring commitment in staff has obviously not been achieved. I truly believe that unless stakeholders are consulted and their views taken on board, NOMS will not achieve its aims. Therefore, it is immensely important that the stakeholder forum should come into being and that the council should be used to maximum effect.

On 6 January 2004 the then Home Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), explained how the Government envisaged the service being provided at regional level. He said:

"We believe that the task of integrating the management of offenders is best achieved at regional and local level"—

I emphasise the word "local"—

"where effective links can be forged and joined-up strategies developed. Those will include working with complementary services, including health, education, housing and employment."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 6 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 172.]

[Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas]

However, local arrangements were omitted from the development of the organisational structures, and, subsequently, more than 90 per cent. of the boards either suggested alternative sub-regional structures or felt that the current 42 areas, or something similar, should be retained. None of the union responses was in favour of the regional structure. Most felt that the 42 areas, or something like that, should be retained.

One of my worries is the sheer size of each regional offender region. Liz Hill, the regional offender manager for my area is responsible for the north-west, while Carol Bernard is the ROM for the whole of Wales. ROMs will have major responsibility. By 2006–07, they will be responsible for holding the budget for probation and prisons in their regions, commissioning services for prisons and local probation boards, holding both prison and probation areas to account for their performance, improving performance by developing contestability and allowing alternative service providers to compete for work so that regions obtain the best value for money in managing offenders.

I do not understand how such a task can be managed at regional level. My area will include not only Merseyside, but Cheshire, Lancashire, Manchester and Cumbria, each with wide-ranging and varied offending problems. I fear that the regional structure will lead simply to increased bureaucracy, not better local results. What works in Bootle does not necessarily work in Crosby, and we must not lose sight of that in the re-organisation. I wish to receive reassurance that ROMs will work to make a strong, local focus possible within a regional structure, or else the structure will fail. As much commissioning as possible should be carried out locally rather than regionally to make delivery of contracts as relevant as possible to local people, their local problems and local issues.

Following consultation, the Government decided to retain the current structure of the probation service only for the time being. The fact that regional offender managers are working with the 42 existing local boards seems to be an example of the Government's improved stance towards consultation, and I firmly welcome it. I was initially pleased by my hon. Friend the Minister's response in July 2004 to concerns about the move to a regional structure. He seems to have acted on consultation responses that included reservations about regionalisation, especially the replacement of probation boards populated by members of the local community with regional boards, which, it was thought, would disrupt links and reduce local accountability. The focus was to be end-to-end management of offenders and contestability, which also gave cause for concern.

As well as the retention of probation boards, my hon. Friend explained that individual offender management would work at local level because it understands the importance of links at local level. I am keen to see how that will transpire in organisational reality. I am also aware that he emphasised that it was not a good idea to move to new regional boards for several reasons. However, regardless of his comments, it seems that NOMS is moving towards a more regional structure so, despite concerns expressed about such a move, plans have been postponed, not changed. Given that my hon. Friend the Minister still intends to move towards a regional structure and to replace the probation boards, those real worries have not been addressed.

Such a change will be driven centrally and result in a lack of local accountability, and I want local accountability. I do not want to undermine the good multi-agency work that is happening in my constituency and throughout Merseyside. Will my hon. Friend clarify whether NOMS will move towards a more regional structure and, if so, what will it look like? If regionalism is the goal, the Government need to assure parliamentarians and key stakeholders that that will make improvements in what already exists.

I should also like more information about the role and the powers of local offender managers. I am concerned that the Prison Service seems to have opted out of NOMS and, thus, that offender managers will not be able to affect the programmes in prison as they will have no authority over prison governors. Will my hon. Friend expand on the role and responsibilities of offender managers and explain how much influence they will have over the management of offenders in prison? I should be grateful if he told me whether he intends to remove local probation boards because it is important that they have power and resources to make links at local level. I, for one, am much in favour of local probation boards.

Community involvement was seen to be an important feature of NOMS, as are restorative justice measures. On that, one charity said:

"we support measures to treat civil renewal as a matter of building confidence, resilience and social capital so that crime can be reduced and lower level nuisances can be dealt with by civil and social measures, including restorative measures, without recourse to the criminal justice process."

I say amen to that. I fear that the move to regionalisation could damage those links with the local community, and we must retain them.

I am not necessarily opposed to the inclusion of a regional tier; there is definitely a place for a regional section within the proposals, for strategic purposes alone. However, the form of regionalism that NOMS seems to be moving towards would undermine the strengths of the current system, particularly the criminal justice partnerships that have been established in all our communities and are beginning to work well.

The criminal justice system has been moving towards a partnership approach to tackling crime and disorder since the introduction of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, in recognition of the fact that organisations and individuals can achieve more if they work together than if they work in isolation. The 1998 Act places a joint responsibility on local authorities and police to formulate and implement strategies to reduce crime and disorder in their area. They must do that in co-operation with a large number of organisations from the statutory, private and voluntary sectors. They must also consult the local community about their proposals.

Partnership groups make decisions on the setting of local priorities, targets, strategies and resources, and most have established a series of working groups to assess that process. Those working groups bring particular expertise to bear on a specific issue and make recommendations. Membership of the working groups will vary according to the issues that they address. They may contain a wider range of agencies than those represented in partnership groups, including agencies such as Victim Support and neighbourhood watch schemes. Vitally, they also involve members of the local community. Members of our local community are currently involved in criminal justice partnerships, which address problems caused by criminals operating locally. They are keen to ensure that such offenders are involved in restorative justice programmes that they have access to and have a voice in, and we cannot afford to lose that.

The probation boards operating in each of the 42 probation areas have boundaries that are contiguous with constabulary and court boundaries. That has encouraged the growth of local partnerships between a range of agencies and service providers covering the same area, from crime reduction and disorder partnerships and the local criminal justice boards to primary care trusts and local authorities. We are currently in a utopia of coterminous authorities, and we wreck that at our peril. The Carter report vision is for the continuation of such partnerships, and it highlights the need for improving shared information. I agree with that direction, as do the people I have spoken to and the responses I have seen in the summary of responses to the consultation.

My local probation service is outstanding; through my experiences with it, I am aware of the good practice that emerges through collaboration—it has taken great pains to demonstrate that to me on more than one occasion. There is a lot of support for increasing the use of partnerships, although concerns have been raised about how that might happen in practice. In general, organisations appeared to be keen to work with each other, and to develop the work that has been done in recent years. The Probation Boards Association said that it would "welcome the increased use of the voluntary/not-for-profit sector in dealing with the needs of offenders and communities. These partnerships not only add to the capacity of probation boards to deliver services but play an important part in community engagement and awareness-raising."

The second part of "National Offender Management Service—Next Steps" summarises the response to the second consultation, which focused on the preferred organisational design of the new service. Despite the support that there is for increased partnership working, many respondents made it clear that they felt that there was no need for radical structural changes, and that the required changes in delivery could be brought about without so much upheaval to staff—staff who have been involved in the process of change for many years. That process is not conducive to good, efficient working, or the improvement of morale.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I apologise for not being in the Chamber for the early part of my hon. Friend's speech.

I secured a debate in Westminster Hall on this topic three weeks ago and have had a great deal of feedback from probation officers in the service. Does my hon. Friend agree, from knowledge of her research and contacts, that the probation service feels uneasy about the relationship of the regional structure and the fact that it will just have contractual, not supervisory, relationships with suppliers? Does she regret—as the probation service does—that the service in its current form, which was set up almost 100 years ago by the Probation of Offenders Act 1907, seems unlikely to survive in the way that was envisaged just some years ago? Will not the centenary be a redundant date?

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I am delighted to see my hon. Friend in the Chamber and I take this opportunity to congratulate him on securing the first debate on the subject. I read the response to that debate with a great deal of sadness and noted that many of his concerns were not adequately addressed. I concur with his views.

The local probation boards and the probation facilities feel disfranchised from the process of restructuring the probation services and are yet to be convinced that the models on offer will do anything to enhance the effectiveness of their role in relation to prisoners.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I am listening to the hon. Lady's speech carefully and agree with a lot of what she says. There is an element of déjà vu about this whole debate. I, too, was dissatisfied with the Minister's responses to the last debate, and I asked him to reply to all Members present in writing, but I had not yet had a letter from him until he handed me today a copy of a letter dated 24 March. To the best of my knowledge, it has not yet arrived in my office, and even it does not fully answer all the questions raised in the debate. There have been answers subsequent to the debate and publication of the Hansard report of it, but the hon. Lady may, like me, not have had the advantage of seeing even that inadequate letter.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: NOMS, the probation service and prisons are not on many parliamentarians' list of hot topics, but they are certainly on mine. A discrete number of colleagues in the House is interested in this matter, and we will not let it rest. We know that there are significant consequences to changing the probation and prison services. I want to ensure that any changes deliver a better service, and I will not stop until I have seen evidence of that and probation boards tell me that what is going to happen is better. Those people have the experience, and I am not going to argue with them because that experience has been gained over a long period, as my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) just said.

Many respondents to the consultation pointed out that existing local relationships, both formal and informal, were important in ensuring successful management. As I said earlier, and as I intend to repeat, I want local people working with the crime and disorder partnerships, the probation boards, the youth offender teams and the youth justice boards to ensure that there is local accountability. That matters immensely to me.

One of the strongest messages coming from the consultation was concern about regional rather than local delivery structures. Numerous respondents pointed out how integral local structures and partnerships were to criminal justice services, and it was felt that the NOMS design would reduce that. The NOMS design does nothing to enhance those organisations that were set up as a result of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 and runs counter to many of the measures introduced under that Act that focused on local involvement and local agency working.

[Mrs. Curtis-Thomas]

Local arrangements supported by local people are necessary to ensure that work with offenders can be carried out effectively and in partnership with the range of other agencies which provide services to offenders. Furthermore, co-operation between locally managed probation services, the police and courts has been vital to crime reduction and the running of youth justice teams, which have been enabled by coterminous boundaries.

I am extremely impressed with the work on Merseyside through multi-agency public protection arrangements, and there are currently interagency arrangements to tackle serious crime. Those arrangements bring together all the relevant agencies and organisations to share information on the minority of offenders who cause the most concern—that is, sexual or violent offenders.

Until the mid to late 1990s, joined-up work was patchy. Agencies tended to work in isolation and guard their information on offenders, often managed in isolated pockets of time. That would mean one agency closing a file, with another opening a new one. Now, there is file sharing, and things are much better. A different approach prevails, and we have seen good examples of it in Liverpool. One of the basic principles of sharing such information is illustrated by the Liverpool intensive supervision monitoring scheme, whereby the police and probation officers have access to each others' computer files. Three levels of seriousness have been introduced to assist the process. Level 3 is the most serious and is reserved for the critical few who pose a risk to the community that requires input from a range of agencies. Senior managers come together locally to allocate significant resources to manage such individuals.

The scheme has been successful, as the 2003–04 statistics indicate. Some 67 individuals were subject to a level 3 multi-agency protection panel, and only two were subsequently charged with a new serious offence. In areas such as Bootle, that meant a massive reduction in some drug-related crime; and by massive I mean 80 per cent. The agents involved in the exercise—they are involved to this day—say that that is the result of multi-agency working and local solutions to local problems.

It is worth giving a real example. AA, who is just 20, has been in trouble with the law all his life and is serving a long prison sentence for violent muggings on trains. He has a history of psychological problems, made worse by drink and drug abuse. He has completed his intensive offending behaviour programme, acquired some educational qualifications during his prison sentence and faced up to the effects of his behaviour on his victims. He will soon be released on licence to complete his prison sentence under supervision in the community, which I applaud.

A MAPPA meeting will therefore be called to ensure that all the supervision arrangements are in place, to monitor his progress. At such meetings, all agencies share information, assess the risk and agree actions to be taken by the various agency representatives. In AA's case, the agencies involved will work together, as they understand that although good use is being made of custody time, he must be supported in the community.

Merseyside has formed a strategic management board made up of the relevant senior agency representatives, as well as the prison and probation services and the police. The board includes representatives of Support After Murder and Manslaughter—SAMM—the director of social services, the area manager of the St. Helens youth offending team and the deputy director of nursing for Mersey Care NHS Trust, to name but a few. Those people will be lost in the regional structure, but we cannot afford to lose them. They must stay in place.

The head of St. Helens youth offending services has found that the work has informed his involvement with the strategic management board and feels that it has helped his understanding of issues involving victims of crime and the wider community. Where is there a place for such people in the current organisational structures for ROMs? I cannot see it. Does that mean that their role disappears, or does it mean that they are pulled into the centre of NOMS, a long way from Merseyside and the problems that my constituents experience.

Carol Chalmers, who is the chief executive of victim support and witness services in Merseyside, also welcomes her part in the multi-agency partnership. She says that "research has shown that a collaborative approach in addressing the issues surrounding serious offenders is essential to prevent re-offending re-occurring . . . public protection is dependant upon thorough co-ordination by all the key agencies."

I have laboured the point about localisation of the structure long enough and should turn to contestability. The Minister wants to place contestability at the heart of NOMS to ensure the best services. In an interview with NOMS Update magazine in January, Christine Knott explained that ROMs were already forging links with the key people in their regions and would quickly begin working to separate offender management from interventions. That will mean that existing providers will compete with private and voluntary sector providers to supply interventions in the community, thus leading to secrecy rather than information sharing. If agencies have to compete for work, they will develop their own strategies and ways of preparing and pricing programmes. There will not be the sharing of best practice between providers that we have now. I have seen that kind of sharing in action; providers say, "What is working with you? This is working with us." If they all have to contract for work, there will be no sharing of good practice. People will keep good practice to themselves in the hope that they can win further contracts, and I am deeply opposed to that.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend has moved on, at least in part, from effectiveness to cost. Is she concerned, as I am, that the NOMS overhead associated with producing, considering and monitoring myriad contracts with public, private and voluntary sector providers will itself be a very substantial cost? Perhaps we may judge by early experiences in the related area of hostels facilities and management contracts. The experience there, according to people who have e-mailed me, is that the situation

"goes from bad to worse in terms of service but the costs increase."

That is just a scandal. We do not need to look into a crystal ball; we can look back at what happened in that area when there was contestability, outsourcing and privatisation. Is not that the case?

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I agree absolutely; that is my experience. We have seen repeated examples of that when we have privatised a service. Privatisation may provide a service at less cost, but that does not mean it is more effective. We cannot overestimate the sophistication of the programmes developed to address the criminal habits of some individuals. The programmes have to be specifically tailored for each individual at great expense to the taxpayers. That is as a result of the criminals' action in the first place. The result is further expense to try to curtail and manage their behaviour in future. Experts currently put these programmes together, and they work.

A regional structure will incur greater costs, and those will have to be shared by each of the probation services, so we will get increasing costs and supervision. I want to know how that translates to the bottom line in terms of improved delivery. Quite frankly, I do not want any more managers in the system; I want more people out on the streets working with offenders.

Many probation staff feel clearly threatened by the proposal to split the purchaser-provider functions, as do the trade unions. Nearly 60 per cent. of union responses were strongly against the proposal. One union said that the split would "run counter to Patrick Carter's original aim of 'breaking down the silos of the services' and will have a negative impact on staff and on the recruitment of staff, as well as on the principles of the service."

The move towards contestability seems to go against the principle suggested in the Carter report. The proposals appear not to provide any structural integration of the probation and prison services; rather, they keep them separate and signal the intention of splitting the probation service in two.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Lady has mentioned the movement towards contestability. It is no longer a movement, because the first cluster of prisons has already been put out for competition; contestability is with us before we have even had any Bills and before NOMS has had sufficient scrutiny in this House, let alone among the unions and other interested parties.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: Yes, I am aware of that. A member of my staff is currently with some of the probation boards and services across the UK, and I asked about some of those services. I know that some are shaping up to be put out, but I did not realise some of them had gone out.

As hon. Members know, I am prolific in asking parliamentary questions, having asked nearly 2,000. I give the Minister good notice of the fact that I shall be putting pen to paper, and I will expect to find out exactly what is what in this area. That will be good news for the Minister for after the next election, one hopes.

I want to bring my remarks to a close. I apologise for the length of my speech, but I wanted to put these matters, which I feel so strongly about, on the record. I am accountable to the people I serve in my constituency, and I am proud to be so. This is an essential part of my job. Many of us do not like to think of prisoners coming back into the community and reoffending. I have been trying my damnedest to limit that eventuality in my community. That is why I have such a great interest in the subject, and I do not intend to relinquish that interest.

In a press statement, the National Association of Probation Officers said:

"The purpose of the National Offender Management Service, which is established in today's Bill, is to dismantle the Probation Service and introduce privatisation in order to drive down costs. This will be done through reducing terms and conditions of staff."

That is not necessarily the case. However, the statement went on:

"This is unlikely to reduce re-offending and, indeed, could actually lead to an increase in crime, because quantity not quality will become the main principle."

It is not the cost but the value that matters. There is therefore a belief that NOMS will cause disruption in the service while failing in its aim to reduce reoffending.

As I have mentioned, one of the most effective methods of working in the probation service of late has been the multi-agency approach. I argued that that would be undermined if the boundaries of the probation service were changed. It will be more difficult to maintain links as their focuses will vary. However, multi-agency working, which we have been moving towards, faces a greater threat from the decision to move towards contestability through the separation of purchaser and provider functions. As one commentator noted:

"There is a risk that this approach could be counterproductive if NOMS is to succeed in delivering end-to-end management of offenders that will rely upon co-operation between service providers from all sectors."

There is much evidence to support the view that dislocating the work of offender management and interventions would adversely affect the provision of an integrated, coherent and effective service to offenders.

I have said enough. My primary concern is that the NOMS service will be managed regionally. The dimension of locality seems to be missing. I have looked at the organisational structures—I am something of an expert in those—and cannot find anything that suggests that local providers will be able to determine what best suits local needs. That is what is crucial. Moreover, our probation boards are populated by local people who are accountable to local people and take great pride in the work that they do. We must not prejudice the involvement of local people in the action of the probation boards—that is also crucial.

I am implacably opposed to contestability. At the moment it is about reducing cost and not necessarily improving the effectiveness of services. We cannot do that. We must continue with the good work established with a number of agencies since the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 was introduced, which is commendable. We have worked hard to involve local people in the management of local offenders, and we have to continue to do that. I cannot see NOMS, as constituted, enabling that process of local accountability one jot. I look forward to the reassuring words that I hope to get from my hon. Friend the Minister at the end of the debate, which will address not only my concerns but those of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire and of the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), as expressed in recent debates. We must have overt and coherent answers to our concerns. If we do not, I have a long and interesting record of writing parliamentary questions about the matter.

[Mrs. Curtis-Thomas]

2.39 pm

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): I warmly congratulate the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas), who has spoken with enormous passion. Her anger and commitment have been made clear in her remarks. She need not apologise for speaking at length, because I have to say that I agreed with every single word. I have learnt a great deal. She is right to say that, cross-party, we all wanted to take a sensible way forward from the Carter review. We need one organisation to look at the whole criminal sentence process; many of us were concerned about the different parts of the organisation. When the National Offender Management Service was being talked about as a result of Carter, there was a sense that quite a bit of consensus could be achieved. As we know, a lot of the good will was lost over the birth of NOMS. There is no point in going over the history, but NOMS certainly did not start out well because of how it was managed.

However, I sign up to the underlying objectives and aims that people are trying to achieve. The hon. Member for Crosby was right to talk about the problems experienced after the launch, and about the lack of consultation. I was interested to hear her comments about the current stakeholder forum, and I hope that that represents a more constructive approach. It is a pity that it has come so late; we could have achieved much more in a different way if it had been there before. Never mind; it is there now, and let us hope that it is a building block for a better way forward.

The hon. Member for Crosby was right to look harshly at some of the issues of structure. Structure is critical; it is important that we get the right level. I was taken by her illustrations of the fact that what works in Bootle may not work in Crosby. We all know about that principle from our experiences in different parts of the country. We have to have a strong local focus, and one way to achieve that is for a set of individuals to work in their communities at making people aware, particularly of work on probation.

That is why the probation boards have been so helpful in building those links. I see the structure issue—whether there should be organisations in different regions—and the probation board issue as one. My experience of meeting probation boards, such as the one serving my area in Hampshire and Winchester, is that good chief executives and individuals on them will go out and be advocates. They will, if you like, sell the service of probation—and by golly it needs selling. It needs explaining, and it needs businesses and communities to be signed up to the work that is taking place. The person running the probation service in my area, and the chairman of the board, have done excellent work in talking to local newspapers, writing articles, holding receptions in their offices, bringing businesses in and persuading the community that they should be taking individuals who are part of community service. They have been the advocates. However, I have to say that we would not have gone to their receptions or events unless they had been locally focused and we had been on first-name terms with some of those individuals who, we felt, were embedded and knew about the community. The hon. Lady was absolutely right to raise that issue.

She was also right to raise concerns about contestability—horrible word. I am not ideologically opposed to the private sector being involved in running public services. I have never bought into the argument of public good, private bad. I have always been very open minded about how things should work. However, in some areas the private sector is not necessarily appropriate; sometimes, deciding whether to bring in the private sector is very complex. I have concerns about that, particularly in relation to prisons; the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) is right to say that the process starts with prisons.

I am uneasy about the assumption that a failing prison may be ripe for contestability and for a private company to come in. Surely we should examine some of the reasons why prisons are struggling in the first place and the assumption that their problems can be solved by a different organisational structure. Such problems cannot always be solved in that way. Many prisons are failing because of issues of funding, location, the age of the buildings and pressures of overcrowding—reasons that have very little to do with management and the individuals running through.

I am also concerned about how things are being done, given the need for a level playing field. I have one specific question for the Minister. There appear to be different offender management targets in different prisons. I am told that public-sector prisons have the target of keeping overcrowding to under 24 per cent. However, the target for overcrowding in contracted prisons is 34 per cent. That seems bizarre; there are unlevel playing fields for contracted and publicly-run prisons when it comes to targeting. Will the Minister respond, or write to me, on that? That would be helpful. If we have unlevel playing fields on contestability, there will obviously be some concerns.

I conclude with some thoughts about why it is so important to get matters right, and on the challenge for those working in probation and in the prisons. The hon. Member for Crosby said it may be that not all politicians want to talk about that. My party will talk about it in the next four weeks, during the general election campaign, although there is a risk in doing so. The other parties are already distributing leaflets misquoting things that I have said about whether prison works but I shall keep on talking about prison, and about the importance of getting this right, because if we are serious about tackling crime, one obvious way of reducing the number of criminal offences is to reduce the number of people who leave prison and reoffend.

I need not bore those in this Chamber, who are all familiar with them, with the statistics: more than 50 per cent. of prisoners—and more than 70 per cent. of 18 to 21-year-olds—who leave prison reoffend. Prison is expensive, and we should get better value for money than reoffending rates such as that. Probation and prison working together can play a key role in tackling that reoffending rate, and they need to work better to enable individuals who leave prison to access housing and probation. Multi-agencies need to have a role in that too. The system needs to work better so that prisoners on probation and out in the community doing community service have good access to drug rehabilitation and alcohol programmes; we know that they are effective.

Tackling the problem of education and training is critical to the process. Let me end with an anecdote that has troubled me enormously. I met a prisoner who was due for release and congratulated her on her release, but she said that she did not want to be released. When I asked why, she said, "Because I am in the middle of a hairdressing course and I want to continue it. I am going to be released in three weeks' time and the course in prison will finish in about four months. I have tried everywhere to be able to continue the course outside prison, and I cannot, so I would much rather stay here to continue the course, to get the qualification and to become a hairdresser and get a job."

The situation is nonsensical. It highlights that it is essential to bring together probation, prison and all the agencies if we are to tackle that sort of problem and all the others that go with integration. I congratulate the hon. Member for Crosby on having raised the issue and I hope that the Minister will give us satisfactory responses. It is important, it is critical; it is a really big issue that needs to be tackled. The intentions behind NOMS were good, but it has gone off the rails. There could be good will across all parties to get it back on track.

David Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the ways of getting back on the rails—the present prisons Minister is the best we have had in the past eight years—would be for NOMS to publish a detailed business plan that can be scrutinised, debated and measured against standards that people will accept as being those of a good public sector organisation?

Mr. Oaten: I agree; the sooner that happens, the better.

I am informed that the NOMS business plan has just been published and put on the Home Office website, although it appears not to have been circulated to probation boards and chief officers. The Minister may be able to confirm that; it was mentioned in a briefing note that I received a couple of days ago. If that is the case, it is a shame that those on the front line have not received it. On the other hand, they can access the website. At least the information is available. If it has not been put across in the right way, that is another example of how this issue is not handled as well as it might be. We have an opportunity to get it right. We are a long way from doing so, but the will is there to make it work in future.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): There is a huge element of déjà vu about our debate, but I am delighted that the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) has given us another opportunity to beard the Minister in this den of Westminster Hall. I hope that he will be left with a lot more time to answer today's debate, as we have a lot more questions and many are hanging over from previous debates.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Crosby on her introduction to the debate. I understand that the Minister is married to a lady from Crosby. I hope that that will soften him up for his replies to the debate—and I hope that the hon. Lady will have more success in getting replies out of the Minister than did other Members in this Chamber on previous occasions.

I identify strongly with the story told by the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten). Unfortunately, the Liberal Democrats do not have much continuity in dealing with the subject; the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) was speaking on prisons in the previous Westminster Hall debate. It would be nice to see consistency, with the same people following the subject through.

I, too, have spoken to many prisoners and discovered that the way in which they are prepared for release is so inadequate that they would rather stay inside. Recidivism is one thing, but it borders on the ridiculous that people can be so frightened of re-entering society that they would prefer to lose their liberty. That is when probation officers and prison officers come to the fore. They are the very people, the experts, needed to deliver a reduction in reoffending and to help ex-prisoners to take a proper role in society—a role in which they can contribute by working and paying tax rather than being a net drain on society. We all share that view.

To a certain extent, the Carter principles, the rebalancing of sentencing and a greater congruence between the work of the Prison Service and the probation service to help reduce reoffending and to protect the public is something to which we all subscribe. I have no doubt about that. Nevertheless, however pleasant, charming and helpful the Minister is, I am afraid that we seem to be descending into a quagmire. People do not know what is going on, and communications are exceedingly poor.

I understand that a group or cluster of prisons has already been put out to competition under the National Offender Management Service, but the Bill has gone nowhere. I was today handed a letter in reply to the debate that was instigated the other day by the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor). That letter confirms that the first competition has gone ahead, but the points that I raised on the Bill were not dealt with, other than the Minister stating:

"It is regrettable that the Parliamentary timetable has not allowed for this Bill to be progressed more swiftly; however, I confirm that I have no intention of withdrawing the Bill this Session."

That was allegedly written on 24 March; yet on 6 April, today, the Bill has little likelihood of success. I hope that the Minister is not going to pick a horse on the Grand National on Saturday; I am not sure that I would trust his judgment. It was an open secret: everyone knew that the Bill would go nowhere—everyone except the Minister, who seemed always to stand up for it. I have heard rumours that the Bill will be redrafted—I am sure it will—yet NOMS is rolling on apace without legislative scrutiny, and the Minister has not consulted those involved in the work or Members of the House. Despite that, the change affects every constituency.

The business plan is not an impressive document. It is one of the thinnest business plans that I have seen for a long time. I, too, know about business and management. The business plan runs to five pages. The corporate plan is a little longer, but several of its pages show pictures of the members of the NOMS executive board. I thought that legislation had to be scrutinised by the House before the changes took place, but the plan mentions April 2005. I am not sure when it was prepared, but it must have been obvious that the Bill would not be introduced or debated. We question how it was introduced and how it is being managed by the Home Office. I have no doubt that there is general confusion and chaos, and that communications are poor.

[Mrs. Cheryl Gillan]

David Taylor: I shall dash back to my office to look at the website and examine the business plan to which the hon. Lady refers. What matters is quality, not length, but I have seen what appear to be more substantial business plans for village halls. We are talking about a major public service that obviously needs billions of pounds of public money, and the trauma of change is envisaged. Condensing that to five sides of A4 paper means that it is unlikely to have been done well.

Mrs. Gillan: It is hard to glean much detail from it, but it has just appeared on the Home Office website and one must ask to whom it has been sent because the chief probation officers have not yet received it. I am not sure what the distribution process is for information, but while we are talking about communications from the Home Office, I note that NOMS officials have acknowledged that communications have been poor. I understand that the NOMS updates that are circulated to all staff have also dried up. Will the Minister confirm that NOMS updates have not been issued to staff recently and that they have been left in the dark on a permanent basis at a time of unprecedented change? Goodness only knows. I used to work for Arthur Young when it merged with Ernst and Whinney, and became Ernst and Young, and we had daily communications. In a major upheaval in a major organisation, the staff must be spoken to, informed and consulted, not kept in the dark. At a time such as this, during a general election, the updates should not be allowed to dry up.

I question the way in which the whole process is being managed. Our prison and probation services are not running along nicely. Indeed, they are in crisis in many areas: we still have gross overcrowding in some areas; the prison system is 24 per cent. overcrowded, as confirmed by Anne Owers; and there are at least two self-inflicted deaths a week. Last year, prison staff had to resuscitate 228 prisoners—that is 228 lives that were saved by the people who are not being consulted about the way in which their jobs are being changed—and there were almost 18,000 incidents of self-harm in our prisons. We are talking about the most vulnerable people in our society, who are at the mercy of the state, and about the people who provide this service to our society.

There are still many questions, and I am disappointed in the response so far as this should not be a contentious matter. Members of the Labour, Conservative and Liberal Democrat parties have pressed the Minister for an answer, but answers came there none. There is silence on so much about the way in which NOMS has been put forward.

Throughout this process, I have been briefed by the unions and their representatives, and I have been pleased to do business with them as they have conducted themselves in a first-class fashion. They have sought not to make political mileage but to get their organisations' voices heard by the Labour Government. I am grateful for the fair way in which they have briefed me.

The National Association of Probation Officers believes that there are still huge gaps and unanswered questions, and that the vision that the Minister has so often articulated about the statement of purpose for the Prison Service and the aims of the probation service is silent on the objective of rehabilitating those who have offended. It is an alarming indictment that it is silent on core values and principles. It is silent on achieving diversity and treating people with humanity, and on supporting the staff. Believe me, the staff do not feel supported. It is silent on the principles of openness and transparency, on the need for problem-solving approaches and on the need for an approach based on partnership and collaboration. That is a fundamental criticism of the process, which is reflected in the way in which the hon. Member for Crosby introduced the debate.

I do not want to speak for too long, as I want to leave the Minister plenty of time to respond, but I am worried. My having covered this brief for the past year and having spoken to so many people, it is natural that documents should be sent to me from time to time, and I need some explanation from the Minister about some of them.

There is no doubt that this is a time of unprecedented change with the major sentencing reforms in the Criminal Justice Act 2003 being introduced this week, on 4 April. The challenges from the changes to the courts and the criminal justice service, particularly the probation service, are great, and our services need stability and support if they are to achieve the aims that the Minister and the Home Office have set out for them. However, at the same time, we have NOMS going on.

The business plan for the national probation service is obviously assessed internally within the Home Office. I have been passed something called annex C which is a summary risk register for 2005–06. I think that I understand the document, but I would like the Minister to answer some questions about it.

The risk register takes a couple of headings from the circular and identifies the likelihood of the risk taking place and what the impact would be of certain happenings. The first heading is:

"Contributing to the building of an excellent National Offender Management Service with the separation of Offender Management from Interventions: During 2005–06 areas will be expected to reorganise themselves to establish a clear operational division between offender management and interventions."

The risks and risk descriptions are then laid out, accompanied by a traffic-light system. One obviously, therefore, looks at the ones marked in red. I find there that there is a medium likelihood, with a high impact, and a risk rating assessment which is right up the register, that a "lack of programme and programme management for NOMS implementation leads to uncertainty resulting in drop in performance and organisational effectiveness" of the prison and probation service. That sounds pretty serious. I would like to know what the Minister thinks a medium risk with a high impact is. Also considered to be of medium risk is "insufficient priority to establishment of new interventions organisation results in non-viable interventions capacity."

Likewise, a medium risk is given to

"inadequate workforce planning to meet challenges of new CJA/ Offender Manager development results in loss of confidence by sentencers."

All those risks fall into the red area.

The next heading is:

"Working purposefully with other criminal justice agencies to protect the public from harm."

I really want some answers from the Minister today on that area. Various risks have been identified, with their likelihood of the risk taking place and the impact. The first is "industrial action/work to rule leading to disruption of service delivery."

Apparently the Home Office considers that to be a medium risk. However, there is also considered to be a high risk of a "loss of key skills resulting in inadequate supervision of dangerous offenders", of which the impact would also be high. That is rated outside the traffic-light system: it goes to black.

Another area considered to be of very high risk and very high impact is described as follows:

"Failure to obtain GSI accreditation results in reduced cross-CJS collaboration leading to failure to deliver benefits of joined up for CJS."

I understand that that is a total failure of communications by e-mail; it does not work. There is considered to be a very high likelihood of it happening, and a very high risk.

We are talking about a system for managing offenders. They are vulnerable people and people who, if they are not properly contained, looked after, managed and seen through the process—as the Minister likes to call it—of offender management, may put other people at risk. If this document says that even the basic communication system is not going to work, I am worried. Will the Minister comment on that?

There is also considered to be a high risk of "inadequate supervision of cases leading to high profile media attention and unmanageable policy making."

The impact of that would also be very high. Again, that is put in a black box, so it is outside the traffic-light system—it is right at the top of the risk rating.

If all that is the case, everything that has ever been said by the Opposition on this area is coming home to roost; the prison and probation service have been tipped into a position in which risks are being run. The Minister should take the 25 minutes available not only to respond to the points raised by the hon. Member for Crosby, but to talk us through those risk assessments. I am sure that they will be easy for him to dismiss. He said, "Well it might happen; that is how we look at the risks". However, we deserve an answer from the Minister, even this close to a general election, when the ratings against the risk factors that I have identified in the debate are "very high".

Our prison and probation services are very good. I am proud of them, and they deserve first-class treatment for the first-class job that they try to do. As I said, they do not deserve the current chaos and uncertainty, and I look to the Minister to answer today and not to write to me before the election.

3.5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I happily promise the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) that I will not write to her again before the general election, if that will satisfy her. I also hope that I will be able to answer the questions that my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) has asked this afternoon as well as those asked by other hon. Members.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on raising the issue. She rightly described herself as a persistent and prolific offender when it comes to parliamentary questions and debates and raising issues of importance to her and her constituents. As she said at the end of her speech, that is the job of a constituency Member of Parliament. She does that job assiduously, which is greatly to her credit, and I firmly hope that that is recognised in the next few weeks. I am sure that it will be.

My hon. Friend spoke with passion and said that she would be back. I am grateful for that, because we are a year into what we always said was a five-year programme of development of the National Offender Management Service. It was never a service that could be pulled out of a hat or developed in five minutes. It is a complex arrangement that will take time to deliver and to develop properly. In the end, it will succeed only with the collaboration of those people who work at the sharp end of the service. I shall return to that theme later.

David Taylor: Will the Minister talk at some point about the existence or absence of a detailed business plan? We are 20 per cent. of the way into the five-year programme. Is he sure that staff have been properly informed at all stages, so that the fog of uncertainty has been lifted and the doubts and concerns that they naturally have as professionals working in an established service have been allayed? Is he sure that that aspect of the reorganisation of the service has been given proper attention and priority?

Paul Goggins: I am very pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) in the Chamber again today. Indeed, he secured the previous debate on this subject. He has always participated in these debates, to which I pay tribute.

I should ensure that hon. Members do not confuse the business plan with the business case, which has frequently been requested and which, as I confirmed in the previous debate, is currently the subject of a Freedom of Information Act application. We will reconsider our refusal to publish the full business case if we accept that application, but in the meantime we have the business plan, which any public service is expected to provide, for the immediate period ahead. That is the document to which we are referring. I will talk about that issue later in more detail.

I have never hidden the fact that there has been a need to improve communication with the work force to ensure that they are engaged and involved in the development of the organisation and its work. That is and remains my vision for the development of NOMS. We have taken steps to ensure that communication is improved. I will also talk about that later.

[Paul Goggins]

Do I believe that staff now understand everything and feel confident that their positions in the organisation are secure? I fully accept that many members of staff do not feel like that, which is regrettable. It therefore remains an urgent task for Ministers and other senior officials to ensure that that dialogue is intensified and developed, because no one has anything to fear from the development of the service. Professionals and everyone else who is engaged in the system have everything to gain from the more coherent system that will be developed through the service.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) stated that the five-page business plan had not been distributed to our chairmen and chief executives. The chairmen, in the inception of NOMS, were excluded from discussions and I know that there has been an attempt to address the omission, but can the Minister confirm that the business plan and the accompanying corporate plan have been distributed to the chief executive of the probation authorities and the chairmen and that they received them before we did?

Paul Goggins: I cannot confirm that a specific copy has been sent personally to each of the people my hon. Friend mentions. There is no secret about the documents. They have been published on the website and they are there for people to see. If my hon. Friend suggests that people in those key positions in the local organisations do not routinely look at the Home Office website and need their attention to be drawn to this, that is worth considering. I will happily go back and check whether direct communications were made. If they have not been I will make sure that they are. My hon. Friend is entirely right.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: Will the Minister give way?

Paul Goggins: I will, although several hon. Members complained that I did not respond adequately to questions last time. I always give way in debates because it is important to exchange views. But if hon. Members want their questions to be answered they will have to give me a little time to complete my remarks.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: The Minister says that it is incumbent on chairmen and chief executives to check the website. That is a bit like me saying to my constituents, "If you want an answer to a problem, go to my website." That is not acceptable. These people are pivotal in the delivery of services. They ought to be treated as such and receive the correspondence that is pertinent to their job. I must receive assurances that that will be the case. I am exceptionally busy and I do not check my website every day. I do not expect them to have to check a document that is available to the general public to find out information that is directly pertinent to them and the operation of their service.

Paul Goggins: I do not wish to go down a blind alley here. I was simply making the point that I would expect those people to have seen the business plan. My hon. Friend is quite right: we should ensure that they have seen them for certain. I will check that they have.

Mrs. Gillan: May I help the Minister?

Paul Goggins: I will be happy to receive the hon. Lady's assistance, but my hon. Friend has this assurance: I am not a Minister who will take a punt on whether something has happened, even if it probably has, if I do not know for certain. I always check things thoroughly. If it has not happened, it will happen.

Mrs. Gillan: A probation board's briefing was emailed to me yesterday. It says that the business plan and the NOMS corporate plan have just appeared on the Home Office website. To whom has it been sent? It was not sent, apparently, to probation chief officers or boards. I was told that in direct briefing from a probation board. The Minister can take it that it has not been sent to them. It does not surprise me because there is so much in these documents that needs to be answered. The Minister will understand that they will be concerned about all the efficiency savings, for example, that are laid out to be achieved in these documents.

Paul Goggins: Nothing in the business plans will come as a surprise to any of the chief officers engaged in the delivery of the services. I make the point again: I will check and if they have not received the plan already, they will. I will be in touch with my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby to let her know the outcome.

I must press on as time is receding very rapidly. Our correctional services have more investment going in now than ever before. Almost £4 billion is going into our prison and probation services. They are performing better than ever. There is no question about that. But, as has emerged from the debate, we still need to do more, not least in reducing rates of reoffending. It is that determination to reduce rates of reoffending that lies at the heart of the offender management service reforms.

I was delighted to hear my hon. Friend declare openly that she shared the vision for NOMS. She rightly pointed out that she and the Home Affairs Committee had welcomed the introduction of NOMS. There is no disagreement between us there. I hope that I will be able to offer her some reassurance on some of her detailed points about organisational structure and so on. Our determination is threefold. I have made these points before, but I need to make them again. First, we need to rebalance the system. My hon. Friend studies these things carefully and she knows that far too many people are still in the wrong part of the criminal justice system. Too many are in prison on short-term sentences rather than on robust community sentences, and too many have the support and supervision of probation officers when they should have been dealt with through a fine. We are determined to reinvigorate the fine and to ensure that community sentences are properly developed and robust and that there are adequate and proper places in prison for the serious and dangerous offenders who need to be there. The need to rebalance the system is absolutely fundamental.

Secondly, we need to introduce a proper system of offender management. In his report, Patrick Carter always referred to the two silos of prison and probation.

No matter how well those services perform, we can no longer have a system that is divided in that way. We need individual offender managers who are accountable to individual offenders and responsible for their sentence plans. That is particularly important now—if it was not before—following the introduction on Monday of the new sentencing framework. Under that framework, a determinate prisoner, for example, will spend the first part of their sentence in prison and the whole of the second part of their sentence after they have left prison under community supervision. We shall have one sentence, in two parts, properly managed by one offender manager. That gives us real hope that we can do far more to join up the systems.

The story that the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) told was horrific. Somebody was making progress because of a hairdressing course, but they were unable to see that progress sustained beyond the prison gates. Whether we are talking about hairdressing training, education, drug treatment, mental health support, employment or accommodation, provisions must be followed through coherently in one system. That is why I am so passionate about the need to introduce offender management right through the system.

The third element is contestability. We need to drive out more value for the huge amounts of investment that we are making. That is not privatisation or old-fashioned market testing, which seeks to cut the costs of our services. We have made guarantees, not least in relation to the contestability process for the three prisons on the Isle of Sheppey, that we are not looking for cost reductions. We are looking for added value and a bigger impact on reducing rates of reoffending.

I want the private sector, the voluntary sector and the not-for-profit sector to deepen the partnership that they already have with our Prison Service and probation service. I was delighted to meet people from the Pitstop project in Calderdale in a room nearby, and I hope that hon. Members present also had the opportunity to do so. My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) drew my attention to that voluntary organisation, which works to prevent young people from getting involved in crime in the first place. I want the correctional services to embrace such organisations, to bring them on side and to see them as part and parcel of the system. That is what contestability is, and that organisation, like any voluntary organisation or private company, should have the chance to bid for the work.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I have looked at what organisational structures and schematics exist for NOMS. The Minister has asserted that there will be continuous management of individuals' rehabilitation programmes inside and outside prison, but nothing in the current structure demonstrates that. On the contrary, there is one line saying that prison services will be paid for and one saying that probation services will be paid for; there is no box that draws the two together. Will the Minister confirm that one person will be responsible for an individual and will dictate their rehabilitative programme, whether they are in prison or community service? At the moment, the organisational structure does not show that; it shows two different people managing the individual in two different worlds.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Edward O'Hara): Order. Before the Minister responds to that intervention, let me say that I have been taking advice about the request by the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) to speak a second time in the debate; I can find no precedent for that. She seems to have been following my advice to achieve her purpose through interventions, and I advise her to continue to do so. It is, of course, for the Minister to determine whether he has time to take all her interventions.

Paul Goggins: As I explained, I always try to take interventions, so that we can have a genuine exchange. I can confirm to my hon. Friend that one, named, individual offender manager will be responsible for the whole sentence plan. Whether that plan is in prison, in the community, or partly in each, it will be for the individual offender manager to manage the whole plan, and to have a real input into its various elements.

An issue arises about where a prison governor's responsibility starts and ends. The governor is responsible for good order and discipline in the prison, as we should expect, and will continue to exercise that authority, but the system will not, as it is now, be composed of two distinct and unrelated parts. The offender manager will determine the plan and see it through and will be accountable for it and its impact. I hope that that gives greater clarity.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the Minister give way?

Paul Goggins: I should just like to mention the Isle of Sheppey, and the announcement that we made there a couple of weeks ago, because the hon. Lady asked me about that. She referred to our taking the action in question without a Bill. We are handling the contestability process in relation to the three prisons on the Isle of Sheppey within existing legislation.

The staff on Sheppey, entering upon the process, can do so in the knowledge that they have all the protection of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 and all the additional protections that arise from the code designed to tackle the two-tier work force, so that, for example, a bidder cannot win the contract simply by undercutting on wages. There will have to be a level playing field.

The staff can, also, begin in the knowledge that the public sector prison service has a fine and growing reputation. There is nothing to fear for anyone who works in the Prison Service in those three prisons from what is being done; what we stand to gain is added value for the work that they do.

Mrs. Gillan: I hope that the Minister is not implying that after the Bill on NOMS is passed the staff would not have the protection of TUPE. According to the spirit, if not the essence, of these things, I appreciate that the Minister does not need the legislation, but to put things out so precipitately is not correct.

I should like to take the Minister back to what he was saying; he said that an individual will be responsible for the sentence plan and management of an offender and will be accountable. How can someone be held accountable when a prisoner is moved from London to another part of the country, and then to another and another, as happens now? Does the Minister say that there will be no churning—no movement of prisoners across the country?

[Mrs. Gillan]

Paul Goggins: The hon. Lady knows, because we have debated the subject in the past, that one of my hopes—my firm expectations—from the development of the offender management service, is that we shall increase the number of prisoners who are closer to home, particularly in preparation for release. She and I know—we all know—that good resettlement and rehabilitation are best achieved in close collaboration with the agencies in the community that can support a sentence plan beyond prison. I therefore expect that the numbers she is concerned about will reduce, and it is important that they should. The hon. Lady shakes her head, although I do not know what evidence she has to support her view. My aspiration is clear, and I believe that the increasing local and regional focus, to which I shall come in a second, will help us.

Mr. Oaten: The Minister has talked about contestability with respect to prisons; will he deal with my point about the different overcrowding targets in the public and private sectors?

Paul Goggins: I shall happily do that; I am glad that the hon. Gentleman reminded me. It is in the notes and I hope that I should have reached it anyway. The reason for the differential is that most private sector prisons are more modern and are in a better position to cope with the pressures of overcrowding. However, of course none of us delights in an overcrowded prison system.

We have recently opened up a slight capacity gap, because fewer people are in prison today than a year ago—including far fewer women—which is a good sign that we are achieving a rebalanced system. I am pleased that because of that we have recently been able to take out some places from the more overcrowded prisons, and reduce overcrowding. I take that issue very seriously, but the reason for the differential is that private prisons tend to be more modern and can more easily deal with it.

Let me move on and address some of the urgent questions that my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby asked. We need to improve communication with staff and unions on the development of NOMS, especially in the early months. We have existing negotiating machinery between staff and the employers—the Prison Service and local probation boards. We also now have the national joint council, where trade unions can meet senior NOMS officials. We are seeking to develop a stakeholder forum in which representatives of all the organisations and agencies involved in NOMS can participate, ask questions, and debate issues with senior officials and Ministers so that we can get the benefit of their advice. The initial intention was to do that through the NOMS board. On reflection, I think it would be better to keep operational issues with the senior executive board within NOMS, but also to have a wider group of stakeholders so that we can have the benefit of their advice and wisdom.

I made it clear to the trade unions and staff that immediate dialogue with Ministers is also important. I want to have a kind of direct exchange with staff similar to that which we are having now.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the Minister give way?

Paul Goggins: I will not, as my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby has raised a number of questions and I want to answer as many of them as I can.

I hope that our fourfold approach will sustain better communications in future. In terms of organisational development, the 10 regional offender managers are now in place. My hon. Friend referred to there being a lack of consultation. Of course we could always consult more, but the fact is that we have had two formal consultations on NOMS, one on the original report by Patrick Carter, and another on the proposal for organisational change, which took place about a year ago, and which culminated in my deciding not to press ahead with what was proposed in the consultation document. I say to those who criticise the Home Office for not consulting and listening that we have had two formal consultations, one of which resulted in me changing my mind, so we are consulting and we are listening. Do we need to do more? Yes, and we will do more. That is important.

I have spoken about the development of offender management. I have been clear from the beginning that we have to get offender management on the ground and fully operational and making the impact that we know it can have. We have pilots in the north-west, and the probation service is in practice developing the split between offender management and interventions throughout the country. I am keen to make sure that that feeds through into the organisational design that will follow.

I want to make it clear to my hon. Friend that local connection is important. She rightly emphasised that on many occasions. I am proud that we have developed a coherent system of local partnerships across the criminal justice system; there are local crime and disorder reduction partnerships and local criminal justice boards, and all such partnerships are extremely important. NOMS will have a national structure and a regional profile, but it will also have to have that local connection.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the Minister give way?

Paul Goggins: I am not going to do so.

Mrs. Gillan: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can you advise me how I can ask the Minister to respond, outside this debate, to the serious points I have made about the risk register? In the light of the fact that this Parliament is about to be dissolved, would it be in order for him to have to write to Members who have taken part in this debate within 24 hours?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is quite in order for the Minister to offer to write to Members about such matters, but it is doubtful whether one could insist on his doing so within 24 hours.

Paul Goggins: I will, of course, make sure that any outstanding questions are answered.

I want to finish by addressing the important point on local connection. I recently launched the clean-up campaign, where local communities were able to determine—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has been extremely generous, and we have run out of time.

Cycling

3.30 pm

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): Like other hon. Members who are lucky enough to have secured a Back-Bench Adjournment debate, I am pleased to have such an opportunity. I wish to talk about sports cycling, and I want first to draw attention to the fact that I am proud to have been elected several times to the chair of the all-party parliamentary cycling group. My predecessors in that role have moved on to illustrious roles: my right hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) is now the Home Secretary and my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) is Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. I have been acting as adviser on sports cycling to the Minister for Sport and Tourism, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. As someone who has never taken a driving test, cycling is one of my main modes of transport.

While we were enjoying our Easter recess—perhaps eating chocolate—the cycling Team GB were in Los Angeles for the world championships. It is worth remembering that, as a result of reorganisation of the cycling calendar, the team has competed in three world championships during the past 20 months, the others being in Stuttgart and Melbourne. That is on top of two world cup campaigns and the 2004 Olympics in Athens where Team GB won four medals. It does not stop there: last week, the under-23 team took part in the tour of Majorca. It is worth bearing it in mind that this year was supposed to be a rest year following the Athens Olympics. Some rest.

We should congratulate the British cycling team because, at the world championship over Easter, it won six medals, including four gold medals—twice as many gold medals as the next best team. I wish to put on the record the gold medal success of Rob Hayles and Mark Cavendish in the Madison; Steve Cummings, Chris Newton, Rob Hayles, Paul Manning and Ed Clancy in the men's 4 km pursuit; Victoria Pendleton for winning the women's sprint, and Jamie Staff, Jason Queally and Chris Hoy in the men's sprint relay. Jason Queally gained a silver in the men's 1 km time trial and Chris Hoy won a bronze in the men's 1 km time trial.

As an hon. Member, it is always good to praise and welcome success that is built on the investment in facilities for the team based at the Manchester velodrome, which I was lucky enough to visit during the Commonwealth games in Manchester. It is possibly the best indoor track in the world. I welcome the recent announcement that there will be a new velodrome in east London, which will go ahead whether or not we are lucky enough to secure the Olympics for London in 2012, which I am sure we all hope will happen.

Mark Cavendish, Ed Clancy, Ross Edgar and Victoria Pendleton, four of the team at Los Angeles, are quite young and offer real hope for the future of cycling. It shows that, when we obtain top-class facilities, strong national organisation, funding for training and coaching, together with support for our athletes, Britons can be the best in the world. My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts would have been surprised if I had talked only about the success of sport cycling, much as I am tempted to do so. She will have expected me to say at least something about what more the Government can do, the fact that we can be even more successful in sport cycling and how cycling can achieve wider health and environmental objectives.

[Jane Griffiths]

This year, the national body for sport cycling, British Cycling, has undergone major restructuring, which places the emphasis on two ambitions: to achieve continued excellence—more medals—and to increase participation in cycling generally, not only competitively. Those two ambitions are inextricably linked, and the funding for the British Cycling Federation from UK Sport and Sport England reflects that. I believe that continued success can be delivered on both fronts, given adequate funding and support.

Cycling continues to prove itself to be one of the most successful Olympic sports. It is probably more accessible to the young and the less advantaged than other successful Olympic sports in Britain, such as rowing, sailing, equestrian sports and so on. That is something that leaders in the sport are always uncomfortable about saying, because of the need to maintain good relations with other sports and the sports councils that fund them, but I feel that I can say it. Nevertheless, the truth is that investment in the sport and activity of cycling will contribute far more to all our key Government health agendas than will most other sports.

We are more likely to achieve real, sustainable increases in participation by getting people to ride to school or work, or to the shops, and that should be funded accordingly more than almost any other comparable sport. It is unlikely that healthy activity will arise from people rowing to school, sailing to work or riding a horse to the shops, commendable as rowing, sailing and riding are. That is not to say that GB does not already do quite well in the funding stakes, but there is an argument that we should do even better.

Cycling is also the only sport that contributes to our transport and environment agendas, so real encouragement for cycling to school and work would repay massively in those areas. Despite that, however, the funding made available by the Department for Transport for Cycling England is insignificant in the extreme. The new document published jointly by the Department of Health and the DCMS, "Choosing Activity: a physical action plan", features cycling to school on the front cover and refers throughout to cycling in various forms as being beneficial to health. But how is the sport expected to make that happen if no funding of any consequence is available?

Cycling as a sport is traditionally seen as a road-based activity, but increases in traffic and the speed of traffic make cycling on the roads ever more difficult. It is also more difficult and expensive than it needs to be, because I am sorry to say that the Home Office continues to drag its feet over the event safety guidance project. Both my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) and I have asked questions about that in recent years, but there still appears to be little or no progress.

Although sport cycling has traditionally been seen as a road sport, young people are much more likely to use their bikes off main roads. BMX has a great role to play in getting younger people interested in competitive cycling, some of whom will get involved in that sport. I am pleased that due recognition has been given to BMX, which will be part of the Beijing Olympics. It is pleasing that BMX has become part of the lottery-funded GB cycling team.

In January Team GB appointed its first full-time national BMX coach, Jeremy Hayes, who has been involved in the sport virtually since the first explosion of interest in the early '80s. He has said:

> "The talent's already there in this country. We just need to get the best riders on board and get them working with proper training programmes."

He is right. I hope that the higher profile of BMX—particularly if the investment by Team GB in the sport results in medals in Beijing—will encourage the many teenagers and younger people I see riding their bikes around Reading to use facilities such as those in Hills Meadow and get more active in the sport.

In the face of increasing problems in continuing to use the roads for racing, British Cycling has positively, and with a fair degree of success, sought to move more events to closed-road circuits, but, unfortunately, suitable facilities are few and far between. Funding for refurbishment of tracks and small facilities has come on-stream recently and will continue in a modest way, but the real investment needs to be in multi-sport, multi-discipline facilities such as those in Preston. There are also ready-made facilities that we could use as a nation, such as motor-racing circuits and redundant airfields, but they are usually commercially run, often making the cost of hiring prohibitive.

Cycling is consistently the first or second most popular out-of-school activity, along with football, and most young people own bicycles. The recently published "UK Strategy Framework: For Women And Sport" rates cycling as the fourth most popular sport and/or physical activity for women. Despite that, cycling is not a curriculum activity and does not receive the promotion or funding that, for example, swimming receives as a life skill. In fact, the amount of cycling training in schools is declining rather than increasing.

A child not properly trained to ride a bike is far more likely to have a related accident on the road than one not trained to swim is to have an accident in water. As the governing body for cycling, British Cycling is funded to provide coaching and skills training for young people, but it is not funded to train them to cycle safely on the roads.

I accept that parents also have a responsibility. It is not enough to give a child a bike, buy them a helmet and let them go off. I spent a long time teaching my children to cycle on the roads, riding with them and talking with them about what was happening. We are not born with road sense. It takes time and experience to be able to be out safely in traffic. Parents have a responsibility to ensure that their children have that knowledge and experience before letting them out on the roads. Getting involved in sports cycling in a safe environment is a good way of learning about riding and getting training in riding on the road.

As well as the work with regard to BMX that I mentioned, British Cycling has been given a target to encourage younger people to get involved, which everyone must welcome. As part of that, British Cycling has instituted the very good Go-Ride programme. The programme has a website providing information about the various branches of sports cycling, where they happen and the type of clothing typically needed to take part in the sports, so that parents can help their children to get active in an appropriate way.

The programme also provides training with properly trained coaches at clubs around the UK. Clubs receive the clubmark accreditation, which recognises duty of care and child protection, to ensure that club officials are trained and have the resources to deal effectively with child protection issues, and ensures that the club runs safe, structured, regular coaching activities and competition for young people. The scheme also ensures that the club is an open and inclusive environment, so that every club member can achieve their full potential, and that finance, planning, communication and development are properly addressed.

I have had the pleasure of seeing the scheme in action in my constituency, where the Palmer Park Velo club has provided training to young people since 1990. It now has 65 members aged from five to 16, boys and girls, who range from beginners to national standard achievers. The club runs training sessions at the Palmer Park track every Saturday, except for two weeks a year, as well as off-road rides, road rides and club championships.

Further to that work, a new coach has been appointed for the best British junior riders. Darren Tudor has been set the task of achieving the same success with the junior riders as has been achieved with the under-23s and the full squad. He has said:

"We'll be looking to give the juniors a more structured, year round approach, lots of skill based work, particularly on the track, with junior year two riders looking to performing at world championship level".

I am pleased that there has already been a get-together of some of our best juniors for a week of activities and coaching in half term. The event was a huge success, which underlines the depth of young talent now coming through.

As I think I have shown, cycling as a sport has enjoyed unprecedented success in the past eight years and can claim to be one of the most successful Olympic sports in terms of return on the investment of lottery funding, if not the most successful. Such value for money is borne out by the National Audit Office report, "UK Sport: Supporting elite athletes". The report shows that of the four sports—athletics, swimming, rowing and cycling—that receive the bulk of the funding, cycling, with the return of one medal for every £2 million, was the most cost-effective. The advantages of using that success as an inspiration to young people, and the not-so-young seeking better health, are easy to see. If we succeed in that, and get more people riding bikes, for whatever purpose, more often, we will make a meaningful contribution in such key areas as health, environment, transport and education.

It is obvious that there would be long-term benefits if the Departments responsible for those areas could link with the DCMS to commit serious funds to the promotion of cycling as a sport, as a means of transport and as a way of life, instead of focusing on roads and railways—and then needing more hospitals.

3.46 pm

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) on having secured this debate, and thank her for the work that she has done on this issue throughout her time in Parliament. We in the DCMS know of her interest and we are grateful for her support. I thank her for her work in the all-party group and on cycling matters in Parliament, and wish her well in the future.

My hon. Friend tells a good story. The person who would normally respond in a debate such as this, the Minister for Sport and Tourism, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), is overseas lobbying for us to have the Olympics, so he cannot be with us. That has given me the opportunity to think about cycling, and there does seem to be a good tale to tell. I understand my hon. Friend's wish for the Government to provide further financial support, and I appreciate her desire to keep the sport at the top of the agenda. I do not think that there is much difference in our views on the importance of cycling, the recognition of what has been achieved and the need to go further.

Let me start by re-emphasising my hon. Friend's points about the areas of our lives to which cycling makes a contribution. It is a sport. Not everybody can practise it at elite standards and win medals, but most children—indeed, most people at some point in their lives—enjoy riding bicycles. Even if they are racing down the road or in the park, it is a sport for them. It fulfils that role, and my hon. Friend is right to point out that at a time when the Government, with the whole nation, are worried about keeping children active and making sure that they remain active beyond their school years, reducing obesity levels and improving fitness, cycling has a key role to play.

Almost as important, if not more, is transport. If we could get more people to cycle rather than to drive cars, many of our problems would be solved. I accept the centrality of cycling, old activity though it may be, to much of the modern political, social, economic and health agenda.

I also congratulate the UK cycling team. Even as somebody who does not particularly follow the sport, I remember the team's success at the last Olympic games. That shot cycling to the top of the television agenda and gave everybody an opportunity to appreciate not only the energy and skill that goes into the sport, but the fine record of the UK's cycling athletes. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for informing the House of the team's subsequent successes, and I know that our cyclists will be planning for the next Olympics. It is good to record our congratulations to them and our appreciation not only of what they have done for cycling, but of their contribution to national esteem—sporting success does that.

It is a good story, and cycling as a sport is on the increase. It is moving forward; it is not in decline, nor is it getting less money, and it is not as though fewer people are winning medals, or as though our national or international reputation is diminished—it is going in the right direction. If there is anything to debate for the future, it is how much support to give—how well different Departments should organise themselves to support cycling—and therefore how much further progress we can make.

[Estelle Morris]

Let me explain some of the ways in which the Government support cycling, particularly the elite sport in which people cycle competitively, to win medals. Sport England has given £2.9 million to British cycling for sports talent development, and to support the network responsible for the development of clubs, competitions and schools activity. My understanding is that the bid was for £3 million. To secure £2.9 million out of £3 million is, quite frankly, a record that I have not seen matched in my eight years in government. So someone somewhere recognises the value of cycling. It will certainly be spent well and will help to support the sport as it approaches the next Olympics.

I was delighted that the sport has also secured £7.9 million of funding from UK Sport, an organisation supporting talented athletes. Also, 11 individual athletes receive £3,000 of financial support as part of the talented athlete scholarship scheme. We can see from the medals that have been won that the money has been well invested. Given the rigour with which UK Sport has reallocated its resources to those sports from which it feels medals can be gained as a result of the investment, the amount that the sport has got is a tribute to its record.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right that unless we maintain the facilities and invest in them now, we will find that we have been resting on our laurels and Olympic and competitive glory will become a thing of the past. She is absolutely right to say that we need to invest in training, in facilities, in our young people and in opportunities for them if we are to make sure that cycling retains its standard. I want to put on record the work being done with facilities. I was pleased to read that £2.9 million has been allocated to the community club development programme, under which 16 sports have been selected to receive public money for developing the community programme. That will support additional clubs.

I do not know whether my hon. Friend is aware that a further £40 million has been allocated by Sport England to that programme, and although no further money has been allocated to cycling, that extra money has not been allocated. I cannot read anyone's mind, but in coming months cycling and the community club development part of the programme may well be able to access some of that further £40 million.

I wondered also about hopes for the future. I agree with my hon. Friend that, to some extent, the trick lies in making sure that we have multidisciplinary sports facilities where a number of sports can take place. Once we get people in there, we can attract them to particular sports because the facilities are there. In future months, the DCMS will work with local authorities to make sure that we know where the sports facilities are, what state they are in, whether they are where people need them and whether they are supporting the sports that we should support. The Government are not ready to make an announcement about that; we have to do the spade-work. I very much hope that an item for the next Parliament will be a sizeable amount of work being done on investing in local authorities' multi-sports facilities.

Our aim is that no one should live too far from one of these multidisciplinary sports facilities, so that they can access it as part of their normal lives. People will want to monitor that and make sure that cycling is represented in those facilities. As far as my hon. Friend's concerns go, that might be the best avenue for trying to influence people and make sure that cycling continues to be represented.

Like my hon. Friend, I was delighted to hear the Lord Mayor of London's announcement that, whether or not we get the Olympics for 2012—and let us hope that we do—the velopark will be built in the Lower Lee valley. That will include a 1,500-seat velodrome, an outdoor cycle speedway circuit, a 1.6 km road-racing circuit, an international competition BMX freestyle path and a cross-country mountain bike course. That is exactly the type of facility that I am sure my hon. Friend would like to see in every area so that people can access one wherever they live. I cannot promise that; it is not likely to happen in the foreseeable future, but an early commitment to building that facility in the Lower Lee valley, come what may of the Olympic bid, is a sign of the commitment of many decision makers who are allocating resources for sport across the country.

I want to move on to involving young people in cycling. My hon. Friend mentioned this at different points in her speech. It is also good to know that cycling has been included in the 22 sports that are delivering the Club Links programme as part of the very successful national strategy for PE, School Sport and Club Links.

Young people drop out of sport and physical activity when they leave school, so we must bridge the gap and ensure that they do not fall when they enter different parts of their life. My hon. Friend will know that this initiative ensures that clubs make links with schools so that the transition from sport in school to sport in an amateur club is almost seamless and that young people are caught before they must make a choice between school work and non-school work.

Some £85,000 has been secured for cycling clubs to make links with schools. Again, I hope that my hon. Friend views that as a bold attempt to work with amateur clubs to ensure that they attract as many young people as they can. I am particularly pleased to see that £50,000 has been made available for the young volunteers scheme, which includes cycling for young people.

My hon. Friend also talked about training, on which we can probably do some work. It is silly to set up different bodies and not encourage them to work together on a national standard for cycle training. I am told that work is being done to ensure that people from different committees at least sit on other people's committees so that the knowledge that each can build up is pooled. The strategy group that is working on the national standard for cycle training needs to work carefully with each of the other cycling bodies. I am told that the first step has been taken and that cross-representation has been secured. My hon. Friend also mentioned Cycling England. She acknowledged that this sport does not exactly aim for Olympic medals but aims to improve our lives by making transport more cycle-friendly and encouraging more people to travel by bicycle, as she does, rather than by car.

My hon. Friend also mentioned the £5 million from the Department of Trade and Industry. One could argue that that does not seem like much, but it is a start. I shall rattle through what the other Departments have done.

She said that they had not provided any money to join the scheme. That is true, although the Department for Education and Skills has put £20 million a year into the Travelling to School programme. It will not all go into cycling, but if someone is seriously thinking about how children travel to school, cycling must be one of the ways forward.

The Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), has just turned up for the next Adjournment debate. We can thank him for the £1 billion that is going to primary care trusts in the next year three years to implement public health measures. Again, that £1 billion will not be spent solely on cycling, but cycling must claim its place among the public health measures on which that money will be spent. As my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East says, cycling contributes to the health agenda.

The Department for Transport has given £10 million for the Links to Schools programme to provide access to schools for the existing national cycle network. The DFES has given £20 million in grants for facilities that could include cycle policies, including the provision of lockers.

This is the beginning. I do not pretend that those millions of pounds will go only to cycling, but it sends a signal that government, which is sometimes incredibly cumbersome and slow to respond to what needs to be done, is beginning to show across Departments that money is being invested in cycling as well as in other things. That is key.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that we know that we have succeeded when the Department of Health and the DFES automatically include cycling in the planning and development of their policies and consider what it can contribute. I sense from the words that she used and the tone of her speech that she knows that progress has been made. In return, however, I equally accept that more progress must be made. It is a tribute to her work on this issue during her time in Parliament that the debate that she has secured today and her wise words to the House will be picked up by future Members who choose to take an interest in this subject on behalf of their constituents, and by Ministers who know that cycling can make a contribution to each of their agendas. I thank her for giving us an opportunity to debate it today.

East Sussex Hospitals Trust

4 pm

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): It is a great pleasure to have secured what I understand is the last Westminster Hall debate of this Parliament and possibly of this Government. I am delighted to see the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman). I am sure that he is aware of the problems faced by my local hospitals trust, so I will not have to go through them in great detail. I have raised them in questions in the House, as well as in a recent meeting with the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton).

In a nutshell, we have faced some difficult problems over recent weeks and months, particularly in my local hospital, Eastbourne District General hospital. More than 140 operations have been cancelled on the day of the operation. Bed blocking is still double the national average and has been significantly higher than that. People have been turned away from the accident and emergency department, and I am continuing my campaign to ensure that the A and E department stays open 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Things began to get difficult back in early March. On 3 March, the local trust issued a press release following its board meeting, in which it talked about the extreme pressure that the hospital is under. It said that the trust had been working at a 97 per cent. average bed occupancy rate for the past six weeks, way above the recommended bed occupancy rates. Emergency admissions were up more than 6 per cent. on the same time last year; 158 operations had been cancelled on the day of surgery, and many more a day or two in advance.

That obviously raised some difficult issues, including one of three possible options decided by the board at one stage: the closure of an A and E department during times of severe pressure. That clearly attracted a lot of local interest, and was followed up some days later by a letter from the chief executive, Annette Sergeant, setting out the background. As she put it:

> "When levels of bed occupancy reach into the upper 90s risks of clinical errors become unacceptably high."

Again, she talked about closing an A and E department to give some respite. She stressed that that was to be a last resort, and, as she said:

> "I would only take this decision if it was my view, and that of my clinical colleagues, that not to do so would compromise patient safety."

She referred to the ongoing problem, which seems to have been perennial rather than to have existed only since March, of so-called bed blocking in our local hospitals. That has obviously caused a lot of human problems. A number of constituents have come to me who have had their operations cancelled once or several times. One can only imagine the stress that that produces. People have to get psyched up for an operation, and in some cases they have even gone into hospital at the allotted time and then had to go home again.

There have also been problems with people being turned away from the A and E department. The local paper referred to the case of a Seaford man who had a stroke. The ambulance taking him to the Eastbourne

[Mr. Nigel Waterson]

District General hospital had to be diverted because there were no beds, and he was taken to the Conquest hospital in Hastings. That meant that he had to travel almost 30 miles to hospital after suffering a stroke. Matters had become extremely serious.

As I said, I had a constructive meeting with the Minister of State to discuss the various options. One of the decisions that she had taken at that stage was to put a recovery and support unit into the local NHS to try to find some solutions. It is also interesting that there is a short-term solution: on the day that I visited A and E, I found that some 19 patients had been removed that very morning and placed in nursing and care homes. It seems that, somehow, despite the background of deficits right across the local health economy and the pressures, which I will come on to in more detail, on local social services, funds were found that day to spirit 19 patients out of the hospital. It clearly made a significant difference, in A and E as well as in the medical assessment unit and other wards. We will see in a moment how long term that improvement is likely to be.

Only a few days ago, the issue came up in Health questions. I am sorry to say that the suggestion was made by some Labour and Liberal Democrat Members—even more sadly, it was endorsed by the Minister—that it was somehow the fault of the Tory-run county council. That was unfortunate, because it is not true. Since the present administration took over in East Sussex, its top priority has been helping older people. It has modernised by investing an extra 35 per cent. in services for older people during its four years, despite receiving only 1 per cent. extra in grant from the Government if one excludes the extra funds passported to education.

The county council has tried very hard to persuade the local health bodies to work jointly and also to find alternatives to hospital admission, which in some cases seems inappropriate. In particular—I would be grateful if the Minister were to comment on this specific point—it has been pressing hard for health bodies to be able to invest the fines money paid by the county council in new services as a better alternative to hospital admission. I understand that that is what many other health organisations are doing.

It is particularly unfortunate that the Minister of State forgot herself at Health questions—forgot, perhaps, that she is a Minister of the Crown whose job is to look after health care rather than make cheap political points. Had she thought for a moment, far from putting the blame at the door of East Sussex county council, she would have remembered that, according to the Commission for Social Care Inspection, East Sussex is the most improved social services authority in the country. She, or those advising her, might also have glanced at the recent Audit Commission review, "Elderly Care in East Sussex", which in broad terms finds that East Sussex social services has been doing its bit for care of the elderly but that health has much more to do. I am told that East Sussex county council has accepted the Audit Commission's conclusions in full and is encouraging health organisations to do the same.

Despite the pooling of some funds to help with the immediate problem, which may have coincided with my arrival at A and E, the county council is dubious about whether putting more money into the system will solve the problem. It feels that beds will fill up again as soon as they are empty, and that council tax would spiral as a result, hitting older and more vulnerable people. Not unreasonably, it points to the whole systems review by the Audit Commission, to which I referred. It also points to the fact that in the financial year just ended the county council funded an additional 100 residential and nursing home placements at a cost of £3 million from its own resources. In March, it agreed to a further 40 placements, to be funded jointly with primary care trust partners. However, it says:

"This does not however address the underlying cause of the problem".

The primary care trust, which has a crucial role in all this, has told me of its position; apart from anything else, it has "severe financial difficulties". It was looking to end the year with a deficit of £980,000. It is not the only trust in that situation. The last projection I saw for the East Sussex hospitals trust, which includes my hospital, was a forecast for a £4.7 million overspend at the year end.

There is a difficulty. I wager that the Minister will say, "Yes, it is important that all those bodies work together to try to solve the problem." If, as I believe, the underlying cause of the problem is underfunding, of both health and social care, it is no wonder that those bodies are often at each other's throats, blaming each other for the present situation. Anyone who knew anything about it—I served on the Committee that dealt with the Community Care (Delayed Discharges etc.) Bill—would have known that the system of fines would only exacerbate relationships between organisations that should be working closely together to solve the problem.

I have three main points to put to the Minister. The first is about the deficits. I have already explained that, for some time, all the health organisations in my area have been struggling with substantial deficits. There is a rumour going around that Ministers are themselves telephoning chief executives in some parts of the country demanding that they eliminate their deficits by the year's end. I have no evidence for that, but I have no evidence to the contrary either. At Health questions I asked the Minister of State whether she could "assure me and my constituents that no one is putting any pressure on the trust to reduce the deficit at this very difficult time?"—[Official Report, 22 March 2005; Vol. 432, c. 728.]

I believe that it is significant, although I am open to persuasion, that she made no attempt to answer that direct question and merely talked about the importance of local agencies working together.

My first specific question for the Under-Secretary is this: can he answer that question? Is any pressure being put by Ministers, the strategic health authority or anyone else on my local health authority to eliminate deficits, particularly if, at this delicate time, it could be at the expense of patient care? Although I do not complain, I remain somewhat mystified how, all of a sudden, these organisations, all of which seem to have historic deficits, were able to find money for those 40 extra placements.

Secondly, I ask the Minister of State, through the Under-Secretary, to reconsider her attitude to this issue and try to remove the party political stuff, which intruded at Health questions. I have already made the point that her own inspectorate gave an extra star to East Sussex social services and that the Audit Commission in its report came out in favour of the social services department and said that the health organisations could and should do more. I have already indicated how the Conservative-controlled county council has set as a priority increasing spending on older people's services. If the Under-Secretary really believes that the problem lies with social services, why on earth did the Minister of State decide to put in the recovery and support unit, which I assume is there to deal with health issues and not social services?

Thirdly, will the Under-Secretary or other Ministers seriously consider in the medium term the question of underfunding? East Sussex has the highest concentration of people aged over 85 in the country, yet this year it received the smallest increase in grant of any county. There simply is not enough money to go around. The Government seem content to allow the various health bodies and the county council to squabble over the limited resources available. My constituents and I think that it is time for this blame game to stop. It is played out week after week in my local paper. I am heartily sick of it.

I mentioned the funding that was discovered for 40 extra placements only a couple of weeks or so ago. It is perfectly true that there was a short-term improvement after some funding was found recently. I described that at the time as a sticking-plaster solution. I note from the latest figures from the trust that the figures for bed blocking are creeping up again. Bed blocking in Eastbourne is twice the national average. The percentage this week in Eastbourne is 6.1 per cent—30 beds—which is an increase of six from only last week. I fear that we are slowly getting back to the position we were in when this crisis blew up at the beginning of March.

I ask the Under-Secretary to think again about the funding issue. The problem will not go away. He may go away and I may go away, but the problem will remain. Whichever Minister of whatever party is in his place after 5 May they will still have to tackle it. For the moment I am not going to give up and neither will my constituents.

4.14 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I congratulate the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) on his interest in the NHS and on securing this debate. I am always bemused in these debates when Conservative Members start off by making an overtly political comment about the result of the next general election and bury numerous other political comments in their speeches, yet say constantly that they want to avoid party political fighting and want some form of consensual politics.

If the hon. Gentleman had really wanted that, he could have set an example. He could have emphasised the massive reinvestment in the national health service: overall expenditure in the NHS has roughly doubled since 1997, and it will have trebled by 2008. He could have mentioned the fact that social services departments around the country have been given a real-terms increase of a little under 30 per cent. in their budgets since 1997. I shall come on to some more specific figures about the massively increased resources that we have made available since 1997. What would be the state of the hon. Gentleman's local health and social services if we were still working to the spending plans envisaged by the last Conservative Government? He would certainly have had something to complain about.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman in that I believe his local trust is experiencing some significant challenges. However, I would argue that it is trying to respond to them, and I do not think that it is helped when the hon. Gentleman raises the issue of a contingency plan to close the local accident and emergency department. He knows—he has been assured by the local authority—that that was purely an in-extremis contingency plan. If the capacity of the A and E department had reached such a point that people could no longer be treated sensibly, a contingency plan was in place; that A and E department might have been closed temporarily and people diverted to one with more capacity. That has never happened, and the hon. Gentleman knows that it is never likely to happen. He should not try to misrepresent the status of that plan.

I should like to pay tribute to all the staff of the local NHS, who are working very hard to deal with the issues that the hon. Gentleman has raised. I shall come in a moment to some of the ways in which they are thinking of doing that. As the hon. Gentleman rightly emphasised, there are two partners: the NHS and the local council. In his eyes the NHS is, of course, largely to blame for the problems, while the local council struggles gamely to try to deal with them in the face of an uncaring NHS.

Has the hon. Gentleman's analysis of the situation something to do with the fact that the council is Conservative, whereas through the NHS he can try to pass the blame on to the Labour Government? In preparing for this speech, I received an e-mail from one of the hon. Gentleman's constituents. I shall not give his name, because I do not have his permission to use it. However, I have checked the information in the e-mail and can vouch for its accuracy. It says:

"The Commission for Social Care Inspection: Performance Assessment Framework Reports November 2004 on East Sussex County Council's social services department show that ESCC is not investing enough in the older peoples' services and have been among the lowest providers across the country for some time. The comparative data shows that East Sussex County Council is the 17th worst performer in the country for delayed transfers of care. The Council's funding of home care is even worse. For intensive home care as a percentage of home and residential care the Council's performance is the 9th worst in the country. The Council is the 5th worst performer in the country for the percentage of households receiving intensive home care and the 11th worst performer in the country for helping older people to live at home. This is out of a total of 150 local authorities providing social services"— what follows is the only bit of the e-mail that I disagree with—

"many of them in areas far more deprived than East Sussex is."

I would argue that almost all are in areas far more deprived than East Sussex. My correspondent goes on:

"The figures also show that ESCC performance is rock bottom when the Council is compared with the 13 local authorities who are similar to it. For supported admissions of older people to residential and nursing care, East Sussex County Council is the third lowest performer. For helping older people to Eve at home, it is the second lowest performer; and for intensive home care as a percentage of home and residential care, the Council is actually the lowest performer of the 13 authorities with which it is compared."

[Dr. Stephen Ladyman]

The correspondent goes on to say that that data

"is also reproduced in the recent Audit Commission presentation on 'Whole System Review of Services for Older People in East Sussex'," to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

So, we have a clear picture of a county council social services department that, whatever its intentions for the future, has not been punching its weight or delivering its side of the equation: to ensure that there is capacity in the local community for people to be discharged from hospital without delay when that is in their interests. If social services is not prioritising that capacity, it is no wonder that the sort of problems that the hon. Gentleman identified arise. We must accept that the performance of social services has been lamentable.

Mr. Waterson: The Minister throws around words such as "lamentable"—$10 words that are the flavour of the moment—but why did the social services get an extra star from the inspectorate, and why is he quoting an anonymous member of the public who seems to have done a lot of research, rather than what the Department thinks? Does he agree with the Minister of State that the county council has a deliberate policy to block beds? That is a serious allegation that has yet to be sustained.

Dr. Ladyman: I quote those figures because I checked them against the official statistics and found that the correspondent is well informed and that the information is accurate. The county council could have gained an extra star for a multitude of reasons. Social services also provides services for children, and it is entirely possible—I speculate only; I would have to look at the figures—that it got its extra star for improving its care of children rather than that of older people.

The hon. Gentleman assures me that social services will try to do more to increase capacity in the local community for older people, which I applaud if it is the case. I hope that it will work better with the local health services on delayed discharges.

The hon. Gentleman mentions the use of the delayed discharge grant and the way in which several authorities have done deals with local health services to invest that money in capacity in the local area. East Sussex seems to believe that if that money is invested in local capacity, that will put a cap on its exposure to delayed discharges, but it does not; it does not do that anywhere in the country. I have made it absolutely clear that delayed discharge fines should be audited and that if they exceed the agreed amount to be invested in the local community, the council must pay the fines to the NHS, because the NHS is paying the cost of keeping people in acute beds when their care should be in the local community.

The hon. Gentleman does not like the delayed discharge legislation, but if his party were to win the general election would it repeal it? The legislation has saved about 1 million bed nights a year since it and the Government's efforts to reduce delayed discharges were introduced. That is the equivalent of eight or nine large district general hospitals. It is a massive success. Experts around the world have identified England—other parts of the UK did not introduce the legislation—as the only country in the world on track to remove delayed discharges from our hospitals.

East Sussex is the one area about which I constantly hear it said that the delayed discharge legislation is not working and a fight continues between health and social care. Everywhere else, people have managed to make arrangements that work better as a result of the legislation. East Sussex council seems to have set its face against allowing it to work. I encourage the council and local health partners to get into a room together and work out how to make it better for them. If they can do that by ensuring that the more than £1 million that East Sussex has already been given from the delayed discharges grant this year works better for the benefit of local people, that is all to the good.

In addition to social services, it is important that we move ahead and try to do what we can to improve things in the health service for the benefit of the hon. Gentleman's constituents. In the spirit of "Shifting the Balance of Power" such decisions must be taken locally; Ministers no longer take them centrally. I am pleased to say that the Surrey and Sussex strategic health authority is working with the acute trust and relevant health and social care partners to address the issue of cancelled operations that was raised by the hon. Gentleman. I have received assurance from the local NHS that cancellations, when they do occur, are handled sensitively, that people receive personal calls from officials of the trust, and that every possible effort is made to reschedule patients within 28 days. Currently, the trust is able to reschedule about 50 per cent. of cancellations, but it is working to try to increase that to 100 per cent. as soon as possible.

Leaders of the local health and social care organisations met in early March to discuss the operational problems faced by the hospital, and to urgently review local arrangements to manage the discharge of care. Some measures have been designed to help to address those problems and to free up beds. Improved intermediate care is one option that the local health and social care economy is considering. For example, I am pleased to say that Eastbourne Downs primary care trust has worked with social services to develop a 21-bed intermediate care facility funded by the NHS and social services. There are also proposals for the PCT to integrate purchasing of places in the independent sector with that of social services, to ensure effective and efficient use of the independent sector capacity that is available.

Bexhill and Rother primary care trust and Hastings and St. Leonard's primary care trust are funding the post of intermediate care co-ordinator to become substantive from 1 April 2005. The co-ordinator will have an ongoing specific brief to develop a single point of access to intermediate care services. Sussex Downs and Weald primary care trust is increasing the capacity of discharge co-ordinators based in the community who work with the acute trusts to identify patients who are appropriate for support in the community.

In addition to intermediate care, other proposals include plans to ensure that rapid access diagnostics facilities are available, so that the length of stay is as brief as possible and that hospital-avoidance initiatives are effective, and plans to use locality-based commissioning to engage GPs in active referral management, with a view to reducing hospitalisation rates.

Furthermore, I am advised that health and social care partners will meet on Friday 8 April to agree and sign off a joint action plan, which was compiled following the Audit Commission review of older people's services in East Sussex.

Although there are challenges at present—I agreed earlier with the hon. Gentleman that that was the case—I hope that he will accept that progress is being made, but that it must be made by both partners. Health and social care must work together.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the issue of resources. In the past two years, an extra £100 million has been added to the access and systems capacity grant to local councils to improve the quality and range of local authority community services. In East Sussex, the council received £4.8 million for that grant last year and £6.2 million this year. That money is entirely intended to build up the social care capacity of the local community to allow it to deal better with those types of problems. The health service in East Sussex has also benefited from significant additional resources: between 2005–06 and 2007–08, the four PCTs in East Sussex will receive an increase of more than £111 million for health care services.

The hon. Gentleman also talked about deficits. All NHS organisations, including those in East Sussex, have received a fair share of resources. However, if that is the case, they have a corresponding responsibility to manage those effectively. It is now the responsibility of strategic health authorities to deliver overall financial balance for their local health communities and to ensure that each NHS organisation achieves financial balance. Therefore, when the hon. Gentleman raises the issue of deficits he must face the fact that if I waved a magic wand and cleared the debts, that money would have to come from someone else's health care economy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

It being half-past Four o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.